preading to other cities and her rtistry maturing. The numbers which he wil sing with the orchestra are amina's aria from Mozart's "Magic lute" and "Depuis le Jour" from harpentier's "Louise."

POST JAN. 3

VARIEGATED HARVEST FROM THE WEEK-END

The Symphony Orchestra Excels Most of Its Music—Familiar Dependables at the Copley-Plaza — Quasi-Novelty from the Handel and Haydn Society — Miss Howell, Pleasing Singer—An "American Concerto"—Impending Programmes

THERE is no occasion to be severe with the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. It gave placid pleasure to a somewhat smaller audience than usually then and there assembles. Once more came clear token of the progress of the orchestra along the course to which Mr. Monteux deviatingly and tirelessly holds it. Good to hear were its plasticity, euphony and transparency of tone in Beethoven's first symphony; its sprightly progress and light, lithe accents in Roger-Ducasse's French Suite. Rather, the concert, like that of the week before, missed the exhilaration of the ten predecessors by none too stimulating a programme. Beethoven's eighteenth-century Symphony was a bit too much of music of a period after Haydn's Military Symphony seven days before. Franck's tone-poem of "The Jinns" is more industrious than inspired; and if we are to hear Regerian music thick with counterpoint and a multitude of instrumental voices seldom stilled and rarely parted, Reger himself—say in the Hiller Variations—is more to be desired than the plodding Mr. Bingham of the Passacaglia. The champions of American composers because they are American assert that mediocre French and German pieces find place in symphony concerts in the United States. They surely do; but so also do mediocre American numbers; while nationality in all three instances is scant soothing to the chafing listener. As in the week before a piece resurrected from the repertory was savor to the concert—Roger-Ducasse' French Suite, deft and compact, fertile spirited and for ten years—the more th pity!—left on the shelves. Perhaps it i too much to ask of Mr. Monteux a stirring programme every week; the best of us sag in a long job; but he himself set the pace and valiantly.

TRANS. JAN. 24

PENSION FUND CONCERT

At the pension fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, the programme in detail is now announced as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers," prelude to "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhauser," and the Bacchanale as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of singers will be members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by Agide Jacchia. There will also be played "The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyries," the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," strikingly sad music in which there is a brilliant English horn solo, one of the most famous passages ever written for that beautiful instrument, and finally the excerpts from "The Ring," "Siegfried's Passage Through the Circle of Fire to Brunnhilde's Rock," from the third act of "Siegfried," and the "Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey of Siegfried," which makes the prelude to "The Dusk of the Gods."

POST JAN. 26

THERE WILL BE 101 IN ENSEMBLE

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Concert Here on Feb. 20.

SPECIAL TRAIN IS HIRED

First Appearance of Full Orchestra in 10 Years.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Brockton, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 20, in the City Theatre, will be the first appearance of the full orchestra of 101 men in this city for 10 years. That a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert may be an annual event here is the desire of the managers, W. H. Brennan and G. E. Judd. Such cities as Lawrence, Lowell, Providence, Lynn and Haverhill are already included in the itinerary of cities visited by the orchestra, and it is hoped Brockton may be added to the list.

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor.

The concert promises to be exceptional. The orchestra ensemble will be composed of 101 musicians, with Pierre Monteux, conductor, regarding whose ability and personal magnetism musical critics have only words of admiration, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster and violin soloist. Mr. Burgin is already known to Brocktonians, having appeared with Mme. Florence Ferrell in a recent concert in City Theatre.

That the coming of the orchestra to Brockton is a task for which an army general might be particularly fitted is evidenced by the arrangements.

Special Train Is Engaged.

There will be a special train to convey the orchestra to and from Brockton, permission for which was secured through the State board of public utilities, A. A. Highlands secretary. Three applications were also necessary before the concert could be given, one the local permit signed by Mayor Keith.

There will also be a baggage car and two baggage men in addition to the passenger car and with the orchestra Manager Brennan and Judd, the conductor, librarian, and others, will include a personnel of nearly 125.

The afternoon hour, the concert to commence at 3:15, continuing for two hours, was felt to be more satisfactory than the evening. This will be more advantageous to out of town patrons who are beginning to turn to Brockton more and more for good concerts and will not conflict with evening events in the city proper.

The special number on the programme, which will be one of the orchestra's best, will be Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, "From the New World." Op. 95. This remarkable symphony was written by Dvorak on returning from America. In his composition he embodied American motifs in music, especially the famous negro spiritual, "Swing, Low Sweet Chariot." In the four movements of the symphony some characteristic American musical themes are brought out. A horn solo is a feature.

The "Tannhauser" Overture.

Other numbers will include Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser, which in the series of pop conc rt given last season by the orchestr was second in the demand for re quest numbers. The famous "Concert for Violin in E Minor," Op. 64, by Mendelssohn, will be given and "Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody in A Major, Oi 11, No. 1.

Some of the principal artists of th orchestra, several of whom have a peared here are Alfred Holy, eight season as first harp; Albert San seventh season as first clarine Georges Mager, second season as fir trumpet; Ferdinand Thillois, third se son as leader of second violins; Ca
Hampe, 29th season as first trombone; Georges Longy, 23d season as firs oboe; Julius Theodorowicz, second season as second concert master; Stefan Neumann, 11th season as firs tympani; George Wendler, 12th sea son as first horn; Georges Laurent third season as first flute; Jean Be detti, second season as first 'cello;
Max Kunze, 10th season as first bass; Abdon Laus, third season as firs bassoon.

BROSKTON-ENTEPRISE JAN 27

AFTER MANY DAYS CARPENTE BALLET-MUSIC

"The Birthday of the Infanta" to Played by the Symphony Orchest
The Hoffmann Quartet from Smetan Schumann—Vaughan Williams's "I
don Symphony" Near—Mr. Mengell Carries the Day—Items, Incidents, O
ions

AT last Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," will be heard, though not seen, in Boston. From the music for the stage he has drawn a Suite for the concert-hall, to be played at the Symphony Concerts of next week. If recollection and information do not slip, he has made few material omissions in this transfer, so that we shall hear, virtually "in entirety," the venture of a highly individual American composer into a field little cultivated by his fellows. By common consent, moreover, "The Birthday of the Infanta" is new witness to the progress of Mr. Carpenter in firmness of hand, fineness of means and scope of imagination. As he writes in this Ballet, as he wrote in the preceding Symphony, he has broadened and deepened from the days of the early Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator" and the subsequent Concertino.

Of course music for the stage is music for the stage, and at Symphony Hall, there will be no miming by Mr. Bolm and the other dancers, no settings and dresses by Mr. Jones. As many will recall, we were to see as well as hear "The Birthday of the Infanta" when the Chicago Opera visited Boston a year ago. A storm that held Mr. Bolm at New Haven, the bunglings of the "office-man" then director (sic) of the company and the indifference of the "local management" defeated the announced or any subsequent performance. Now, thanks to Mr. Monteux, comes a measure of compensation. When the Suite was played by the Chicago Orchestra a month or more ago, Mr. Carpenter divided it as follows:

I. Introduction—Entrance of the Infanta—Children's Dance—Arrival of the Guests—The Gypsy Dance.
II. The Bull Fight.
III. Entrance of the Dwarf—The Fatal Dance—The Tragedy—The End.

while, for the programme, he wrote the following "Argument," as felicitous in another way as the gladsome preamble to "Adventures in a Perambulator." Behind both ballet and "Argument," lies, of course, the story by Oscar Wilde of like title with the music:

> The little princess, dressed in a costume of the Velasquez period, emerges from the palace alone. She is sad and depressed. She is convinced that her birthday has been forgotten. But she is interrupted by her old and ample nurse, who comes to prepare her for the great surprise. Almost at once the children, her birthday guests, begin to arrive—in twos, in fours, and finally in one gay and noisy flock. They run, they dance, they play. At the climax of their excitement a trumpet, a signal, is heard from behind the scene. Eager curiosity! Something is going to happen! A strange procession marches upon the stage. First come two enormous major-domos, with clothes and gesture bizarre and alike. They are followed by a file of solemn servants, each bearing a birthday gift, covered with mysterious wrappings, but large and satisfying.
>
> The spectacle begins. First there are gypsy dancers, followed by a juggler and a tight-rope walker, a curious pair, the one tall and meagre, the other short and much too fat for his delicate profession. Then follows a bull fight, the best kind of all, a make-believe one with boys on hobby horses and a wonderful bull in plush.
>
> Then comes the climax of the party. A weird and fabulous creature is brought in. He has been caught in the forest, and appears grotesque and misshapen. He is the last offering at the feast. At first he is timid and shy. His dance is one of strangely shifting moods, of fear and confidence. But in the end he achieves a dance of wild and absorbing abandon. The children applaud wildly, and the princess in her excitement throws her handkerchief to the fantastic. He is filled with extraordinary emotion. He wonders if it is a sign that she has found him beautiful. He wonders if, may be, she loves him.
>
> The cook now comes out, a great, fat creature, carrying a birthday cake with sixteen candles. There is great excitement among the children, and they follow cook into the palace. Pedro, the fantastic, cannot bear to be left alone. He follows and is repulsed by the major-domos. It is growing dark, so he clambers up to the palace windows. The scene changes; but the music does not stop, and almost at once Pedro is seen entering one of the palace chambers. It is gloomy. He can barely see. Suddenly he sees something coming toward him. He stops. It stops. Pedro has never seen a reflection, but suddenly the terrifying consciousness comes over him that this monstrous grotesque image may be his own. He holds up the handkerchief, and lo! it too appears before him. This is the last blow. He recalls with inner agony the effect he must have made on the princess. He repeats his dance only in perverted form, in the way he thinks it must have seemed to her, and he falls broken hearted and dies. The children are seen in the background passing the door as they play some game. Finally they come in, but they do not see the prostrate form. But the princess enters and at once detects the huddled shape of Pedro lying in the shadow to one side. She steals up quietly to his side and kneels. She makes a mute appeal. Finally she touches the handkerchief in his hand, but finding no response, starts back in horror and slowly steals away.

Programmes in Prospect

Since Mr. Carpenter's Ballet-Suite longish, only two other pieces stand u
Mr. Monteux's programme for the S phony Concerts of next week: Schumar Symphony in C major, in which he s the happiness he was lucky enough find in marriage, and Beethoven's Conce
for Piano and Orchestra in C minor w
Mr. Levitzki taking the solo-part. Usua conductors and pianists overlook this C certo—the third in the series—but w
Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Levitzki and the tional Symphony Orchestra played it other day in New York the audience r to it.

Clearly Mr. Monteux's programmes are whetting interest again—this week with Mr. Scott's two Passacaglie; next week with Mr. Carpenter's ballet; and, before long, possibly on Feb. 25 and 26, with the celebrated "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams—vivid, eloquent, atmospheric music, both largely and finely written. In British music of the day, it is second only to Elgar's Symphonies and of far different matter and manner. When Mr. Coates and the Damrosch Orchestra played it in New York last month, two audiences were equally illuded and impressed.

NEW SOPRANO HEARD AT SYMPHONY

Two novelties appeared on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirteenth of the present season, Mme. Hulda Lashanska, soprano, sang for the first time in this city, and two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the English composer, were given their first performance in Boston.

Besides the latter, the program included Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Wagner's "Faust" overture and two operatic arias, sung by Mme. Lashanska, Pamina's aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

Mme. Lashanska, favorably known here by reputation, was enthusiastically greeted, but the applause which welcomed her first appearance was slight compared with that which broke forth at the end of her first number. She has voice of extraordinary beauty, rich and smooth in the middle and lower registers, clear and pure in the higher. The song from "Louise" has been given very few performances here comparable to that of Mme. Lashanska; nor should the performance of the orchestra be passed by without special mention. The singer was recalled again and again.

Enthusiasm marked the entire program. The Spanish dances by Mr. Scott were of unusual interest, the first especially striking, brilliantly orchestrated and brilliantly performed. Mr. Scott, who was in the audience, was forced to respond to the applause after Mr. Monteux had shown the audience by signs where he was sitting.

Both director and players were warmly applauded after the fine performance of the symphony, and the conductor summoned the meen to rise and share honors with him.

AMER. JAN. 29.

Boston Notes

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on January 28. The following was the program: Dvořák, Symphony No. 2 in D minor op. 70; Scott, two passacaglias; Mozart, Air of Pamina from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"; Wagner, a Faust overture. Hulda Lashanska was the soloist.

The revival of Dvořák's second symphony was a happy thought on the part of Mr. Monteux. It added another to the long list of such revivals for which we cannot be too grateful to him. This symphony does not show the lapse of time as much as might be expected. There is a certain freshness and sincerity in the music of Dvořák which will probably cause it to outlast much of the music of his contemporaries who wrote with perhaps more method and seriousness. It is to be regretted that Dvořák's name has so long been associted with the "New World Symphony" only. Many of his other works are quite as worthy of a hearing as yesterday's performance showed. Cyril Scott's two passacaglias, performed for the first time in Boston, are hardly to be taken seriously. This does not mean that they are not delightful music to hear. The orchestral coloring is laid on with a lavish hand and the meagerness of invention is thereby concealed. Although these pieces are not unpleasantly dissonant, they do not excite the desire for an immediate rehearing. They were enthusiastically received and the composer, who was present, acknowledged the applause which his compositions brought forth. Mme. Lashanska interpreted the aria from "Louise" with much purity of tone and style. The playing of the orchestra throughout the afternoon was brilliant, and remarkable as well for its rare beauty of nuance and rhythm.

Those who attend orchestral concerts for the purpose of hearing sensational interpretations of Beethoven's symphonies, those who enjoy theatrical pianissimos and fortes, those who enjoy a thick, heavy orchestral tone quality will not be satisfied with the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the other hand, those who delight in hearing the masterpieces of the classical repertory and deserving works of our own time interpretated with exquisite taste and skill, without the intrusion of an aggressive personality between them and the music, will find these concerts a never ending source of pleasure and education.

MONITOR JAN. 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCOTT'S MUSIC IN UNFAMILIAR VOICE

His Two Passacaghas for Orchestra Works of Imagination and Power—The Faded Wagner of "A Faust Overture"—The Fresh Dvorak of a Resurrected Symphony—Mme. Lashanska, Cool and Crystalline Singer

A TRANQUIL Symphony Concert ran agreeable course at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and naught disturbed peace and pleasure unless it was the two Passacaglias of Cyril Scott. Prolific in songs, pianopieces and the "smaller forms" generally, he has written relatively little for orchestra in his riper years—a Concerto for Piano, a setting of Keats's ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," possibly the music-drama with which gossip credits him, and the two troublesome Passacaglias. These and the Piano-Concerto he brought with him on his present visit to the United States. The Concerto requires the presence of the composer "at the piano"; the powers at Symphony Hall preferred that he should occupy the "guest-seats" and as "the author of their being," acknowledge the applause the persistent Passacaglias won. Not only did the audience hear the composer's music; it also looked upon him; and a pleasure of the lecture-room became a pleasure of the concert-hall.

In more senses than one, persistent is the word for the two pieces. True modernist, Mr. Scott respects the chosen form. That is to say, he preserves "the subject" of each Passacaglia as faithfully as though he were writing in the eighteenth, instead of the twentieth century. An Irish folk-piece—a sombre, moaning "Famine Song"—underlies the first; another folk-[illegible], "The Poor Irish Boy," that the composer sets beating to lively dance-rhythm, is source of the second. In neither does the ear ever lose clew to these basic measures. Indeed, Mr. Scott drives home the dancing-tune by every rhythmic, harmonic, instrumental device within his power. They are well chosen "subjects"; the lament of "The Famine Song" pierces the ear, haunts the memory; the dance is so gay a tune and so adaptable to "development" that only by inadvertence could Mr. Grainger have overlooked it. The variation of these persistent "subjects" that the making of a Passacaglia prescribes is another thing. Rather, as Mr. Scott writes, it is ingenious and often imaginative manipulation. He leads fragments of his Irish tunes less from key to key than through quickly passing tonalities. He diversifies and contrasts the harmonic and instrumental dress, the rhythmic accent; he impregnates measure after measure with his own fervent moods. Time and again he flickers into vivid harmonic experiment, sometimes easy to catch in the concert-hall, sometimes more graphic on the paper of the score. As often keen play of timbres flashes out of a multitudinous orchestra, lacking only a first shawm and a second sackbut.

At every turn Mr. Scott compasses variety of voice; nowhere does the fabric of the Passacaglias sag or dim; while over both, hiding the processes beneath, is deep, clear glow of creation from the heart as well as the mind, by imagination as well as by reflection. The first Passacaglia rises from dark reiteration, through variation as in individual lament, to a massed and sombre splendor of mourning that endures but is not resigned. The second Passacaglia is apotheosis of the folk-dance, decked with the trappings, gilded with the lights and shadows, spurred by the devices of a more sophisticated music; while, throughout with higher and higher beat, rhythm dances tireless. The celesta tinking aerially upon an Irish green; the tripping folk—and chords that are as acid in respectable ears. Not the least of the work of the moderns and the ultra-moderns is to clothe old forms with new imagery and vigors. Well does Mr. Scott do it in these two Passacaglias, and lo! the second is more akin to the original dance whence the form sprang than twenty similar exercises written in studious, orthodox "closets." From his piano-pieces—the Sonata aside; from his songs, it is easy to label Mr. Scott a composer with fancy and felicity. In these Passacaglias, as in the Sonata and the Quintet for strings, he is composer of imagination and power.

For gentler spice to the afternoon, two elderly pieces contrastingly belied anticipation. Not often in these days does Wagner's "Faust Overture" return to the concert-hall. When it does most of us with his music-dramas at the back of our heads, expect much of it—more than it can yield in these present years of musical grace, more, perhaps, than it yielded when even it was "New: First Time." The truth is that it sounded yesterday as a faded, antiquated romantic music. Hear the darksome beginning—Faust self-tortured, groping, charactered in tones by a Wagner that in those early forties lagged in such things far behind Liszt and Berlioz. Listen to Gretchen, attended by songful horns and half-sister to simple Senta of "The Flying Dutchman." Observe the lispings, as it were, of the subsequent Wagnerian idiom—"chromatic sighs" and the like. Watch the tentative Wagner, feeling his way to the Mephistophelian mockeries with which Liszt made a division of his "Faust Symphony" coruscate as with blue flame.

No doubt, the composer of "Tristan" and "The Ring" that was to be, but exceedingly thin-voiced. No doubt the approved romantic formulas for such subject-matter in tones—but how far from the graphic energies of Berlioz, the keen strokes of Liszt. No doubt skilful manipulation of a formal overture to delineative ends; but somehow the Weber of "Oberon," "Euryanthe" and "Freischütz" keeps the process fresh and glowing; while dust strews "Eine Faust-Overture.' The unquenchable Wagnerians averred that Mr. Monteux was at fault; that he did not animate and glamor the overture as he did the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz a year ago, as Dr. Muck used to do with the lesser tone-poems of Liszt. They had reason, as the French say; but what of a Wagner that cannot keep his feet in merely dutiful performance?

On the other hand a proud afternoon for poor old Dvorak, the despised and forsaken of every truly modern repertory, a happy afternoon for all within ear-shot of his Symphony in D minor, timely resurrected by Mr. Monteux. It has not been wrung out to the last thin drop, like that sop of conductors to audiences, the Symphony, "From the New World." No more does it depend upon rather patchy sonorities like the overtures—"Husitzka," "Carnival," "Othello"—to be heard in occasional revival. In fact, this Second Symphony is no more than Dvorak "warbling his native wood-notes wild"—or rather mild—in his prime therewith and pleasant to hear in the process. Once he is clear of a "scholarly" and so for him rather labored beginning of the slow movement, the melody charms in outline, substance, progress and the color the wind-choir lends to it—a wistful, simple hearted, yet by no means unordered music. By instinct, maybe, Dvorak sang, but he contrived also to be adept in the singing. Bright are the contrasting rhythms of the Scherzo. He has caught them glinting from the folk. Spontaneously, gayly he writes. There is plentiful symphonic flourish in the Finale and it does nowadays sound empty. There are also measures still warm with the strangeness and the glow that is romantic illusion. Not for nothing was Dvorak a Czech who could dream as well write music. Agreed that in the first movement he is no more than following the formulas sonorously; but even there the instinct for the finely set harmony, the warm tint in the instrumental voices, will out. Of course Dvorak was natural rather than sophisticated composer. Therein is his distinction; thereby his more spontaneous and innocent music, like this Symphony in D minor, keeps vitality, gives pleasure after [illegible] years. It was not until he took [illegible] of the world and wrote "New [illegible] that he labored and [illegible] was dull. Yesterday, too, the wood-wind choir of our orchestra would have rejoiced him.

Between whiles and for the first time in Boston, Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang—a chastely longing air of Pamina from Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; the sensuous and rhapsodic soliloquy of Louise from Charpentier's like-named music-drama. She is of cool and comely presence—a Galatea, so to say, of the concert-hall. She possesses a cool, clear soprano voice, smooth, rounded, crystalline. As the polished, transparent, glassy sphere in which the "gazer" is about to read the future, holds the eye, so do Mme. Lashanska's tones engage the ear. She sings with a cool and studious skill—the note well shaped, the phrase well moulded, the period well curved and cumulated. Careful is she in the mating of text and tone, of voice with orchestra. She takes mental note of the mood, the sentiment of the music and would discreetly convey it.

Of such resource and mettle, Mme. Lashanska sang Mozart's air so that the dullest hearer perceived the flowing beauty of line, the charm of phrase unfolding into phrase, the serene and limpid course of the music, the gentle pathos, gently mirrored. The loveliness, the remoteness (as it seems nowadays) of Mozart in such song were in her tones. A crystal voice sang a crystal music and for the time and piece, the manifold Mozart asks no more. To at least one singer of the younger generation, Mme. Sembrich has transmitted a Mozartean technique and poise. The rhapsody from "Louise" is far different of matter, manner, mood. The crystal of the singer's tones faithfully mirrored Charpentier's pages; but no ray of sensuous warmth, no glow of amorous ecstacy, no wild glint of freedom traversed it. Thoughtfully Mme. Lashanska sang Louise's monologue—Louise "happy in her home" and taking tea with "our best people."

H. T. PARKER

TRANS JAN 29

SYMPHONY PLANS ALL WAGNER BIL

A highly interesting progra consisting entirely of the music Wagner, will make the coming P sion Fund Concert, to be given the Boston Symphony Orchestr der Pierre Monteux, Sunday noon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, a n event, since such a progra though once a standing cust the Pension Fund concerts, been given for some time.

The program in detail w follows: The Prelude to T tersingers, the Prelude t grin; the Overture to T and the Bacchanale, as the composer for the fir tion of that work in Paris, the chorus of sirens will by members of the Cecilia trained for the occasion b rector, Agide Jacchia. Th also be played the Ride of kyries from "The Valkyr Prelude to the third act of and Isolde," striking m lamentation in which there is longed solo for the English one of the most famous pa ever written for that beautif strument.

The final number will consi excerpts from "The Ring," inclu Siegfried's Passage through charmed circle of fire to Brun hilde's Rock, from the third act Siegfried, and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods," consisting of "Dawn and the Rhine Journey of Siegfried."

RECORD JAN. 29

A "Wagner-Programme" from the Symphony Orchestra — Mr. Werrenrath and Mr. Johnson for Impending Singers—Mr. Levitzki and Mr. Ganz for Pianists—A Visit from the Cleveland Orchestra—Chamber and Choral Music

SUNDAY afternoon, Feb. 6, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund for disabled or retired members. Mr. Monteux will conduct and, for the first time in some years, the programme will consist wholly of Wagner's music, viz.: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," with a women's chorus from The Cecilia assisting; Ride of the Valkyrs from "Die Walküre"; Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan," with the melody for English horn played by Mr. Speyer; Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock; Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung."

Friday afternoon, Feb. 11, in Symphony Hall, the fourteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Schumann's Symphony in C major; a Suite from Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta"; and Beethoven's Concerto for piano in C minor fill the programme. Mr. Levitzki, who excels in such music, will be the pianist.

TRANS JAN. 29.

[79.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

After the fourth regular trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week, the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 11 and 12. Mr. Monteaux will then conduct Schumann's Second Symphony in C major and, for the first time in Boston, the orchestral suite which John A. Carpenter has arranged from his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta." The ballet itself, based on the story by Oscar Wilde, was first produced last season by the Chicago Opera Company. Each principal episode of the tragic story of the little princess and the hunchback is depicted in the suite—the entrance of the Infanta and the royal reception—the bull fight—the entrance of the grotesque—the fatal dance and the final tragedy. The soloist will be Micha Levitski. He will play Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 in C minor.

WAGNER PENSION FUND

A highly interesting program, consisting entirely of the music of Wagner, will make the coming pension fund concert, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, a notable event, since such a program, although once a standing custom at the pension fund concerts, has not been given for some time. The program in detail will be as follows: The prelude to "The Mastersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to Tannhaeuser and the Bacchanale, as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of sirens will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by its director, Mr. Jacchia. Also the Ride of the Valkyries, the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," in which there is a prolonged solo for the English horn, and excerpts from "The Ring," including Siegfried's passage through the charmed circle of fire to Bruennhilde's rock, from the third act of "Siegfried," and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods" consisting of Dawn and the Rhine journey of Siegfried.

HERALD JAN. 30

Sunday, Feb 6, at 3:00. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concert in aid of the pension fund. Wagner program. Preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin"; overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure"; prelude to Act 3 of "Tristan und Isolde"; Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, from "Siegfried"; "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung."

Events and Comments

There are no regular Symphony concerts this week. Mr Monteux' program for Feb 11 and 12 is as follows: Symphony in C major, No. 2, Schumann; Suite, "The Birthday of the Infanta," Carpenter; Third Piano Concerto, Beethoven. Soloist, Mischa Levitski.

GLOBE JAN. 30.

SYMPHONY IN ALL-WAGNER BILL

A highly interesting program, consisting entirely of the music of Wagner, will make the coming Pension Fund Concert, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux on Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock, a notable event. The program follows:

The prelude to "The Mastersingers," the perlude to "Lohengrin"; the overture to "Tannhauser" and the Bacchanale, as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of sirens will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by Agide Jacchia. There will also be played the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyries," the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," and excerpts from "The Ring," including Siegfried's passage through the charmed circle of fire to Brunnhilde's Rock, from the third act of "Siegfried," and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

After the fourth trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 11 and 12. Pieerre Monteux will conduct Schumann's symphony in C major, John Alden Carpenter's ballet-suite "The Birthday of the Infanta" and, with Mischa Levitzki as soloist, the Beethoven concert in C minor, No. 3, for the piano and orchestra.

Lashanska Wins Honors at the Symphony

MME. HULDA LASHANSKA, one of the most popular American sopranos, made her Boston debut at the thirteenth Symphony concerts. She sang the Mozart Aria, "Ah, Lo So, piu non m'avanza," from "The Magic Flute," and the always delightful "Depuis le Jour" aria from Charpentier's Louise."

This young American diva has a rich, warm voice, rather of the mezzo-soprano quality, and for this reason she was more effective in the Charpentier song. Her style is eminently artistic. The audience recalled her several times.

The concerts were also notable through the appearance, informally,

---

of Cyril Scott, the noted English composer, whose two "Passacaglias" for orchestra, organ and piano were performed for the first time in Boston. They proved to be bizarre works. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave a praiseworthy performance of them. Mr. Scott bowed twice to the courteous applause.

Dvorak's D minor symphony, which had not been heard for many years, and Wagner's "Faust" overture were the other numbers. Both numbers were superbly performed.

ADVERTISER JAN. 30

Wagner Programme for Pension Fund

A programme, consisting entirely of the music of Wagner, will make the coming Pension Fund Concert, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock a notable event.

The programme in detail will be as follows: The prelude to the Mastersingers, the prelude to Lohengrin the overture to Tannhauser and the Bacchanale, as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of sirens will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by its director, Agide Jacchia. There will also be played the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyries," the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," striking music of lamentation in which there is a prolonged solo for the English horn, one of the most famous passages ever written for that beautiful instrument. The final number will consist of excerpts from "The Ring," including Siegfried's passage through the charmed circle of fire to Brunnhilde's Rock, from the third act of Siegfried, and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods," consisting of "Dawn" and the Rhine journey of Siegfried.

POST - JAN. 30

From INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Cortot Boston Symphony Soloist

At the third concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 3, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's symphony of large proportions entitled "Manfred," and based on Byron's dramatic poem. This splendid work, although not often heard, is considered to number among the great Russian's very finest scores. Its movements describe "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte; Manfred's Death." The brilliant closing piece at this concert will be Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey," which has been arranged for orchestra in striking fashion by Alfredo Casella, the modern Italian composer. The soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, who will be heard in the brilliant Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens in F major.

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 26

At the third concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 3, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's symphony of large proportions entitled "Manfred," and based on Byron's dramatic poem. This splendid work, although not often heard, is counted among the great Russian's finest scores. Its movements describe "Manfred's Wanderings in Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte; Manfred's Death." The brilliant closing pieces at this concert will be Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy "Islamey," which has been arranged for orchestra in striking fashion by Alfredo Casella, the modern Italian composer. The soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, considered the finest pianist of France, who will be heard in the fifth concerto by Saint-Saens in F major. This music is distinctive by its Oriental subjects and character and the Nubian Love Song which is the theme of the slow movetment. Alfred Cortot was born in Switzerland of French parents. He came to Paris at a very early age where he entered the conservatory under Decombes, one of the last of Chopin's disciples, and under Diemer, in whose class in 1896 he obtained first prize. Immediately thereafter he played as soloist at the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts. This led to several extensive tours of Europe in which he was heard both with the orchestra in city after city and in recitals of his own, and he was identified as a principal founder of the new French piano school. In addition to his career as pianist, he accepted the position (at the age of twenty-four) of repetiteur at Bayreuth, and under his conductorship in Paris Wagner's operas had notable performances. A year later, in 1903, he founded the Societe des Concerts, the purpose of which was to give auditions of great choral works. Thus to his organizing and conducting ability choral productions of Parsifal, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," and many new works were due. In America, however, he is only known as pianist, and his European reputation as a master of this instrument has been confirmed here.

Record
Philadelphia, Pa.
90

—At the third concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 3, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Manfred," based on Byron's dramatic poem. This splendid work, although not often heard, is considered to number among the great Russian's finest scores. The movements describe "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes; Invitation to Astarte; Manfred's Death." The brilliant closing piece at this concert will be Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," which has been arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, a modern Italian composer. The soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, named as the finest pianist in France, who will be heard in the Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens in F major. This music is distinctive by his Oriental subject and character and the Nubian Love Song which is the theme of the slow movement. Alfred Cortot was born in Switzerland of French parents. He came to Paris at a very early age, where he entered the Conservatory under Decombes, one of the last of Chopin's disciples, and under Dielmer, in whose class in 1896 he obtained first prize. Immediately thereafter he played as soloist at the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts. This led to several extensive tours of Europe in which he was heard both with the orchestra in city after city and in recitals of his own, and was identified as a principal founder of the new French piano school. In addition to his career as pianist, he accepted the position (at the age of 24) of repetiteur at Bayreuth, and under his conductorship in Paris Wagner's operas had notable performances. A year later, in 1903, he founded the Societe des Concerts, the purpose of which was to give auditions of choral works.

From
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.
1921

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, as soloist. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," which the Russian composer called after Byron's dramatic poem. Cortot is to play Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto in F major, and the concluding number will be Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, the rising young Italian composer.

From
EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
1921

Boston Symphony.

For the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux has compiled the following programs:

For Thursday evening, Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, after Byron's dramatic poem, the movements of which describe, Manfred's Wanderings and Despair, the Fairy of the Alps, Pastorale, the Palace of Ariamanes, Invocation to Astarte, Manfred's Death; d'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from his new opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher," "An Sluah Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York, and Lalo's Overture to "The King of Ys." For the Saturday afternoon concert, Mozart's Overture to his opera, "Don Giovanni," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," composed by Charles T. Griffes after the poem of Coleridge. Shortly after this work was introduced to New York in a Thursday concert by Pierre Monteux last spring, the noted young American composer died. This and other of his works have aroused considerable musical interest. Malipiero's First Suite, "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions of Nature") with the movements "Il Capinero" ("The Blackcap"), "Il Picchio" ("The Woodpecker"), "Il Chiu" ("The Owl"), have its first performance in New York, [illegible] Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," orchestrated by the rising young Italian composer, Alfredo Casella.

From
EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
1921 JAN 2
Date

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

As soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music, [illegible]day evening, Alfred Cortot, pianist, will play with the orchestra Saint-Saens's Fifth Concerto in F Major, which is particularly interesting on account of its Oriental [illegible]. Pierre Monteux will conduct [illegible] same concert Schumann's Symphony in D Minor and [illegible] Overture to his opera "Don Giovanni."

The closing number will be Balakireff's "Islamey." This Oriental fantasy, which has been [illegible] difficult music ever written for the piano, has been orchestrated by the Italian composer Alfredo Casella.

Ever since it was [illegible] sing in Boston [illegible] pupil of [illegible] She [illegible]

From JAN 3
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

tune, "The Poor Irish Boy," that the composer sets beating to lively dance-rhythm, is source of the second. In neither does the ear ever lose clew to these basic measures. Indeed, Mr. Scott drives home the dancing-tune by every rhythmic, harmonic, instrumental device within his power. They are well chosen "subjects"; the lament of "The Famine Song" pierces the ear, haunts the memory; the dance is so gay a tune and so adaptable to "development" that only by inadvertence could Mr. Grainger have overlooked it. The variation of these persistent "subjects" that the making of a Passacaglia prescribes is another thing. Rather, as Mr. Scott writes, it is ingenious and often imaginative manipulation. He leads fragments of his Irish tunes less from key to key than through quickly passing tonalities. He diversifies and contrasts the harmonic and instrumental dress, the rhythmic accent; he impregnates measure after measure with his own fervent moods. Time and again he flickers into vivid harmonic experiment, sometimes easy to catch in the concert-hall, sometimes more graphic on the paper of the score. As often keen play of timbres flashes out of a multitudinous orchestra, lacking only a first shawm and a second sackbut.

At every turn Mr. Scott compasses variety of voice; nowhere does the fabric of the Passacaglias sag or dim; while over both, hiding the processes beneath, is deep, clear glow of creation from the heart as well as the mind, by imagination as well as by reflection. The first Passacaglia rises from dark reiteration, through variation as in individual lament, to a massed and sombre splendor of mourning that endures but is not resigned. The second Passacaglia is apotheosis of the folk-dance, decked with the trappings, gilded with the lights and shadows, spurred by the devices of a more sophisticated music; while, throughout with higher and higher beat, rhythm dances tireless. The celesta tinkling aerially upon an Irish green; the tripping folk—and chords that are as acid in respectable ears. Not the least of the work of the moderns and the ultra-moderns is to clothe old forms with new imagery and vigors. Well does Mr. Scott do it in these two Passacaglias, and lo! the second is more akin to the original dance whence the form sprang than twenty similar exercises written in studious, orthodox "closets." From his piano-pieces—the Sonata aside; from his songs, it is easy to label Mr. Scott a composer with fancy and felicity. In these Passacaglias, as in the Sonata and the Quintet for strings, he is composer of imagination and power.

For gentler spice to the afternoon, two elderly pieces contrastingly belied anticipation. Not often in these days does Wagner's "Faust Overture" return to the concert-hall. When it does most of us with his music-dramas at the back of our heads, expect much of it—more than it can yield in these present years of musical grace, more, perhaps, than it yielded when even it was "New: First Time." The truth is that it sounded yesterday as a faded, antiquated romantic music. Hear the darksome beginning—Faust self-tortured, groping, charactered in tones by a Wagner that in those early forties lagged in such things far behind Liszt and Berlioz. Listen to Gretchen, attended by songful horns and half-sister to simple Senta of "The Flying Dutchman." Observe the lispings, as it were, of the subsequent Wagnerian idiom—"chromatic sighs" and the like. Watch the tentative Wagner, feeling his way to the Mephistophelian mockeries with which Liszt made a division of his "Faust Symphony" coruscate as with blue flame

No doubt, the composer of "Tristan" and "The Ring" that was to be, but exceedingly thin-voiced. No doubt the approved romantic formulas for such subject-matter in tones—but how far from the graphic energies of Berlioz, the keen strokes of Liszt. No doubt skilful manipulation of a formal overture to delineative ends; but somehow the Weber of "Oberon," "Euryanthe" and "Freischütz" keeps the process fresh and glowing; while dust strews "Eine Faust-Overture." The unquenchable Wagnerians averred that Mr. Monteux was at fault; that he did not animate and glamor the overture as he did the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz a year ago, as Dr. Muck used to do with the lesser tone-poems of Liszt. They had reason, as the French say; but what of a Wagner that cannot keep his feet in merely dutiful performance?

On the other hand a proud afternoon for poor old Dvorák, the despised and forsaken of every truly modern repertory, a happy afternoon for all within ear-shot of his Symphony in D minor, timely resurrected by Mr. Monteux. It has not been wrung out to the last thin drop, like that sop of conductors to audiences, the Symphony, "From the New World." No more does it depend upon rather patchy sonorities like the overtures—"Husitzka," "Carnival," "Othello"—to be heard in occasional revival. In fact, this Second Symphony is no more than Dvorák "warbling his native wood-notes wild"—or rather mild—in his prime therewith and pleasant to hear in the process. Once he is clear of a "scholarly" and so for him rather labored beginning of the slow movement, the melody charms in outline, substance, progress and the color the wind-choir lends to it—a wistful, simple hearted, yet by no means unordered music. By instinct, maybe, Dvorák sang, but he contrived also to be adept in the singing. Bright are the contrasting rhythms of the Scherzo. He has caught them glinting from the folk. Spontaneously, gayly he writes. There is plentiful symphonic flourish in the Finale and it does nowadays sound empty. There are also measures still warm with the strangeness and the glow that is romantic illusion. Not for nothing was Dvorák a Czech who could dream as well write music. Agreed that in the first movement he is no more than following the formulas sonorously; but even there the instinct for the finely set harmony, the warm tint in the instrumental voices, will out. Of course Dvorák was natural rather than sophisticated composer. Therein is his distinction; thereby his more spontaneous and innocent music, like this Symphony in D minor, keeps vitality, gives pleasure after forty years. It was not until he took thought of the world and wrote "New symphonies that he labored and was dull. Yesterday, too, the wood-wind choir of our orchestra would have rejoiced him.

Between whiles and for the first time in Boston, Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang—a chastely longing air of Pamina from Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; the sensuous and rhapsodic soliloqup of Louise from Charpentier's like-named music-drama. She is of cool and comely presence—a Galatea, so to say, of the concert-hall. She possesses a cool, clear soprano voice, smooth, rounded, crystalline. As the polished, transparent, glassy sphere in which the "gazer" is about to read the future, holds the eye, so do Mme. Lashanska's tones engage the ear. She sings with a cool and studious skill—the note well shaped, the phrase well moulded, the period well curved and cumulated. Careful is she in the mating of text and tone, of voice with orchestra. She takes mental note of the mood, the sentiment of the music and would discreetly convey it.

Of such resource and mettle, Mme. Lashanska sang Mozart's air so that the dullest hearer perceived the flowing beauty of line, the charm of phrase unfolding into phrase, the serene and limpid course of the music, the gentle pathos, gently mirrored. The loveliness, the remoteness (as it seems nowadays) of Mozart in such song were in her tones. A crystal voice sang a crystal music and for the time and piece, the manifold Mozart asks no more. To at least one singer of the younger generation, Mme. Sembrich has transmitted a Mozartean technique and poise. The rhapsody from "Louise" is far different of matter, manner, mood. The crystal of the singer's tones faithfully mirrored Charpentier's pages; but no ray of sensuous warmth, no glow of amorous ecstacy, no wild glint of freedom traversed it. Thoughtfully Mme. Lashanska sang Louise's monologue—Louise "happy in her home" and taking tea with "our best people."

H. T. Parker

TRANS JAN 29

SYMPHONY PLANS ALL WAGNER BIL

A highly interesting progra consisting entirely of the music Wagner, will make the coming P sion Fund Concert, to be giver the Boston Symphony Orchestr der Pierre Monteux, Sunday noon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, a n event, since such a prograr though once a standing cust the Pension Fund concerts, been given for some time.

The program in detail w follows: The Prelude to T tersingers, the Prelude t grin; the Overture to T and the Bacchanale, as the composer for the fir tion of that work in Paris, the chorus of sirens will by members of the Cecilia trained for the occasion b rector, Agide Jacchia. Th also be played the Ride of kyries from "The Valkyr Prelude to the third act of and Isolde," striking m lamentation in which there is longed solo for the English one of the most famous pa ever written for that beauti strument.

The final number will consi excerpts from "The Ring," inclu Siegfried's Passage through charmed circle of fire to Brur hilde's Rock, from the third act Siegfried, and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods," consisting of "Dawn and the Rhine Journey of Siegfried."

REGORD JAN. 29

A "Wagner-Programme" from the Symphony Orchestra — Mr. Werrenrath and Mr. Johnson for Impending Singers—Mr. Levitzki and Mr. Ganz for Pianists—A Visit from the Cleveland Orchestra—Chamber and Choral Music

SUNDAY afternoon, Feb. 6, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund for disabled or retired members. Mr. Monteux will conduct and, for the first time in some years, the programme will consist wholly of Wagner's music, viz.: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," with a women's chorus from The Cecilia assisting; Ride of the Valkyrs from "Die Walküre"; Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan," with the melody for English horn played by Mr. Speyer; Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock; Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung."

Friday afternoon, Feb. 11, in Symphony Hall, the fourteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Schumann's Symphony in C major; a Suite from Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta"; and Beethoven's Concerto for piano in C minor fill the programme. Mr. Levitzki, who excels in such music, will be the pianist.

TRANS JAN. 29.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

After the fourth regular trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week, the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 11 and 12. Mr. Monteaux will then conduct Schumann's Second Symphony in C major and, for the first time in Boston, the orchestral suite which John A. Carpenter has arranged from his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta." The ballet itself, based on the story by Oscar Wilde, was first produced last season by the Chicago Opera Company. Each principal episode of the tragic story of the little princess and the hunchback is depicted in the suite—the entrance of the Infanta and the royal reception—the bull fight—the entrance of the grotesque—the fatal dance and the final tragedy. The soloist will be Micha Levitski. He will play Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 in C minor.

WAGNER PENSION FUND

A highly interesting program, consisting entirely of the music of Wagner, will make the coming pension fund concert, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, a notable event, since such a program, although once a standing custom at the pension fund concerts, has not been given for some time. The program in detail will be as follows: The prelude to "The Mastersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to Tannhaeuser and the Bacchanale, as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of sirens will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by its director, Mr. Jacchia. Also the Ride of the Valkyries, the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," in which there is a prolonged solo for the English horn, and excerpts from "The Ring," including Siegfried's passage through the charmed circle of fire to Bruennhilde's rock, from the third act of "Siegfried," and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods" consisting of Dawn and the Rhine journey of Siegfried.

HERALD JAN. 30

Sunday, Feb 6, at 3:00. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concert in aid of the pension fund. Wagner program. Preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin"; overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure"; prelude to Act 3 of "Tristan und Isolde"; Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, from "Siegfried"; "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung."

Events and Comments

There are no regular Symphony concerts this week. Mr Monteux' program for Feb 11 and 12 is as follows: Symphony in C major, No. 2, Schumann; Suite, "The Birthday of the Infanta," Carpenter; Third Piano Concerto, Beethoven. Soloist, Mischa Levitski.

GLOBE JAN. 30.

SYMPHONY IN ALL-WAGNER BILL

A highly interesting program, consisting entirely of the music of Wagner, will make the coming Pension Fund Concert, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux on Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock, a notable event. The program follows:

The prelude to "The Mastersingers," the perlude to "Lohengrin"; the overture to "Tannhauser" and the Bacchanale, as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of sirens will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by Agide Jacchia. There will also be played the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyries," the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," and excerpts from "The Ring," including Siegfried's passage through the charmed circle of fire to Brunnhilde's Rock, from the third act of "Siegfried," and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

After the fourth trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 11 and 12. Pieerre Monteux will conduct Schumann's symphony in C major, John Alden Carpenter's ballet-suite "The Birthday of the Infanta" and, with Mischa Levitzki as soloist, the Beethoven concert in C minor, No. 3, for the piano and orchestra.

Lashanska Wins Honors at the Symphony

MME. HULDA LASHANSKA, one of the most popular American sopranos, made her Boston debut at the thirteenth Symphony concerts. She sang the Mozart Aria, "Ah, Lo So, piu non m'avanza," from "The Magic Flute," and the always delightful "Depuis le Jour" aria from Charpentier's Louise."

This young American diva has a rich, warm voice, rather of the mezzo-soprano quality, and for this reason she was more effective in the Charpentier song. Her style is eminently artistic. The audience recalled her several times.

The concerts were also notable through the appearance, informally,

of Cyril Scott, the noted English composer, whose two "Passacaglias" for orchestra, organ and piano were performed for the first time in Boston. They proved to be bizarre works. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave a praiseworthy performance of them. Mr. Scott bowed twice to the courteous applause.

Dvorak's D minor symphony, which had not been heard for many years, and Wagner's "Faust" overture were the other numbers. Both numbers were superbly performed.

ADVERTISER-JAN. 30

Wagner Programme for Pension Fund

A programme, consisting entirely of the music of Wagner, will make the coming Pension Fund Concert, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock a notable event.

The programme in detail will be as follows: The prelude to the Mastersingers, the prelude to Lohengrin the overture to Tannhauser and the Bacchanale, as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of sirens will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by its director, Agide Jacchia. There will also be played the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyries," the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," striking music of lamentation in which there is a prolonged solo for the English horn, one of the most famous passages ever written for that beautiful instrument. The final number will consist of excerpts from "The Ring," including Siegfried's passage through the charmed circle of fire to Brunnhilde's Rock, from the third act of Siegfried, and the introductory music to the "Dusk of the Gods," consisting of "Dawn" and the Rhine journey of Siegfried.

POST - JAN. 30

rom
NQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Cortot Boston Symphony Soloist

At the third concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 3, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's symphony of large proportions entitled "Manfred," and based on Byron's dramatic poem. This splendid work, although not often heard, is considered to number among the great Russian's very finest scores. Its movements describe "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte; Manfred's Death." The brilliant closing piece at this concert will be Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey," which has been arranged for orchestra in striking fashion by Alfredo Casella, the modern Italian composer. The soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, who will be heard in the brilliant Fifth Concerto Saint-Saens in F major.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the third concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 3, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's symphony of large proportions entitled "Manfred," and based on Byron's dramatic poem. This splendid work, although not often heard, is counted among the great Russian's finest scores. Its movements describe "Manfred's Wanderings in Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte; Manfred's Death." The brilliant closing pieces at this concert will be Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy "Islamey," which has been arranged for orchestra in striking fashion by Alfredo Casella, the modern Italian composer. The soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, considered the finest pianist of France, who will be heard in the fifth concerto by Saint-Saens in F major. This music is distinctive by its Oriental subjects and character and the Nubian Love Song which is the theme of the slow movetment. Alfred Cortot was born in Switzerland of French parents. He came to Paris at a very early age where he entered the conservatory under Decombes, one of the last of Chopin's disciples, and under Diemer, in whose class in 1896 he obtained first prize. Immediately thereafter he played as soloist at the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts. This led to several extensive tours of Europe in which he was heard both with the orchestra in city after city and in recitals of his own, and he was identified as a principal founder of the new French piano school. In addition to his career as pianist, he accepted the position (at the age of twenty-four) of repetiteur at Bayreuth, and under his conductorship in Paris Wagner's operas had notable performances. A year later, in 1903, he founded the Societe des Concerts, the purpose of which was to give auditions of great choral works. Thus to his organizing and conducting ability choral productions of Parsifal, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," and many new works were due. In America, however, he is only known as pianist, and his European reputation as a master of this instrument has been confirmed here.

Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

—At the third concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 3, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Manfred," based on Byron's dramatic poem. This splendid work, although not often heard, is considered to number among the great Russian's finest scores. The movements describe "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes; Invitation to Astarte; Manfred's Death." The brilliant closing piece at this concert will be Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," which has been arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, a modern Italian composer. The soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, named as the finest pianist in France, who will be heard in the Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens in [illegible] major. This music is distinctive by his Oriental subject and character and the Nubian Love Song which is the theme of the slow movement. Alfred Cortot was born in Switzerland of French parents. He came to Paris at a very early age, where he entered the Conservatory under Decombes, one of the last of Chopin's disciples, and under Dielmer, in whose class in 1896 he obtained first prize. Immediately thereafter he played as soloist at the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts. This led to several extensive tours of Europe. in which he was heard both with the orchestra in city after city and in recitals of his own, and was identified as a principal founder of the new French piano school. In addition to his career as pianist, he accepted the position (at the age of 24) of repetiteur at Bayreuth, and under his conductorship in Paris Wagner's operas had notable performances. A year later, in 1903, he founded the Societe des Concerts, the purpose of which was to give auditions of choral works.

From
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, as soloist. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," which the Russian composer called after Byron's dramatic poem. Cortot is to play Saint Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto in F major, and the concluding number will be Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, the rising young Italian composer.

EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

For the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux has compiled the following programs:

For Thursday evening, "Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, after Byron's dramatic poem, the movements of which describe; Manfred's Wanderings and Despair, The Fairy of the Alps, Pastorale, The Palace of Arimanes, Invocation to Astarte, Manfred's Death; d'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from his new opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher," "An Sluah Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York, and Lalo's Overture to "The King of Ys." For the Saturday afternoon concert, Mozart's Overture to his opera, "Don Giovanni," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," composed by Charles T. Griffes after the poem of Coleridge. Shortly after this work was introduced to New York in a Thursday concert by Pierre Monteux last spring, the noted young American composer died. This and other of his works have aroused considerable musical interest. Malipiero's First Suite, "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions of Nature") with the movements "Il Capinero" ("The Blackcap"), "Il Picchio" ("The Woodpecker"), "Il Chiu" ("The Owl"), will have its first performance in New York, and the concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," orchestrated by the rising young Italian composer, Alfredo Casella.

rom EAGLE
ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate 1921

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

As soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music Thursday evening, Alfred Cortot, pianist, will play with the orchestra Saint-Saens's Fifth Concerto in F major, which is particularly interesting on account of its Oriental character.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the same concert Schumann's Symphony in D Minor and Mozart's Overture to his opera "Don Giovanni."

The closing number will be Balakireff's "Islamey," which has been called the Oriental Fantasy, difficult music ever written for piano, has been set for orchestra by the Italian composer Alfredo Casella.

Ever since it sing in Boston and pupil of
She formerly

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

rom JAN 3
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

[79]

TIGHT BINDING

ecord
Philadelphia, Pa.

t the third concert to be given b oston Symphony Orchestra in th my of Music on Monday evening ary 3, Pierre Monteux will conduct ikowsky's symphony, "Manfred," on Byron's dramatic poem. This d work, although not often heard, dered to number among the great s finest scores. The movements "Manfred's Wanderings and ," "The Fairy of the Alps," orale," "The Palace of Arimanes; ation to Astarte; Manfred's ." The brilliant closing piece at oncert will be Balakireff's Oriental , "Islamey," which has been ar- for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, ern Italian composer. The soloist evening will be Alfred Cortot, as the finest pianist in France, ll be heard in the Fifth Concerto t-Saens in major. This music nctive by his Oriental subject and er and the Nubian Love Song is the theme of the slow move- Alfred Cortot was born in Switz- of French parents. He came s at a very early age, where he the Conservatory under De- one of the last of Chopin's dis- and under Dielmer, in whose n 1896 he obtained first prize. diately thereafter he played as so- the Colonne and Lamoureux rts. This led to several extensive of Europe, in which he was heard with the orchestra in city after nd in recitals of his own, and was fied as a principal founder of the French piano school. In addition career as pianist, he accepted the (at the age of 24) of repetiteur yreuth, and under his conductor- n Paris Wagner's operas had nota- formances. A year later, in 1903, unded the Societe des Concerts, urpose of which was to give audi- of choral works.

---

rom JAN 1 - 1921
ULLETIN,
hiladelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Monteux, conductor, will give its concert of the season at the Acad of Music next Monday evening Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, soloist. The symphony will be ikowsky's "Manfred," which the an composer called after Byron's atic poem. Cortot is to play Saint s' Fifth Piano Concerto in F ma- and the concluding number will be kireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," anged for orchestra by Alfredo C a, the rising young Italian composer.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 2 1921

Boston Symphony.

the third pair of Boston Sym- concerts to be given in Carnegie ext Thursday evening and Sat- afternoon, Pierre Monteux has led the following programs: Thursday evening, "Tschaikow- "Manfred" Symphony, after 's dramatic poem, the move- of which describe; Manfred's erings and Despair, the Fairy of lps, Pastorale, the Palace of anes, Invocation to Astarte, ed's Death; d'Indy's "La Queste eu," a symphonic excerpt from ew opera, "The Legend of St. opher," "An Sluah Sidhe" ("In aery Hills"), a symphonic poem elic subject by the English com- Arnold Bax, which will on this on have its first performance in York, and Lalo's Overture to King of Ys." For the Saturday oon concert, Mozart's Overture s opera, "Don Giovanni," Schu- 's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," osed by Charles T. Griffes after oem of Coleridge. Shortly after ork was introduced to New York hursday concert by Pierre Mon- last spring, the noted young can composer died. This and of his works have aroused con- ble musical interest. Malipiero' Suite, "Impressioni dal Vero" ressions of Nature"), with the nents "Il Capinero" ("The cap"), "Il Picchio" ("The Wood- "), "Il Chiu" ("The Owl"), will its first performance in New and the concert will close with reff's Oriental fantasy, "Isla- orchestrated by the rising young composer, Alfredo Casella.

EAGLE
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 2 1921

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

soloist at the third Boston Sym- y concert of the season, to be in the Academy of Music Fri- evening, Alfred Cortot, pianist, play with the orchestra Saint- 's Fifth Concerto in F Major, is particularly interesting on nt of its Oriental character. rre Monteux will conduct at the concert Schumann's Fourth phony in D Minor and Mozart's ure to his opera "Don Giovanni."

closing number will be Balak "Islamey." This Oriental fa which has been called the mo lt music ever written for th has been set for orchestra b composer Alfredo Casella.

Ever since it was announced a few weeks ago that Hulda Lashanska, the "newiy discovered" Swedish lyric soprano, was to sing in Boston for the first time on Jan. 28 and 29, local patrons of music have been discussing her. A New York girl and pupil of Madame Sembrich, famous opera star of other days, she made her debut five years ago in Carnegie Hall. She formerly studied piano under Alexander Lambert, but was persuaded by him to start on a vocal career.

OST JAN. 30

From JAN 4
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Cortot Shines as Soloist in the Saint-Saens Concerto No. 5

THE PROGRAM

"Manfred," symphonic poem . . Tschaikowsky
Fifth Concerto, for piano and orchestra, Saint-Saens
Alfred Cortot
"Islamey," Oriental fantasy. . . . Balakireff
(Orchestrated by Casella)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played in excellent style about as uninteresting an orchestral program as has been given in Philadelphia for a long time. The concert opened with the "Manfred" symphony, or rather symphonic form, for it has little of the real symphony about it except the scherzo, as the second movement should be called, its best movement by the way, of the four. Tschaikowsky himself refused to include it in his symphonies and with good reason, for no one can accuse that composer of lack of the symphonic feeling. "Manfred" was well performed by the Boston orchestra, but it is not Tschaikowsky at his best. There is the full knowledge of the orchestra that is shown in all his orchestral compositions and there is an excees of the melancholy of the later works, but there is little of the poignant Tschaikowsky melody that makes up the body of the Fifth and Sixth symphonies that followed it.

The second number was the Saint-Saens fifth concerto for piano and orchestra, superbly played by Alfred Cortot. In spite of the exquisitely crisp touch of Mr. Cortot and the undoubted technique which the concerto demands and which the soloist possesses, there is little real music in the composition. The first movement is a tour de force of virtuosity and was executed by the soloist in a faultless manner and with great brilliance but left little impression except that of admiration for the ability of Mr. Cortot to play so many notes in so short a space of time, not exactly the reason for the performance of an elaborate concerto. The second movement, an exceedingly militant andante, left pretty much the same impression, but the second theme of the finale is real music, and it was so interpreted by the soloist and the orchestra. Mr. Cortot brought out all the technique of the concerto, which is enormous, and all the music which the composer has put into it, which is little. The work gives no chance for the performer to show his interpretative abilities.

The concluding number was Balakireff's "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella. Evidently Mr. Monteux has exhausted the orchestral literature, for this is the second time in two concerts that the Boston orchestra has given Philadelphia audiences compositions in other forms arranged for orchestra. A month ago he dipped into the literature of chamber music with the Mendelssohn Octet and this time into the even vaster literature of the piano.

The chief claim to fame of "Islamey" is that it is probably the most difficult composition for the piano ever written. The same might almost hold good for its orchestration by Mr. Casella. He has arranged it for an astounding number of instruments, most of which seem to be playing all the time with the result that there is nothing of the Oriental color which might have been displayed with more reserve in the use of the instruments. In due justice to the Boston orchestra it is only fair to say that the work was splendidly performed, but, after all, it seemed to be hardly worth the work evidently put upon it. With recollections of a recent performance of "Scheherazade" in mind, it would have been interesting to know what Rimsky-Korsakoff, with his vast orchestral knowledge and true Oriental feeling, would have done with an arrangement of "Islamey."

---

rom
Evening Sun
altimore, Md.

Lyric — On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of this season with Alfred Cortot, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist. He will play with the orchestra Saint-Saens' Fifth Concerto in F major, which is particularly interesting because of its Oriental themes. The orchestral numbers will include Brahms' Fourth Sympathy in E minor and Lola's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" (The King of Ys), which has an important passage for 'cello solo.

---

n WS JAN 2 - 1921
altimore, Md. NEWS.

CORTOT TO APPEAR HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Pianist Will Be Soloist At Orchestral Concert Wednesday—Serato, Violinist, To Make Local Debut On Friday.

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

After the rush of the holiday season, with its rapid concurrence of concerts, recitals and opera performances, there will be a brief let-up in the musical season. Only two affairs of importance are scheduled for this week—the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Cortot as soloist, at the Lyric Wednesday night and the local debut of Arrigo Serato, violinist, at the Peabody Conservatory Friday afternoon.

Several new bookings for later dates have recently been made, including a concert by the Columbia Saxophone Sextet at the Lyric on January 14. A return engagement by Pavlowa's company, which made a tremendous success at its earlier appearance, is also being arranged. It will take place during the latter part of the season.

---

rom JAN 4 - 1921
TIMES
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Considerable interest centers in the erformance of "Scheherazade" by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Paron's theater Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock, in that this will be one of he first performances of this popular uite by the orchestra under the guidance of Pierre Monteux who was so amous for his magnificent reading of his score in its ballet version when e conducted the Ballet Russe orchesra. The symphonic form of this Oriental and gorgeously colored music of the Arabian Nights is, of course, its finest nd also its authentic form. Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian colorist, wrote it olely for orchestral use, and only after is death in 1908 was it made into a choreographic drama." Seat sale now n progress at Sedgwick & Casey's.

From JAN 3 - 1921
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Music This Week

The Boston Orchestra under the di tion of Pierre Monteux, will play the Lyric Wednesday evening, when assisting artist will be Alfred Cor the eminent French pianist. He be heard in the fifth Saint-Saens certo, the one in F major. The phony will be the fourth, of ms, restored to this orchestra's ms by special request. The over- o Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" will also be

---

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

CORTOT IS MASTE OF PIANO CONCE

Frenchman's Playing of S Saens' Work Brings Hi Four Recalls.

Alfred Cortot, the eminent of France, received the ovati the afternoon at yesterday's c of the Boston Symphony Orch with Pierre Monteux, the F conductor, directing the third cert of the season of the B players at the National Th A large and distinguished au was present, including Mrs. W and Mme. Jusserand, both of entertained box parties.

M. Cortot received four r after his playing of the Saint-S piano concerto in F major. It was a brilliant performance, one filled with mastery of the design and character of the music, and instinct with the sweeping rhythm of a great artist.

WEALTH OF MUSIC.

What a wealth of music may be revealed in a composition when it is touched with the magic of imagination and intellect! Within the brilliant flow of shimmering liquid runs, or of incisive dominantly announced themes of barbaric type, there was a wealth of meaning told in rare eloquent or dramatic tones. The music themes rang out anon like chimes, interspersed with a broad aria akin to "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from the same composer's opera, "Samson and Dalilah."

Splendidly were they developed, with rare chords, a romantic soliloquy, or a spirit of revelry; the lyric and the barbaric resolving into a "tour de force" of great virtuoso technique and commanding power. The orchestra was a rich body of tone like a vivid background, bizarre — almost melodramatic Saint-Saens made it at times.

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY.

The symphony was the Schumann, No. 4, in D minor. Mr. Monteux seemed happiest in the lighter gracious moments. If, as Clara Schumann wrote, this symphony was composed "from the depths of Robert's soul"—that depth was not sounded yesterday. In fact it was not introspective, but was developed brilliantly and carried directly to its climax with little variety and few dynamics. Mr. Bedetti, solo cellist, received personal recognition for his solo part, the strings, however, were more biting than mellow. All that golden glow of the Boston Symphony of other days seemed sharpened into too bright a tone-color.

Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys" was impressive with a regal splendous of tone, while the final number, the "Islamey," of Balakireff, was an Arabian Nights oriental fantasy of abandon, though the sinuous, the alluring subtlety of the East was crowded out by an obvious, albeit temperamental, picture.

JESSIE MacBRIDE.

[80]

ecord
Philadelphia, Pa.

90

At the thi concert to be given by oston Symphony Orchestra in the emy of Music on Monday evening, ary 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct ikowsky's symphony, "Manfred," on Byron's dramatic poem. This did work, although not often heard, idered to number among the great 's finest scores. The movements "Manfred's Wanderings and ," "The Fairy of the Alps," orale," "The Palace of Arimanes; ation to Astarte; Manfred's " The brilliant closing piece at ncert will be Balakireff's Oriental , "Islamey," which has been ar- for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, ern Italian composer. The soloist evening will be Alfred Cortot, as the finest pianist in France, ill be heard in the Fifth Concerto nt-Saens in major. This music tinctive by his Oriental subject and cter and the Nubian Love Song is the theme of the slow move- Alfred Cortot was born in Switz- of French parents. He came ris at a very early age, where he the Conservatory under De- , one of the last of Chopin's dis- , and under Dielmer, in whose n 1896 he obtained first prize. diately thereafter he played as so- at the Colonne and Lamoureux ts. This led to several extensive of Europe, in which he was heard with the orchestra in city after nd in recitals of his own, and was fied as a principal founder of the French piano school. In addition career as pianist, he accepted the on (at the age of 24) of repetiteur yreuth, and under his conductor- n Paris Wagner's operas had nota- rformances. A year later, in 1903, unded the Societe des Concerts, urpose of which was to give audi- of choral works.

---

om
ULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

n Boston Symphony Orchestra, e Monteux, conductor, will give its concert of the season at the Aca of Music next Monday evening, Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, soloist. The symphony will be aikowsky's "Manfred," which the ian composer called after Byron's atic poem. Cortot is to play Saint s' Fifth Piano Concerto in F ma- and the concluding number will be kireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," anged for orchestra by Alfredo Ca a, the rising young Italian composer.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

the third pair of Boston Sym- concerts to be given in Carnegie next Thursday evening and Sat- afternoon, Pierre Monteux has led the following programs:

Thursday evening, "Tschaikow- "Manfred" Symphony, after 's dramatic poem, the move- of which describe; Manfred's erings and Despair, the Fairy of lps, Pastorale, the Palace of anes, Invocation to Astarte, ed's Death; d'Indy's "La Queste eu," a symphonic excerpt from ew opera, "The Legend of St. opher," "An Sluah Sidhe" ("In aery Hills"), a symphonic poem elic subject by the English com- Arnold Bax, which will on this on have its first performance in York, and Lalo's Overture to King of Ys." For the Saturday oon concert, Mozart's Overture opera, "Don Giovanni," Schu- 's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," osed by Charles T. Griffes after oem of Coleridge. Shortly after ork was introduced to New York hursday concert by Pierre Mon- last spring, the noted young can composer died. This and of his works have aroused con- ble musical interest. Malipiero' Suite, "Impressioni dal Vero" ressions of Nature"), with the nents "Il Capinero" ("The cap"), "Il Picchio" ("The Wood- "), "Il Chiu" ("The Owl"), will its first performance in New and the concert will close with reff's Oriental fantasy, "Isla- orchestrated by the rising young composer, Alfredo Casella.

EAGLE
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

soloist at the third Boston Sym- y concert of the season, to be in the Academy of Music Fri evening, Alfred Cortot, pianist, play with the orchestra Saint- 's Fifth Concerto in F Major, h is particularly interesting on unt of its Oriental character. rre Monteux will conduct at the concert Schumann's Fourth phony in D Minor and Mozart's ture to his opera "Don Giovanni."

closing number will be Balak "Islamey." This Oriental fa which has been called the most ult music ever written for the , has been set for orchestra by talian composer Alfredo Casella

---

Ever since it was announced a few weeks ago that Hulda Lashanska, the "newly discovered" Swedish lyric soprano, was to sing in Boston for the first time on Jan. 28 and 29, local patrons of music have been discussing her. A New York girl and pupil of Madame Sembrich, famous opera star of other days, she made her debut five years ago in Carnegie Hall. She formerly studied piano under Alexander Lambert, but was persuaded by him to start on a vocal career.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Cortot Shines as Soloist in the Saint-Saens Concerto No. 5

THE PROGRAM

"Manfred," symphonic poem..Tschaikowsky
Fifth Concerto, for piano and orchestra,
Saint-Saens
Alfred Cortot
"Islamey," Oriental fantasy.....Balakireff
(Orchestrated by Casella)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played in excellent style about as uninteresting an orchestral program as has been given in Philadelphia for a long time. The concert opened with the "Manfred" symphony, or rather symphonic form, for it has little of the real symphony about it except the scherzo, as the second movement should be called, its best movement by the way, of the four. Tschaikowsky himself refused to include it in his symphonies and with good reason, for no one can accuse that composer of lack of the symphonic feeling. "Manfred" was well performed by the Boston orchestra, but it is not Tschaikowsky at his best. There is the full knowledge of the orchestra that is shown in all his orchestral compositions and there is an excees of the melancholy of the later works, but there is little of the poignant Tschaikowsky melody that makes up the body of the Fifth and Sixth symphonies that followed it.

The second number was the Saint-Saens fifth concerto for piano and orchestra, superbly played by Alfred Cortot. In spite of the exquisitely crisp touch of Mr. Cortot and the undoubted technique which the concerto demands and which the soloist possesses, there is little real music in the composition. The first movement is a tour de force of virtuosity and was executed by the soloist in a faultless manner and with great brilliance but left little impression except that of admiration for the ability of Mr. Cortot to play so many notes in so short a space of time, not exactly the reason for the performance of an elaborate concerto. The second movement, an exceedingly militant andante, left pretty much the same impression, but the second theme of the finale is real music, and it was so interpreted by the soloist and the orchestra. Mr. Cortot brought out all the technique of the concerto, which is enormous, and all the music which the composer has put into it, which is little. The work gives no chance for the performer to show his interpretative abilities.

The concluding number was Balakireff's "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella. Evidently Mr. Monteux has exhausted the orchestral literature, for this is the second time in two concerts that the Boston orchestra has given Philadelphia audiences compositions in other forms arranged for orchestra. A month ago he dipped into the literature of chamber music with the Mendelssohn Octet and this time into the even vaster literature of the piano.

The chief claim to fame of "Islamey" is that it is probably the most difficult composition for the piano ever written. The same might almost hold good for its orchestration by Mr. Casella. He has arranged it for an astounding number of instruments, most of which seem to be playing all the time with the result that there is nothing of the Oriental color which might have been displayed with more reserve in the use of the instruments. In due justice to the Boston orchestra it is only fair to say that the work was splendidly performed, but, after all, it seemed to be hardly worth the work evidently put upon it. With recollections of a recent performance of "Scheherazade" in mind, it would have been interesting to know what Rimsky-Korsakoff, with his vast orchestral knowledge and true Oriental feeling, would have done with an arrangement of "Islamey."

---

rom
Evening Sun
ltimore, Md.

Lyric.—On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of this season with Alfred Cortot, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist. He will play with the orchestra Saint-Saens' Fifth Concerto in F major, which is particularly interesting because of its Oriental themes. The orchestral numbers will include Brahms' Fourth Sympathy in E minor and Lola's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" (The King f Ys), which has an important passage or 'cello solo.

POST JAN. 30

n WS
altimore, Md. NEWS.

CORTOT TO APPEAR HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Pianist Will Be Soloist At Orchestral Concert Wednesday—Serato, Violinist, To Make Local Debut On Friday.

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

After the rush of the holiday season, with its rapid concurrence of concerts, recitals and opera performances, there will be a brief let-up in the musical season. Only two affairs of importance are scheduled for this week—the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Cortot as soloist, at the Lyric Wednesday night and the local debut of Arrigo Serato, violinist, at the Peabody Conservatory Friday afternoon.

Several new bookings for later dates have recently been made, including a concert by the Columbia Saxophone Sextet at the Lyric on January 14. A return engagement by Pavlowa's company, which made a tremendous success at its earlier appearance, is also being arranged. It will take place during the latter part of the season.

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Music This Week

The Boston Orchestra, under the di tion of Pierre Monteux, will play the Lyric Wednesday evening, when assisting artist will be Alfred Cor the eminent French pianist. He be heard in the fifth Saint-Saens certo, the one in F major. The phony will be the fourth, of ms, restored to this orchestra's ms by special request. The over- o Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" will also be

---

rom
TIMES
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Considerable interest centers in the erformance of "Scheherazade" by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Par- on's theater Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock, in that this will be one of he first performances of this popular uite by the orchestra under the guid- nce of Pierre Monteux who was so amous for his magnificent reading of his score in its ballet version when e conducted the Ballet Russe orches- ra. The symphonic form of this Orien- al and gorgeously colored music of the rabian Nights is, of course, its finest nd also its authentic form. Rimsky- Korsakoff, the Russian colorist, wrote it olely for orchestral use, and only after is death in 1908 was it made into a choreographic drama." Seat sale now n progress at Sedgwick & Casey's.

[80]

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

CORTOT IS MASTE OF PIANO CONCE

Frenchman's Playing of S Saens' Work Brings Hi Four Recalls.

Alfred Cortot, the eminent of France, received the ovati the afternoon at yesterday's c of the Boston Symphony Orch with Pierre Monteux, the F conductor, directing the third cert of the season of the B players at the National Th A large and distinguished au was present, including Mrs. W and Mme. Jusserand, both of entertained box parties.

M. Cortot received four r after his playing of the Saint-S piano concerto in F major. It was a brilliant performance, one filled with mastery of the design and character of the music, and instinct with the sweeping rhythm of a great artist.

WEALTH OF MUSIC.

What a wealth of music may be revealed in a composition when it is touched with the magic of imagination and intellect! Within the brilliant flow of shimmering liquid runs, or of incisive dominantly announced themes of barbaric type, there was a wealth of meaning told in rare eloquent or dramatic tones. The music themes rang out anon like chimes, interspersed with a broad aria akin to "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from the same composer's opera, "Samson and Dalilah."

Splendidly were they developed, with rare chords, a romantic solilo quy, or a spirit of revelry; the lyric and the barbaric resolving into a "tour de force" of great virtuoso technique and commanding power. The orchestra was a rich body of tone like a vivid background, bizarre — almost melodramatic Saint-Saens made it at times.

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY.

The symphony was the Schumann, No. 4, in D minor. Mr. Monteux seemed happiest in the lighter gracious moments. If, as Clara Schumann wrote, this symphony was composed "from the depths of Robert's soul"—that depth was not sounded yesterday. In fact it was not introspective, but was developed brilliantly and carried directly to its climax with little variety and few dynamics. Mr. Bedetti, solo cellist, received personal recognition for his solo part, the strings, however, were more biting than mellow. All that golden glow of the Boston Symphony of other days seemed sharpened into too bright a tone-color.

Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys" was impressive with a regal splendous of tone, while the final number, the "Islamey," of Balakireff, was an Arabian Nights oriental fantasy of abandon, though the sinuous, the alluring subtlety of the East was crowded out by an obvious, albeit temperamental, picture.

JESSIE MacBRIDE.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
JAN 5

HUB SYMPHONY CAPTIVATES IN FINE MUSICALE

With Cortot as Soloist Audience Is Charmed By Program.

The largest audience that has attended the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season thronged the New National Theater yesterday afternoon when Alfred Cortot appeared as the soloist. At the conclusion of the magnificently rendered Saint-Saens Pianoforte Concerto No. 5 in F major, Op. 103, there was a tumult of vocal and manual manifestations of approval.

There is no need to speak of the amazing technique of Cortot; it is adequate for any demand of virtuosity. His tones are marked with a purity and beauty which he produces by a marvelously sensitive touch on the keys. This master is able to get singularly beautiful tone colors and contrasts throughout his entire range from the most delicate pianissimo to a great thundering fortissimo. The concerto itself is of unusual beauty.

Captivating Theme.

For the opening orchestral number Pierre Monteux, the conductor, had selected Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." This composition abounds in the most captivating of themes, Andantino non troppo, taken from Rozenn's air "En silence pourquoi souffrir?" in her duet with Margared. An overture to the opera was performed for the first time November 12, 1876, but it was remodeled and played in its present form for the first time, January 24, 1886.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120. Its title states that the composition is "in one piece," the parts passing into one another without pause. The orchestra brought out with striking force the full beauties of the second movement which opens with a simple, plaintive and exquisitely refined melody that lingers in the memory.

Balakireff's "Islamey" an Oriental fantasy, orchestrated by Alfredo Casella was the concluding number. The work is thoroughly Arabian in character and formed a fitting close to one of the most enjoyable concerts given by this organization the present season. The concert was under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene.

---

in the first days of the war and by the sheer excellence of his playing, his technic and his interpretations, has carved for himself a niche among the greatest virtuosi of the keyboard today.

The entire evening was a most robust one, abounding with lusty virility, taking its mood, of course, from Conductor Monteux, who allowed his men to go sweeping along in a bold, slashing fashion, sometimes to the detriment of the passage rendered. There was very little subtlety, very little tender shading, less of the painting that makes a composition glow with life. The symphony was the beautiful one by Brahms', the Fourth in E minor, which was recently played by the Stokowski organization. The second movement was very well done, which, with the first, is the best of the four. Both the third and fourth movements were done in a manner a trifle too broad, although, it must be admitted, a somewhat vigorous reading accords well with the general style of the closing Allegro energico e passionato. If a comparatively small appreciation of finer perceptions was in evidence throughout the symphony, the men from Boston, nevertheless, play with a great deal of energy and enthusiasm, this vitality being much preferred to the clock-like precision apparent under the former Muck regime. This same vitality can, in time, be toned down to something very fine.

M. Cortot's playing, as always, was superb. Digitally he has few equals rising to notable heights in the sparkling fireworks of the closing movement of the Saint-Saens' Fifth Concerto in F major. His performance here was gripping and he fairly electrified by his dominating control of the keyboard. Whatever interest this concerto may possess is centered in the second movement with its colorful Orientalities achieved by a use of some exotic Eastern scales. The first sounds at moments slightly Slavic with occasional breaths of melody typical of Tschaikowsky.

Edouard Lalo's trusty old warhorse, the heterogeneous Overture to his "Le Roi d'Ys", completed the evening's program. The shadow of Richard of Bayreuth keeps constantly falling across this muchly played work, and with the opening bars of his "Pilgrims' Chorus," he definitely returns to life. It was played with rousing spirit and developed to a thunderous, tempestuous finale.

G. K.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN 5 - 1921 L
STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Cortot-Boston Symphany.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the third concert of its Washington series yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, with Alfred Cortot, pianist, as soloist. The large and fashionable audience which greeted the organization showed its appreciation of the program, which was beautiful in choice of compositions and in rendition. It was, however, a bit long for a late afternoon concert, many having to leave before the close.

M. Monteux has given to the orchestra fire and dash seldom heard in former performances, although there is not such careful precision as has distinguished the Boston orchestra in previous seasons. The Schumann Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, was played with placidity. Probably the best work of the orchestra yesterday was in the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys." The solo instruments were beautifully played and the accompaniment was exquisite.

M. Cortot played Saint-Saens Concerto in F Major, No. 5, opus 103, with exquisite delicacy, yet not lacking dramatic fire and poetic interpretation. The shading and color of his scales and cadenzas were delicate and rich, and his warmth of tone was manifest throughout, with an occasional exception in the very forte passages when the tones in the treble seemed cold, almost hard. M. Cortot was recalled many times with applause and "bravos."

The Balakireff oriental fantasy "Islamey," written for the piano and orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, was played by the orchestra with dash, though it has not much in the way of beauty to commend it.

ESTABLISHED 1881
JAN 6 - 1921 M
From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

LYRIC
The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to the Lyric for its third concert of the season last evening in a program provocative of neither pro- [illegible] praise nor expectant interest. [illegible] was the eminent French

---

From JAN 8 - 1921
TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

CORTOT WITH THE BOSTON.

Chief credit, as indicated by the applause of the audience at last night's third Boston Syhphony orchestra concert at the Academy of Music must go to Alfred Cortot, soloist of the evening, who played the fifth Saint-Saens F major piano concerto.

It is, however, more or less of a custor to hand the individual performer the lion's share of praise, and it is probably for this reason that the Saint-Saens concerto was elevated above the Schumann Symphony No. 4, in D minor.

Certainly, the Schumann composition is richer in real tone and profited well by Conductor Monteux's reading. The entire symphony was played without pauses between the four movements. Particularly beautifully done were the second or romanza movement, and the third, the scherzo.

In the last movement the skeleton in the Monteux closet, an inheritance from his predecessor, Henri Rabaud, clattered its ghostly cymbals. It is a tendency toward the over-emphasis of brasses that must, it seems, manifest itself at least once, even if ever so slightly at each Brooklyn concert.

The opening number was Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," a selection that has been heard often enough to make eligible for the reception of late comers. The closing number, "Islamey," an Oriental fantasy by Balakireff, was rather a disappointment. It is a noisy affair that conjures up visions of the "Orientalism of Coney Island.

Cortot, in his manner of playing, may be profitably contrasted with Percy Grainger, where that talented young American spends a good deal of energy in pounding-and-mane-wagging. Cortot has a more motionless method, but his results are vivid and satisfying. Tone is not his entire accomplishment, though, as he demonstrated in the first movement of the concerto. So technical was that rendition that the audience was a bit disbayed and his colorful second movement was a psychological lifesaver. At the finish of the concerto he was aendered an enthusiastic ovation.

[81]

From JAN - 9
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

At The Symphony.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at its concert for children given yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, played the "Mignon" overture, by Thomas; the march movement from Raff's "Lenore" symphony, the Saint-Saens serenade for violin, violoncello and piano, the "Allegretto" from Beethoven's F major symphony and the fire music from Wagner's "The Valkyrie."

Schumann's D minor symphony and Malapiero's "Impressions from Nature" were featured on Mr. Monteux's Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee programme at Carnegie Hall yesterday.

ESTABLISHED 1881
JAN 13 1921 X
From Dispatch
Pittsburg, Pa.

MUSIC AT CARNEGIE HALL

There was a novelty at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Malipiero's "Impressional dal Vero" ("Impressions From Nature") Suite No 1. It comprises three little sketches suggested by three birds, the blackcap, the woodpecker and the owl. The first pictures the song of the bird in autumn woods. In the second the woodpecker is at work on the mildwood trunks of the oaks at high noon. The forest is en fete, teeming with life, under the warming rays of the sun. In the third the mournful note of the owl is heard through the stillness of night. All three show imagination and exquisite fancy, and Malipiero has not found it necessary to wallow in dissonates. Each of the pieces has character and distinction, each is skilfully orchestrated. There were many music lovers from the Keystone State in the audience.

Brooklyn Life
New York City
JAN 15 1921 K

The Third Boston Symphony Concert

The overture which Mozart dashed off the night before his masterpiece, "Don Giovanni," had its première gave the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra an admirable opening at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. And it made one wish that one might hear the entire opera in Brooklyn's beautiful opera house with, say, Lehmann, Nilsson, Sembrich, Bonci and Renaud as the principal singers, and Seidl in the conductor's chair. One may, of course, wish the impossible. The Overture gave genuine delight to an audience which, more's the pity, did not fill all the seats. Schumann's Fourth Symphony, played without pause, added delight to delight, for it was played superbly under the direction of Monteux. From beginning to end, the symphony was wonderful. The remaining orchestral number, the "Islamey" of Balakireff, orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, met with a less cordial reception. It is an interesting composition, but somewhat mystifying as an "Oriental fantasy." As for the soloist, Alfred Cortot, he made a profoundly favorable impression with his playing of the Saint-Saëns pianoforte concerto in F. major (No. 5). Cortot is a remarkably fine pianist and it is most gratifying that after his altogether too long struggle for adequate recognition here he has finally come into his own. Certainly every one who heard him last week Friday evening is more than keen to hear him again. He alone justified the Brooklyn insistence upon a soloist at the local Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

---

don," each dedicated to a dead fellow-soldier. As a tribute to a musician, his selection of dance forms may seem eccentric. But in his treatment of each movement he once more proved his rare talent as a composer of ingenious and impressive music. At the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, Mr. Monteux gave us Mendelssohn's Octett for violins, 'cellos, and violas, in E flat major, composed two years before his music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream." As the invention of a mere boy of sixteen, it seems a miracle. Though the first movement and the second are jejune, the succeeding Scherzo and the Finale (Presto) still amaze one by their fantasy and spirit. With the Octett Mr. Monteux restored to us Lalo's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and, to complete a most attractive scheme, threw in Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Ballet Suite.

Last week brought a first celebration

From WEEKLY REVIEW
Address New York City
Date DEC 15 1920 M

01

Music

From Symphony to Opera—"Le Tombeau de Couperin"—A Beethoven Festival

THOUGH there were vacant seats at the last two New York performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra, both its programmes were received with eager interest. Mr. Monteux, the director of the orchestra, has done a great deal for the young French school. The first of his two schemes included Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite, an equivalent of Debussy's "Hommage à Rameau." Rameau and Couperin, between them, laid the foundations of French style in music, informing it with grace and charm and beauty of a discreet, expressive kind.

Ravel began his Suite in honor of the chief writer for the clavecin before the war. Then, being dragged into the strife, he laid it aside till three or four years later. He first arranged it as a six-part work for the piano. From this composition he next singled out for orchestration four movements, a "Prelude," a "Forlane" (or "furlana"), in the Venetian mode, a "Ménuet" and a "Riga

---

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.

At the forthcoming

RICHARD BURGIN
Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be solo violinist at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 25.

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.
1921

BURGIN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 25, at 8:15, will be Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Burgin is a newcomer to this country, having crossed the ocean at the beginning of the present season to take the post of honor at the left of the conductor, coming from Russia, which has long been famous for the number of great violinists produced there, and a pupil of Leopold Auer, whose training has brought forth the greatest of these. His inspired performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, of Brahm's violin concerto, which favorite work he will play with the orchestra here, brought the highest praise from public and press, and his introductory recital caused like enthusiasm.

A native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's musical training has taken place largely in Russia, and the larger part of his career has been confined by chaotic conditions in the East to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. For twelve years he served as concertmaster in the fine orchestras which the largest cities of these countries possess. Of Auer's pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist studied with the noted master just before his time; Seidel came later, while Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend. Thus prepared for his professional career, Burgin toured Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia with a great deal of success, playing as soloist in Petrograd, Kieff, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society, and the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not strange to him for he attended one of the symphony concerts in New York when he visited the metropolis for a few months as a boy wonder and played several times there. He has, in Europe, played as concertmaster under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, likewise under Richard Strauss and under Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania and formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm.

The First Symphony of Beethoven will be played at this coming Boston Symphony concert, and also Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Beethoven's First Symphony is accounted one of the master's most graceful and melodious works. This, his first

---

From JAN 16 1921
STAR
Indianapolis, Ind.

Miss Pauline Schellschmidt, who has recently returned from New York and Philadelphia, brings back some enthusiastic impressions of the music she heard. She says: "It was my good fortune to hear the Philadelphia orchestra, Leopold Stowoski, conductor; the Boston orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor and LaScala orchestra, with the well-known opera conductor, Arturo Toscanini. From the viewpoint of conductor, orchestra personnel and makeup of program, the Philadelphia has without a doubt the first place. The Italian orchestra occasioned a tremendous display of patriotism among the Italian population, who turned out en masse to welcome the great leader and his body of men.

This orchestra excells in one particular thing, this was evidenced in the [illegible] minor concerto for strings of Vivaldi (a composer who antedates Sebastian Bach) which Toscanini interpreted strictly as written, obtaining a pianissimo that gave the [illegible] of [illegible] from an organ in a [illegible] thedral, the sixty strings pl[illegible] single man. The effect was [illegible] der and beauty. The string[illegible] good, better than the othe[illegible] The reading of the Beetho[illegible] "Symphony" was flavored w[illegible] Italian condiment—unlike a[illegible] tation of that composi[illegible] nini is a great Wagner [illegible] led the orchestra with [illegible] hemence in the "Prelude [illegible] Death" (Tristan and Isolde[illegible]

Of the Boston Symphon[illegible] one can truly say, "it wa[illegible] new faces, and those wh[illegible] sat at the last desks [illegible] The program made up of [illegible] poem "Manfred" (Tschai[illegible] oriental fantasy, "Islamey[illegible] and the fifth concerto for [illegible] Saens) played by Alfred [illegible] generally regarded by [illegible] goers as the most intere[illegible] tral program heard in [illegible] a long time.

HERALD
ess Washington, D. C.

JAN 5

HUB SYMPHONY CAPTIVATES IN FINE MUSICALE

With Cortot as Soloist Audience Is Charmed By Program.

The largest audience that has attended the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season thronged the New National Theater yesterday afternoon when Alfred Cortot appeared as the soloist. At the conclusion of the magnificently rendered Saint-Saens Pianoforte Concerto No. 5 in F major, Op. 103, there was a tumult of vocal and manual manifestations of approval.

There is no need to speak of the amazing technique of Cortot; it is adequate for any demand of virtuosity. His tones are marked with a purity and beauty which he produces by a marvelously sensitive touch on the keys. This master is able to get singularly beautiful tone colors and contrasts throughout his entire range from the most delicate pianissimo to a great thundering fortissimo. The concerto itself is of unusual beauty.

Captivating Theme.

For the opening orchestral number Pierre Monteux, the conductor, had selected Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." This composition abounds in the most captivating of themes, Andantino non troppo, taken from Rozenn's air "En silence pourquoi souffrir?" in her duet with Margared. An overture to the oper was performed for the first time November 12, 1876, but it was re modeled and played in its presen form for the first time, January 24 1886.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120. Its titl states that the composition is "i one piece," the parts passing int one another without pause. Th orchestra brought out with striking force the full beauties of the second movement which opens with a simple, plaintive and exquisitely refined melody that lingers in the memory.

Balakireff's "Islamey" an Oriental fantasy, orchestrated by Alfredo Casella was the concluding number. The work is thoroughly Arabian in character and formed a fitting close to one of the most enjoyable concerts given by this organization the present season. The concert was under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene.

From STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Cortot-Boston Symphany.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the third concert of its Washington series yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, with Alfred Cortot, pianist, as soloist. The large and fashionable audience which greeted the organization showed its appreciation of the program, which was beautiful in choice of compositions and in rendition. It was, however, a bit long for a late afternoon concert, many having to leave before the close.

M. Monteux has given to the orchestra fire and dash seldom heard in former performances, although there is not such careful precision as has distinguished the Boston orchestra in previous seasons. The Schumann Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, was played with placidity. Probably the best work of the orchestra yesterday was in the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys." The solo instruments were beautifully played and the accompaniment was exquisite.

M. Cortot played Saint-Saens' Concerto in F Major, No. 5, opus 103, with exquisite delicacy, yet not lacking dramatic fire and poetic interpretation. The shading and color of his scales and cadenzas were delicate and rich, and his warmth of tone was manifest throughout, with an occasional exception in the very forte passages when the tones in the treble seemed cold, almost hard. M. Cortot was recalled many times with applause and "bravos."

The Balakireff oriental fantasy "Islamey," written for the piano and orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, was played by the orchestra with dash, though it has not much in the way of beauty to commend it.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 6 - 1921
From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

LYRIC

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to the Lyric for its third concert of the season last evening in a program provocative of neither prolonged praise nor expectant interest. The soloist was the eminent French pianist, Alfred Cortot, who came to us in the first days of the war and by the sheer excellence of his playing, his technic and his interpretations, has carved for himself a niche among the greatest virtuosi of the keyboard today.

The entire evening was a most robust one, abounding with lusty virility, taking its mood, of course, from Conductor Monteux, who allowed his men to go sweeping along in a bold, slashing fashion, sometimes to the detriment of the passage rendered. There was very little subtlety, very little tender shading, less of the painting that makes a composition glow with life. The symphony was the beautiful one by Brahms', the Fourth in E minor, which was recently played by the Stokowski organization. The second movement was very well done, which, with the first, is the best of the four. Both the third and fourth movements were done in a manner a trifle too broad, although, it must be admitted, a somewhat vigorous reading accords well with the general style of the closing Allegro energico e passionato. If a comparatively small appreciation of finer perceptions was in evidence throughout the symphony, the men from Boston, nevertheless, play with a great deal of energy and enthusiasm, this vitality being much preferred to the clock-like precision apparent under the former Muck regime. This same vitality can, in time, be toned down to something very fine.

M. Cortot's playing, as always, was superb. Digitally he has few equals, rising to notable heights in the sparkling fireworks of the closing movement of the Saint-Saens' Fifth Concerto in F major. His performance here was gripping and he fairly electrified by his dominating control of the keyboard. Whatever interest this concerto may possess is centered in the second movement with its colorful Orientalities achieved by a use of some exotic Eastern scales. The first sounds at moments slightly Slavic with occasional breaths of melody typical of Tschaikowsky.

Edouard Lalo's trusty old warhorse, the heterogeneous Overture to his "Le Roi d'Ys", completed the evening's program. The shadow of Richard of Bayreuth keeps constantly falling across this muchly played work, and with the opening bars of his "Pilgrims' Chorus," he definitely returns to life. It was played with rousing spirit and developed to a thunderous, tempestuous finale.

G. K.

From

MUSIC EVENTS

CORTOT WITH THE BOSTON.

Chief credit, as indicated by the applause of the audience at last night's third Boston Syhphony orchestra concert at the Academy of Music must go to Alfred Cortot, soloist of the evening, who played the fifth Saint-Saens F major piano concerto.

It is, however, more or less of a custor to hand the individual performer the lion's share of praise, and it is probably for this reason that the Saint-Saens concerto was elevated above the Schumann Symphony No. 4, in D minor.

Certainly, the Schumann composition is richer in real tone and profited well by Conductor Monteux's reading. The entire symphony was played without pauses between the four movements. Particularly beautifully done were the second or romanza movement, and the third, the scherzo.

In the last movement the skeleton in the Monteux closet, an inheritance from his predecessor, Henri Rabaud, clattered its ghostly cymbals. It is a tendency toward the over-emphasis of brasses that must, it seems, manifest itself ot least once, even if ever so slightly at each Brooklyn concert.

The opening number was Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," a selection that has been heard often enough to make eligible for the reception of late comers. The closing number, "Islamey," an Oriental fantasy by Balakireff, was rather a disappointment. It is a noisy affair that conjures up visions of the "Orientalism of Coney Island.

Cortot, in his manner of playing, may be profitably contrasted with Percy Grainger, where that talented young American spends a good deal of energy in pounding-and-mane-wagging. Cortot has a more motionless method, but his results are vivid and satisfying. Tone is not his entire accomplishment, though, as he demonstrated in the first movement of the concerto. So technical was that rendition that the audience was a bit disbayed and his colorful second movement was a psychological life-saver. At the finish of the concerto he was aendered an enthusiastic ovation.

From JAN 9
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

At The Symphony.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at its concert for children given yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, played the "Mignon" overture, by Thomas; the march movement from Raff's "Lenore" symphony, the Saint-Saens serenade for violin, violoncello and piano, the "Allegretto" from Beethoven's F major symphony and the fire music from Wagner's "The Valkyrie."

Schumann's D minor symphony and Malapiero's "Impressions from Nature" were featured on Mr. Monteux's Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee programme at Carnegie Hall yesterday.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Dispatch
Pittsburg, Pa.

MUSIC AT CARNEGIE HALL

There was a novelty at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Malipiero's "Impressional dal Vero" ("Impressions From Nature") Suite No 1. It comprises three little sketches suggested by three birds, the blackcap, the woodpecker and the owl. The first pictures the song of the bird in autumn woods. In the second the woodpecker is at work on the mildwood trunks of the oaks at high noon. The forest is en fete, teeming with life, under the warming rays of the sun. In the third the mournful note of the owl is heard through the stillness of night. All three show imagination and exquisite fancy, and Malipiero has not found it necessary to wallow in dissonates. Each of the pieces has character and distinction, each is skilfully orchestrated. There were many music lovers from the Keystone State in the audience.

Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Third Boston Symphony Concert

The overture which Mozart dashed off the night before his masterpiece, "Don Giovanni," had its première gave the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra an admirable opening at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. And it made one wish that one might hear the entire opera in Brooklyn's beautiful opera house with, say, Lehmann, Nilsson, Sembrich, Bonci and Renaud as the principal singers, and Seidl in the conductor's chair. One may, of course, wish the impossible. The Overture gave genuine delight to an audience which, more's the pity, did not fill all the seats. Schumann's Fourth Symphony, played without pause, added delight to delight, for it was played superbly under the direction of Monteux. From beginning to end, the symphony was wonderful. The remaining orchestral number, the "Islamey" of Balakireff, orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, met with a less cordial reception. It is an interesting composition, but somewhat mystifying as an "Oriental fantasy." As for the soloist, Alfred Cortot, he made a profoundly favorable impression with his playing of the Saint-Saëns pianoforte concerto in F. major (No. 5). Cortot is a remarkably fine pianist and it is most gratifying that after his altogether too long struggle for adequate recognition here he has finally come into his own. Certainly every one who heard him last week Friday evening is more than keen to hear him again. He alone justified the Brooklyn insistence upon a soloist at the local Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

Address New York City

Date.................................

Music

From Symphony to Opera—"Le Tombeau de Couperin"—A Beethoven Festival

THOUGH there were vacant seats at the last two New York performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra, both its programmes were received with eager interest. Mr. Monteux, the director of the orchestra, has done a great deal for the young French school. The first of his two schemes included Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite, an equivalent of Debussy's "Hommage à Rameau." Rameau and Couperin, between them, laid the foundations of French style in music, informing it with grace and charm and beauty of a discreet, expressive kind.

Ravel began his Suite in honor of the chief writer for the clavecin before the war. Then, being dragged into the strife, he laid it aside till three or four years later. He first arranged it as a six-part work for the piano. From this composition he next singled out for orchestration four movements, a "Prelude," a "Forlane" (or "furlana"), in the Venetian mode, a "Ménuet" and a "Riga

---

don," each dedicated to a dead fellow-soldier. As a tribute to a musician, his selection of dance forms may seem eccentric. But in his treatment of each movement he once more proved his rare talent as a composer of ingenious and impressive music. At the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, Mr. Monteux gave us Mendelssohn's Octett for violins, 'cellos, and violas, in E flat major, composed two years before his music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream." As the invention of a mere boy of sixteen, it seems a miracle. Though the first movement and the second are jejune, the succeeding Scherzo and the Finale (Presto) still amaze one by their fantasy and spirit. With the Octett Mr. Monteux restored to us Lalo's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and, to complete a most attractive scheme, threw in Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Ballet Suite.

Last week brought a first celebration

TRIBUNE
ss: Providence, R. I.

At the forthcoming

RICHARD BURGIN,
Concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be th solo violinist at the next concert o Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday eve
Jan. 25.

TRIBUNE
ss: Providence, R. I.

BURGIN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 25, at 8:15, will be Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Burgin is a newcomer to this country, having crossed the ocean at the beginning of the present season to take the post of honor at the left of the conductor, coming from Russia, which has long been famous for the number of great violinists produced there, and a pupil of Leopold Auer, whose training has brought forth the greatest of these. His inspired performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, of Brahm's violin concerto, which favorite work he will play with the orchestra here, brought the highest praise from public and press, and his introductory recital caused like enthusiasm.

A native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's musical training has taken place largely in Russia, and the larger part of his career has been confined by chaotic conditions in the East to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. For twelve years he served as concertmaster in the fine orchestras which the largest cities of these countries possess. Of Auer's pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist studied with the noted master just before his time; Seidel came later, while Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend. Thus prepared for his professional career, Burgin toured Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia with a great deal of success, playing as soloist in Petrograd, Kieff, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society, and the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not strange to him for he attended one of the symphony concerts in New York when he visited the metropolis for a few months as a boy wonder and played several times there. He has, in Europe, played as concertmaster under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, likewise under Richard Strauss and under Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania and formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm.

The First Symphony of Beethoven will be played at this coming Boston Symphony concert, and also Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Beethoven's First Symphony is accounted one of the master's most graceful and melodious works. This, his first

---

rom
TAR
Indianapolis, Ind

Miss Pauline Schellschmidt, who has recently returned from New York and Philadelphia, brings back some enthusiastic impressions of the music she heard. She says: "It was my good fortune to hear the Philadelphia orchestra, Leopold Stowoski, conductor; the Boston orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, and LaScala orchestra, with the well-known opera conductor, Acturo Toscanini. From the viewpoint of conductor, orchestra personnel and makeup of program, the Philadelphia has without a doubt the first place. The Italian orchestra occasioned a tremendous display of patriotism among the Italian population, who turned out en masse to welcome the great leader and his body of men.

This orchestra excells in one particular thing, this was evidenced in the A minor concerto for strings of Vivaldi (a composer who antedates Sebastian Bach) which Toscanini interpreted strictly as written, obtainnig a pianissimo that gave the effect of achos from an organ in a vast cathedral, the sixty strings pla single man. The effect was der and beauty. The string good, better than the other The reading of the Beethov "Symphony" was flavored with Italian condiment—unlike any tation of that composition nini is a great Wagner cond led the orchestra with fire hemence in the "Prelude and Death" (Tristan and Isolde).

Of the Boston Symphony one can truly say, "it was new faces, and those who sat at the last desks The program made up of the poem "Manfred" (Tschaikow oriental fantasy, "Islamey" and the fifth concerto for Saens) played by Alfred generally regarded by goers as the most interestin tral program heard in Phila a long time.

RIBUNE
Providence, R. I.

e forthcoming
RICHARD BURGIN,
master of the Boston Sym-Orchestra. He will be the violinist at the next concert of n Symphony Orchestra in Iny Hall on Tuesday evening, 25.

ONY
Sym-given Jan.
the
Mr. ntry, egin-
the nduolong viol of has His Hall, certo, with ghest is in-husi-rgin's argely f his connland rs he e or-these s of balist st be-while friend.
al ca-Fin-t deal Petro-open-n con-Petro-elsing-Chris-d the ra.
is not one of York
a few played urope, o forphony
Arthur
Strauss
h conquar-Burgin en will Sym-
symis ac-grace-is first edral, the sixty strings playing as a gle man. The effect was one of won-and beauty. The string section d, better than the other sections e reading of the Beethoven "Fifth mphony" was flavored with a real lian condiment—unlike any interpretion of that composition. Tosca-ni is a great Wagner conductor an the orchestra with fire and v mance in the "Prelude and Isolde eath" (Tristan and Isolde).

Of the Boston Symphony Orchestr
e can truly say, "it was." There a w faces, and those who former at the last desks are advanc he program made up of the symph em "Manfred" (Tschaikowsky), ( riental fantasy, "Islamey" (Balakir nd the fifth concerto for piano (Sai aens) played by Alfred Cortot enerally regarded by the con oers as the most interesting orch al program heard in Philadelphi long time.

From AMERICAN,
New York City

1921

BOSTON IS WON BY GENIUS OF TOSCANINI

Critics Pay High Praise to the Conductor and Demand He Be Obtained to Head Their Orchestra; His Art Outstanding

By MAX SMITH.

WHILE certain persons in New York, whose vision could be compressed into a homeopathic pilule, are proclaiming in nasal squawks that Toscanini's Beethoven is not Beethoven, his Brahms not Brahms, a lot of enthusiasts in Boston, carried off their feet by the two concerts of the Scala Orchestra, are loudly demanding that he be made the leader of their once famous orchestra.

As Fred J. McIsaac puts it bluntly in the Boston American: "Our orchestra is like an ostrich with its head buried in the sand, not knowing what is going on around it. Our Boston music lovers have no standards of comparison. They refuse to attend concerts by other American orchestras when they come here, so of late years they have not come.

"It takes the visit of an organization with a leader like Toscanini to show them that they have a smug little band with a second-rate if hard working little conductor, no more capable of duplicating the performance of yesterday than I am of jumping over the moon. What's to be done about it?

"Get Toscanini. He will come if they pay him enough, and no fee is too great for the greatest conductor in the world. With our orchestra Toscanini could exceed his achievements with La Scala, and without him we have no business claiming the world's best orchestra. Wherever Toscanini may be playing there is the world's best orchestra."

Evidently Mr. McIsaac is not involved in any of the musical politics of Boston. His thoughts go straight to the point, and so do his words. And how he hits the nail on the head!

But how about Charles Martin Loeffler, who it seems went into raptures over the great Italian conductor? Was he not reputed to be one of the leaders of the anti-Italian propaganda in the Hub? Did he not use his influence a few years ago to discourage the movement to make Toscanini the successor of Dr. Muck?

And what of Phillip Hale, distinguished annotator of the Boston orchestra's programmes and critic of the Herald? Was he not also responsible in large measure for the engagement of Pierre Monteux, whom Mr. McIsaac classes with Rabaud and others as a nonentity? And did he not also throw cold water on the project of bringing Toscanini to America?

Read what Mr. Hale has to say and compare it with the utterances of some of his oft-quoted confreres in this city.

"In the course of the last forty years we have heard many excellent performances of the Fifth Symphony. We have never heard one that was so interesting as the one of yesterday.

"No doubt some in the audience said to themselves: 'But this is not as Beethoven wrote it or wished it.' An easy thing to say; a difficult thing to prove. Beethoven put down notes on paper. They are only notes until a conductor with his men gives them significance. Then the personal equation enters. No one knows how Beethoven wished his symphony to be played. If he should appear to-day in the flesh and conduct it, there would still be ultra-conservatives who would exclaim: 'This is not the spirit of Beethoven.'

"Beethoven was a great romanticist. Mr. Toscanini read the symphony romantically. He gave beauty to measures that other conductors have found perfunctory and to be hurried over. Little melodic phrases that to others seemed inconsequential he sang with Italian fervor, yet without swelling their relative importance, without disturbing the sense of proportion, without checking the mighty flow of musical thought.

"Were Mr. Toscanini's dynamic contrasts violent? They were dramatic. We know this about Beethoven as pianist and conductor: He delighted in sharp contrasts. Is not the Fifth Symphony inherently dramatic? The interpretation yesterday abounded in a treatment of details that enhanced the natural glory of the music. Nor was there anything in this interpretation that is not hinted at in the music."

So much regarding a performance of Beethoven's Fifth that because of its unprecedented beauty passed over the heads of pigmy pedants. Now let Toscanini's unforgettable interpretation of Brahms's Second Symphony occupy our attention for a few moments.

Here in New York, of course, Toscanini's Brahms made one or two of our precious musical paleontologists squirm. The "militancy of Mr. Toscanini" and the "contemplative profundity of Brahms" (don't forget by the way, that the songful Second Sympphony is under consideration) "could not mix." The score of the D major symphony "was a sealed book to the militant Italian until he reached the last movement, when his pent-up energies burst their shackles and he thundered the rushing figuration in a truly temperamental style."

The first three movements were, "to put it plainly, deadly dull." There was no "adequate publication of the poetic reflections of Brahms." The "strength of the deep feeling which is so foreign in its character grasp." And so forth, and so forth.

to the sensual emotion of the Italian soul was not for Mr. Toscanini to

But what did Philip Hale, who evidently is not one of those who cling grimly to the barnacles that have made the music of Brahms unpalatable to many, have to say on the same subject? Read this:

"Nietsche in his famous article suggested by Bizet's 'Carmen,' after his attack on German music, especially the music of Wagner and Brahms, said that it was necessary to 'Mediterraneanize' the German art. Last night Mr. Toscanini 'Mediterraneanized' the symphony of Brahms; he gave it southern beauty; he sang where German conductors had ruthlessly plowed their way through the measures, thinking thus to emphasize the rugged intellectuality that they are pleased to find in this symphony—forgetting that the better portions of the work are lyrical, often in the manner of Mendelssohn.

"Thus this symphony is in strong contrast to the first and fourth of Johannes. And so this music was clothed in loveliness, all but the second movement, into which even Mr. Toscanini could not infuse beauty, grace, nor even a touch of human emotion. Nor were the more sturdy pages of the symphony softened. The contrasts were strongly marked."

Now, I am not absolutely in accord with Mr. Hale's views regarding Brahms, nor even regarding German conductors. Certainly I would rather hear a Brahms symphony conducted by a Steinbach than by a Coates or a Monteux. But I am sure that the composer who was carried away by enthusiasm when he heard Alice Barbi sing some of his songs as he had never heard them sung before, not even in his imagination, would have been no less responsive if he had been privileged to hear Arturo Toscanini, compatriot of Verdi, the man whom he admired so much, "Mediterraneanize" his Symphony in D major.

STABLISHED 1881
From
TIMES,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the following program for its concert to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, February 4: Dvorak's Symphony No. 2; Wagner Faust Overture; Romanza of Juliet from the Opera, "The Capulets and the Montagues," by Bellini, and Cavatina de Leila, from "The Pearl Fishers," by Bizet, to be sung by Madam Lashanska, closing with Suite Francaise in D. Major, by Roger Ducasse.

AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

Coming Plans Disclosed.

These orchestral works are announced to be played at the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season in Baltimore in the Lyric Theater on February 2 at 8:15 P. M., Pierre Monteux conductor:

Beethoven, first symphony; Wagner, "Faust" overture; Debussy, symphonic suite, "La Mer" ("The Sea"). The movements of the suite are three and are entitled, respectively, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "The Play of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea."

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, noted soprano, will be special soloist. She is one of the particularly successful musicians of more recent years and was a pupil of Mme. Sembrich.

From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

For the next Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 31, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Second Symphony of Dvorak. Also on the program will be Richard Wagner's "Faust" overture, which is the only important work which the master wrote solely for symphonic purposes. Another number that will be on the program is Cesar Franck's pictorial symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," a musical setting of the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the important piano part will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist.

The soloist of the evening is Hulda Lashanska. A New York girl and a pupil of Madame Sembrich, she made her debut five years ago in Carnegie Hall, New York. Her professional career since then has been one of steadily increasing prestige and acceptance.

JAN.23.

Richard Burgin to Be Soloist At Third Boston Symphony Concert Next Tuesday Evening

Richard Burgin, the celebrated new concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the regular soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15. At this concert he will play with the great orchestra the highly beautiful violin concerto of Brahms, which is considered one of the finest concertos written for this instrument. Pierre Monteux will at this concert conduct the graceful and melodious first symphony of Beethoven, and, for a closing number, the great symphonic poem of Liszt, inspired by the romantic life and death of the Italian poet, Tasso.

Mr. Burgin is a comparative newcomer to this country, having come from Eastern Europe last autumn to take the post of honor at the left of the conductor. However, his career there has been brilliant and his reputation wide, and this record has been amply justified by his recital in Boston and his appearance as soloist with the orchestra in Symphony Hall. A native of Poland, Mr. Burgin studied with Lotto, with Joachim, and with Leopold Auer, the greatest of all violin teachers. With the latter he also served later as assistant teacher. This apprenticeship was followed by highly brilliant appearances in recitals and as soloist with orchestras in many of the largest cities of that part of the world. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the principal orchestras of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, and has served in this position under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Fiedler and Nikisch and likewise under Richard Strauss and Sibelius, the famous Finnish composer. A friend and ardent admirer of Sibelius, he first played the violin concerto of this great artist (said to be the most difficult ever written) under his supervision. He led a string quartette in Christiania and formed in Stockholm the Burgin Quartette which was considered the finest in the country.

Charles A. Duggan, Edward M. Fay, William Gamble, Arthur Goodrich, Robert Gray, Jr., John T. Greene, Henry Hermann, Ernest House, Patrick A. Kearns, Andrew Link, Jesse Linnton, Frank Wolberg and Joseph Lemarie.

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.

Lashanska as Soloist.

The soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the present season, to be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 1, at 4:30 oclock, will be Madame Hulda Lashanska, who has a foremost place among the lyric sopranos of the rising generation.

---

rom TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

The following rules must be carefully noted by all students using students tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts: 1, these student cards are for students under 25 years of age and are not transferable; 2, each student living in the city must redeem his own card for a ticket the day of the concert; 3, students living out of the city may take student card and money for ticket the day before the concert to the following authorized people who will redeem all cards from that section: East Providence, Mrs. Ralph Larry, 22 Boston street; Cranston, Mrs. S. A. Vining, 136 Wheeler avenue, Edgewood; Woonsocket, Miss Lillian Louise Simester, Court square; Pawtucket, Miss Florence Brinton, Pawtucket high school.

---

om POST
ldress: Washington, D. C.
te

The soloist at the next to the last Boston symphony concert of the present season, to be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 1, at 4:30, will be Mme. Hulda Lashanska, a pupil of Mme. Sembrich. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Schubert's Overture in the Italian style in C major. The symphony will be that of Haydn, known as the "Military" by virtue of the unusual number of instruments of percussion used in it. The final number will be the "Suite Francaise" by Roger Ducasse. Tickets are available at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau.

---

om TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I. late

Musical Mention

By N. B. Pettis

The coming week contains the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an event of paramount interest to the local musical world. The date is Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall.

The new concertmaster of the orchestra, Richard Burgin, will be the soloist. He will play with the orchestra the great violin concerto of Brahms, considered one of the finest concertos written for this instrument. Pierre Monteux will conduct at his concert the charming First Symphony of Beethoven, especially famed for the beauty of its slow movement. The final number on the program will be the symphonic poem of Liszt, describing the sufferings of the great Italian poet, Tasso, the splendor of the court at Ferrara, and his final triumph, in a truly splendid array of tones.

Mr. Burgin came to the post of honor at the first desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra only last autumn, but he is not entirely a newcomer to this country since he paid a short visit to New York some years ago when a boy of 11, and surprised that city by several concerts there. His career in eastern Europe has been brilliant and his reputation extensive. A native of Warsaw, he studied with Lotto, with Joachim in Berlin, and for four years with Leopold Auer in Petrograd, later becoming assistant teacher to this famous pedant in Christiania. He has played as soloist in all the larger cities of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, and has served as concertmaster and soloist both with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society, and the Stockholm Concert Society. As concertmaster he has served under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Fiedler and Nikisch, and likewise as concertmaster under Richard Strauss, Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, and under Sibelius in Helsingfors. He is a close friend and admirer of the last named Finnish composer and played Sibelius's violin concerto (said to be the most difficult ever written), under the supervision of the composer. In Christiania he led a string quartet and in Stockholm formed the Burgin Quartet which toured regularly from city to city, giving 12 recitals a season. Since he came to this country his record abroad has been amply justified by his recital in Boston and his appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

At the third Boston Symphony concert of the season at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's First Symphony in C Major, which, influenced by the symphonies of his predecessor, Haydn, is considered one of the most graceful and melodious of the master's works. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," will also be given, and the violin concerto of Brahms in D major, which is one of the finest concertos written for this instrument. The soloist in the latter work will be Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. He is a newcomer to this country. In eastern Europe he has long been considered one of the finest of living concertmasters. Of Polish birth and parentage, Mr. Burgin's training has taken place largely in Russia, where, in particular, he studied under the great master, Leopold Auer for four years in Petrograd. In the largest cities of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia he played both in recital of his own and as soloist in symphony concerts with pronounced success. He has served as concertmaster with the leading orchestras of Stockholm, Helsingfors and Christiania, and from the principals of the last-named orchestra he formed the Burgin string quartet.

Announcement has been made of the rules governing the purchase of student tickets for the concert, which are as follows: Student cards are for students under 25 years of age and are not transferable; each student living in the city must redeem his own card for a ticket the day of the concert; students living out of the city may take student card and money for ticket the day before the concert to the following authorized people, who will redeem all cards from that section: East Providence, Mrs. Ralph Larry, 22 Boston street; Cranston, Mrs. S. A. Vining, 136 Wheeler avenue, Edgewood; Woonsocket, Miss Lillian Louise Simester, Court square; Pawtucket, Miss Florence Brinton, Pawtucket high school.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 23

For the last but one Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy on Monday evening, January 31, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Second Symphony of Dvorak, which is less known in America than the "new world." The program will also include Wagner's "Faust Overture", Cesar Franck's pictorial symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," a musical setting of the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the important piano part will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist. The soloist of the evening will be Hulda Lashanska, lyric soprano.

* * *

ESTABLISHED 1881
From STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony February 1.

The soloist at next to the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 1, will be Mme. Hulda Lashanska, a lyric soprano of the rising generation. Mme. Lashanska's training has taken place entirely in New York and Mme. Sembrich was her most noted teacher. She made her professional debut at Carnegie Hall five years ago.

Pierre Monteux will conduct in Schubert's Overture in the Italian style, in C major. The symphony will be that of Haydn, known as the "Military," by virtue of the unusual number of percussion instruments used in it. The final number will be the "Suite Francaise," by the French composer, Roger Ducasse—Overture, "Bourree," "Recitative and Air" and "Minuet."

---

om
NQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Lashanska Boston Symphony Soloist

For the last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 31, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Second Symphony of Dvorak, which although less known in America than the "New World" Symphony is nevertheless in Europe considered to be among the masterpieces of the noted Bohemian composer. Also on his programme will be Richard Wagner's 'Faust Overture," which is the only important work which the master wrote solely for symphonic purposes. Another number that will be on the programme is Ceasar Franck's pictorial symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," a musical setting of the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the important piano part will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, the brilliant French pianist.

The soloist proper of the evening, however, will be Hulda Lashanska, who is fast taking a foremost place among the rising lyric sopranos of our generation. Madame Lashanska is looked upon as one of the real discoveries of recent seasons. A New York girl and a pupil of Madame Sembrich, she made her debut five years ago in Carnegie Hall, New York, and the occasion aroused unusual interest from the musical public of that metropolis, partly, since no one had ever heard of this young artist, who sang with such a glowing style and with such artistic distinction. Her professional career since then has been one of a steadily increasing fame and success.

---

rom
IMES,
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—LASHANSKA.

Hulda Lashanska will be soloist at he last but one of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 1, at 4:30 o'clock. Mme. Lashanska has a foremost place among the lyric sopranos of the rising generation. Her training has been entirely in New York, where Mme. Sembrich was her most noted teacher. She made her debut at Carnegie Hall five years ago, going from obscurity to a position that earned glowing praise. And her reputation and artistry has steadily increased in succeeding seasons.

Pierre Monteaux, conductor, will present the Schubert "Overture in the Italian Style," C major, a Schubert ingratiating work said to be influenced by Rossini. The symphony will be the Haydn "Military Symphony," because of the free use of percussion instruments. The "Suite Francaise," by the living French composer, Roger Ducasse, with its spirited Overture, Bourree, recitative and air, and Minuet, will complete the program.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Aside from the church programmes, today brings no musical offerings, the first concert of the week being scheduled for Tuesday at Infantry Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in its third concert of the season. A musical dearth seems imminent unless unexpected recitals turn up to fill in the gaps between the Sunday concerts, which offer the only programmes until the middle of March. Next Sunday the Musicians' Protective Association will give a benefit concert at Fays Theatre and the next offering is two weeks later, when Florence Macbeth, coloratura soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, will be heard at the Strand Theatre with the Harvard Glee Club.

[82]

From Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

—For the last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 31, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Second Symphony of Dvorak, which, although less known in America than the "New World" Symphony, is nevertheless in Europe considered to be among the masterpieces of the noted Bohemian composer. Also on the program will be Richard Wagner's "Faust" overture. It is the only important work which the master wrote solely for symphonic purposes. Cesar Franck's pictorial symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," a musical setting of the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the important piano part will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, French pianist, is another offering. The soloist of the evening, however, will be Hulda Lashanska, who is fast taking a foremost place among lyric sopranos. Madame Lashanska is looked upon as one of the real discoveries of recent seasons. She is a New York girl and a pupil of Madame Sembrich. Lashanska made her debut five years ago in New York and the occasion aroused unusual interest from the musical public of that metropolis, partly, since no one had ever heard of this young artist who sang with such a glowing style and with such artistic distinction. Her professional career since then has been one of steadily increasing fame and success.

From
TIMES, JAN 23 1921 Y
Brooklyn, N. Y.

LASHANSKA SOLOIST.

At the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, February 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Second Symphony of Dvorak. Other numbers on this program will be the "Suite Francaise," of the living French composer, Roger Ducasse. The soloist at this concert will be Madame Hulda Lashanska, who is fast taking a foremost place among the rising lyric sopranos of our generation.

---

m EAGLE
lress: Brooklyn, N. Y

JAN 23

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Tomorrow evening under Institute auspices Adelaide Fischer, soprano, and Mario Laurenti, baritone, will give a joint recital in the Music Hall of the Academy. There are groups of solo numbers and a few duets. Miss Fischer is a Brooklyn woman who has achieved not a little success as a recital-singer. Mr. Laurenti is one of the lesser baritones of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 4. The purely orchestral numbers will be Dvorak's unfamiliar Second Symphony, a "French Suite," by Roger Ducasse, and "Eine Faust Overture" of Richard Wagner.

---

rom EAGLE
ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate

Boston Symphony.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 3, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 5, Pierre Monteux has arranged the following program:

For the Thursday concert, Beethoven's First Symphony in C major; "Two Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott; Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," with the following movements: I. "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; II. "Frolic of the Waves"; III. "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday concert, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor; Suite Francaise, by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" Overture.

LISHED 1881
JAN 26 A LETIN, vidence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY INTRODUCES BURGIN AT CONCERT HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played here for the third time this season in Infantry Hall. The concert was largely attended and introduced Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, as soloist. Mr. Monteux provided the following programme:

"Adagio molto; Allegro con brio," "Andante cantabile con moto," "Menuetto; Allegro motto e vivace, Trio," "Finale: Adagio, Allegro molto e vivace," from Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; "Allegro non troppo," "Adagio," "Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace," from Brahms, Concerto in D-major; "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo, Symphonic Poem No. 2," from Liszt.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 1, while it does not reveal its composer in the full development of his genius as symphonist, does give to the listener unmistakable evidences of the style and workmanship which later gave to his symphonic works their rugged beauty and power. It fact, it is Beethovenish, but of a gayer, more light-hearted and care-free character than is disclosed in the symphonic writings of his riper years. The influence of Haydn and Mozart, which might naturally be expected to be more or less in evidence in his first symphony, is scarcely discernible. It is his own individuality—and originality—in mode of musical expression that charms the ear. The first and final movements are filled with a sparkle and spontaneity that might suggest Mozart, were it not for the characteristic Beethoven flavor. The Andante has much grace of movement and flowing melody, while the Minuet, in reality a Scherzo, is filled with the captivating rythmic effects which invariably appear in similar movements in the later symphonies. Mr. Monteux read the work with excellent judgment, and the men played as if it were a pleasure and not a task.

In selecting the Brahms concerto Mr. Burgin did not make a bid for virtuoso honors. Tricks and the superficialities of violin playing do not find a place in this classic work. Its difficulties are very great. It is one of the most taxing concertos, technically, among all the great compositions for solo violin. But these pitfalls of technique were not created for purposes of display. They are merely the necessary accompaniments of the composer's musical ideas. The voice of the solo instrument is largely a part of the ensemble, that is, a delicate embellishment to a harmonic background rather than an assertive voice with a merely dependent accompaniment. The cadenza allowed Mr. Burgin, who is really a brilliant technician, to unloose the temperament which constantly struggled to assert itself. He was, however, successful in grasping the spirit of the concerto and brought out its effects in pleasing measure. The adaigo was given with repose and the brilliant finale was played with commanding breadth and fire.

The new concertmaster produces a very clear, incisive tone. His bowing is free and graceful and in bravura work he is exceedingly energetic. His debut here as soloist shows him to be a temperamental but sterling artist whom it should always be a pleasure to hear.

The playing of the concerto's score by the orchestra was a well-balanced performance. Mr. Monteux kept his forces well in hand and a fine ensemble resulted. At the close the soloist was recalled two or three times to acknowledge the big applause which greeted his playing.

The programmes final number, Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," was played in expressive fashion. The poem is a revision of the composer's "prelude" played at the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of Goethe's birth. It is a highly imaginative and colorful piece. Liszt's gift for striking instrumental combinations is here shown in its fulness. The poem is a tone picture that powerfully stirs the hearer and it was played with appropriate expression, instrumental coloring and with splendid power in the closing climax.

A. F. P.

---

m JAN 23 1921 L
RLD,
ew York City

TWEEDLEDUM OR TWEEDLEDEE?

By James Gibbons Huneker.

* * *

With Willem Mengelberg the reverse is the case; the more you hear him the better you like him. He is built for endurance, artistically and physically. I discovered this long ago at Amsterdam. He is more solid than sensational, yet Arthur Nikisch apart, I know of few conductors who combine the classic and modern schools with such brilliant success. He is truly a great conductor in his versatility. He possesses consummate virtuosity with the baton, but is not in the prima-donna class. With Arturo [illegible] we enter into a more rarefied region, the Fourth Dimension of the art of conducting. His band is mediocre, judged by the high standards of the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras. Yet what boots an instrument to this Italian poet? He could make eloquent a melodeon or a phonograph. If ever the ascription of genius could be made to a reproducing artist then the name of Toscanini comes to the lips. He literally re-creates as he conducts. Not alone the puissant current of magnetism that flows from his stick—watch that wonderful left hand with the thumb almost abnormal in its separation from the fingers, infallible sign of an extraordinary volition—but on the purely intellectual side he compels his listeners, willy-nilly, to bow to his arbitrary interpretations. With others of my critical clan I have misgivings concerning his apparition in the concert room. His readings of the classics are romantically interesting, though far from convincing. Fascinating indeed it is to witness the operations of his mental and emotional machinery, nevertheless, we frankly prefer him in the opera orchestra pit, where he is a veritable monarch. Nor have his recent war experiences soothed his capricious nerves. He is too volcanic, in gestures too expansive. You seem to see him at the front of a conquering army, terrible with banners, which, to put it mildly is hardly conducive to the serene atmosphere of pure and lofty art. However—Sempre Toscanini! He is unique.

* * *

With pleasure we note that Guiomar Novaes, the charming Brazilian artiste, is married. His first name is Octavio. It is meet and just that a pianist should be wedded to an Octave; interlocking octaves, to put it technically.

TABLISHED 1881
om
URNAL
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY INTRODUCES BURGIN

New Concertmaster is Soloist in Pleasing Programme.

CONCERT WELL ATTENDED

Audience at Infantry Hall Applauds Brilliant Playing of Violin Soloist Here for First Time.—Selections from Beethoven, Brahms and Liszt Included.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played here for the third time this season in Infantry Hall. The concert was largely attended and introduced Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, as soloist. Mr. Monteux provided the following programme:

"Adagio molto; Allegro con brio," "Andante cantabile con moto," "Menuetto; Allegro motto e vivace, Trio," "Finale: Adagio, Allegro molto e vivace," from Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; "Allegro non troppo," "Adagio," "Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace," from Brahms, Concerto in D-major; "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo, Symphonic Poem No. 2," from Liszt.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 1, while it does not reveal its composer in the full development of his genius as symphonist, does give to the listener unmistakable evidences of the style and workmanship which later gave to his symphonic works their rugged beauty and power. It fact, it is Beethovenish, but of a gayer, more light-hearted and care-free character than is disclosed in the symphonic writings of his riper years. The influence of Haydn and Mozart, which might naturally be expected to be more or less in evidence in his first symphony, is scarcely discernible. It is his own individuality—and originality—in mode of musical expression that charms the ear. The first and final movements are filled with a sparkle and spontaneity that might suggest Mozart, were it not for the characteristic Beethoven flavor. The Andante has much grace of movement and flowing melody, while the Minuet, in reality a Scherzo, is filled with the captivating rythmic effects which invariably appear in similar movements in the later symphonies. Mr. Monteux read the work with excellent judgment, and the men played as if it were a pleasure and not a task.

In selecting the Brahms concerto Mr. Burgin did not make a bid for virtuoso honors. Tricks and the superficialities of violin playing do not find a place in this classic work. Its difficulties are very great. It is one of the most taxing concertos, technically, among all the great compositions for solo violin. But these pitfalls of technique were not created for purposes of display. They are merely the necessary accompaniments of the composer's musical ideas. The voice of the solo instrument is largely a part of the ensemble, that is, a delicate embellishment to a harmonic background rather than an assertive voice with a merely dependent accompaniment. The cadenza allowed Mr. Burgin, who is really a brilliant technician, to unloose the temperament which constantly struggled to assert itself. He was, however, successful in grasping the spirit of the concerto and brought out its effects in pleasing measure. The adaigo was given with repose and the brilliant finale was played with commanding breadth and fire.

The new concertmaster produces a very clear, incisive tone. His bowing is free and graceful and in bravura work he is exceedingly energetic. His debut here as soloist shows him to be a temperamental but sterling artist whom it should always be a pleasure to hear.

The playing of the concerto's score by the orchestra was a well-balanced performance. Mr. Monteux kept his forces well in hand and a fine ensemble resulted. At the close the soloist was recalled two or three times to acknowledge the big applause which greeted his playing.

The programmes final number, Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," was played in expressive fashion. The poem is a revision of the composer's "prelude" played at the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of Goethe's birth. It is a highly imaginative and colorful piece. Liszt's gift for striking instrumental combinations is here shown in its fulness. The poem is a tone picture that powerfully stirs the hearer and it was played with appropriate expression, instrumental coloring and with splendid power in the closing climax.

A. F. P.

UN
New York City
JAN 26 1921 D

The wind from the West blows strong. The Chicago Opera isn't enough for an invasion. Last night the Chicago Symphony Orchestra attacked the uptown flank and overcame Carnegie Hall. It is a famous orchestra, now under the conductorship of Frederick Stock, and this was its first appearance in New York for a few seasons.

Back in 1890, when contracts were being signed for the formation of this band, Mrs. Theodore Thomas's memoirs of her husband tell how delighted he was with one clause of his agreement: "I never expected to see the day when I would be told that I would be 'held responsible' for maintaining the highest standard of artistic excellence in my musical work!" That responsibility made Chicago famous. Mr. Thomas's death in 1905 gave fuller opportunity to his assistant, Frederick Stock, who is now in full command.

This was the programme which Mr. Stock chose for his orchestra's introduction to New York: Brahms's Third Symphony; Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"; Bax's symphonic poem, "The Garden of Fand," and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." It was a programme guaranteeing balance and inclusiveness. It carried up through the romantic generation to the one new example of Arnold Bax, London's latest. The Boston Symphony played one of his Gaelic revels here only recently—and doubtless, if Mr. Newmann and other English critics wield an active persuasion, we shall soon hear much more. The Brahms brought out the very beautiful tone of the choirs—the quality of the strings, particularly. We haven't heard strings like that since the pre-war days of the Boston Symphony. But the Brahms also showed the inveterate quest of Mr. Stock's interpretation. It was orchestration brought down to the exquisiteness of chamber music, to the smoothness of silk and the excitiveness of an Ik Marvel revery.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED
From
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its reappearance at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, introducing as soloist Hulda Lashanska, soprano, who appeared here with great success in concert last season. As the orchestral numbers Mr. Monteux announces the Second Symphony, in D minor, of Dvorak; the "Faust" overture, Wagner, and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Djinns," in which the piano solo will be played by E. Robert Schmitz. Mme. Lashanska will sing arias from "The Capulets and the Montagues," Bellini, and "Hamlet," Faccio.

EVG. SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.

The penultimate Boston Symphony concert, Pierre Monteux directing, will be given at the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, with Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the celebrated American soprano, appearing as soloist. She will sing with the orchestra Pamina's aria, "Ah! lo so," from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the well-known aria, 'Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera, "Louise."

The symphony will be the First of Beethoven, the one in C major, one of the earlier and less frequently played work of this master. Wagner's "Faust" Overture is also on the program and one of Debussy's masterpieces, "La Mer" (The Sea).

From Evening Post
New York

Here is the first intimation as to the beginning of the end. The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one this season will be given at Carnegie Hall next week, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 30 1921
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Madame Hulda Lashanska, one of the foremost lyric sopranos of the rising generation, will sing as soloist at the final concert of the season but one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 4, at 8:15. Madame Lashanska is looked upon as one of the real discoveries of recent seasons. The larger part of her training has taken place in Manhattan, where Madame Sembrich was her most distinguished teacher. In that city also she made her public debut several seasons ago at Carnegie Hall and the occasion caused surprise and much enthusiasm on the part of the musical public there. Her fame has been spreading ever since and her style and artistry maturing. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, Wagner's "Faust" Overture, and Debussy's Symphonic Suite, "La Mer ("The Sea"), the movements of which describe "From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves," and "Dialogue of Wind and Sea."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

HUL
LASHA
SOLOIS
SYMP
ACA
FRID

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one, to be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Anton Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, a Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" Overture. Mme. Lashanska will sing Juliet's Romanza from Bellini's opera "The Capulets and the Montagues," and the aria from "Hamlet" by Faccio.

Frieda Hempel will be the soloist of the fourth concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch to be given in the Academy of Music, Saturday afternoon, Feb. 12.

---

m EAGLE
lress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

THE ORCHESTRAS

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one this season will be given at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for the Thursday evening concert the following program: Beethoven's First Symphony in C Major, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano solo will be taken by Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer" (The Sea), which describes (1) From dawn till noon on the ocean; Frolic of waves; Dialogue of wind and sea, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the [illegible] of Dvorak in D Minor, Two Passacaglias, by Cyril Scott, the Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, of which the movements are. Overture, [illegible] Recitative and Sir; and Menuet, and Wagner's A Faust Overture.

NEW YORK
TABLISHED 1881
om
orning Telegraph
New York

For the last pair but one, of the Boston Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux conducting, will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 3, and Saturday afternoon, February 5. For the Thursday concert Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, "Two Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott; Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," with the following movements: 1, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; 2, "Frolic of the Waves"; 3, "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday afternoon concert Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, Suite Francaise, by Roger-Ducasse, Wagner's "Faust" overture.

Address New York City
TIMES JAN 3
Date

Brooklyn Music.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last but one of the Brooklyn concerts on Friday at the [illegible] Carl G. Schmidt [illegible] recital at [illegible] Brooklyn [illegible]

N
Baltimore, Md.
30 1921

Lyric—The B
estra will giv e season on W Hulda Lashansk me. Lashanska will Ah! Lo So," fro

ute," and "Depuis le arpentier's "Louise," ll be Beethoven's First ther numbers will be W verture, Debussy's
"La Mer" (The Sea),
"From Dawn Till Noon O
"Frolic of Waves" and Wind and Sea."

SUN
Baltimore, Md

Will Sing

HULDA LASH
Mme. Lashanska wil
t the Boston Symphon ert at the Lyric on W

---

rom
TAR. 30

Lashanska-Boston Sy
Mme. Hulda Lashansk soprano, will appear
Boston Symphony
n Tuesday afternoon
tional Theater at re Monteux will cond
's Overture in the It major, Haydn's so-call mpony in G major, one
's last works, and the uant Suite Francaise, ench composer, Roger Mme. Lashanska will s chestra, Pamina's aria
m "The Magic Flute," r's famous "Depuis l s opera, "Louise." Mme out several seasons
rk caused quite a st tic praise in that c nks in a foremost pla ric sopranos of the

RTH AMERICA
Philadelphia, Pa.

NTEUX'S PR
LACKS INSPI

Robert Schmit
Cesar Franck's
certo 'Les Dj

ASHANSKA S

me years ago it was he Boston Symphon uild his program
dard symphonic wor ional dash of n teux's policy, as was ized by last night's Academy of Music, a of delving after
d. This scheme
ing is very often jus est of novelty: it is could be followed w of Mr. Monteux's But last night's ring to the audienc
ing that con

From Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

—For the last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 31, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Second Symphony of Dvorak, which, although less known in America than the "New World" Symphony, is nevertheless in Europe considered to be among the masterpieces of the noted Bohemian composer. Also on the program will be Richard Wagner's "Faust" overture. It is the only important work which the master wrote solely for symphonic purposes. Cesar Franck's pictorial symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," a musical setting of the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the important piano part will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, French pianist, is another offering. The soloist of the evening, however, will be Hulda Lashanska, who is fast taking a foremost place among lyric sopranos. Madame Lashanska is looked upon as one of the real discoveries of recent seasons. She is a New York girl and a pupil of Madame Sembrich. Lashanska made her debut five years ago in New York and the occasion aroused unusual interest from the musical public of that metropolis, partly, since no one had ever heard of this young artist who sang with such a glowing style and with such artistic distinction. Her professional career since then has been one of steadily increasing fame and success.

From
TIMES, 1921
Brooklyn, N. Y.

LASHANSKA SOLOIST.

At the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, February 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Second Symphony of Dvorak. Other numbers on this program will be the "Suite Francaise," of the living French composer, Roger Ducasse. The soloist at this concert will be Madame Hulda Lashanska, who is fast taking a foremost place among the rising lyric sopranos of our generation.

---

m EAGLE
lress: Brooklyn, N. Y

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Tomorrow evening under Institute auspices Adelaide Fischer, soprano, and Mario Laurenti, baritone, will give a joint recital in the Music Hall of the Academy. There are groups of solo numbers and a few duets. Miss Fischer is a Brooklyn woman who has achieved not a little success as a recital-singer. Mr. Laurenti is one of the lesser baritones of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 4. The purely orchestral numbers will be Dvorak's unfamiliar Second Symphony, a "French Suite," by Roger Ducasse, and "Eine Faust Overture" of Richard Wagner.

---

rom EAGLE
ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate

Boston Symphony.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 3, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 5, Pierre Monteux has arranged the following program:

For the Thursday concert, Beethoven's First Symphony in C major; "Two Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott; Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," with the following movements: I. "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; II. "Frolic of the Waves"; III. "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday concert, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor; Suite Francaise, by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" Overture.

LISHED 1881
LETIN,
ovidence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY INTRODUCES BURGIN AT CONCERT HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played here for the third time this season in Infantry Hall. The concert was largely attended and introduced Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, as soloist. Mr. Monteux provided the following programme:

"Adagio molto; Allegro con brio," "Andante cantabile con moto," "Menuetto; Allegro motto e vivace, Trio," "Finale: Adagio, Allegro molto e vivace," from Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; "Allegro non troppo," "Adagio," "Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace," from Brahms, Concerto in D-major; "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo, Symphonic Poem No. 2," from Liszt.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 1, while it does not reveal its composer in the full development of his genius as symphonist, does give to the listener unmistakable evidences of the style and workmanship which later gave to his symphonic works their rugged beauty and power. It fact, it is Beethovenish, but of a gayer, more light-hearted and care-free character than is disclosed in the symphonic writings of his riper years. The influence of Haydn and Mozart, which might naturally be expected to be more or less in evidence in his first symphony, is scarcely discernible. It is his own individuality—and originality—in mode of musical expression that charms the ear. The first and final movements are filled with a sparkle and spontaneity that might suggest Mozart, were it not for the characteristic Beethoven flavor. The Andante has much grace of movement and flowing melody, while the Minuet, in reality a Scherzo, is filled with the captivating rythmic effects which invariably appear in similar movements in the later symphonies. Mr. Monteux read the work with excellent judgment, and the men played as if it were a pleasure and not a task.

In selecting the Brahms concerto Mr. Burgin did not make a bid for virtuoso honors. Tricks and the superficialities of violin playing do not find a place in this classic work. Its difficulties are very great. It is one of the most taxing concertos, technically, among all the great compositions for solo violin. But these pitfalls of technique were not created for purposes of display. They are merely the necessary accompaniments of the composer's musical ideas. The voice of the solo instrument is largely a part of the ensemble, that is, a delicate embellishment to a harmonic background rather than an assertive voice with a merely dependent accompaniment. The cadenza allowed Mr. Burgin, who is really a brilliant technician, to unloose the temperament which constantly struggled to assert itself. He was, however, successful in grasping the spirit of the concerto and brought out its effects in pleasing measure. The adaigo was given with repose and the brilliant finale was played with commanding breadth and fire.

The new concertmaster produces a very clear, incisive tone. His bowing is free and graceful and in bravura work he is exceedingly energetic. His debut here as soloist shows him to be a temperamental but sterling artist whom it should always be a pleasure to hear.

The playing of the concerto's score by the orchestra was a well-balanced performance. Mr. Monteux kept his forces well in hand and a fine ensemble resulted. At the close the soloist was recalled two or three times to acknowledge the big applause which greeted his playing.

The programmes final number, Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," was played in expressive fashion. The poem is a revision of the composer's "prelude" played at the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of Goethe's birth. It is a highly imaginative and colorful piece. Liszt's gift for striking instrumental combinations is here shown in its fulness. The poem is a tone picture that powerfully stirs the hearer and it was played with appropriate expression, instrumental coloring and with splendid power in the closing climax.

A. F. P.

---

m RLD,
ew York City

TWEEDLEDUM OR TWEEDLEDEE?

By James Gibbons Huneker.

With Willem Mengelberg the reverse is the case; the more you hear him the better you like him. He is built for endurance, artistically and physically. I discovered this long ago at Amsterdam. He is more solid than sensational, yet Arthur Nikisch apart, I know of few conductors who combine the classic and modern schools with such brilliant success. He is truly a great conductor in his versatility. He possesses consummate virtuosity with the baton, but is not in the prima-donna class. With Arturo Toscanini we enter into a more rarefied region, the Fourth Dimension of the art of conducting. His band is mediocre, judged by the high standards of the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras. Yet what boots an instrument to this Italian poet? He could make eloquent a melodeon or a phonograph. If ever the ascription of genius could be made to a reproducing artist then the name of Toscanini comes to the lips. He literally re-creates as he conducts. Not alone the puissant current of magnetism that flows from his stick—watch that wonderful left hand with the thumb almost abnormal in its separation from the fingers, infallible sign of an extraordinary volition—but on the purely intellectual side he compels his listeners, willy-nilly, to bow to his arbitrary interpretations. With others of my critical clan I have misgivings concerning his apparition in the concert room. His readings of the classics are romantically interesting, though far from convincing. Fascinating indeed it is to witness the operations of his mental and emotional machinery, nevertheless, we frankly prefer him in the opera orchestra pit, where he is a veritable monarch. Nor have his recent war experiences soothed his capricious nerves. He is too volcanic, in gestures too expansive. You seem to see him at the forefront of a conquering army, terrible with banners, which, to put it mildly is hardly conducive to the serene atmosphere of pure and lofty art. However—Sempre Toscanini! He is unique.

* * *

With pleasure we note that Guiomar Novaes, the charming Brazilian artiste, is married. His first name is Octavio. It is meet and just that a pianist should be wedded to an Octave; interlocking octaves, to put it technically.

TABLISHED 1881
om
URNAL
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY INTRODUCES BURGIN

New Concertmaster is Soloist in Pleasing Programme.

CONCERT WELL ATTENDED

Audience at Infantry Hall Applauds Brilliant Playing of Violin Soloist Here for First Time.—Selections from Beethoven, Brahms and Liszt Included.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played here for the third time this season in Infantry Hall. The concert was largely attended and introduced Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, as soloist. Mr. Monteux provided the following programme:

"Adagio molto; Allegro con brio," "Andante cantabile con moto," "Menuetto; Allegro motto e vivace, Trio," "Finale: Adagio, Allegro molto e vivace," from Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; "Allegro non troppo," "Adagio," "Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace," from Brahms, Concerto in D-major; "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo, Symphonic Poem No. 2," from Liszt.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 1, while it does not reveal its composer in the full development of his genius as symphonist, does give to the listener unmistakable evidences of the style and workmanship which later gave to his symphonic works their rugged beauty and power. It fact, it is Beethovenish, but of a gayer, more light-hearted and care-free character than is disclosed in the symphonic writings of his riper years. The influence of Haydn and Mozart, which might naturally be expected to be more or less in evidence in his first symphony, is scarcely discernible. It is his own individuality—and originality—in mode of musical expression that charms the ear. The first and final movements are filled with a sparkle and spontaneity that might suggest Mozart, were it not for the characteristic Beethoven flavor. The Andante has much grace of movement and flowing melody, while the Minuet, in reality a Scherzo, is filled with the captivating rythmic effects which invariably appear in similar movements in the later symphonies. Mr. Monteux read the work with excellent judgment, and the men played as if it were a pleasure and not a task.

In selecting the Brahms concerto Mr. Burgin did not make a bid for virtuoso honors. Tricks and the superficialities of violin playing do not find a place in this classic work. Its difficulties are very great. It is one of the most taxing concertos, technically, among all the great compositions for solo violin. But these pitfalls of technique were not created for purposes of display. They are merely the necessary accompaniments of the composer's musical ideas. The voice of the solo instrument is largely a part of the ensemble, that is, a delicate embellishment to a harmonic background rather than an assertive voice with a merely dependent accompaniment. The cadenza allowed Mr. Burgin, who is really a brilliant technician, to unloose the temperament which constantly struggled to assert itself. He was, however, successful in grasping the spirit of the concerto and brought out its effects in pleasing measure. The adaigo was given with repose and the brilliant finale was played with commanding breadth and fire.

The new concertmaster produces a very clear, incisive tone. His bowing is free and graceful and in bravura work he is exceedingly energetic. His debut here as soloist shows him to be a temperamental but sterling artist whom it should always be a pleasure to hear.

The playing of the concerto's score by the orchestra was a well-balanced performance. Mr. Monteux kept his forces well in hand and a fine ensemble resulted. At the close the soloist was recalled two or three times to acknowledge the big applause which greeted his playing.

The programmes final number, Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," was played in expressive fashion. The poem is a revision of the composer's "prelude" played at the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of Goethe's birth. It is a highly imaginative and colorful piece. Liszt's gift for striking instrumental combinations is here shown in its fulness. The poem is a tone picture that powerfully stirs the hearer and it was played with appropriate expression, instrumental coloring and with splendid power in the closing climax.

A. F. P.

UN
New York City 1921

The wind from the West blows strong. The Chicago Opera isn't enough for an invasion. Last night the Chicago Symphony Orchestra attacked the uptown flank and overcame Carnegie Hall. It s a famous orchestra, now under the conductorship of Frederick Stock, and this was its first appearance in New York for a few seasons.

Back in 1890, when contracts were being signed for the formation of this band, Mrs. Theodore Thomas's memoirs of her husband tell how delighted he was with one clause of his agreement: "I never expected to see the day when I would be told that I would be 'held responsible' for maintaining the highest standard of artistic excellence in my musical work!" That responsibility made Chicago famous. Mr. Thomas's death in 1905 gave fuller opportunity to his assistant, Frederick Stock, who is now in full command.

This was the programme which Mr. Stock chose for his orchestra's introduction to New York: Brahms's Third Symphony; Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"; Bax's symphonic poem, "The Garden of Fand," and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." It was a programme guaranteeing balance and inclusiveness. It carried up through the romantic generation to the one new example of Arnold Bax, London's latest. The Boston Symphony played one of his Gaelic revels here only recently—and doubtless, if Mr. Newmann and other English critics wield an active persuasion, we shall soon hear much more. The Brahms brought out the very beautiful tone of the choirs—the quality of the strings, particularly. We haven't heard strings like that since the pre-war days of the Boston Symphony. But the Brahms also showed the inveterate quest of Mr. Stock's interpretation. It was orchestration brought down to the exquisiteness of chamber music, to the smoothness of silk and the excitiveness of an Ik Marvel revery.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED
From
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its reappearance at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, introducing as soloist Hulda Lashanska, soprano, who appeared here with great success in concert last season. As the orchestral numbers Mr. Monteux announces the Second Symphony, in D minor, of Dvorak; the "Faust" overture, Wagner, and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Djinns," in which the piano solo will be played by E. Robert Schmitz. Mme. Lashanska will sing arias from "The Capulets and the Montagues," Bellini, and "Hamlet," Faccio.

EVG. SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.

The penultimate Boston Symphony concert, Pierre Monteux directing, will be given at the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, with Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the celebrated American soprano, appearing as soloist. She will sing with the orchestra Pamina's aria, "Ah! lo so," from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the well-known aria, 'Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera, "Louise."

The symphony will be the First of Beethoven, the one in C major, one of the earlier and less frequently played work of this master. Wagner's "Faust" Overture is also on the program and one of Debussy's masterpieces, "La Mer" (The Sea).

From Evening Post
New York

Here is the first intimation as to the beginning of the end. The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one this season will be given at Carnegie Hall next week, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Madame Hulda Lashanska, one of the foremost lyric sopranos of the rising generation, will sing as soloist at the final concert of the season but one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 4, at 8:15. Madame Lashanska is looked upon as one of the real discoveries of recent seasons. The larger part of her training has taken place in Manhattan, where Madame Sembrich was her most distinguished teacher. In that city also she made her public debut several seasons ago at Carnegie Hall and the occasion caused surprise and much enthusiasm on the part of the musical public there. Her fame has been spreading ever since and her style and artistry maturing. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, Wagner's "Faust" Overture, and Debussy's Symphonic Suite, "La Mer ("The Sea"), the movements of which describe "From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves," and "Dialogue of Wind and Sea."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

HU
LASH
SOLOIS
SYMP
ACAD
FRID

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one, to be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Anton Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, a Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" Overture. Mme. Lashanska will sing Juliet's Romanza from Bellini's opera "The Capulets and the Montagues," and the aria from "Hamlet" by Faccio.

Frieda Hempel will be the soloist of the fourth concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch to be given in the Academy of Music, Saturday afternoon, Feb. 12.

---

m EAGLE
lress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

THE ORCHESTRAS

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one this season will be given at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for the Thursday evening concert the following program: Beethoven's First Symphony in C Major, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano solo will be taken by Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer" (The Sea), which describes (1) From dawn till noon on the ocean; Frolic of waves; Dialogue of wind and sea, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the of Dvorak in D Minor, Two Passacaglias, by Cyril Scott, the Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, of which the movements are. Overture, E; Recitative and Air; and Menuet, and Wagner's A Faust Overture.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
Morning Telegraph
New York

For the last pair but one, of the Boston Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux conducting, will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 3, and Saturday afternoon, February 5. For the Thursday concert Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, "Two Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott; Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," with the following movements: 1, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; 2, "Frolic of the Waves"; 3, "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday afternoon concert Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, Suite Francaise, by Roger-Ducasse

---

Address New York City
TIMES
Date

Brooklyn Music.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, heard with the Boston Symph chestra at the last but one of lyn concerts on Friday at the Carl G. Schmidt gives a recital at the Girls' High Brooklyn today.

UN
Baltimore, Md.
1921

Lyric—The Boston stra will give its season on Wednesday Hulda Lashanska, sopra Mme. Lashanska will sing "Ah! Lo So," from ute," and "Depuis le Charpentier's "Louise." will be Beethoven's First Other numbers will be Overture, Debussy's "La Mer" (The Sea), "From Dawn Till Noon O "Frolic of Waves" and Wind and Sea."

SUN
Baltimore, Md

Will Sing

HULDA LASH

Mme. Lashanska wil at the Boston Symphon cert at the Lyric on W

From STAR.

Lashanska-Boston Sy

Mme. Hulda Lashansk lyric soprano, will appear Boston Symphony Tuesday afternoon National Theater at Pierre Monteux will cond 's Overture in the major, Haydn's so-call Symphony in G major, one 's last works, and the Suite Francaise, French composer, Roger Mme. Lashanska will orchestra, Pamina's aria "The Magic Flute," 's famous "Depuis opera, "Louise." Mme about several seasons work caused quite a st critic praise in that c ranks in a foremost pl lyric sopranos of the

---

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

MONTEUX'S PRO LACKS INSPI

E. Robert Schmit Cesar Franck's certo 'Les Dji

LASHANSKA S

Some years ago it was the Boston Symphon build its programs standard symphonic work occasional dash of Monteux's policy, as was realized by last night's Academy of Music, of delving after This scheme is very often jus of novelty; it is could be followed w of Mr. Monteux's But last night's bring to the audienc thing that contained genius, or even real klyn, N. Y.

30 1921

HULDA
LASHA
SOLOIST
SYMP
ACAD
FRID

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

ulda Lashanska, soprano, will ear as soloist, ith the Boston phony Orchestra at the last Bos- Symphony concert of the season one, to be given at the Academy Music next Friday evening. Pierre nteux will conduct at this concert on Dvorak's Second Symphony in minor, a Suite Francaise by Roger- asse, and Wagner's "Faust" Over- e. Mme. Lashanska will sing et's Romanza from Bellini's opera e Capulets and the Montagues," the aria from "Hamlet" by cio.

rieda Hempel will be the soloist of fourth concert of the New York phony Orchestra under the direc- n of Walter Damrosch to be given the Academy of Music, Saturday ernoon, Feb. 12.

EAGLE

ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

· THE ORCHESTRAS

The last pair of Boston Symphony ncerts but one this season will be ven at Carnegie Hall Thursday eve- ng and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux has arranged for e Thursday evening concert the fol- wing program: Beethoven's First mphony in C Major, Cesar Franck's mphonic poem "Les Djinns," based the poem of Victor Hugo, in which e piano solo will be taken by Mr. E. obert Schmitz, Debussy's symphonic uite "La Mer" (The Sea), which de- cribes (1) From dawn till noon on he ocean; Frolic of waves; Dialogue f wind and sea, and Liszt's symphonic oem "Tasso." For the Saturday mat- nee the symphony will be the s nd Dvorak in D Minor, Two Pas an- lias, by Cyril Scott, the Suite w the caise by Roger-Ducasse, of which the movements are. Overture, Bourree, Recitative and Sir; and Menuet, and Wagner's A Faust Overture.

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1861
m orning Telegraph
New York

For the last pair but one, of the Bos on Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux conducting, will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 3, and Saturday afternoon, February 5. For the Thursday concert Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, "Two Passa- agalias," by Cyril Scott; Debussy's ymphonic suite, "The Sea," with the ollowing movements: 1, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; 2, "Frolic of he Waves"; 3, "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem f Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday afternoon concert, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, uite Francaise, by Roger-Ducasse, and W "Faust" overture.

Address New York City

TIMES. JAN 30 1

Date

Brooklyn Music.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will be heard with the Boston Symphony Or chestra at the last but one of its Brook lyn concerts on [illegible] at the Academy [illegible] a free [illegible] Carl G. [illegible]

SUN
Baltimore, Md.

1921 X

Lyric.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of the season on Wednesday evening with Hulda Lashanska, soprano, as soloist. Mme. Lashanska will sing Pamina's aria, "Ah! Lo So," from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise." The symphony will be Beethoven's First in C Major. Other numbers will be Wagner's "Faust" Overture, Debussy's descriptive suite, "La Mer" (The Sea), in three parts, "From Dawn Till Noon On the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves" and "Dialogue of Wind and Sea."

SUN
: Baltimore, Md.

Y

Will Sing Here

HULDA LASHANSKA

Mme. Lashanska will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Lyric on Wednesday.

From STAR.

Lashanska-Boston Symphony.

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the noted lyric soprano, will appear as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given Tuesday afternoon in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock. Pierre Monteux will conduct in Schubert's Overture in the Italian Style in C major, Haydn's so-called "Military" sympony in G major, one of the master's last works, and the spirited and piquant Suite Francaise, by the living French composer, Roger Ducasse.

Mme. Lashanska will sing, with the orchestra, Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so," from "The Magic Flute," and Charpentier's famous "Depuis le jour," from his opera, "Louise." Mme. Lashanska's debut several seasons ago in New York caused quite a stir of enthusiastic praise in that city. She now ranks in a foremost place among the lyric sopranos of the rising generation.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

MONTEUX'S PROGRAM LACKS INSPIRATION

E. Robert Schmitz Plays Cesar Franck's Concerto 'Les Djinns'

LASHANSKA SINGS

Some years ago it was the custom of the Boston Symphony orchestra to build its programs chiefly on the standard symphonic works, with an occasional dash of novelty. Mr. Monteux's policy, as was again emphasized by last night's concert at the Academy of Music, appears to be one of delving after the seldom heard. This scheme of program making is very often justified by the interest of novelty; it is a procedure that could be followed with profit by some of Mr. Monteux's contemporaries. But last night's program did not bring to the audience's attention anything that contained the kernal of genius, or even real novelty.

The second symphony of Dvorak headed the program. Under a less invigrating baton than Mr. Monteux's the work would have revealed stretches of dullness. It is a symphony with considerable melodic content, but of no great vitality. Tunes flow along one after the other, never reaching full development. They lack the impress of individuality which characterizes the work of truly creative genius. But the work makes agreeable listening, particularly the latter half of the Adagio, and some portions of the Scherzo and Finale. Certainly the work cannot be regarded as a neglected masterpiece, however.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem for piano and orchestra, "Les Djinns," brought E. Robert Schmitz before local audiences again, this time to better advantage than when he attacked the Tshaikovski B minor concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra. His uncertain touch and lack of force did not stand out so glaringly in the Franck composition. His contribution was adequate. All there is in the work was brought out by the orchestra. Mr. Monteux has the faculty of putting apparent vitality into works which are of halting inspiration. This he did in "Les Djinns," altho sacrificing balance and smoothness in the orchestra at times.

In Pamina's air from the Magic Flute and "Despuis le Jour," from "Louise," Hulda Lashanska, who was the featured soloist of the concert, made a favorable impression. An aria from a forgotten Bellini opera and Leila's Air from the "Pearl Fishers" were the numbers programmed, but the music was lost in transit, and the above mentioned numbers were substituted. Her voice is not large, and the tone not always round, but she sings with considerable effect. Her singing of the Mozart lacked authority and fullness of tone, but in the Charpentier number her success was unquestioned. Wagner's "Faust" overture closed the program.

From
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.
Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With Hulda Lashanska as Soprano Soloist

A PROGRAM more than ordinarily infused with the element of novelty was presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening. The soloist was Hulda Lashanska, a young soprano, who made her second appearance in this city.

In the way of orchestral numbers, Pierre Monteux, the conductor, offered the second symphony, in D minor, of Anton Dvorak, a symphonic poem entitled "Les Djinns," for piano and orchestra, by Cesar Franck, and, as the concluding selection, Wagner's "A Faust Overture."

The symphony is a melodious and ingratiating work of no little power and impressiveness in a dramatic sense. It has a noticeably beautiful adagio movement, scarcely less effective in its melodious allurement than the languorous largo in the same composer's better known and popular "New World" symphony.

The work was admirably played for the most part, though the orchestra did not strike its best gait at the beginning. The tone was vibrant and brilliant, but more suggestive of harshness and lack of unity than one is accustomed to hear from the Boston musicians. The succeeding movements, however, the adagio and the finale, were nearer the former standard.

The Franck symphonic poem, elucidating Victor Hugo's "Les Djinns," combines piano and orchestra in an effective unison of solo instrument and somewhat profuse instrumentation, in which neither part obscures the other, the piano, while at times dominating in the full, melodious ensemble, having more the effect of a component obbligato than that of a semi-detached solo. The pianist was E. Robert Schmitz, who played with the authoritative command and insight of the well-trained and understanding artist.

Changing her selections—the scores of the numbers announced failing to arrive on time—Mme. Lashanska sang Pamina's aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and "Depuis le jour" from "Louise."

Her voice is of a pure, limpid quality, rich, mellow, and even throughout its wide range, suggesting that of Melba when the great Australian soprano was in her prime. It was used with ease and fluent expressiveness, though a bit timidly, as if the singer were not as yet quite sure of herself, in the Mozart selection, but in the familiar Charpentier aria in a manner which won the sort of enthusiastic applause that betokens an emphatic success.

From
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

1921

THREE MUSIC NOTES

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, gave the fourth in its current series of concerts at the Academy of Music last evening, when the programme included the uninspired "Faust" overture of Richard Wagner, Cesar Franck's vivid and picturesque setting of Victor Hugo's poem, "Les Djinns," and the Second Symphony in D minor of Antonin Dvorak. This is a work with which the American public is not familiar and which deserves to be better known. That is makes as strong an emotional or melodious appeal as the "New World" it would be too much to say, but [illegible] good music, [illegible] ten, imaginatively conceived and thematically interesting, and it exemplifies some of its famous composer's most valuable and distinctive characteristics.

It is played, as were the other numbers on the list, with plenty of spirit and technical efficiency and not without some suggestion of the beauty of tone and refinement of style for which the Boston Orchestra at its best estate was so pre-eminently distinguished. The soloist was Hulda Lashanska, a young lyric soprano with a cultivated method and an extremely sympathetic and agreeable voice, who was heard with much pleasure in Tamina's aria in "The Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise." Miss Lashanska is a cultivated artist, with an unusually ingratiating personality, for whom it seems safe to prophesy a brilliantly successful career. She certainly captured her last night's audience.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season in the Academy last night, and had an audience of fair size, which cordially approved the performance. Pierre Monteux conducted with his habitual urbanity and there were two soloists, though the work of E. Robert Schmitz at the piano was incidental to Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," and first honors went to the prima donna, Hulda Lashanska.

In first place on the program came Dvorak's second symphony in D minor, a work that lacks the inspiration and the vitality of the famous "New World" symphony, and still a composition well worth the pains of presentation. Like most of the playing last evening, the performance was uneven; a good deal of the time one's attention was attracted to the individual distinction of certain veteran players and away from the somewhat halting and uncertain ensemble.

The orchestra has not yet recovered the disciplined alignment and the crisp definition, the instant and powerful attack and the welded cohesion of the days of old. But with each performance the hope is renewed that the glory has not departed forever. The finale of the symphony was the most satisfactory of the four movements.

Franck's magnificent "Les Djinns" was performed for the first time at these concerts, and E. Robert Schmitz played the piano part with authority, not once at a loss among the rolling and running figures, where it would be so easy to go wrong. He was much applauded, and he deserved it.

The music announced for Hulda Lashanska to sing was lost in transit and the substituted numbers were Mozart's air of Pamina, from "The Magis Flute," and Charpentier's "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise." The young soprano sang deliciously and was received with every manifestation of pleasure.

Her voice has peculiar color and warmth, and its distinctive quality finds its way to the innermost recesses of the heart. A striking stage presence enhances the impression made by this excellent singer. The highest notes, instead of being projected mightily, were given in a delicate pianissimo and the glissando thence to the lower register was artfully accomplished.

Wagner's "Faust" overture, after a somewhat too vague beginning, was played with aggressive energy and phrasing well controlled as the final number.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mr. Monteux Gives Remarkable Program at 4th Concert of Organization

THE PROGRAM

Symphony in D minor (No. 2)........Dvorak
Symphonic Poem for Piano and Orchestra, "Les Djinns"...............Francis
Piano solo, E. Robert Schmitz
(a) Pamina's aria, "Magic Flute"...Mozart
(b) "Depuis le jour" from "Louise," Charpentier
Mme. Hulda Lashanska
A Faust Overture..................Wagner

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, Mr. Monteux presented a program about equally combined of deathly dullness and delicate beauty. He opened with the Second Symphony of Dvorak, a work not previously performed in Philadelphia, to the recollection of the writer, but nevertheless bearing the opus title of 70, therefore coming after some of the most significant of the composer's writings, such as the quartet in E-flat, op. 51, and other compositions which bid fair to live for many years, a fate it must be admitted will not be vouchsafed to the symphony. The work is interesting principally because it is a composition of Dvorak, but there is little of the real Dvorak, the Dvorak of the "New World" symphony, the piano quintet, or the so-called "American" quartet in it.

On the other hand, there are plenty of what Mr. Hale, the commentator of the Boston Orchestra, calls "reminders" about it. There is Brahms, but not in melody as the commentator finds, but in the transition of tonalities without the intermediate key. On the other hand, there are many indications of the Dvorak to come only a few opuses later, but this is the case in the rhythms more than in any other one feature. The last two movements are decidedly the best of the symphony.

The Cesar Franck symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," proved to be a veritable gem, and it is astounding that it has not been heard here before. The music is the mature Franck and carries out to the letter the idea of the poem on which it was founded. It was the finest thing of the evening, both in composition and in performance. The elaborate piano part was beautifully played by Mr. Schmitz, who played the Tschaikowsky concerto with our own orchestra earlier in the season. He received many recalls, as his performance warranted, which he shared with Mr. Monteux. The last orchestral number was the "Faust" overture of Wagner, which is no more Wagner at his best than the symphony was Dvorak at his best. A biographer of the composer has said that "it" (the "Faust" overture) was written "in a cold draughty garret, shared with his wife and his dog, and while he had a raging toothache." Compared to the Wagner of "Tristan" or "The Ring," it sounds as though the biographer were strictly correct.

The work of the orchestra showed improvement over the previous concerts of this and last season, and the Boston Orchestra is rapidly getting back into the form which it displayed when it was the premier orchestra of the United States. The tone of the strings is excellent, but the famous wood-winds are not what they were. This may be because the compositions of last evening gave them little chance to show what they could really do. The brass was especially good, and the work of the first trumpet exceptional.

Mme. Lashanska was not at her best in the Mozart aria, but it seems as though no one can sing Mozart in the present day. She sang the aria from "Louise" much better and received many recalls.

12TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Franck's "The Jinn" Interpreted with Eloquence and Passion

SCHMITZ AT PIANO · POETIC VIRTUOSO

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program read as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Franck, "The Jinn," symphonic poem for piano and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Bingham, Passacaglia for orchestra (first performance); Roger-Ducasse, Suite Francaise. E. Robert Schmitz was the pianist. Yesterday afternoon the order in which the pieces by Franck and Bingham were played was reversed.

Franck's symphonic poem was heard here really for the first time. It was played at a Chickering Production Concert in 1909, but the attendant circumstances were not favorable and the music made little impression. Franck was never strongly influenced by oriental legend or color. He wrote a song, "The Emir of Bengador," with words by Mery, interesting in itself, in the oriental way as it was then musically understood. There was an illustrated title page showing the conventional eastern potentate addressing the conventional light of the harem. Mr. Gardner Lamson sang the song at his recital nearly 30 years ago; the first song of Franck's that was heard in Boston. It was the first time that Franck's name was on a program of any concert in this city.

One is not accustomed to associate this composer with the musical expression of the Satanic. He reached a sublime height of mysticism in pages of "The Beatitudes" and thus stood with Palestrina and the Spaniard Tomas Luiz de Victoria; his mysticism was warmed by his sympathy with poor humanity; but when he attempted in "The Beatitude" to portray in tones Satan and all his host, he wrote music that reminds one of Meyerbeer at his worst. The wonder is that he chose Victor Hugo's "Jinn" for the subject of a symphonic poem. Nevertheless he succeeded far better here in demoniacal expression than in his symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman." M. d'Indy has said that "The Jinn" is not properly speaking a musical adaptation of Hugo's "lozenge" and is not "very closely connected with the subject." It is true that the music is not panoramic; it is not an interlinear translation; but it is charged with the spirit of Hugo's wild verses. There is a dramatic, one might say melodramatic intensity to it that is not to be found elsewhere in Franck's compositions. There is more than the suggestion of the supernatural; there are the hellish voices of the dread visitors with their breath of flame, their murderous wings. In the relieving passages there is still the shudder of anxiety, of fear, until the cries die away in the flight of the dark swarm; and town, sea, sky are again at peace.

The performance of this music was Hugoesque. Mr. Monteux gave an eloquent and passionate interpretation; the orchestra was a supreme virtuoso; Mr. Schmitz's playing of the piano will long be remembered. Twice now at Symphony concerts he has been as one of the orchestral players. May we not hope to hear him soon in a concerto where he will have the dominating role? Few pianists that come to Boston can vie with him as poetic virtuoso and emotional musician.

Mr. Bingham, an instructor in theory and composition at Colmbia University, has written a set of variations in the form of a Passacaglia, but not in the old and orthodox manner. The theme, proclaimed by a trumpet, is modified rhythmically; there are many changes in tonality and harmonization; in one instance, at least, there is development. Mr. Bingham, modest as a man, is by no means timid as a composer. He dares at times to use a thunderous speech, to be bold with the brass section, to prepare unexpected combinations of timbres. The Passacaglia is interesting in many ways; it argues well for his future—though he is by no means a beginner in composition. As the work was heard yesterday, the instrumentation occasionally seemed thick and ineffective, as if the musical ideas were not clearly brought out. The work was favorably received. Mr. Bingham, with refreshing modesty, did not rush to the platform; he left his seat on the floor only to bow.

There was a delightful performance of the symphony, one that the fastidious Mr. Gericke, lover and master of proportion and euphony, would have applauded. A brilliant reading of the French Suite brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2, D minor; Cyril Scott, Two Passacaglias (first time in Boston); Mozart, Pamina's Air from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"; Wagner, a Faust overture. Mme. Hulda Lashanska will then sing in Boston for the first time.

HERALD JAN: 22.

A WEEK-END OF ALL THINGS FOR ALL MEN

Mr. Scott and the Symphony Orchestra —Why Should There Not Be Guest-Conductors as Well as Guest-Composers?—Mr. Hofmann Excels Himself in Chopin's Music — Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Cortot Paired—Mr. Lazaro Entertains and Miss Thompson Does Her Duty—Again the Sonata of Pizzetti—Items and Prospects

IT was deserved compliment that Mr. Monteux paid Cyril Scott when he played the composer's two Passacaglias at the Symphony Concerts of last week. Mr. Scott may not be the most eminent or the most impressive of Britons now writing music; he is indeed a sincerely modest man; but he happens to be on visit to America and by intrinsic merit these orchestral pieces warranted performance. Wisely the conductor gave them place; while as wisely the management invited Mr. Scott to the concerts as "guest of honor." There is reasonable curiosity among the public of the Symphony Orchestra to look upon the composers whose music it hears—the more when their pieces "in the smaller forms" are familiar upon many a piano. In such case stood Mr. Scott and there was no little straining of eyes and clapping of hands when he bowed from the "guest-seats" on Friday afternoon and came to the platform on Saturday evening, there to acknowledge his debt to orchestra and conductor as well as to applauding audience. Mr. Scott is interesting to see; his aspect kindles speculation about the man and the musician within. His presence in the eye and the ear spiced two concerts, otherwise not too amusing.

The clear truth is that the public, regular or occasional, of the Symphony Concerts welcomes celebrities, whether they chance to be "assisting artists" or composers in the programme of the day. It is as plain that their presence adds zest to the occasion and detracts not a whit from established standards. By these signs when an eminent conductor visits the United States, he would be no less welcome and stimulating as guest, for a concert or a pair of concerts, of orchestra and audience. Mr. Toscanini brings his own band to America and plays upon no other; Mr. Coates tarried too briefly to go outside New York; Mr. Mengelberg remains—come from Amsterdam for a much longer stay with the National Symphony Orchestra and (it is said) by no means unwilling to prove his mettle elsewhere. By common consent he is a conductor of signal abilities; western and central Europe set him high; he is not likely to revisit this side of the world.

For the prestige of the Symphony Concerts Mr. Mengelberg ought to be heard at a pair of them; or, if not there, at a spring concert for the increase of the orchestra's Pension Fund. As the committee administering it invited Richard Strauss, years ago, as such guest, so reasonably and creditably, it might summon the Hollander; while beyond question a considerable public in Boston is eager to hear him. The hampering, dulling notion that the Symphony Concerts are a closed preserve into which no "outsider" must ever enter belongs to the régime that ended with the reorganization of the orchestra in 1917. A more open-minded and liberal policy now governs it. From time to time there should obviously be room—for a day—for visiting conductors of conspicuous worth. Fancy an editor who tried to conduct a newspaper with no contributions but his own—and Mr. Monteux is a reasonable, a courteous as well as an able man. H. T. P.

Items and Announcements

The Manchester Guardian reveals the interesting fact that when Mr. Monteux and the management of the Symphony Orchestra were choosing a new concertmaster last summer, the final choice lay between Mr. Burgin and Mr. Catterall, the first violinist of the Hallé Orchestra in that city, and the leader of a noted string quartet. Mr. Burgin received the post and somewhat belatedly The Guardian rejoices in an outcome that keeps Mr. Catterall at home.

At the two concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York this week Mr. Monteux is repeating, for the most part, numbers recently heard at home: On Thursday evening, Beethoven's First Symphony, Scott's Passacaglias, Debussy's Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea," and Franck's tone-poem, "The Jinn"; on Saturday afternoon, Dvorak's Second Symphony, Roger-Ducasse's French Suite, Wagner's "Faust Overture" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Tasso."

TRAN. JAN. 31.

[84]

klyn, N. Y.

HUL
LASHA
SOLOIS
SYMP
ACAD
FRID

MUSIC IN BRÓOKLYN

ulda Lashanska, soprano, will ar as soloist, ith the Boston phony Orchestra at the last Bos- Symphony concert of the season one, to be given at the Academy Music next Friday evening. Pierre nteux will conduct at this concert on Dvorak's Second Symphony in ninor, a Suite Francaise by Roger- asse, and Wagner's "Faust" Over- . Mme. Lashanska will sing et's Romanza from Bellini's opera e Capulets and the Montagues," the aria from "Hamlet" by cio.

rieda Hempel will be the soloist of fourth concert of the New York phony Orchestra under the direc- of Walter Damrosch to be given the Academy of Music, Saturday rnoon, Feb. 12.

EAGLE
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE ORCHESTRAS

The last pair of Boston Symphony ncerts but one this season will be ven at Carnegie Hall Thursday eve- ng and Saturday afternoon.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for e Thursday evening concert the fol- wing program: Beethoven's First ymphony in C Major, Cesar Franck's mphonic poem "Les Djinns," based the poem of Victor Hugo, in which e piano solo will be taken by Mr. E. obert Schmitz, Debussy's symphonic uite "La Mer" (The Sea), which de- cribes (1) From dawn till noon on e ocean; Frolic of waves; Dialogue f wind and sea, and Liszt's symphonic oem "Tasso." For the Saturday mat- ee the symphony will be the s nd f Dvorak in D Minor, Two Pas g- las, by Cyril Scott, the Suite an- caise by Roger-Ducasse, of w the movements are. Overture, Bourree, Recitative and Sir; and Menuet, and Wagner's A Faust Overture.

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1861
m orning Telegraph
New York

For the last pair but one, of the Bos on Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux onducting, will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 3, and Saturday afternoon, February 5. For he Thursday concert Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, "Two Passa- agalias," by Cyril Scott; Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," with the ollowing movements: 1, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; 2, "Frolic of he Waves"; 3, "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem f Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz. For the Saturday afternoon concert, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, uite Francaise, by Roger-Ducasse, and

Address New York City
TIMES JAN 30

Date

Brooklyn Music.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will be heard with the Boston Symphony Or chestra at the last but one of its Brook lyn concerts on Friday at the Academy Carl G. Sch High School recital at Brooklyn

---

SUN
Baltimore, Md.

Lyric—The Boston Symphony Or chestra will give its fourth concert of the season on Wednesday evening with Hulda Lashanska, soprano, as soloist. Mme. Lashanska will sing Pamina's aria, "Ah! Lo So," from Mozart's "The Ma Flute," and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise." The symphony will be Beethoven's First in C Major. Other numbers will be Wagner's "Faust" Overture, Debussy's descriptive suite, "La Mor" (The Sea), in three parts, "From Dawn Till Noon On the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves" and "Dialogue of Wind and Sea."

SUN
Baltimore, Md.

Will Sing Here

HULDA LASHANSKA

Mme. Lashanska will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Lyric on Wednesday.

From STAR.

Lashanska-Boston Symphony.

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the noted lyric soprano, will appear as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given Tuesday afternoon in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock. Pierre Monteux will conduct in Schubert's Overture in the Italian Style in C major, Haydn's so-called "Military" sympony in G major, one of the master's last works, and the spirited and piquant Suite Francaise, by the living French composer, Roger Ducasse.

Mme. Lashanska will sing, with the orchestra, Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so," from "The Magic Flute," and Charpentier's famous "Depuis le jour," from his opera, "Louise." Mme. Lashanska's debut several seasons ago in New York caused quite a stir of enthusiastic praise in that city. She now ranks in a foremost place among the lyric sopranos of the rising generation.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

MONTEUX'S PROGRAM LACKS INSPIRATION

E. Robert Schmitz Plays Cesar Franck's Concerto 'Les Djinns'

LASHANSKA SINGS

Some years ago it was the custom of the Boston Symphony orchestra to build its programs chiefly on the standard symphonic works, with an occasional dash of novelty. Mr. Monteux's policy, as was again emphasized by last night's concert at the Academy of Music, appears to be one of delving after the seldom heard. This scheme of program making is very often justified by the interest of novelty; it is a procedure that could be followed with profit by some of Mr. Monteux's contemporaries. But last night's program did not bring to the audience's attention anything that contained the kernal of genius, or even real novelty.

The second symphony of Dvorak headed the program. Under a less invigrating baton than Mr. Monteux's the work would have revealed stretches of dullness. It is a symphony with considerable melodic content, but of no great vitality. Tunes flow along one after the other, never reaching full development. They lack the impress of individuality which characterizes the work of truly creative genius. But the work makes agreeable listening, particularly the latter half of the Adagio, and some portions of the Scherzo and Finale. Certainly the work cannot be regarded as a neglected masterpiece, however.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem for piano and orchestra, "Les Djinns," brought E. Robert Schmitz before local audiences again, this time to better advantage than when he attacked the Tshaikovski B minor concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra. His uncertain touch and lack of force did not stand out so glaringly in the Franck composition. His contribution was adequate. All there is in the work was brought out by the orchestra. Mr. Monteux has the faculty of putting apparent vitality into works which are of halting inspiration. This he did in "Les Djinns," altho sacrificing balance and smoothness in the orchestra at times.

In Pamina's air from the Magic Flute and "Despuis le Jour," from "Louise," Hulda Lashanska, who was the featured soloist of the concert, made a favorable impression. An aria from a forgotten Bellini opera and Leila's Air from the "Pearl Fishers" were the numbers programmed, but the music was lost in transit, and the above mentioned numbers were substituted. Her voice is not large, and the tone not always round, but she sings with considerable effect. Her singing of the Mozart lacked authority and fullness of tone, but in the Charpentier number her success was unquestioned. Wagner's "Faust" overture closed the program.

From
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.
Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With Hulda Lashanska as Soprano Soloist

A PROGRAM more than ordinarily infused with the element of novelty was presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening. The soloist was Hulda Lashanska, a young soprano, who made her second appearance in this city.

In the way of orchestral numbers, Pierre Monteux, the conductor, offered the second symphony, in D minor, of Anton Dvorak, a symphonic poem entitled "Les Djinns," for piano and orchestra, by Cesar Franck, and, as the concluding selection, Wagner's "A Faust Overture."

The symphony is a melodious and ingratiating work of no little power and impressiveness in a dramatic sense. It has a noticeably beautiful adagio movement, scarcely less effective in its melodious allurement than the languorous largo in the same composer's better known and popular "New World" symphony.

The work was admirably played for the most part, though the orchestra did not strike its best gait at the beginning. The tone was vibrant and brilliant, but more suggestive of harshness and lack of unity than one is accustomed to hear from the Boston musicians. The succeeding movements, however, the adagio and the finale, were nearer the former standard.

The Franck symphonic poem, elucidating Victor Hugo's "Les Djinns," combines piano and orchestra in an effective unison of solo instrument and somewhat profuse instrumentation, in which neither part obscures the other, the piano, while at times dominating in the full, melodious ensemble, having more the effect of a component obbligato than that of a semi-detached solo. The pianist was E. Robert Schmitz, who played with the authoritative command and insight of the well-trained and understanding artist.

Changing her selections—the scores of the numbers announced failing to arrive on time—Mme. Lashanska sang Pamina's aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and "Depuis le jour" from "Louise."

Her voice is of a pure, limpid quality, rich, mellow, and even throughout its wide range, suggesting that of Melba when the great Australian soprano was in her prime. It was used with ease and fluent expressiveness, though a bit timidly, as if the singer were not as yet quite sure of herself, in the Mozart selection, but in the familiar Charpentier aria in a manner which won the sort of enthusiastic applause that betokens an emphatic success.

From 1921
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

THREE MUSIC NOTES

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, gave the fourth in its current series of concerts at the Academy of Music last evening, when the programme included the uninspired "Faust" overture of Richard Wagner, Cesar Franck's vivid and picturesque setting of Victor Hugo's poem, "Les Djinns," and the Second Symphony in D minor of Antonin Dvorak. This is a work with which the American public is not familiar and which deserves to be better known. That is makes as strong an emotional or melodious appeal as the "New World" it would be too much to say, but it is good music, skilfully written, imaginatively conceived and thematically interesting, and it exemplifies some of its famous composer's most valuable and distinctive characteristics.

It is played, as were the other numbers on the list, with plenty of spirit and technical efficiency and not without some suggestion of the beauty of tone and refinement of style for which the Boston Orchestra at its best estate was so pre-eminently distinguished. The soloist was Hulda Lashanska, a young lyric soprano with a cultivated method and an extremely sympathetic and agreeable voice, who was heard with much pleasure in Tamina's aria in "The Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise." Miss Lashanska is a cultivated artist, with an unusually ingratiating personality, for whom it seems safe to prophesy a brilliantly successful career. She certainly captured her last night's audience.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season in the Academy last night, and had an audience of fair size, which cordially approved the performance. Pierre Monteux conducted with his habitual urbanity and there were two soloists, though the work of E. Robert Schmitz at the piano was incidental to Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," and first honors went to the prima donna, Hulda Lashanska.

In first place on the program came Dvorak's second symphony in D minor, a work that lacks the inspiration and the vitality of the famous "New World" symphony, and still a composition well worth the pains of presentation. Like most of the playing last evening, the performance was uneven; a good deal of the time one's attention was attracted to the individual distinction of certain veteran players and away from the somewhat halting and uncertain ensemble.

The orchestra has not yet recovered the disciplined alignment and the crisp definition, the instant and powerful attack and the welded cohesion of the days of old. But with each performance the hope is renewed that the glory has not departed forever. The finale of the symphony was the most satisfactory of the four movements.

Franck's magnificent "Les Djinns" was performed for the first time at these concerts, and E. Robert Schmitz played the piano part with authority, not once at a loss among the rolling and running figures, where it would be so easy to go wrong. He was much applauded, and he deserved it.

The music announced for Hulda Lashanska to sing was lost in transit and the substituted numbers were Mozart's air of Pamina, from "The Magis Flute," and Charpentier's "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise." The young soprano sang deliciously and was received with every manifestation of pleasure.

Her voice has peculiar color and warmth, and its distinctive quality finds its way to the innermost recesses of the heart. A striking stage presence enhances the impression made by this excellent singer. The highest notes, instead of being projected mightily, were given in a delicate pianissimo and the glissando thence to the lower register was artfully accomplished.

Wagner's "Faust" overture, after a somewhat too vague beginning, was played with aggressive energy and phrasing well controlled as the final number.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mr. Monteux Gives Remarkable Program at 4th Concert of Organization

THE PROGRAM

Symphony in D minor (No. 2)........Dvorak
Symphonic Poem for Piano and Orchestra, "Les Djinns"..............Francis
Piano solo, E. Robert Schmitz
(a) Pamina's aria, "Magic Flute"...Mozart
(b) "Depuis le jour" from "Louise," Charpentier
Mme. Hulda Lashanska
A Faust Overture.................Wagner

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, Mr. Monteux presented a program about equally combined of deathly dullness and delicate beauty. He opened with the Second Symphony of Dvorak, a work not previously performed in Philadelphia, to the recollection of the writer, but nevertheless, bearing the opus title of 70, therefore coming after some of the most significant of the composer's writings, such as the quartet in E-flat, op. 51, and other compositions which bid fair to live for many years, a fate it must be admitted will not be vouchsafed to the symphony. The work is interesting principally because it is a composition of Dvorak, but there is little of the real Dvorak, the Dvorak of the "New World" symphony, the piano quintet, or the so-called "American" quartet in it.

On the other hand, there are plenty of what Mr. Hale, the commentator of the Boston Orchestra, calls "reminders" about it. There is Brahms, but not in melody as the commentator finds, but in the transition of tonalities without the intermediate key. On the other hand, there are many indications of the Dvorak to come only a few opuses later, but this is the case in the rhythms more than in any other one feature. The last two movements are decidedly the best of the symphony.

The Cesar Franck symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," proved to be a veritable gem, and it is astounding that it has not been heard here before. The music is the mature Franck and carries out to the letter the idea of the poem on which it was founded. It was the finest thing of the evening, both in composition and in performance. The elaborate piano part was beautifully played by Mr. Schmitz, who played the Tschaikowsky concerto with our own orchestra earlier in the season. He received many recalls, as his performance warranted, which he shared with Mr. Monteux. The last orchestral number was the "Faust" overture of Wagner, which is no more Wagner at his best than the symphony was Dvorak at his best. A biographer of the composer has said that "it" (the "Faust" overture) was written "in a cold draughty garret, shared with his wife and his dog, and while he had a raging toothache." Compared to the Wagner of "Tristan" or "The Ring," it sounds as though the biographer were strictly correct. z

The work of the orchestra showed improvement over the previous concerts of this and last season, and the Boston Orchestra is rapidly getting back into the form which it displayed when it was the premier orchestra of the United States. The tone of the strings is excellent, but the famous wood-winds are not what they were. This may be because the compositions of last evening gave them little chance to show what they could really do. The brass was especially good, and the work of the first trumpet exceptional.

Mme. Lashanska was not at her best in the Mozart aria, but it seems as though no one can sing Mozart in the present day. She sang the aria from "Louise" much better and received many recalls.

12TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Franck's "The Jinn" Interpreted with Eloquence and Passion

SCHMITZ AT PIANO • POETIC VIRTUOSO

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program read as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Franck, "The Jinn," symphonic poem for piano and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Bingham, Passacaglia for orchestra (first performance); Roger-Ducasse, Suite Francaise. E. Robert Schmitz was the pianist. Yesterday afternoon the order in which the pieces by Franck and Bingham were played was reversed.

Franck's symphonic poem was heard here really for the first time. It was played at a Chickering Production Concert in 1909, but the attendant circumstances were not favorable and the music made little impression. Franck was never strongly influenced by oriental legend or color. He wrote a song, "The Emir of Bengador," with words by Mery, interesting in itself, in the oriental way as it was then musically understood. There was an illustrated title page showing the conventional eastern potentate addressing the conventional light of the harem. Mr. Gardner Lamson sang the song at his recital nearly 30 years ago; the first song of Franck's that was heard in Boston. It was the first time that Franck's name was on a program of any concert in this city.

One is not accustomed to associate this composer with the musical expression of the Satanic. He reached a sublime height of mysticism in pages of "The Beatitudes" and thus stood with Palestrina and the Spaniard Tomas Luiz de Victoria; his mysticism was warmed by his sympathy with poor humanity; but when he attempted in "The Beatitude" to portray in tones Satan and all his host, he wrote music that reminds one of Meyerbeer at his worst. The wonder is that he chose Victor Hugo's "Jinn" for the subject of a symphonic poem. Nevertheless he succeeded far better here in demoniacal expression than in his symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman." M. d'Indy has said that "The Jinn" is not properly speaking a musical adaptation of Hugo's "lozenge" and is not "very closely connected with the subject." It is true that the music is not panoramic; it is not an interlinear translation; but it is charged with the spirit of Hugo's wild verses. There is a dramatic, one might say melodramatic intensity to it that is not to be found elsewhere in Franck's compositions. There is more than the suggestion of the supernatural; there are the hellish voices of the dread visitors with their breath of flame, their murderous wings. In the relieving passages there is still the shudder of anxiety, of fear, until the cries die away in the flight of the dark swarm; and town, sea, sky are again at peace.

The performance of this music was Hugoesque. Mr. Monteux gave an eloquent and passionate interpretation; the orchestra was a supreme virtuoso; Mr. Schmitz's playing of the piano will long be remembered. Twice now at Symphony concerts he has been as one of the orchestral players. May we not hope to hear him soon in a concerto where he will have the dominating role? Few pianists that come to Boston can vie with him as poetic virtuoso and emotional musician.

Mr. Bingham, an instructor in theory and composition at Colmbia University, has written a set of variations in the form of a Passacaglia, but not in the old and orthodox manner. The theme, proclaimed by a trumpet, is modified rhythmically; there are many changes in tonality and harmonization; in one instance, at least, there is development. Mr. Bingham, modest as a man, is by no means timid as a composer. He dares at times to use a thunderous speech, to be bold with the brass section, to prepare unexpected combinations of timbres. The Passacaglia is interesting in many ways; it argues well for his future—though he is by no means a beginner in composition. As the work was heard yesterday, the instrumentation occasionally seemed thick and ineffective, as if the musical ideas were not clearly brought out. The work was favorably received. Mr. Bingham, with refreshing modesty, did not rush to the platform; he left his seat on the floor only to bow.

There was a delightful performance of the symphony, one that the fastidious Mr. Gericke, lover and master of proportion and euphony, would have applauded. A brilliant reading of the French Suite brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2, D minor; Cyril Scott, Two Passacaglias (first time in Boston); Mozart, Pamina's Air from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"; Wagner, a Faust overture. Mme. Hulda Lashanska will then sing in Boston for the first time.

HERALD JAN: 22

A WEEK-END OF ALL THINGS FOR ALL MEN

Mr. Scott and the Symphony Orchestra —Why Should There Not Be Guest-Conductors as Well as Guest-Composers?—Mr. Hofmann Excels Himself in Chopin's Music — Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Cortot Paired—Mr. Lazaro Entertains and Miss Thompson Does Her Duty—Again the Sonata of Pizzetti—Items and Prospects

IT was deserved compliment that Mr. Monteux paid Cyril Scott when he played the composer's two Passacaglias at the Symphony Concerts of last week. Mr. Scott may not be the most eminent or the most impressive of Britons now writing music; he is indeed a sincerely modest man; but he happens to be on visit to America and by intrinsic merit these orchestral pieces warranted performance. Wisely the conductor gave them place; while as wisely the management invited Mr. Scott to the concerts as "guest of honor." There is reasonable curiosity among the public of the Symphony Orchestra to look upon the composers whose music it hears—the more when their pieces "in the smaller forms" are familiar upon many a piano. In such case stood Mr. Scott and there was no little straining of eyes and clapping of hands when he bowed from the "guest-seats" on Friday afternoon and came to the platform on Saturday evening, there to acknowledge his debt to orchestra and conductor as well as to applauding audience. Mr. Scott is interesting to see; his aspect kindles speculation about the man and the musician within. His presence in the eye and the ear spiced two concerts, otherwise not too amusing.

The clear truth is that the public, regular or occasional, of the Symphony Concerts welcomes celebrities, whether they chance to be "assisting artists" or composers in the programme of the day. It is as plain that their presence adds zest to the occasion and detracts not a whit from established standards. By these signs when an eminent conductor visits the United States, he would be no less welcome and stimulating as guest, for a concert or a pair of concerts, of orchestra and audience. Mr. Toscanini brings his own band to America and plays upon no other; Mr. Coates tarried too briefly to go outside New York; Mr. Mengelberg remains—come from Amsterdam for a much longer stay with the National Symphony Orchestra and (it is said) by no means unwilling to prove his mettle elsewhere. By common consent he is a conductor of signal abilities; western and central Europe set him high; he is not likely to revisit this side of the world.

For the prestige of the Symphony Concerts Mr. Mengelberg ought to be heard at a pair of them; or, if not there, at a spring concert for the increase of the orchestra's Pension Fund. As the committee administering it invited Richard Strauss, years ago, as such guest, so reasonably and creditably, it might summon the Hollander; while beyond question a considerable public in Boston is eager to hear him. The hampering, dulling notion that the Symphony Concerts are a closed preserve into which no "outsider" must ever enter belongs to the régime that ended with the reorganization of the orchestra in 1917. A more open-minded and liberal policy now governs it. From time to time there should obviously be room—for a day—for visiting conductors of conspicuous worth. Fancy an editor who tried to conduct a newspaper with no contributions but his own—and Mr. Monteux is a reasonable, a courteous as well as an able man. H. T. P.

Items and Announcements

The Manchester Guardian reveals the interesting fact that when Mr. Monteux and the management of the Symphony Orchestra were choosing a new concertmaster last summer, the final choice lay between Mr. Burgin and Mr. Catterall, the first violinist of the Hallé Orchestra in that city, and the leader of a noted string quartet. Mr. Burgin received the post and somewhat belatedly The Guardian rejoices in an outcome that keeps Mr. Catterall at home.

At the two concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York this week Mr. Monteux is repeating, for the most part, numbers recently heard at home: On Thursday evening, Beethoven's First Symphony, Scott's Passacaglias, Debussy's Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea," and Franck's tone-poem, "The Jinn"; on Saturday afternoon, Dvorak's Second Symphony, Roger-Ducasse's French Suite, Wagner's "Faust Overture" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Tasso."

TRAN. JAN. 31,

[84]

Mr. Carpenter's Ballet-Music for the First Times—A "Wagner-Programme" from the Symphony Orchestra—The Cleveland Orchestra Comes—A Novel Sonata of Debussy—Mr. Levitzki and Mr. Ganz as Pianists—Mme. Raisa in Miscellany—Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Laurent for Young People

ELEVEN months ago, the Chicago Opera Company announced a single performance in Boston of Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta"—the first considerable venture by an American composer of distinctive place into such music of the theatre. It was to be mimed and danced by Mr. Bolm and an able cast, to be clothed in Spanish settings and dresses of the time and the courts of Velasquez, as designed by Robert Jones. Mischances defeated arrangements and there was no subsequent effort to renew them. Accordingly, Mr. Carpenter's music will be heard for the first times here at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in the form of a Suite put together by the composer himself. Fortunately, it omits little. After an Introduction, the Infanta and her train enter to her birthday party. Other children come as guests; servants display the gifts in stately fashion. There are dances for the children themselves and for gypsies; a miniature and fantastic bull-fight besides. From nowhere comes a dwarf; like no other he dances; deluded, he believes he has won the Infanta's eye and, maybe, heart. A mirror discloses to him his own deformity and ugliness. Under the shock of disillusion, he dies. The princess is grieved; but more she is puzzled. So run "argument" and action, to a reflecting, characterizing music that yet speaks for itself in the concert-hall. It is written with Mr. Carpenter's manifold command of symphonic means and with his usual fineness and freshness of imagination. It gilds the suggesting story by Wilde; it discovers new abilities in the composer. There is promise, then, in the Suite of rare interest and as rare satisfaction. For the rest, Mr. Monteux will begin the concerts with Schumann's Symphony in C major—the symphony of happy wedlock—and end them with Beethoven's Piano-Concerto in C minor, the third in the series, nowadays seldom heard. In it Mr. Levitzki will play the solo-part. The music invites his clarity, surety, finesse and elegance.

For the first time in four years the Symphony Orchestra will undertake a "Wagner-Concert"—tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, beginning by exception at three o'clock; while as heretofore on such occasions the receipts will go to the Pension Fund for retired or disabled players. The programme traverses: the Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhaüser"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Valkyrs' Ride from "Die Walküre"; Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock, Dawn, and Siegfried's Journey on the Rhine from the "Ring" operas. In the fragment of "Tristan," Mr. Speyer will play the desolate melody for English horn; in the Bacchanale from "Tannhaüser," a women's choir from The Cecilia will be audible, but invisible. It is long since such an array of Wagner's music has been heard in Boston, and if we are to have him at all, it must be in the concert-hall. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra should be variously eloquent.

Two numbers from Wagner stand also on the programme of the concert by the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders' Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening next—the overture to "Tannhaüser" and the Valkyrs' Ride. The chosen symphony is the second of Dvorák lately heard and liked in Boston. For solo numbers, Mr. Schroeder, the violoncellist, will play Böllman's "Symphonic Variations" and Bruch's version of the liturgical Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrei."

TRAN. Feb. 5.

The 38th Pension Fund concert will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon at three o'clock sharp instead of the usual hour of 3.30. The program, consisting entirely of Wagner's music, follows: Prelude to "The Meistersingers," Prelude to "Lohengrin," Overture to "Tannhauser" and Bacchanale (the chorus to be taken by members of the Cecilia Society trained by their director, Agide Jacchia), the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyries," Prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," with English horn solo by Mr. Louis Speyer of the orchestra, and excerpts from "The Ring," including "Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey."

At the 14th pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 11 and 12, Mischa Levitzki, the young Russian pianist of steadily rising fame, will play as soloist with the orchestra Beethoven's Third Concerto in C Minor. Pierre Monteux will conduct at these concerts Schumann's Second Symphony in C Major and, for its first performance in Boston, John Alden Carpenter's suite from his ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta." This work in its ballet form proved highly popular in each city where it was performed by the Chicago Opera Assn. last season.

RECORD FEB. 5.

WAGNER PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

The 38th Pension Fund concert will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock sharp, instead of the usual hour of 3:30. The program consists entirely of Wagner's music.

TRAV. FEB 5.

Wagner Concert Today

Attention is called to the earlier hour of the Pension Fund Concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall today at 3 o'clock sharp. A Wagner programme will be given. There will be an additional choral number in the Bacchanale which Wagner wrote for the first Paris performance of "Tannhauser," where a ballet was demanded. The chorus will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained by their director, Agide Jacchia. The complete programme consists of the prelude to "The Meistersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries from act 3, "The Valkyries," the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde" (in which the famous English horn solo will be played by Mr. Louis Speyer of the orchestra); and finally, the following excerpts from "The Ring," Seigfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock from the third act of "Siegfried," and the "Dawn and Rhine Journey" of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods."

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Feb. 11, and Saturday evening, Feb. 12, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's Second Symphony in C major, opus 61. A notable event will be the first performance in Boston of "The Birthday of the Infanta" in the form of an orchestral suite, arranged by the composer, John Alden Carpenter, from his ballet of the same name, based on the short story of Oscar Wilde.

As soloist at this pair of concerts Mischa Levitzki will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Third Pianoforte concerto in C minor.

POST. FEB 6.

SYMPHONY GIVES PENSION CONCERT

All-Wagner Program Stirs Great Enthusiasm

It would be difficult for the memory, not of the oldest inhabitant, perhaps, but of the most regular attendant at Symphony pension fund concerts, to recall a more exhilarating one than that of yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Reasons for this were: An all-Wagner program, not over long and consisting of not too heavily Wagnerian selections; playing by the orchestra with uncommon zest, vigor and freedom of spirit; an audience as big as those that greet famous tenors and soaring sopranos, a throng that was as enthusiastic over fine points of "Lohengrin," "Tristan" and "Nibelungan" music as those that mightily acclaim the deepest depths of sub-cellar bass or the steeple-heights of a coloratura climber.

The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was played with splendid dash, high good humor and plentiful power. After this in fine contrast came the delicately suggestive spiritual finesse of the "Lohengrin" prelude. The "Tannhaeuser" introduction and the Paris version of the bacchanale stirred the big assemblage to special vigor of applause. The effect of the wildly whirling bacchanale was heightened by an off-stage chorus of 30 women's voices from the Cecilia Society trained by Agide Jacchia.

The Valkyries never rode with more fierce abandon or on more weirdly whistling winds than in the orchestra's playing of their ride from "Die Walkuere."

Sometimes portions of "Tristan und Isolde" fail to rouse more than languid interest. This time the introduction to the third act with the plaintive piping of the shepherd boy was a marked exception. Both the orchestra and Louis Speyer, who played the pastoral solo on his English horn, were acclaimed again and again.

The concert ended—magnificently with the beauties of Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's rock, dawn, Siegfried's Rhine journey and the ponderous finale of "Gotterdaemmerung."

HERALD. FEB. 7.

HERALD

ess New York City

1921

Boston Symphony Plays.

The last except one this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thursday evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. There was no novelty in the programme, but all the works given were enjoyed. They were Beethoven's first symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," after Hugo's poem, with the piano solo played by Robert Schmitz; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer," and for the final number Liszt's "Tasso." The orchestra gave a generally good performance of the Beethoven symphony. It might have had more tonal smoothness, but the balance and precision were good and the spirit excellent.

NEWS FEB 2 1921 L

Baltimore, Md.

TO BE A SOLOIST TOMORROW

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Lyric tomorrow night. She will sing an aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Pepuis le Jour," from Carpentier's "Louise."

HERALD

Washington, D. C.

FEB 2 1921 L

DUAL MUSIC BILL DELIGHTS LARGE AUDIENCE HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra with Hulda Lashanka Proves Hit.

Program.

Overture in the Italian Style in C major ....Shubert

Op. 170

Symphony in G major, "Military"..Hayden

(B. & H. No. 11)

I. Adagio; Allegro.

II. Allegretto.

III. Menuetto; Trio.

IV. Finale: Presto.

Aria, "Ah! lo so," from "The Magic Flute"........................Mozart

Air, "Depuis le jour," from "Louis".... ....Chaarpentier

Suite Francaise, in D major..Roger-Ducasse

I. Ouverture: Tres decide.

II. Bourree; Pas vite et tres rythme.

III. Recitatif et air; Tres declame. Plus lent; lentement.

IV. Menuet vif: Tres decide; Tranquille.

Soloist, Hulda Lashanska.

O. SUN

Baltimore, Md.

LYRIC

The Boston Orchestra And Hulda Lashanska.

The Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, which played again last evening at the Lyric, is fast regaining its prewar finesse and distinction. It gave a brilliant but peculiarly delicate rendition of the charming little first symphony of Beethoven, a work that seems to be engagingly Mozartian in intent and definitely reminiscent of Haydn, but which is nevertheless characterized by a somewhat greater profundity than is to be found in the writings of those masters. The supreme grace of the Beethoven work and its melodic charm were beautifully indicated in Mr. Monteux's reading and delighted one of the largest audiences that has as yet gathered to enjoy this particular orchestral series.

The program as a whole was well balanced and varied, the principal work of the evening being the great Debussy tone poem "Le Mer," a composition that makes supreme demands upon the technical facility of the players. This unusual suite, so richly characterized by mood and so frankly sensuous in its appeal, portrays with great splashes of tone and infinite orchestral device the restlessness and constantly changing quality but insistent vitality of the ocean. It is a work of broadly rhythmic feeling, replete with broken melodies couched in the terms of the whole-tone scale, rich in unusual progressions and resolutions. It is music, moreover, that from one point of view is extraordinarily monotonous, yet at the same time it is frankly stimulating, nervous and often extremely brilliant in effect and, curiously enough, faintly delicately Oriental in spirit. It is an imaginative work that has all the beauty of some rich tapestry, but one in which the design is never very clearly indicated. A different and amazing composition, in fine, that was superbly played. The program also included the rarely heard "Faust" overture of Wagner.

The assisting artist was Hulda Lashanska, a soprano of rare distinction, who sang two arias with orchestral accompaniment, Pamina's tragic song, "Ah! lo so," from Mozart's "Magic Flute," and "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's "Louise." Mme. Lashanska is an unusually fine artist, with a beautifully placed voice, who phrases with knowledge and whose performance is marked always by the most perfect taste. She sings, moreover, with fine authority, and if her tones in the Mozart work were not consistently round, this suggestion of thinness had entirely disappeared by the time she reached the great "Louise" aria. This she gave with really extraordinary beauty of tone and the deepest sympathy and understanding. Indeed, she interpreted this famous work exquisitely, giving it mystic, introspective values that were particularly satisfying.

J. O. L.

---

h 1921 M

WS NEWS.

altimore, Md.

Its Old Prestige Regained

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard At Its Best At The Lyric Wednesday Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in giving its fourth concert of the season Wednesday at the Lyric, presented one of the most, if not the most interesting program of its series. The soloist was Hulda Lashanske.

Under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, the famous organization has certainly regained its former prestige and high standing, and it seems a pity that, by not fully recognizing the fact, the public is depriving itself of enjoying one of the greatest musical treats of the season. The opening work, Beethoven's Sym. No. 1, in C major, received a remarkably vivid, striking and polished interpretation. Under the direction of Mr. Monteux, the impression immediately produced was that of listening to a master composition. The entire symphony is so fresh, so full of life, vigor and melody. There is no sense of striving after effect, the whole being perfectly natural and spontaneous. And the presentation was a masterly portrayal of Beethoven in his earlier days. The entire work was played with dignity, force and a delicate, yet thorough comprehension of the composer's scheme. Each movement was delightfully given, while the bright, sparkling humor of the final movement was wonderfully illustrated.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" received a strong and convincing interpretation in the delivery of which the orchestral intentions of the composer were forcibly delineated.

The Debussy "La Mer" is supposed to be descriptive of the sea in its various and every-changing moods. Clever as an exploitation of orchestral effect, but somewhat discordant for Nature, even in her most angry moments. The work showed occasional suggestions of the influence of Wagner, but without his powers of imagery.

Madame Lashanska is an artist supreme in her art. Presenting an aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and an air from Carpentier's 'Louise," the singer disclosed the possession of a voice rich and sympathetic in quality, extensive in compass and of an effective knowledge of how to use it in all registers to the greatest advantage. There was a charm, a fascinating [illegible] her singing, due not alone to the beautiful quality of her voice, but also to the air of refinement with which she endowed her performance. It was singing for art's sake with no divergence from the straight and narrow path demanded by true art. And so felt the discriminating audience, for the tribute accorded to her at the close of her solos was long continued, unanimous and heartfelt.

W. G. O.

From

TIMES

New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to New York yesterday and gave its first concert in the evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Monteux's program included Beethoven's first symphony, César Franck's symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, "Les Djinns," Debussy's three symphonic sketches "La Mer" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso."

The symphony was charmingly played, crispy and with fine tone and shading. So played it still gives pleasure in the hearing, without the necessity of deciding whether it is "true Beethoven"; whether it is original; how far it is derived from Haydn and Mozart; whether liking it necessarily goes beyond the music itself and involves, in the phase of Mr. Hale's program note, belief in "the plenary inspiration of a great composer."

César Franck's symphonic poem is not among the most frequently played of his works. For one thing, it requires some self-abnegation on the part of the pianist, who has a short but difficult piece to play and but little opportunity to shine as a soloist; for the piano, while more than an orchestral instrument, has hardly an independent part. For another, the work seems somewhat tentative—more an experiment in color, instrumental and harmonic, than the development of strongly individual musical ideas. As such it has a rich and delicate beauty, and its performance gave enjoyment. Mr. Schmitz's playing of the piano part was brilliant and graceful.

There never was so deep an impression made by Debussy's sketches of the sea as by some of his other compositions for orchestra. Now that the method of expression is no longer new, the music seems to have shrunk in significance. How far inferior it is, for instance, in value to the prelude of "The Afternoon of a Faun!" This music summons up little of the sea. Its substance seems to lay thin, its orchestral color patchy. A few passages delight with their tonalities still fresh, but the composer's success seems to have been intermittent.

From

STANDARD UNION FEB 6 1921 A

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music In Manhattan

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, yesterday afternoon, played the Dvorak D minor symphony (heard in Brooklyn the evening before), "Two Passacaglias" by Cyril Scott, Roger-Ducasse's French Suite in D major and Wagner's "Faust" overture.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From FEB 4 1921 A

Morning Telegraph

New York

BEETHOVEN PROGRAM PLAYED AT CARNEGIE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Next to Last Concert to Be Given Here.

The first of the last pair of concerts to be given in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall last evening with Pierre Monteux directing this splendid body of visiting musicians.

The program presented Beethoven's "First Symphony in C major," "Two Passacaglias" by Cyril Scott, Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," and Cesar Franck's "Les Djinns," based on the Victor Hugo poem, with the piano solo played by E. Robert Schmitz.

As proof of the popularity of Mr. Monteux and his orchestra among New Yorkers, Carnegie Hall was practically sold out before the doors were opened to an audience that was appreciative and enthusiastic. The last concert of the series will be held this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, when Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" overture will be rendered.

Mr. Carpenter's Ballet-Music for the First Times — A "Wagner-Programme" from the Symphony Orchestra—The Cleveland Orchestra Comes — A Novel Sonata of Debussy—Mr. Levitzki and Mr. Ganz as Pianists—Mme. Raisa in Miscellany—Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Laurent for Young People

ELEVEN months ago, the Chicago Opera Company announced a single performance in Boston of Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta"—the first considerable venture by an American composer of distinctive place into such music of the theatre. It was to be mimed and danced by Mr. Bolm and an able cast, to be clothed in Spanish settings and dresses of the time and the courts of Velasquez, as designed by Robert Jones. Mischances defeated arrangements and there was no subsequent effort to renew them. Accordingly, Mr. Carpenter's music will be heard for the first times here at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in the form of a Suite put together by the composer himself. Fortunately, it omits little. After an Introduction, the Infanta and her train enter to her birthday party. Other children come as guests; servants display the gifts in stately fashion. There are dances for the children themselves and for gypsies; a miniature and fantastic bullfight besides. From nowhere comes a dwarf; like no other he dances; deluded, he believes he has won the Infanta's eye and, maybe, heart. A mirror discloses to him his own deformity and ugliness. Under the shock of disillusion, he dies. The princess is grieved; but more she is puzzled. So run "argument" and action, to a reflecting, characterizing music that yet speaks for itself in the concert-hall. It is written with Mr. Carpenter's manifold command of symphonic means and with his usual fineness and freshness of imagination. It gilds the suggesting story by Wilde; it discovers new abilities in the composer. There is promise, then, in the Suite of rare interest and as rare satisfaction. For the rest, Mr. Monteux will begin the concerts with Schumann's Symphony in C major—the symphony of happy wedlock—and end them with Beethoven's Piano-Concerto in C minor, the third in the series, nowadays seldom heard. In it Mr. Levitzki will play the solo-part. The music invites his clarity, surety, finesse and elegance.

For the first time in four years the Symphony Orchestra will undertake a "Wagner-Concert"—tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, beginning by exception at three o'clock; while as heretofore on such occasions the receipts will go to the Pension Fund for retired or disabled players. The programme traverses: the Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhaüser"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Valkyrs' Ride from "Die Walküre"; Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock. Dawn, and Siegfried's Journey on the Rhine from the "Ring" operas. In the fragment of "Tristan," Mr. Speyer will play the desolate melody for English horn; in the Bacchanale from "Tannhaüser," a women's choir from The Cecilia will be audible, but invisible. It is long since such an array of Wagner's music has been heard in Boston, and if we are to have him at all, it must be in the concert-hall. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra should be variously eloquent.

Two numbers from Wagner stand also on the programme of the concert by the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders' Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening next—the overture to "Tannhaüser" and the Valkyrs' Ride. The chosen symphony is the second of Dvoràk lately heard and liked in Boston. For solo numbers, Mr. Schroeder, the violoncellist, will play Böllman's "Symphonic Variations" and Bruch's version of the liturgical Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrei."

TRAN, Feb. 5

The 38th Pension Fund concert will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon at three o'clock sharp instead of the usual hour of 3.30. The program, consisting entirely of Wagner's music, follows: Rrelude to "The Meistersingers," Prelude to "Lohengrin," Overture to "Tannhauser" and Bacchanale (the chorus to be taken by members of the Cecilia Society trained by their director, Agide Jacchia), the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyries," Prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," with English horn solo by Mr. Louis Speyer of the orchestra, and excerpts from "The Ring," including "Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey."

At the 14th pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 11 and 12, Mischa Levitzki, the young Russian pianist of steadily rising fame, will play as soloist with the orchestra Beethoven's Third Concerto in C Minor. Pierre Monteux will conduct at these concerts Schumann's Second Symphony in C Major and, for its first performance in Boston, John Alden Carpenter's suite from his ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta." This work in its ballet form proved highly popular in each city where it was performed by the Chicago Opera Assn. last season.

RECORD FEB. 5.

WAGNER PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND

The 38th Pension Fund concert will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock sharp, instead of the usual hour of 3:30. The program consists entirely of Wagner's music.

TRAV. FEB. 5.

Wagner Concert Today

Attention is called to the earlier hour of the Pension Fund Concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall today at 3 o'clock sharp. A Wagner programme will be given. There will be an additional choral number in the Bacchanale which Wagner wrote for the first Paris performance of "Tannhauser," where a ballet was demanded. The chorus will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained by their director, Agide Jacchia. The complete programme consists of the prelude to "The Meistersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries from act 3, "The Valkyries," the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde" (in which the famous English horn solo will be played by Mr. Louis Speyer of the orchestra); and finally, the following excerpts from "The Ring," Seigfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock from the third act of "Siegfried," and the "Dawn and Rhine Journey" of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods."

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Feb. 11, and Saturday evening, Feb. 12, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's Second Symphony in C major, opus 61. A notable event will be the first performance in Boston of "The Birthday of the Infanta" in the form of an orchestral suite, arranged by the composer, John Alden Carpenter, from his ballet of the same name, based on the short story of Oscar Wilde.

As soloist at this pair of concerts Mischa Levitzki will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Third Pianoforte concerto in C minor.

POST. FEB 6.

SYMPHONY GIVES PENSION CONCERT

All-Wagner Program Stirs Great Enthusiasm

It would be difficult for the memory, not of the oldest inhabitant, perhaps, but of the most regular attendant at Symphony pension fund concerts, to recall a more exhilarating one than that of yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Reasons for this were: An all-Wagner program, not over long and consisting of not too heavily Wagnerian selections; playing by the orchestra with uncommon zest, vigor and freedom of spirit; an audience as big as those that greet famous tenors and soaring sopranos, a throng that was as enthusiastic over fine points of "Lohengrin," "Tristan" and "Nibelungan" music as those that mightily acclaim the deepest depths of sub-cellar bass or the steeple-heights of a coloratura climber.

The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was played with splendid dash, high good humor and plentiful power. After this in fine contrast came the delicately suggestive spiritual finesse of the "Lohengrin" prelude. The "Tannhaeuser" introduction and the Paris version of the bacchanale stirred the big assemblage to special vigor of applause. The effect of the wildly whirling bacchanale was heightened by an off-stage chorus of 30 women's voices from the Cecilia Society trained by Agide Jacchia.

The Valkyries never rode with more fierce abandon or on more weirdly whistling winds than in the orchestra's playing of their ride from "Die Walkuere."

Sometimes portions of "Tristan und Isolde" fail to rouse more than languid interest. This time the introduction to the third act with the plaintive piping of the shepherd boy was a marked exception. Both the orchestra and Louis Speyer, who played the pastoral solo on his English horn, were acclaimed again and again.

The concert ended—magnificently with the beauties of Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's rock, dawn, Siegfried's Rhine journey and the ponderous finale of "Gotterdaemmerung."

HERALD. FEB. 7.

HERALD

ess New York City

Boston Symphony Plays.

The last except one this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thursday evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. There was no novelty in the programme, but all the works given were enjoyed. They were Beethoven's first symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," after Hugo's poem, with the piano solo played by Robert Schmitz; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer," and for the final number Liszt's "Tasso." The orchestra gave a generally good performance of the Beethoven symphony. It might have had more tonal smoothness, but the balance and precision were good and the spirit excellent.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

TO BE A SOLOIST TOMORROW

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Lyric tomorrow night. She will sing an aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Pepuis le Jour," from Carpentier's "Louise."

HERALD

Washington, D. C.

DUAL MUSIC BILL DELIGHTS LARGE AUDIENCE HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra with Hulda Lashanka Proves Hit.

Program.

Overture in the Italian Style in C major ....Shubert

Op. 170

Symphony in G major, "Military"..Hayden (B. & H. No. 11)

- I. Adagio; Allegro.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Menuetto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Presto.

Aria, "Ah! lo so," from "The Magic Flute"..Mozart

Air, "Depuis le jour," from "Louis".... ....Chaarpentier

Suite Francaise, in D major...Roger-Ducasse

- I. Ouverture: Tres decide.
- II. Bourree; Pas vite et tres rythme.
- III. Recitatif et air. Tres declame. Plus lent; lentement.
- IV. Menuet vif: Tres decide; Tranquille.

Soloist, Hulda Lashanska.

G. SUN

Baltimore, Md.

LYRIC

The Boston Orchestra And Hulda Lashanska.

The Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, which played again last evening at the Lyric, is fast regaining its prewar finesse and distinction. It gave a brilliant but peculiarly delicate rendition of the charming little first symphony of Beethoven, a work that seems to be engagingly Mozartian in intent and definitely reminiscent of Haydn, but which is nevertheless characterized by a somewhat greater profundity than is to be found in the writings of those masters. The supreme grace of the Beethoven work and its melodic charm were beautifully indicated in Mr. Monteux's reading and delighted one of the largest audiences that has as yet gathered to enjoy this particular orchestral series.

The program as a whole was well balanced and varied, the principal work of the evening being the great Debussy tone poem "Le Mer," a composition that makes supreme demands upon the technical facility of the players. This unusual suite, so richly characterized by mood and so frankly sensuous in its appeal, portrays with great splashes of tone and infinite orchestral device the restlessness and constantly changing quality but insistent vitality of the ocean. It is a work of broadly rhythmic feeling, replete with broken melodies couched in the terms of the whole-tone scale, rich in unusual progressions and resolutions. It is music, moreover, that from one point of view is extraordinarily monotonous, yet at the same time it is frankly stimulating, nervous and often extremely brilliant in effect and, curiously enough, faintly delicately Oriental in spirit. It is an imaginative work that has all the beauty of some rich tapestry, but one in which the design is never very clearly indicated. A different and amazing composition, in fine, that was superbly played. The program also included the rarely heard "Faust" overture of Wagner.

The assisting artist was Hulda Lashanska, a soprano of rare distinction, who sang two arias with orchestral accompaniment, Pamina's tragic song, "Ah! lo so," from Mozart's "Magic Flute," and "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's "Louise." Mme. Lashanska is an unusually fine artist, with a beautifully placed voice, who phrases with knowledge and whose performance is marked always by the most perfect taste. She sings, moreover, with fine authority, and if her tones in the Mozart work were not consistently round, this suggestion of thinness had entirely disappeared by the time she reached the great "Louise" aria. This she gave with really extraordinary beauty of tone and the deepest sympathy and understanding. Indeed, she interpreted this famous work exquisitely, giving it mystic, introspective values that were particularly satisfying.

J. O. L.

WS NEWS.

altimore, Md.

Its Old Prestige Regained

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard At Its Best At The Lyric Wednesday Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in giving its fourth concert of the season Wednesday at the Lyric, presented one of the most, if not the most interesting program of its series. The soloist was Hulda Lashanske.

Under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, the famous organization has certainly regained its former prestige and high standing, and it seems a pity that, by not fully recognizing the fact, the public is depriving itself of enjoying one of the greatest musical treats of the season. The opening work, Beethoven's Sym. No. 1, in C major, received a remarkably vivid, striking and polished interpretation. Under the direction of Mr. Monteux, the impression immediately produced was that of listening to a master composition. The entire symphony is so fresh, so full of life, vigor and melody. There is no sense of striving after effect, the whole being perfectly natural and spontaneous. And the presentation was a masterly portrayal of Beethoven in his earlier days. The entire work was played with dignity, force and a delicate, yet thorough comprehension of the composer's scheme. Each movement was delightfully given, while the bright, sparkling humor of the final movement was wonderfully illustrated.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" received a strong and convincing interpretation in the delivery of which the orchestral intentions of the composer were forcibly delineated.

The Debussy "La Mer" is supposed to be descriptive of the sea in its various and every-changing moods. Clever as an exploitation of orchestral effect, but somewhat discordant for Nature, even in her most angry moments. The work showed occasional suggestions of the influence of Wagner, but without his powers of imagery.

Madame Lashanska is an artist supreme in her art. Presenting an aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and an air from Carpentier's 'Louise," the singer disclosed the possession of a voice rich and sympathetic in quality, extensive in compass and of an effective knowledge of how to use it in all registers to the greatest advantage. There was a charm, a fascination in her singing, due not alone to the beautiful quality of her voice, but also to the air of refinement with which she endowed her performance. It was singing for art's sake with no divergence from the straight and narrow path demanded by true art. And so felt the discriminating audience, for the tribute accorded to her at the close of her solos was long continued, unanimous and heartfelt.

W. G. O.

From

TIMES

New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to New York yesterday and gave its first concert in the evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Monteux's program included Beethoven's first symphony, César Franck's symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, "Les Djinns," Debussy's three symphonic sketches "La Mer" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso."

The symphony was charmingly played, crispy and with fine tone and shading. So played it still gives pleasure in the hearing, without the necessity of deciding whether it is "true Beethoven"; whether it is original; how far it is derived from Haydn and Mozart; whether liking it necessarily goes beyond the music itself and involves, in the phase of Mr. Hale's program note, belief in "the plenary inspiration of a great composer."

César Franck's symphonic poem is not among the most frequently played of his works. For one thing, it requires some self-abnegation on the part of the pianist, who has a short but difficult piece to play and but little opportunity to shine as a soloist; for the piano, while more than an orchestral instrument, has hardly an independent part. For another, the work seems somewhat tentative—more an experiment in color, instrumental and harmonic, than the development of strongly individual musical ideas. As such it has a rich and delicate beauty, and its performance gave enjoyment. Mr. Schmitz's playing of the piano part was brilliant and graceful.

There never was so deep an impression made by Debussy's sketches of the sea as by some of his other compositions for orchestra. Now that the method of expression is no longer new, the music seems to have shrunk in significance. How far inferior it is, for instance, in value to the prelude of "The Afternoon of a Faun!" This music summons up little of the sea. Its substance seems to lay thin, its orchestral color patchy. A few passages delight with their tonalities still fresh, but the composer's success seems to have been intermittent.

STANDARD UNION FEB 6 1921

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music In Manhattan

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, yesterday afternoon, played the Dvorak D minor symphony (heard in Brooklyn the evening before), "Two Passacaglias" by Cyril Scott, Roger-Ducasse's French Suite in D major and Wagner's "Faust" overture.

From

Morning Telegraph

New York

BEETHOVEN PROGRAM PLAYED AT CARNEGIE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Next to Last Concert to Be Given Here.

The first of the last pair of concerts to be given in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall last evening with Pierre Monteux directing this splendid body of visiting musicians.

The program presented Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, "Two Passacaglias" by Cyril Scott, Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," and César Franck's "Les Djinns," based on the Victor Hugo poem, with the piano solo played by E. Robert Schmitz.

As proof of the popularity of Mr. Monteux and his orchestra among New Yorkers, Carnegie Hall was practically sold out before the doors were opened, and an audience that was appreciative and enthusiastic. The last concert of the series will be held this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, when Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" overture will be rendered.

Regained

Its Best At [illegible] Lyric

ing its fourth concert of th of the most, if not the most was Hulda Lashanske.

d a delicate, yet thorough ension of the composer's Each movement was delight-ven, while the bright, sparkmor of the final movement nderfully illustrated.
er's "Faust Overture" re-strong and convincing inten in the delivery of which the al intentions of the composer rcibly delineated.
ebussy "La Mer" is supposed escriptive of the sea in its
and every-changing moods,
s an exploitation of orchesct, but somewhat discordant re, even in her most angry
The work showed occaggestions of the influence of but without his powers of

e Lashanska is an artist su-her art. Presenting an aria art's "Magic Flute" and an Carpentier's 'Louise," the sclosed the possession of a n and sympathetic in qual-sive in compass and of an knowledge of how to use it isters to the greatest ad-was a charm, a faser singing, due not beautiful quality of her so to the air of refine-h which she endowed her nce. It was singing for art's
th no divergence from the and narrow path demanded art. And so felt the disng audience, for the tribute to her at the close of her long continued, unanimous rtfelt.
W. G. O.

---

4 1921 A ng Telegraph
York

OVEN PROGRAM
YED AT CARNEGIE

mphony Orchestra Heard xt to Last Concert to Be Given Here.

of the last pair of concerts in New York this season by Symphony Orchestra took rnegie Hall last evening with nteux directing this splendid ting musicians.
ram presented Beethoven's hony in C major, "Two Pas-Cyril Scott, Debussy's syme, "The Sea," and Cesar es Djinns," based on the Vic-oem, with the piano solo
E. Robert Schmitz. of the popularity of Mr.
nd his orchestra among New arnegie Hall was practically ore the doors were opened to that was appreciative and
The last concert of the se-held this afternoon at Car-when Dvorak's Second Sym-D minor, Suite Francaise by sse, and Wagner's "Faust" ll be rendered.

AN 4 1921 A vening Globe
New York

Music.

oscanini in Notable Concert at Carnegie Hall.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The lines of communication between rturo Toscanini and the great New ork public seemed not to be functioning very well yesterday. Carnegie Hall was by no means filled last evening for his concert for the benefit of the Italian Child Welfare League. And yet no concert given in that hall has better deserved a sold out house. The Scala Orchestra, too, which Mr. Toscanini conducts, proved its worth as it could not last Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Opera House.

O fugitive Metropolitan acoustics! They always stampede off and leave an orchestra playing up on the stage there tonally high and dry. I had heard the London Symphony under Nikisch there, the Boston Symphony under Muck, the Metropolitan orchestra under Toscanini himself, the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra under Messager, and every story was the same: nothing really sounded. Being that informed, no listener ought to have made a mistake about the present Scala Orchestra. Never again shall I speak of it as "mediocre." May my sins be upon my diminished head!

An Excellent Band.

No orchestra that boasts such an assemblage of second violins, such rich and solid basses, so trustworthy a brass section, including a first trumpet that would wake a stone and a drummer nothing short of miraculous can, given an opportunity in any proper auditorium, by any stretch of the imagination be called "mediocre." And my list of specifications does not, by any means, imply that the other elements of the band are inferior.

no mistaking that corybantes danced the finale, not any peasant horde of mud-shod clodhoppers!

The remainder of the programme consisted of Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," done in matchless fashion; the symphonic poem "Juventus" of Victor de Sabata, and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. Young Signor de Sabata's symphonic poem on the poignant subject of youth was new here and of uncommon interest. Like the rest of the young Italians its author is a master of the technic of composition and orchestration. These young men are building as the Romans built. "Juventus" does not nestle in the shadow of the Wagner rock as do the much played fountains of Signor Respighi. Signor de Sabata's material is sufficiently his own, and he makes highly skilful use of it. The performance was superb.

As for Rossini's thrice familiar overture, that was a genuine re-creation. After a finely eloquent delivery of the 'cello solo and a virtuoso exhibition by the wood wind, Mr. Toscanini led the galoppade in a way that was not only simply hair-raising, but an artistic wonder. Let no one imagine again that the overture to "William Tell" is not a great work, a masterpiece, because as a rule it figures in so-called "popular" concerts, led carelessly and played vulgarly.

Ovations for all the audience was worth, followed the Seventh Symphony, and against the end of the programme. These Toscanini concerts are a dispensation of new life in a country populous, busy, and—blue.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From WORLD,
New York City

NEW YORK SYMPHONY COVERS ITALIAN MUSIC

Devotes Concert of Historical Cycle to It—Boston Orchestra Also Heard.

Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon gave the eighth concert in their historical cycle.

The programme, devoted to Italian music from the sixteenth century to the present day, embraced dances of the sixteenth century by Molinaro (1599), and Galilei (1533-91); Rossini's overture to "William Tell;" a Sinigaglia (1868) overture; Respighi's (1879) poem, "Fountains of Rome;" Casella's suite, "The Venetian Convent"—three movements—and de Sabata's symphonic poem, "Juventus". Several of these Mr. Damrosch had planned to play here for the first time on this occasion, but Arturo Toscanini had included them on his own historical programme given recently.

It proved an interesting procedure yesterday and the contrast between the old melodious composers and the young moderns was striking. Miss Henrietta Conrad sang a soprano obbligato in the barcarolle movement of the Casella suite.

In the evening the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux's baton, offered Beethoven's First Symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les

---

Robert Schmitz [illegible] soloist; Debussy's "La Mer" and Liszt's poem "Tasso." The unusual thing about the concert was the vacant seats: a novel experience here for the Boston men. The virtuosity of the band was finely displayed in the Debussy num-

---

LEVITZKI, SOLOIST

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Monteux will conduct Schumann's Second Symphony in C major, Opus 61. A notable event will be the first performance in Boston of "The Birthday of the Infanta," in the form of an orchestral suite, arranged by Mr. Carpenter, from his ballet based on the story of Oscar Wilde. The suite describes the entrance of the Infanta, children's dance, arrival of the guests, the gypsy dance, the bull fight, entrance of the dwarf, the fatal dance, the final tragedy. As soloist Mischa Levitzki will play Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto in C minor. The son of an American citizen of Russian extraction, he was born near Kieff in 1898, during a visit of his parents to their native country. He exhibited great talent as a boy and first studied the violin. He soon showed his preference for the piano. His early training was in New York; he completed his studies in Berlin under Erno Dohnanyi. Four years later he made his debut in Berlin and toured Belgium. His instantaneous success led to his playing in Vienna, Leipsic, Budapest and Christiania. He then made his first professional appearance in New York Oct. 17, 1916.

WAGNER CONCERT TODAY

Attention is called to the earlier hour of the Pension Fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall today at 3 o'clock sharp. A fine Wagner program will be given. There will be an additional choral number when, in the "Bacchanale," which Wagner wrote for the first Paris performance of "Tannhaeuser," where a ballet was demanded, the chorus will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained by its director, Mr. Jacchia. The complete program consists of the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhaeuser," the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Act 3, "The Valkyries"; the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde" (English horn solo by Mr. Speyer), and excerpts from "The Ring": Siegfried's "Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock" from "Siegfried," and the "Dawn and Rhine Journey" of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods."

HERALD. FEB. 6.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteaux, conductor, gave its pension fund concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a Wagner programme. This programme attracted a large and a very enthusiastic audience. It would have surprised Wagner, no doubt, in his lifetime, if he had been told that some day his music, despised and derided by his contemporaries, would be as popular a drawing card as an orchestra could have. And the Boston Symphony, by long experience, as also by the skill of its present conductor, is admirably equipped to play this superb and sonorous music. The programme consisted of well-known compositions, now musical thrice told tales, yet never old, never less than exciting and impressive in the last degree. The compositions were the "Meistersinger" overture, the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Tannhauser" overture, "Ride of the Valkyries," introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," and excerpts from "The Ring of the Nibelungen." The attention of the audience, the sweeping enthusiasm after each number, told more than words of what the music had meant to them.

POST. FEB. 7.

WAGNER PROGRAM AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Plays to Capacity Audience

People's Orchestra Wins Vigorous Applause in Convention Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the second of its three concerts in aid of the pension fund yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The capacity audience and enthusiastic applause were partly a tribute to Wagner, excerpts from whose music dramas filled the entire program. It was a tradition for some years before the war to play a Wagner program at one of the pension fund concerts. It was also a tradition that the orchestra should be on its mettle on such occasions and better if possible the high standard of performance set at the regular concerts.

Yesterday the orchestra played much as though it were a "special Wagner night" at the Pops, where many rehearsals are an impossibility. Those skeptical listeners who have not heard such excellent recent performances as that of Beethoven's First Symphony on Jan 21 must have formed the impression that the absolute precision and euphony in ensemble which were a chief glory of the old Symphony Orchestra are absent in the present band.

The brass section were the most obvious offenders. The chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Agide Jacchia, sang its few measures off stage acceptably.

GLOBE. FEB. 7.

Wagner Program

Attention is called to the earlier hour of the pension fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall today at 3 o'clock sharp. A splendid Wagner program will be given. There will be an additional choral number when, in the bacchanale which Wagner wrote for the first Paris performance of "Tannhauser," where a ballet was demanded, the chorus part will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society.

The complete program consists of the prelude to "The Meistersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the oberture to "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries, from Act 3 of "The Valkyries," the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," and the following excerpts from "The Ring": Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock from "Siegfried," and the "Dawn and Rhine Journey" of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods."

Symphony Program

At the Symphony concerts this week Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's second symphony in C major; "The Birthday of the Infanta," an orchestral suite, by John Alden Carpenter, and, with Mischa Levitzki as soloist, the third Beethoven concerto for piano and orchestra.

ADVERTISER. FEB. 6.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert This Afternoon

Mr Monteux has planned for today's Symphony concert in aid of the pension fund, a program which illustrates the best work of Wagner from the early days of "Tannhauser" to the completion of the "Ring." It includes fragments from every one of his chief works except "Parsifal" and "Rheingold," in each case complete enough in themselves to more than justify concert performance.

Those who like to hear the Symphony Orchestra occasionally, but do not care to buy season tickets have this afternoon their opportunity to hear it at prices less than those charged for the few available tickets for the regular concerts, in a program any one who cares at all for music ought to enjoy.

Concert and Recital Programs for the Current Week

SYMPHONY HALL. Today at 3. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor. Second concert in aid of the Pension Fund. Wagner program. Preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin"; Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure"; Prelude to act 3 of "Tristan und Isolde"; "Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock," from "Siegfried"; "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Gotterdammerung." A chorus of women from the Cecilia Society, trained by Agide Jacchia, will assist in the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." Attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3, not at the usual hour, 3:30.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 14th program Second Symphony, in C major, Schumann; Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," Carpenter (first time in Boston); Third Piano Concerto, in C minor, Beethoven. Solo'st, Mischa Levitski, pianist.

GLOBE FEB. 6.

NEW STRAUS SUITE WELL PLAYED

By FRED J. McISAAC.

One of the most charming and unusual features of a symphony program for many months was the orchestral suite from Richard Strauss opera based on Molliere's play "Le Bourgeo in Gentilhomme." This work was first produced in 1913, but the war and the boycott on Strauss prevented us hearing it until the present time.

There is little of the furturist and cacophonous Strauss in this music. It was composed for an orchestra of thirty-six pieces, and Mr. Monteux dismissed most of his band to keep the work properly proportioned. Strauss had in mind the dainty, graceful airs of Rameau which go so well with Watteau costumes and the period of Molliere. Nothing could keep him from inventing curious and ingenious harmonics, but nobody who is familiar with his big tone poems would believe him so frank and obvious a melodist as he proved to be in these little dances, incidental music and humoresques. The performance was in every respect delightful. Monteux was in his element.

The Schumann symphony number two also received an admirable performance. Mischa Levitzki, the young pianist, was soloist, playing the Beethoven concerto in C minor. Levitzki has already given evidence of more talent than any of the younger set of players on the pianoforte and he furnished a brilliant and satisfying performance of the concerto yesterday.

AMER. FEB 12.

[86]

STRAUSS' NEW SUITE BY THE SYMPHONY

Enthusiastic Greeting Won by the Orchestra

Levitzki Adds to Reputation as a Solo Pianist

Yesterday's performance by the Symphony Orchestra, the first in America of the suite arranged during the war by Richard Strauss from the incidental music he wrote in 1912 for Hofmannsthal's "Der Burger als Edelmann" roused as much enthusiasm in the audience as it would have in 1913. Mr Monteux, who gave a painstakingly sympathetic interpretation of the new piece, was recalled three times at the end and made the orchestra stand to share the applause with him.

Those who remember former collaborations of composer and dramatist, like "Salome" and "Elektra," were disappointed if they hoped the new music would be in the vein of the old. There is a third collaborator this time, whose comic spirit the others have sought to catch.

The text is an adaptation of Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," the farcical comedy about a 17th century profiteer who sought to acquire the airs and graces then needed in "Society." In the new version the play serves an excuse for an opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," written and pereformed for the pleasure of M Jourdain's guests.

The su te is the most carefully simple and conscientiously light music ever composed. The orchestration, for only 35 performers, is a miracle of deftness and ingenuity. Each of the 16 strings has a separate part. The themes are all 18th century in style, prettily tuneful. The harmonies are no harsher than many used by Mozart.

Strauss nas seemingly tried to write such music as Mozart might have composed if he had lived in the 20th century. Nothing except spontaneity is lacking. The piece is far more successful than Ravel's recently played "Le Tombeau de Couperin" in recreating the spirit of a half-forgotten age.

Mischa Levitzki, who made his first appearance as soloist, again showed the sound musicianship and delicate taste that are winning him a great reputation in Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto. The music itself is not among the finest Beethoven wrote.

Schumann's Second Symphony has some beautiful music amid such tiresome padding and repetition. Mr Monteux and the orchestra gave frequent evidence of progress toward regaining old standards. Only by intelligent cooperation and endless pains by all concerned will the present orchestra come to equal the one the war shattered.

GLOBE FEB. 17

MUSIC

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given on February 11, was as follows: Schumann, second symphony, op. 61, in C major; Strauss, orchestral suite from "Der Bürger als Edelman"; Beethoven, concerto for piano and orchestra in C minor.

Strauss' suite was given for the first time in America. The opera from which it is drawn is based on Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The orchestra which Strauss employs is a small and curiously arranged one. The strings are limited to six violins, four violas, four violoncellos, and two double-basses. Each of these plays an individual part. The wind section consists of the usual number of instruments found in the scores of Mozart and Haydn save that the two flutes at times play the piccolo, the second oboe occasionally changes to the English horn and the second bassoon to the doube-bassoon. A trombone is also added. The piano has an important part and there are various instruments of percussion. Naturally there is an attempt in the music to suggest the atmosphere of the seventeenth century. The most successful portions of the suite in this regard are the overture and the music to accompany the entrance of Cleonte. However, this music is but an imitation of that of Lully and his contemporaries, and like all imitations it is never so good as the original. One feels that the composer is all the time saying to himself: "I must be simple, I must be naïve, I must be charming."

In consequence this music, in spite of its cleverness and apparent simplicity, gives the impression of a pose assumed for the time being. The music for the Fencing Master scarcely rises above the quality of much of the perfunctory melodramatic music which we are accustomed to hear in the theater. The music designed to accompany the dinner scene is intended, so we are informed by the program notes, to be humorous. Personally we are unable to find anything particularly humorous in a quotation from the "Rheingold" to accompany the fish course and the bleating of the sheep from "Don Quixote" to accompany the mutton. Of course the connection is obvious, but why are not certain other portions of the music explained? There are twitterings of the flute and clarinet which no doubt refer to the game, and other pages which would undoubtedly serve as an accompaniment to a platter of sausages; still one would like to be accurately informed as to these matters in order that a full æsthetic enjoyment of the music might be reached. The performance was wonderfully euphonious. It seems a pity that so much careful rehearsal was wasted on music of so little value. However, the performance served to show the catholicity of Mr. Monteux's taste and his unsparing devotion to the art of music, regardless of school or period. Schumann's symphony was given an inspired reading, in the true romantic spirit. Mischa Levitzki was the pianist in the Beethoven concerto.

MONITOR FEB. 12

14TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

HERALD FEB. 12

Excerpt from Strauss's Music to Moliere Comedy Much Applauded

BEETHOVEN WORK BRILLIANTLY GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2; Richard Strauss, Orchestral Suite from the music to Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (first time in this country); Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, C minor for piano (Mischa Levitzki, pianist).

The audience was not concerned with the question whether Strauss and Hugo von Hofmannsthal, the librettist, had done Moliere a deadly injury by their comedy-opera-burlesque — produced at Stuttgart in October, 1912. Nor was the audience interested in the fact that "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" section was dropped, like the boy Xury in "Robinson Cruso" when the revised version was performed at Berlin the next year. It listened to the Suite arranged by Strauss as purely concert music; listened and enjoyed it hugely, applauding enthusiastically after each movement; at the end recalling Mr. Monteux several times and insisting that the orchestra should share in the honor. Seldom has an unfamiliar musical composition been so warmly received in Symphony Hall.

This Suite is interesting in many ways; it bids for immediate popularity. It is curiously scored: 6 violins, 4 violas, 4 violoncellos, 2 double basses; 2 flutes (interchangeable with 2 piccolos), 2 oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons (one interchangeable with double bassoon), 2 horns, trumpet, trombone, piano, kettledrums, campanella, side drum, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, triangle, harp. With these instruments Strauss performs all manner of agreeable tricks.

As Lully wrote music for the first performance of Moliere's comedy in 1670, Strauss now and then attempts to reproduce the spirit of the ancient music, but he is whimsical in this, and is suddenly ultra-modern. He is reported as having said after he had completed his "Rosenkavalier": "Now I have written an opera in the manner of Mozart," but he could not write in that manner, greatly as he admires the composer of "The Marriage of Figaro"; nor can he content himself with imitating Lully. Would the Florentine recognize "The Minuet of Lully" played yesterday? It is delightful music but not in the 17th century manner.

The overture is sparkling with its pretty closing dance tune; the first Minuet, without any pretence of imitating Lully, is melodious and graceful; the "Entrance and Dance of Tailors" is gay. The more serious movements—if Strauss is ever serious in this Suite—are the charming Intermezzo, and the beautiful measures entitled "The Entrance of Cleonte." The Dinner Music with Dance of the Kitchen servants is the least engrossing portion of the Suite in spite of various musical eccentricities that might have been effective at the performance in Stuttgart. The Courante in the Suite was not played.

There are many measures that recall the "Rosenkavalier," especially the waltzes. As in other late works of Strauss, the comparative poverty of thematic invention is not wholly concealed by skilful juggling with the instruments; common place, even common melodic figures are not authoritatively embellished by strange blendings of instrumental timbers. It is not necessary to inquire whether the various movements suit the action in the theatre; when a Suite derived from stage music is played in a concert hall, the theatre, for which it was composed, no longer exists; it never existed.

The Suite was finely played by the small orchestra. A successful performance of this music demands not only humorous appreciation, spirit, dash, sentiment; it also demands at times a certain appropriate rollicking coarseness; at other times elegance; above all finenesses.

Mr. Monteux gave a spirited, even an exciting reading of Schumann's Allegros and Scherzo, but with the exception of the Introduction to the first movement and the Adagio, in which the romantic dreamer Schumann is revealed—these sections were eloquently performed—the Symphony has a[illegible]. And in this symphony more than [illegible] the other three the orchestration se[illegible] hopelessly crude, ineffective, distr[illegible] to the ear, while the musical cont[illegible]re seldom worthy of a more taste[illegible]ss.

The concert w[illegible]ng one. Some in the audience w[illegible]able to hear the last movement [illegible]hoven's Concerto. Perhaps they f[illegible] that the tea and buttered toast—[illegible]y with muffins—were growing [illegible] The withdrawal was not courteou[illegible] Mr. Levitzky, Mr. Monteux and th[illegible]rchestra, especially as the performan[illegible] was a brilliant one. Those who did not hear the final Rondo missed an admirable interpretation, conspicuous for crystalline clearness, surprising fleetness, with an ever-present sense of proportion. These qualities with the same musical intelligence in phrasing and in employment of tonal gradations marked the performance of the first Allegro, while the reading of the Largo was emotional without undue emphasis. We read in New York newspapers, when Mr. Levitzky recently played this concerto, that when he was more mature he would show greater depth of feeling. Thus was he patted on the head, as the circus girl by the ringmaster: "She rides well for one so young." But the music itself is not conspicuous for "depth" except to those who have turned the concerto into a fetish inhabited by a spirit. Deep musical emotion was not in fashion in the Vienna of 1800.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week comprises Vaughan Williams's "London" Symphony; Mozart's Concerto No. 6 for violin (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline."

Regained

At Its Best At Th Lyric ving its fourth concert of the e of the most, if not the most

was Hulda Lashanske.

nd a delicate, yet thorough hension of the composer's Each movement was delight- ven, while the bright, spark mor of the final movement nderfully illustrated.

er's "Faust Overture" re- strong and convincing inter- n in the delivery of which the al intentions of the composer rcibly delineated.

ebussy "La Mer" is supposed escriptive of the sea in its and every-changing moods. s an exploitation of orches- ct, but somewhat discordant re, even in her most angry The work showed occa- ggestions of the influence of but without his powers of

e Lashanska is an artist su-

her art. Presenting an aria zart's "Magic Flute" and an Carpentier's 'Louise,' the sclosed the possession of a n and sympathetic in qual- nsive in compass and of an knowledge of how to use it isters to the greatest ad- here was a charm, a fas- er singing, due not beautiful quality of her lso to the air of refine- th which she endowed her nce. It was singing for art's th no divergence from the and narrow path demanded art. And so felt the dis- ng audience, for the tribute to her at the close of her long continued, unanimous rtfeit.

W. G. O.

---

4 192

ng Telegraph
York

OVEN PROGRAM
YED AT CARNEGIE

mphony Orchestra Heard ext to Last Concert to Be Given Here.

of the last pair of concerts in New York this season by Symphony Orchestra took rnegie Hall last evening with nteux directing this splendid iting musicians. gram presented Beethoven's phony in C major, "Two Pas- by Cyril Scott, Debussy's sym- ite, "The Sea," and Cesar Les Djinns," based on the Vic- poem, with the piano solo E. Robert Schmitz. of the popularity of Mr. nd his orchestra among New arnegie Hall was practically fore the doors were opened to e that was appreciative and . The last concert of the se- held this afternoon at Car- when Dvorak's Second Sym- D minor, Suite Francaise by sse, and Wagner's "Faust" ill be rendered.

Djinns," for piano and orchestra, E. Robert Schmitz officiating as soloist; Debussy's "La Mer" and Liszt's poem "Tasso." The unusual thing about the concert was the vacant seats, a novel experience here for the Boston men. The virtuosity of the band was finely displayed in the Debussy number.

From
Evening Globe
New York

JAN 4 1921

Music.

Toscanini in Notable Concert at Carnegie Hall.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The lines of communication between Arturo Toscanini and the great New York public seemed not to be functioning very well yesterday. Carnegie Hall was by no means filled last evening for his concert for the benefit of the Italian Child Welfare League. And yet no concert given in that hall has better deserved a sold out house. The Scala Orchestra, too, which Mr. Toscanini conducts, proved its worth as it could not last Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Opera House.

O fugitive Metropolitan acoustics They always scamper off and leave an orchestra playing up on the stage there tonally high and dry. I had heard the London Symphony under Nikisch there, the Boston Symphony under Muck, the Metropolitan orchestra under Toscanini himself, the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra under Messager, and every story was the same nothing really sounded. Being thus informed, no listener ought to have made a mistake about the present Scala Orchestra. Never again shall I speak of it as "mediocre." May my sins be upon my diminished head!

An Excellent Band.

No orchestra that boasts such an assemblage of second violins, such rich and solid basses, so trustworthy a brass section, including a first trumpet that would wake a stone and a drummer nothing short of miraculous can, given an opportunity in any proper auditorium, by any stretch of the imagination be called "mediocre." And my list of specifications does not, by any means, imply that the other elements of the band are inferior.

no mistaking that corybantes danced the finale, not any peasant horde of mud-shod clodhoppers!

The remainder of the programme consisted of Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," done in matchless fashion; the symphonic poem "Juventus" of Victor de Sabata, and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. Young Signor de Sabata's symphonic poem on the poignant subject of youth was new here and of uncommon interest. Like the rest of the young Italians its author is a master of the technic of composition and orchestration. These young men are building as the Romans built. "Juventus" does not nestle in the shadow of the Wagner rock as do the much played fountains of Signor Respighi. Signor de Sabata's material is sufficiently his own, and he makes highly skilful use of it. The performance was superb.

As for Rossini's thrice familiar overture, that was a genuine re-creation. After a finely eloquent delivery of the 'cello solo and a virtuoso exhibition by the wood wind, Mr. Toscanini led the galoppade in a way that was not only simply hair-raising, but an artistic wonder. Let no one imagine again that the overture to "William Tell" is not a great work, a masterpiece, because as a rule it figures in so-called "popular" concerts, led carelessly and played vulgarly.

Ovations for all the audience was worth, followed the Seventh Symphony, and against the end of the programme. These Toscanini concerts are a dispensation of new life in a country populous, busy, and—blue.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From WORLD,
New York City

NEW YORK SYMPHONY COVERS ITALIAN MUSIC

Devotes Concert of Historical Cycle to It—Boston Orchestra Also Heard.

Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon gave the eighth concert in their historical cycle.

The programme, devoted to Italian music from the sixteenth century to the present day, embraced dances of the sixteenth century by Molinaro (1599), and Galilei (1533-91); Rossini's overture to "William Tell;" a Sinigaglia (1868) overture; Respighi's (1879) poem, "Fountains of Rome;" Casella's suite, "The Venetian Convent"—three movements—and de Sabata's symphonic poem, "Juventus". Several of these Mr. Damrosch had planned to play here for the first time on this occasion, but Arturo Toscanini had included them on his own historical programme given recently.

It proved an interesting procedure yesterday and the contrast between the old melodious composers and the young moderns was striking. Miss Henrietta Conrad sang a soprano obbligato in the barcarolle movement of the Casella suite.

In the evening the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux's baton, offered Beethoven's First Symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les

---

LEVITZKI, SOLOIST

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Monteux will conduct Schumann's Second Symphony in C major, Opus 61. A notable event will be the first performance in Boston of "The Birthday of the Infanta," in the form of an orchestral suite, arranged by Mr. Carpenter, from his ballet based on the story of Oscar Wilde. The suite describes the entrance of the Infanta, children's dance, arrival of the guests, the gypsy dance, the bull fight, entrance of the dwarf, the fatal dance, the final tragedy. As soloist Mischa Levitzki will play Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto in C minor. The son of an American citizen of Russian extraction, he was born near Kieff in 1898, during a visit of his parents to their native country. He exhibited great talent as a boy and first studied the violin. He soon showed his preference for the piano. His early training was in New York; he completed his studies in Berlin under Erno Dohnanyi. Four years later he made his debut in Berlin and toured Belgium. His instantaneous success led to his playing in Vienna, Leipsic, Budapest and Christiania. He then made his first professional appearance in New York Oct. 17, 1916.

WAGNER CONCERT TODAY

Attention is called to the earlier hour of the Pension Fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall today at 3 o'clock sharp. A fine Wagner program will be given. There will be an additional choral number when, in the "Bacchanale," which Wagner wrote for the first Paris performance of "Tannhaeuser," where a ballet was demanded, the chorus will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society, trained by its director, Mr. Jacchia. The complete program consists of the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhaeuser," the 'Ride of the Valkyries" from Act 3, "The Valkyries"; the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde" (English horn solo by Mr. Speyer), and excerpts from "The Ring": Siegfried's "Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock" from "Siegfried," and the "Dawn and Rhine Journey" of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods."

HERALD. FEB. 6.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteaux, conductor, gave its pension fund concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a Wagner programme. This programme attracted a large and a very enthusiastic audience. It would have surprised Wagner, no doubt, in his lifetime, if he had been told that some day his music, despised and derided by his contemporaries, would be as popular a drawing card as an orchestra could have. And the Boston Symphony, by long experience, as also by the skill of its present conductor, is admirably equipped to play this superb and sonorous music. The programme consisted of well-known compositions, now musical thrice told tales, yet never old, never less than exciting and impressive in the last degree. The compositions were the "Meistersinger" overture, the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Tannhauser" overture, "Ride of the Valkyries," introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," and excerpts from "The Ring of the Nibelungen." The attention of the audience, the sweeping enthusiasm after each number, told more than words of what the music had meant to them.

POST. FEB. 7.

WAGNER PROGRAM AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Plays to Capacity Audience

People's Orchestra Wins Vigorous Applause in Convention Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the second of its three concerts in aid of the pension fund yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The capacity audience and enthusiastic applause were partly a tribute to Wagner, excerpts from whose music dramas filled the entire program. It was a tradition for some years before the war to play a Wagner program at one of the pension fund concerts. It was also a tradition that the orchestra should be on its mettle on such occasions and better if possible the high standard of performance set at the regular concerts.

Yesterday the orchestra played much as though it were a "special Wagner night" at the Pops, where many rehearsals are an impossibility. Those skeptical listeners who have not heard such excellent recent performances as that of Beethoven's First Symphony on Jan 21 must have formed the impression that the absolute precision and euphony in ensemble which were a chief glory of the old Symphony Orchestra are absent in the present band.

The brass section were the most obvious offenders. The chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Agide Jacchia, sang its few measures off stage acceptably.

GLOBE. FEB. 7.

Wagner Program

Attention is called to the earlier hour of the pension fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall today at 3 o'clock sharp. A splendid Wagner program will be given. There will be an additional choral number when, in the bacchanale which Wagner wrote for the first Paris performance of "Tannhauser," where a ballet was demanded, the chorus part will be taken by members of the Cecilia Society.

The complete program consists of the prelude to "The Meistersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the oberture to "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries, from Act 3 of "The Valkyries," the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," and the following excerpts from "The Ring": Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock from "Siegfried," and the "Dawn and Rhine Journey" of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods."

Symphony Program

At the Symphony concerts this week Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's second symphony in C major; "The Birthday of the Infanta," an orchestral suite, by John Alden Carpenter, and, with Mischa Levitzki as soloist, the third Beethoven concerto for piano and orchestra.

ADVERTISER. FEB. 6.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert This Afternoon

Mr Monteux has planned for today's Symphony concert in aid of the pension fund, a program which illustrates the best work of Wagner from the early days of "Tannhauser" to the completion of the "Ring." It includes fragments from every one of his chief works except "Parsifal" and "Rheingold," in each case complete enough in themselves to more than justify concert performance.

Those who like to hear the Symphony Orchestra occasionally, but do not care to buy season tickets have this afternoon their opportunity to hear it at prices less than those charged for the few available tickets for the regular concerts, in a program any one who cares at all for music ought to enjoy.

Concert and Recital Programs for the Current Week

SYMPHONY HALL. Today at 3. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor. Second concert in aid of the Pension Fund. Wagner program. Preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin"; Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure"; Prelude to act 3 of "Tristan und Isolde"; "Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock," from "Siegfried"; "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Gotterdammerung." A chorus of women from the Cecilia Society, trained by Agide Jacchia, will assist in the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." Attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3, not at the usual hour, 3:30.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 14th program Second Symphony, in C major, Schumann; Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," Carpenter (first time in Boston); Third Piano Concerto, in C minor, Beethoven. Soloist, Mischa Levitski, pianist.

GLOBE FEB. 6.

NEW STRAUS SUITE WELL PLAYED

By FRED J. McISAAC.

One of the most charming and unusual features of a symphony program for many months was the orchestral suite from Richard Strauss opera based on Molliere's play "Le Bourgeo in Gentilhomme." This work was first produced in 1913, but the war and the boycott on Strauss prevented us hearing it until the present time.

There is little of the furturist and cacophonous Strauss in this music. It was composed for an orchestra of thirty-six pieces, and Mr. Monteux dismissed most of his band to keep the work properly proportioned. Strauss had in mind the dainty, graceful airs of Rameau which go so well with Watteau costumes and the period of Molliere. Nothing could keep him from inventing curious and ingenious harmonics, but nobody who is familiar with his big tone poems would believe him so frank and obvious a melodist as he proved to be in these little dances, incidental music and humoresques. The performance was in every respect delightful. Monteux was in his element.

The Schumann symphony number two also received an admirable performance. Mischa Levitzki, the young pianist, was soloist, playing the Beethoven concerto in C minor. Levitzki has already given evidence of more talent than any of the younger set of players on the pianoforte and he furnished a brilliant and satisfying performance of the concerto yesterday.

AMER. FEB 12.

[86]

STRAUSS' NEW SUITE BY THE SYMPHONY

Enthusiastic Greeting Won by the Orchestra

Levitzki Adds to Reputation as a Solo Pianist

Yesterday's performance by the Symphony Orchestra, the first in America of the suite arranged during the war by Richard Strauss from the incidental music he wrote in 1912 for Hofmannsthal's "Der Burger als Edelmann" roused as much enthusiasm in the audience as it would have in 1913. Mr Monteux, who gave a painstakingly sympathetic interpretation of the new piece, was recalled three times at the end and made the orchestra stand to share the applause with him.

Those who remember former collaborations of composer and dramatist, like "Salome" and "Elektra," were disappointed if they hoped the new music would be in the vein of the old. There is a third collaborator this time, whose comic spirit the others have sought to catch.

The text is an adaptation of Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," the farcical comedy about a 17th century profiteer who sought to acquire the airs and graces then needed in "Society." In the new version the play serves an excuse for an opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," written and pereformed for the pleasure of M Jourdain's guests.

The suite is the most carefully simple and conscientiously light music ever composed. The orchestration, for only 35 performers, is a miracle of deftness and ingenuity. Each of the 16 strings has a separate part. The themes are all 18th century in style, prettily tuneful. The harmonies are no harsher than many used by Mozart.

Strauss has seemingly tried to write such music as Mozart might have composed if he had lived in the 20th century. Nothing except spontaneity is lacking. The piece is far more successful than Ravel's recently played "Le Tombeau de Couperin" in recreating the spirit of a half-forgotten age.

Mischa Levitzki, who made his first appearance as soloist, again showed the sound musicianship and delicate taste that are winning him a great reputation in Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto. The music itself is not among the finest Beethoven wrote.

Schumann's Second Symphony has some beautiful music amid such tiresome padding and repetition. Mr Monteux and the orchestra gave frequent evidence of progress toward regaining old standards. Only by intelligent cooperation and endless pains by all concerned will the present orchestra come to equal the one the war shattered.

GLOBE FEB. 17

MUSIC

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given on February 11, was as follows: Schumann, second symphony, op. 61, in C major; Strauss, orchestral suite from "Der Bürger als Edelman"; Beethoven, concerto for piano and orchestra in C minor.

Strauss' suite was given for the first time in America. The opera from which it is drawn is based on Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The orchestra which Strauss employs is a small and curiously arranged one. The strings are limited to six violins, four violas, four violoncellos, and two double-basses. Each of these plays an individual part. The wind section consists of the usual number of instruments found in the scores of Mozart and Haydn save that the two flutes at times play the piccolo, the second oboe occasionally changes to the English horn and the second bassoon to the doube-bassoon. A trombone is also added. The piano has an important part and there are various instruments of percussion. Naturally there is an attempt in the music to suggest the atmosphere of the seventeenth century. The most successful portions of the suite in this regard are the overture and the music to accompany the entrance of Cleonte. However, this music is but an imitation of that of Lully and his contemporaries, and like all imitations it is never so good as the original. One feels that the composer is all the time saying to himself: "I must be simple, I must be naïve, I must be charming."

In consequence this music, in spite of its cleverness and apparent simplicity, gives the impression of a pose assumed for the time being. The music for the Fencing Master scarcely rises above the quality of much of the perfunctory melodramatic music which we are accustomed to hear in the theater. The music designed to accompany the dinner scene is intended, so we are informed by the program notes, to be humorous. Personally we are unable to find anything particularly humorous in a quotation from the "Rheingold" to accompany the fish course and the bleating of the sheep from "Don Quixote" to accompany the mutton. Of course the connection is obvious, but why are not certain other portions of the music explained? There are twitterings of the flute and clarinet which no doubt refer to the game, and other pages which would undoubtedly serve as an accompaniment to a platter of sausages; still one would like to be accurately informed as to these matters in order that a full æsthetic enjoyment of the music might be reached. The performance was wonderfully euphonious. It seems a pity that so much careful rehearsal was wasted on music of so little value. However, the performance served to show the catholicity of Mr. Monteux's taste and his unsparing devotion to the art of music, regardless of school or period. Schumann's symphony was given an inspired reading, in the true romantic spirit. Mischa Levitzki was the pianist in the Beethoven concerto.

MONITOR FEB. 12

14TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Excerpt from Strauss's Music to Moliere Comedy Much Applauded

BEETHOVEN WORK BRILLIANTLY GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2; Richard Strauss, Orchestral Suite from the music to Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (first time in this country); Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, C minor for piano (Mischa Levitzki, pianist).

The audience was not concerned with the question whether Strauss and Hugo von Hofmannsthal, the librettist, had done Moliere a deadly injury by their comedy-opera-burlesque — produced at Stuttgart in October, 1912. Nor was the audience interested in the fact that "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" section was dropped, like the boy Xury in "Robinson Cruso" when the revised version was performed at Berlin the next year. It listened to the Suite arranged by Strauss as purely concert music; listened and enjoyed it hugely, applauding enthusiastically after each movement; at the end recalling Mr. Monteux several times and insisting that the orchestra should share in the honor. Seldom has an unfamiliar musical composition been so warmly received in Symphony Hall.

This Suite is interesting in many ways; it bids for immediate popularity. It is curiously scored: 6 violins, 4 violas, 4 violoncellos, 2 double basses; 2 flutes (interchangeable with 2 piccolos), 2 oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons (one interchangeable with double bassoon), 2 horns, trumpet, trombone, piano, kettledrums, campanella, side drum, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, triangle, harp. With these instruments Strauss performs all manner of agreeable tricks.

As Lully wrote music for the first performance of Moliere's comedy in 1670, Strauss now and then attempts to reproduce the spirit of the ancient music, but he is whimsical in this, and is suddenly ultra-modern. He is reported as having said after he had completed his "Rosenkavalier": "Now I have written an opera in the manner of Mozart," but he could not write in that manner, greatly as he admires the composer of "The Marriage of Figaro"; nor can he content himself with imitating Lully. Would the Florentine recognize "The Minuet of Lully" played yesterday? It is delightful music but not in the 17th century manner.

The overture is sparkling with its pretty closing dance tune; the first Minuet, without any pretence of imitating Lully, is melodious and graceful; the "Entrance and Dance of Tailors" is gay. The more serious movements—if Strauss is ever serious in this Suite—are the charming Intermezzo, and the beautiful measures entitled "The Entrance of Cleonte." The Dinner Music with Dance of the Kitchen servants is the least engrossing portion of the Suite in spite of various musical eccentricities that might have been effective at the performance in Stuttgart. The Courante in the Suite was not played.

There are many measures that recall the "Rosenkavalier," especially the waltzes. As in other late works of Strauss, the comparative poverty of thematic invention is not wholly concealed by skilful juggling with the instruments; common place, even common melodic figures are not authoritatively embellished by strange blendings of instrumental timbers. It is not necessary to inquire whether the various movements suit the action in the theatre; when a Suite derived from stage music is played in a concert hall, the theatre, for which it was composed, no longer exists; it never existed.

The Suite was finely played by the small orchestra. A successful performance of this music demands not only humorous appreciation, spirit, dash, sentiment; it also demands at times a certain appropriate rollicking coarseness; at other times elegance; above all finenesses.

Mr. Monteux gave a spirited, even an exciting reading of Schumann's Allegros and Scherzo, but with the exception of the Introduction to the first movement and the Adagio, in which the romantic dreamer Schumann is revealed—these sections were eloquently performed—the Symphony has a[illegible]. And in this symphony more than [illegible] the other three the orchestration se[illegible] hopelessly crude, ineffective, distr[illegible] to the ear, while the musical cont[illegible] re seldom worthy of a more taste[illegible] ss.

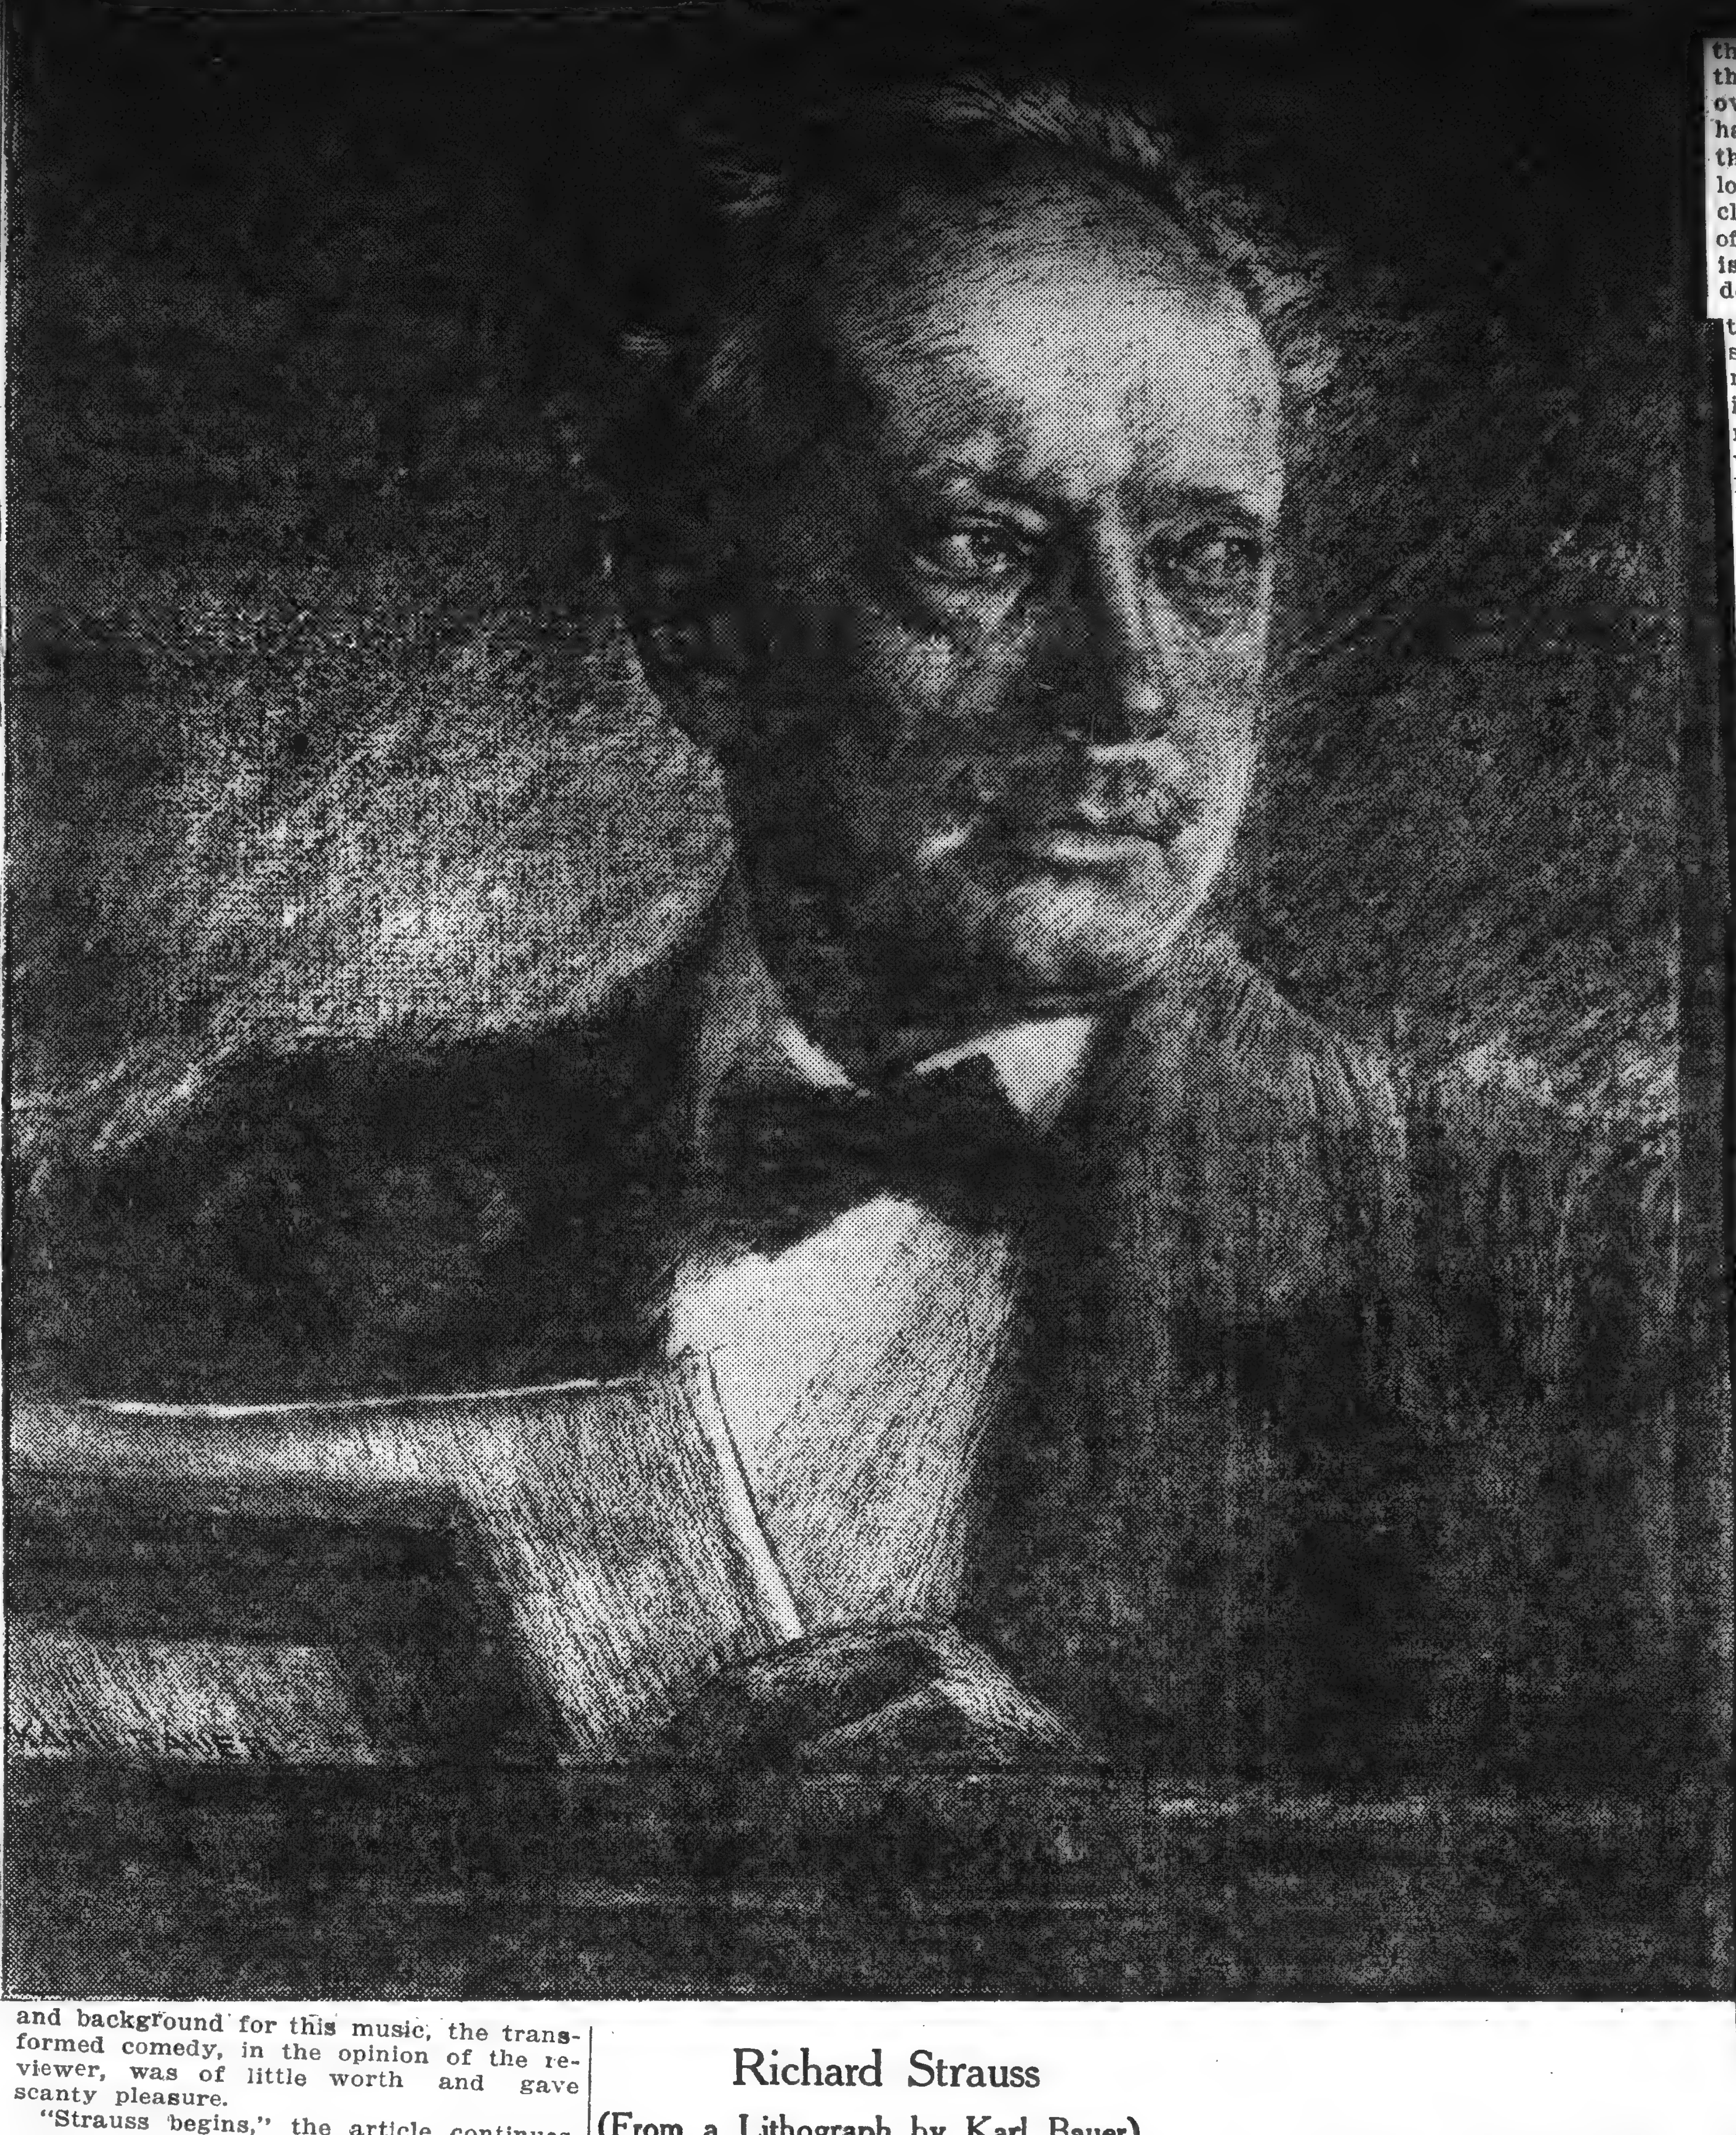
The concert w[illegible] ng one. Some in the audience w[illegible] able to hear the last movement [illegible] thoven's Concerto. Perhaps they f[illegible] that the tea and buttered toast—[illegible] y with muffins—were growing [illegible] The withdrawal was not courteo[illegible] Mr. Levitzky, Mr. Monteux and th[illegible] orchestra, especially as the performanc[illegible] was a brilliant one. Those who did not hear the final Rondo missed an admirable interpretation, conspicuous for crystalline clearness, surprising fleetness, with an ever-present sense of proportion. These qualities with the same musical intelligence in phrasing and in employment of tonal gradations marked the performance of the first Allegro, while the reading of the Largo was emotional without undue emphasis. We read in New York newspapers, when Mr. Levitzky recently played this concerto, that when he was more mature he would show greater depth of feeling. Thus was he patted on the head, as the circus girl by the ringmaster: "She rides well for one so young." But the music itself is not conspicuous for "depth" except to those who have turned the concerto into a fetish inhabited by a spirit. Deep musical emotion was not in fashion in the Vienna of 1800.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week comprises Vaughan Williams's "London" Symphony; Mozart's Concerto No. 6 for violin (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline."

TIGHT BINDING

Novel Music Comes Again From Strauss

His Incidental Pieces to Moliere's Comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," at the Symphony Concerts for the First Times in America



Richard Strauss

(From a Lithograph by Karl Bauer)

TOMORROW afternoon and Saturday evening, as previously noted, Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will play the Suite which Richard Strauss has drawn from his incidental music to "Der Bürger als Edelmann," von Hofmannsthal's adaptation of Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." On the fly leaf of the score from which Mr Monteux will conduct the performances is inscribed its presentation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the number of the copy, 21, and the date, Jan. 3, 1921. Thus do the Symphony Concerts progress from Wagner, early Strauss and still earlier Bruch, to a German novelty of the novelties. Of course the music is not actually new; Strauss's hybrid play and opera were produced 1912, though it was not until some time afterwards that he made the present arrangement for concert performance. Those who recall the aria from "Ariadne on Naxos"—the opera within the play—which Miss Mabel Garrison sang here in 1918, may remember also its slender orchestral accompaniment. With both opera and incidental music, Strauss wrote for a band of less than forty players. In detail, his requirements are two flutes (interchangeable with two piccolos), two oboes (one interchangeable with an English horn), two clarinets, two bassoons, (one interchangeable with a double bassoon), two horns, one trumpet, one trombone, kettledrums, cymbals, tambourine triangle, bass drum, snare drum, glockenspiel, harp, piano, six violins (generally divided into two parts), four violas, fo violoncellos and two double basses. A this after the swollen orchestras of th "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Electra!"

First of the nine numbers of the suit is the overture to the play. Immediatel it proclaims the Old World spirit whic characterizes most of the music that fo lows. It begins rapidly and with vig and ends placidly with a suave and graceful theme for the oboe. The next division, a Minuet, is very brief and its melodic burden is borne chiefly by the two flutes. "The Fencing Master," which follows, is more elaborate, and Strauss's indication "mit Elan" gives a clue to its spirit. At the outset there is bold, virtuoso writing for the trombone and the trumpet—not to mention the piano; the principal theme given to the violins, is dashing, debonair. Then ensue the "Entrance and Dance of Tailors," music of brisk pace, in the rhythm of a gavotte, and essentially diatonic. The middle section, entitled "Tanz des ersten Schneidergesellen," or "Journeymen's Dance," in D major and in triple rhythm, at once suggests Boieldieu or Auber—with a solo violin doing the work of the first and second fiddles. It soon grows complicated, however, and after a brilliant climax there is a return to the mood and matter of the opening. "The Minuet of Lully," which succeeds, is again very short, and ingeniously imitative of that composer's manner. More in the style Bach is the Courante—number six—teeming with elaborate polyphony. "Nach Lully," writes Strauss over the next episode, "Entrance of Cléonte"—more ingenious imitation, but here solemn, dignified. The introduction to the second act—or intermezzo—portrays Dorante and Dorimène, Count and Countess. Strauss marks it "Andante galante e grazioso," and its chivalric grace recalls "Der Rosenkavalier." The final episode bears the title, "The Dinner, Table-Music and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants." The Table-Music is a series of "divertissements": a ponderous Alla Marcia gives way to a melody of peasant character; next in curious contrast comes a suggestion of the bleating sheep of "Don Quixote," then the solo 'cello sings a broad—and beautiful—melody. The sheep-music returns, and in the midst of the general hilarity the oboe squawks the opening bars of "La Donna e Mobile." There is little suggestion of the title in the final dance; instead there is a typically Straussian surge and sweep. Throughout the Suite the composer writes as one who mightily enjoys his task, the music is fresh and tuneful, full of ingenuity and resource and scored for the little orchestra with his characteristic sureness, vividness and variety of effect.

In the Theatre

So much for this music of Strauss as it will be heard in the concert-hall for the first times in America. How it sounded in the theatre with the play in progress, a reviewer set down after the performances of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and "Ariadne on Naxos" at His Majesty's Theatre in London in the spring of 1913 under the joint auspices of Sir Herbert Tree and Sir Thomas Beecham. For the English-speaking stage, Mr. Maugham had made an amalgam, "The Perfect Gentleman," of Molière's comedy, of Hofmannsthal's German version and of his own supplementary inventions. In this piece (with Sir Herbert acting Monsieur Jourdain) the incidental music was set in the appointed place and played by the appointed orchestra. Except as occasion and background for this music, the transformed comedy, in the opinion of the reviewer, was of little worth and gave scanty pleasure.

"Strauss begins," the article continues, "with a little overture; continues with a flourish when Monsieur Jourdain first comes on the stage; proceeds with the exercises of the music-master; finds an accompaniment for the fencing bout; brings the tailors on a-dancing; slips an intermezzo between the first and the second acts and accompanies Monsieur Jourdain's dinner of state with much orchestral ceremony and suggestion. Nowhere else has Strauss written such music. The little overture is as formal and elegant as the seventeenth or the eighteenth century could have wished it; it sounds as nakedly simple as some of Strauss's music sounds perversely intricate; yet it teems with graces of harmony and instrumental coloring that are clearly contemporary and even Straussian. So the composer of the seventeenth or the eighteenth century might have written had he only thought of these devices. Above all, the general impression of the overture is of the gay and fantastic spirit of all that is to come, of an exuberant mastery of the task in hand, of Strauss in new fettle, high and light.

"The fanfare that ushers in Monsieur Jourdain is ludicrously pompous. The exercises in music-making follow old ways in form and manner, follow them very precisely and elegantly or else make sly fun of them. The music for the fencing glints and clicks like the foils and it is easy from it to infer one of the reasons for the piano that Strauss has included in his little orchestra. The dancing and the capering of the tailors as each one brings Jourdain a new garment runs to gay and sparkling music, brightly rhythmed, not altogether inappropriate to a seventeenth-century scene—if the composers of the time had only known modern harmonic and instrumental devices and modern tonal suggestion. That same century and the eighteenth, too, might have envied the elegance of the intermezzo that separates the acts of the play. As for the music of the dinner, the allusions and the quotations that the Teutonic dry-as-dusts have discovered in it, go for nothing in actual performance—the hint of the song of Wagner's water-nixies in the heralding of the salmon from the Rhine, the suspected parodies of the dances in the composer's own "Electra" and "Salome." The pleasure of the music is its fantastic elegance, its light exhilaration, its rococo tone and accent. It becomes sheer gay bravura when the omelette en surprise releases a dancing girl from under the covers who circles about the table to music that is Strauss gay and elegant as he has seldom been elsewhere—the joyous tour de force again."

So decorated the play run its course—rococo entertainment to exhilarating satisfaction, and on its musical side quite new to the theatre. The usual composer would never have had the fantastic wit to adorn spirit of fantastic, elegant, richly resourceful vivacity, as though he were beating the old music at its own game and feeling the exhilaration of the sport, the fun of the whole thing in design and execution with his own modern mind and emotions. Still more rococo, though often in different vein, is "Ariadne on Naxos" itself—rococo to the eye, rococo to the ear, touching the imagination as eighteenth century music, grave or gay, touches it, yet enriching that music with all sorts of modern coloring and implications, and keeping almost steadily fantastic suggestion and the suggestion of exuberant and exhilarating feat.

Moliere's Play

Of the play of Molière that suggests this music, of the changes it underwent at Hofmannthal's adapting hands, of the insertion of the opera, "Ariadne on Naxos" within it. Professor C. H. Grandgent of Harvard wrote in The Transcript when the resulting piece was first produced at the Royal Theatre at Stuttgart in the autumn of 1912. For the conception of the immortal Monsieur Jourdain, he wrote, we must go back to the year 1669, when a certain Chevalier d'Arvieux, renowned for his travels in the East and his acquaintance with Oriental dress and manners, was called to the French court to entertain the king and a few other members of the royal household with an account of his amusing experiences, which excited great hilarity in that august company. In the same year a Turkish ambassador was received by Louis with impressive pomp, but disappointed the Court by his stolid indifference to the splendors of French civilization. Tales of Turkey were brought home no doubt, by many French nobles who had taken part in the wars between that country and Austria. Turkey was then, in 1669, a common topic of conversation; and it is not surprising that Louis XIV, the next year, should have directed his favorite playwright, Molière, to prepare a show in which a burlesque Turkish ceremony should be the principal feature. The piece was intended to enliven a hunting trip, and was performed in October, 1670, at the royal chateau Chambord, where the same author, the autumn before, had produced another musical comedy, "Monsieur de Pourceaugnac." "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" scored an immediate success, both at Chambord and in Paris. It still holds its place on the boards.

Between Molière's play and the ordinary musical comedies now in vogue, there are only two differences; in the first place it is musical, no less a composer than Lulli having written the score; in the second place, coming from the pen of Molière, it is comedy, tenuous though its plot may be. Such combinations of acting, singing, and dancing were in high favor under Louis XIII. and XIV. Ballets were held in exalted esteem, and the grand monarch, in his early years, led some of them himself. In "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" the nucleus is the "Cérémonie Turque," which fills most of the fourth act. Next in importance is the "Ballet des Nations," with which the piece closes. Then come the ballets which intervene between the acts, and the songs interspersed through the play. Connecting these is the dialogue, written primarily as a sort of frame for a musical show. Yet this dialogue turned out to be a masterpiece, admired, performed, read, studied centuries after the song and dance were consigned to oblivion; for Molière, the creator, had filled the piece with human characters, so true and so comic that one can never imagine them growing old. Among these Monsieur Jourdain stands forth conspicuous, but Madame Jourdain, Nicole and the four teachers are drawn with just as sure a hand.

Transformations

"Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," lik Molière's other plays, has been turned in again. In the middle of the eighteent century a German named Bierling brough out what is described on the title-page a a "free and careful translation" into hi language of the whole theatre of Molière The description is just; the work had merited success, and passed through several editions. It now has acquired wit years a pleasantly archaic flavor. Bierling's translation of the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" sticks very close to the origina as far as the prose is concerned; the song of course require a somewhat freer treatment. His title for the play is "Der adelige Bürger."

It was, however, reserved for our ow day and generation to conceive the idea o welding together the old "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and a new opera. This is wha Hugo von Hofmannsthal and Richar Strauss have done in their combination o "Der Bürger als Edelmann" and "Ariadne auf Naxos." This latter spectacle takes the place both of the "Ballet des Nations" and of the "Cérémonie Turque." Of the other ballets in the original, the one at the end of the first is cut down to some capers by Jourdain and his teacher; the dance of the tailors is kept, though apparently reduced while the ballet of the cooks (as well as the whole dinner scene) is expanded. The lyrics are considerably altered and curtailed. The song near the beginning of Act IV. disappears. For the lyrics and dances that remain, Strauss has written new music.

Coming now to the play, let us see what has happened to it. To those who, mindful of Hofmannsthal's previous creations, are in dread of a paranoiac Jourdain, an hysterical Master of Philosophy and a neurasthenic Nicole, it may be said at once that their apprehensions are groundless. The time is no doubt near when a new psychology shall explain Jourdain's social ambition and Dorante's impecuniousness as due to the repression of impulses in babyhood, or to the "endophysical fulfilment of unaccomplishable desires"; but as yet Professor Fred and his pupils have not got much beyond Lady Macbeth. No, there is nothing up-to-date about "Der Burger als Edelmann" except the omission of the plot. There was not overmuch plot to start with; but what little there was is ruthlessly ejected. With it disappear Jourdain's daughter and her suitor, the pretty little lovers' quarrel in the vein of "Le Dépit Amoureu

the dissension in the Jourdain over the bestowal of the young hand. The excision of the plot
the Turkish ceremony entails
loss of Covielle, Cléonte's servant,
clever clown from the Italian co of masks. The opening scene of the is revised and violently abridged, detriment of the diverting contrast tween the mercenary musician and sentimental dancing master. A th more of Act III. is cut out, removing intrigue. Act V. is amputated, nearly all of Act IV. The piece now with the interruption of the banquet Madame Jourdain, this last scene rewritten and somewhat reënforced, good lady becoming just a shade
virulent than Molière made her.
rest of the text is taken, virtually out change from Bierling's translation—as, indeed, the ment on Hofmannsthal's title-p would lead one to expect. Wh have left is: first, the character of Jour
dain, sufficiently intact; the Master and the Master of Phi quite unimpaired; a good bit of the sic and dancing teachers; a Madame Jourdain, and the best of
as much as we want of the rather vague adventurer, Dorante the problematical Dorimène. The ter is divided into two acts.

The Inserted Opera

"Ariadne auf Naxos" is the German t
of the opera which closes the performance Announcement of it is made very early the play. The music teacher, introducin his pupil to Monsieur Jourdain, says: "
is a young man of extraordinary talen
He is the same one who composed t
opera 'Ariadne on Naxos,' which we hav
the honor to present to you in your hou tomorrow evening." And further on, aft
a musical bit, we have this dialogue:

Music Teacher—Now just conceive a whole opera, heroic characters, a mag nificent scene, costumes, lighting. You will be satisfied.

Jourdain—What kind of a scene will
it be?

Music Teacher—The stage represents
the desert island of Naxos, where Ari
adne was deserted by Prince Theseus.

Jourdain—A desert island? That is not the kind of a scene anybody likes.
Please let it happen somewhere else.
. . . Have you taken care that the whole business shall be suitable for a widow? It must absolutely be adapted to a widow of noble station who insists on remaining a widow, but who finally finds it difficult to hold out.

Music Teacher—The opera "Ariadne
on Naxos," in its plot is precisely what you want. Princess Ariadne, inasmuch as she is forever abandoned by her hus band, Prince Theseus, is to be regarded as a widow in mourning; and when, at last, Bacchus approaches her and tries to comfort her—

Jourdain—Is he a shepherd?

Music Teacher—Bacchus? I m
the god Bacchus, the god of joy, wh
pictured as a blooming youth, on a panther, with grape leaves in hair.

Jourdain—Oh, that man. I don't as long as he isn't a shepherd.
do have the desert island look splendid and comfortable. Don't sparing of anything, especially lighting. I shouldn't like the person whom I am arranging it all—but esp cially the funny piece at the
what did you say it was?

Dancing Teacher—Fickle Zerbinetta
and her four lovers.

Jourdain—Is there a reference to widow in that, too? . . .

Dancing Teacher—In a way. It about the inconstancy of women in g
eral.

But there is much more. Immedia
after the close of the play there a new scene by Hofmannsthal, con
the Bourgeois Gentilhomme with Ar
We are in a big hall in Jourdain's
Here are two rival troupes engag
Monsieur Jourdain for the evening
tertainment—one a classic Italian company, led by a prima donna,
the auspices of the music master
other an Italian ballet and "com
dell'arte" company, consisting of binetta and four men and patroniz
the dancing teacher. The one is form Ariadne, the other an impr and dance; but they do not know s to come on first, and dispute ac ously. The prima donna, moreover esses aristocratic scorn for Zer and her vulgar band, while the im has nothing but contempt for the opera singers. Presently a serv nounces that Monsieur Jourdain much changing of his mind, has de ave the two shows performed sim ously. Consternation and despair worst sufferer of all is the inspired poser, who finds himself obliged to cuts in his beloved music in order ard room for the introduction of the troupe. He is comforted by the teacher as follows:

Cuts are the very thing that an opera popular, and the best tres pride themselves on having tributed, by their cuts, at least as to the permanent success of a m work as the composer has done b work he has put into it. The first the lord high director of royal e tainments is accustomed to ask is whether an opera contains fir cuts. It is really time for a musician to suit his convenience
at the start, compose a good lot
cuts into his score.

The opera itself is short. Ariadne taken by Theseus, lies motionless cave on the island of Naxos, Naiad and Dryad. Echo serve refrain. From time to time Zerbin pears as an interested spectator a mentator, and during a lull in the
of the serious piece she and her perform their little improvised
the flouting of Scaramuccio,
and Brighella by Zerbinetta and sen Harlequin. Meanwhile shamed and hopeless, has deter die. At this point the youthful appears drawn by a mysterious Ariadne takes him for Death and
to go with him in his boat;
turns to life and love, and the part transformed—Bacchus ma divinity. Ariadne becomes imme
the lights are turned down,
Dorante and Dorimène make

[87]

TRANS.

SYMPHONIES do younger generat
posers, preferrin
tended forms of musi ing these "works of l their elders like Elgar
among them, however has written a symp
short and of somew
It has become a rathe
newer British music
month ago in New Yo in America; it is to b times in Boston at certs next week. A
Mr. Williams calls his would suggest in tone
London, the spirit
mosphere surroundin
tions they kindle.
embankment, the
ster, a solitary fiddler throngs in the street hard-pressed and st
the scheme of a s avowed delineative pur
tains itself as music.
is lengthy, two numb
the programme: Moza
flat for violin to be tive expert and elegan
inexhaustible and Chabrier's sonorous a ture to his opera, "Gw

TRANS. F

SYMPHONY PI
GIVE 14T

The 14th concert
Symphony Orchestra
at Symphony Hall
by Symphony patr
most brilliant music season.

Conductor Monteu
rection, skillful an gether with the wor
vitski, solo pianist,
ing features of the program, which, b
not a long one.

RECORD.

SYMPHONY

STRAUSS'S NEW SU
FIRST T

Incidental Music to Moli
Bourgeois Gentilhomm
Has Written Nothing
and Sophistication, Old
and Modern Flavor
Schumann and Beeth
and Postlude

COMPOSERS are a
ing once put mu
are exceeding lo
to oblivion. F speedily failed into orato
dure, went Handel's han pastime of antiquarians
ures of a matured compo
carded or unfinished pag
days. Fragments of C somehow slip into Sym
If memory holds, there
formance of Lalo's oper
in "The King of Ys," "N symphonic pieces many much of the music. Sc are hardly near neighbor
Scott and Messieurs Meri
Halévy are not exactly c
and there—the explorers
Bizet's "Fair Maid of P
"Carmen." And so onwa
upon instance. No wonde follows in these well-m since half the gossip of lin runs truly, he is of fru
other matters than music Horatio!" Thereby do
the Bavarian Highlands
apartments in Charlotte
our music even after a lon marbled paper, richly g engraved, appropriately in years ago Strauss overture, entr'act songs—to a Ger comedy, "Le
He wrote it b
—his usual lib
Reinhardt, the agreed to use the me to a short and f on Naxos"—min
"lyric drama" in th seventeenth and eig
the antics of the It Arte. The two-fold nted at Stuttgart in elsewhere a few othe
reproduced it; Sir H. am even ventured it once the first flush did the hybrid m
It was soon clea theatres lack sing actors, "Le Bou plus "Ariadne on staged. Accordin nsthal took counsel play and opera, sha
independent piece.
the truth to say tha and held audience
n, lay the incide

TIGHT BINDING

Novel Music Comes Again From Strauss

His Incidental Pieces to Moliere's Comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," at the Symphony Concerts for the First Times in America

TOMORROW afternoon and Saturday evening, as previously noted, Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will play the Suite which Richard Strauss has drawn from his incidental music to "Der Bürger als Edelmann," von Hofmannsthal's adaptation of Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." On the fly leaf of the score from which Mr. Monteux will conduct the performances is inscribed its presentation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the number of the copy, 21, and the date, Jan. 3, 1921. Thus do the Symphony Concerts progress from Wagner, early Strauss and still earlier Bruch, to a German novelty of the novelties. Of course the music is not actually new; Strauss's hybrid play and opera were produced 1912, though it was not until some time afterwards that he made the present arrangement for concert performance. Those who recall the aria from "Ariadne on Naxos"—the opera within the play—which Miss Mabel Garrison sang here in 1918, may remember also its slender orchestral accompaniment. With both opera and incidental music, Strauss wrote for a band of less than forty players. In detail, his requirements are two flutes (interchangeable with two piccolos), two oboes (one interchangeable with an English horn), two clarinets, two bassoons, (one interchangeable with a double bassoon), two horns, one trumpet, one trombone, kettledrums, cymbals, tambourine, triangle, bass drum, snare drum, glockenspiel, harp, piano, six violins (generally divided into two parts), four violas, four violoncellos and two double basses. And this after the swollen orchestras of the "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Electra!"

First of the nine numbers of the suite is the overture to the play. Immediately it proclaims the Old World spirit which characterizes most of the music that follows. It begins rapidly and with vigor and ends placidly with a suave and graceful theme for the 'oboe. The next division, a Minuet, is very brief and its melodic burden is borne chiefly by the two flutes. "The Fencing Master,' which follows, is more elaborate, and Strauss's indication "mit Elan' gives a clue to its spirit. At the outset there is bold, virtuoso writing for the trombone and the trumpet—not to mention the piano; the principal theme given to the violins, is dashing, debonair. Then ensue the "Entrance and Dance of Tailors," music of brisk pace, in the rhythm of a gavotte, and essentially diatonic. The middle section, entitled "Tanz des ersten Schneidergesellen," or "Journeymen's Dance," in D major and in triple rhythm, at once suggests Boieldieu or Auber—with a solo violin doing the work of the first and second fiddles. It soon grows complicated, however, and after a brilliant climax there is a return to the mood and matter of the opening. "The Minuet of Lully," which succeeds, is again very short, and ingeniously imitative of that composer's manner. More in the style Bach is the Courante—number six—teeming with elaborate polyphony. "Nach Lully," writes Strauss over the next episode, "Entrance of Cléonte"—more ingenious imitation, but here solemn, dignified. The introduction to the second act—or intermezzo—portrays Dorante and Dorimène, Count and Countess. Strauss marks it "Andante galante e grazioso," and its chivalric grace recalls "Der Rosenkavalier." The final episode bears the title, "The Dinner, Table-Music and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants." The Table-Music is a series of "divertissements": a ponderous Alla Marcia gives way to a melody of peasant character; next in curious contrast comes a suggestion of the bleating sheep of "Don Quixote," then the solo 'cello sings a broad—and beautiful—melody. The sheep-music returns, and in the midst of the general hilarity the oboe squawks the opening bars of "La Donna e Mobile." There is little suggestion of the title in the final dance; instead there is a typically Straussian surge and sweep. Throughout the Suite the composer writes as one who mightily enjoys his task, the music is fresh and tuneful, full of ingenuity and resource and scored for the little orchestra with his characteristic sureness, vividness and variety of effect.

In the Theatre

So much for this music of Strauss as it will be heard in the concert-hall for the first times in America. How it sounded in the theatre with the play in progress, a reviewer set down after the performances of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and "Ariadne on Naxos" at His Majesty's Theatre in London in the spring of 1913 under the joint auspices of Sir Herbert Tree and Sir Thomas Beecham. For the English-speaking stage, Mr. Maugham had made an amalgam, "The Perfect Gentleman," of Molière's comedy, of Hofmannsthal's German version and of his own supplementary inventions. In this piece (with Sir Herbert acting Monsieur Jourdain) the incidental music was set in the appointed place and played by the appointed orchestra. Except as occasion and background for this music, the transformed comedy, in the opinion of the reviewer, was of little worth and gave scanty pleasure.

"Strauss begins," the article continues, "with a little overture; continues with a flourish when Monsieur Jourdain first comes on the stage; proceeds with the exercises of the music-master; finds an accompaniment for the fencing bout; brings the tailors on a-dancing; slips an intermezzo between the first and the second acts and accompanies Monsieur Jourdain's dinner of state with much orchestral ceremony and suggestion. Nowhere else has Strauss written such music. The little overture is as formal and elegant as the seventeenth or the eighteenth century could have wished it; it sounds as nakedly simple as some of Strauss's music sounds perversely intricate; yet it teems with graces of harmony and instrumental coloring that are clearly contemporary and even Straussian. So the composer of the seventeenth or the eighteenth century might have written had he only thought of these devices. Above all, the general impression of the overture is of the gay and fantastic spirit of all that is to come, of an exuberant mastery of the task in hand, of Strauss in new fettle, high and light.

"The fanfare that ushers in Monsieur Jourdain is ludicrously pompous. The exercises in music-making follow old ways in form and manner, follow them very precisely and elegantly or else make sly fun of them. The music for the fencing glints and clicks like the foils and it is easy from it to infer one of the reasons for the piano that Strauss has included in his little orchestra. The dancing and the capering of the tailors as each one brings Jourdain a new garment runs to gay and sparkling music, brightly rhythmed, not altogether inappropriate to a seventeenth-century scene—if the composers of the time had only known modern harmonic and instrumental devices and modern tonal suggestion. That same century and the eighteenth, too, might have envied the elegance of the intermezzo that separates the acts of the play. As for the music of the dinner, the allusions and the quotations that the Teutonic dry-as-dusts have discovered in it, go for nothing in actual performance—the hint of the song of Wagner's water-nixies in the heralding of the salmon from the Rhine, the suspected parodies of the dances in the composer's own "Electra" and "Salome." The pleasure of the music is its fantastic elegance, its light exhilaration, its rococo tone and accent. It becomes sheer gay bravura when the omelette en surprise releases a dancing girl from under the covers who circles about the table to music that is Strauss gay and elegant as he has seldom been elsewhere—the joyous tour de force again."

So decorated the play run its course—rococo entertainment to exhilarating satisfaction, and on its musical side quite new to the theatre. The usual composer would never have had the fantastic wit to adorn spirit of fantastic, elegant, richly resourceful vivacity, as though he were beating the old music at its own game and feeling the exhilaration of the sport, the fun of the whole thing in design and execution with his own modern mind and emotions. Still more rococo, though often in different vein, is "Ariadne on Naxos" itself—rococo to the eye, rococo to the ear, touching the imagination as eighteenth century music, grave or gay, touches it, yet enriching that music with all sorts of modern coloring and implications, and keeping almost steadily fantastic suggestion and the suggestion of exuberant and exhilarating feat.

Richard Strauss

(From a Lithograph by Karl Bauer)

Moliere's Play

Of the play of Molière that suggests this music, of the changes it underwent at Hofmannthal's adapting hands, of the insertion of the opera, "Ariadne on Naxos" within it, Professor C. H. Grandgent of Harvard wrote in The Transcript when the resulting piece was first produced at the Royal Theatre at Stuttgart in the autumn of 1912. For the conception of the immortal Monsieur Jourdain, he wrote, we must go back to the year 1669, when a certain Chevalier d'Arvieux, renowned for his travels in the East and his acquaintance with Oriental dress and manners, was called to the French court to entertain the king and a few other members of the royal household with an account of his amusing experiences, which excited great hilarity in that august company. In the same year a Turkish ambassador was received by Louis with impressive pomp, but disappointed the Court by his stolid indifference to the splendors of French civilization. Tales of Turkey were brought home no doubt, by many French nobles who had taken part in the wars between that country and Austria. Turkey was then, in 1669, a common topic of conversation; and it is not surprising that Louis XIV, the next year, should have directed his favorite playwright, Molière, to prepare a show in which a burlesque Turkish ceremony should be the principal feature. The piece was intended to enliven a hunting trip, and was performed in October, 1670, at the royal chateau Chambord, where the same author, the autumn before, had produced another musical comedy, "Monsieur de Pourceaugnac." "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" scored an immediate success, both at Chambord and in Paris. It still holds its place on the boards.

Between Molière's play and the ordinary musical comedies now in vogue, there are only two differences; in the first place it is musical, no less a composer than Lulli having written the score; in the second place, coming from the pen of Molière, it is comedy, tenuous though its plot may be. Such combinations of acting, singing, and dancing were in high favor under Louis XIII. and XIV. Ballets were held in exalted esteem, and the grand monarch, in his early years. led some of them himself. In "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" the nucleus is the "Cérémonie Turque," which fills most of the fourth act. Next in importance is the "Ballet des Nations," with which the piece closes. Then come the ballets which intervene between the acts, and the songs interspersed through the play. Connecting these is the dialogue, written primarily as a sort of frame for a musical show. Yet this dialogue turned out to be a masterpiece, admired, performed, read, studied, centuries after the song and dance were consigned to oblivion; for Molière, the creator, had filled the piece with human characters, so true and so comic that one can never imagine them growing old. Among these Monsieur Jourdain stands forth conspicuous, but Madame Jourdain, Nicole and the four teachers are drawn with just as sure a hand.

Transformations

"Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," like Molière's other plays, has been turned in again. In the middle of the eighteenth century a German named Bierling brought out what is described on the title-page as a "free and careful translation" into the language of the whole theatre of Molière. The description is just; the work had merited success, and passed through several editions. It now has acquired with years a pleasantly archaic flavor. Bierling's translation of the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" sticks very close to the original as far as the prose is concerned; the songs of course require a somewhat freer treatment. His title for the play is "Der adelige Bürger."

It was, however, reserved for our own day and generation to conceive the idea of welding together the old "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and a new opera. This is what Hugo von Hofmannsthal and Richard Strauss have done in their combination of "Der Bürger als Edelmann" and "Ariadne auf Naxos." This latter spectacle takes the place both of the "Ballet des Nations" and of the "Cérémonie Turque." Of the other ballets in the original, the one at the end of the first is cut down to some capers by Jourdain and his teacher; the dance of the tailors is kept, though apparently reduced while the ballet of the cooks (as well as the whole dinner scene) is expanded. The lyrics are considerably altered and curtailed. The song near the beginning of Act IV. disappears. For the lyrics and dances that remain, Strauss has written new music.

Coming now to the play, let us see what has happened to it. To those who, mindful of Hofmannsthal's previous creations, are in dread of a paranoiac Jourdain, an hysterical Master of Philosophy and a neurasthenic Nicole, it may be said at once that their apprehensions are groundless. The time is no doubt near when a new psychology shall explain Jourdain's social ambition and Dorante's impecuniousness as due to the repression of impulses in babyhood, or to the "endophysical fulfilment of unaccomplishable desires"; but as yet Professor Fred and his pupils have not got much beyond Lady Macbeth. No, there is nothing up-to-date about "Der Burger als Edelmann" except the omission of the plot. There was not overmuch plot to start with; but what little there was is ruthlessly ejected. With it disappear Jourdain's daughter and her suitor, the pretty little lovers' quarrel in the vein of "Le Dépit Amoureux"

the dissension in the Jourdain
over the bestowal of the young
hand. The excision of the plot
the Turkish ceremony entails
loss of Covielle, Cléonte's servant,
clever clown from the Italian co
of masks. The opening scene of th is revised and violently abridged, detriment of the diverting contras
tween the mercenary musician and sentimental dancing master. A thi more of Act III. is cut out, removing intrigue. Act V. is amputated
nearly all of Act IV. The piece now with the interruption of the ban Madame Jourdain, this last scen rewritten and somewhat reënforc [illegible] just a shade m
virulent than Molière made her.
rest of the text is taken, virtually w
out change from Bierling's translation—as, indeed, the annou ment on Hofmannsthal's title would lead one to expect.
[illegible] character
dain, sufficiently intact; the Master and the Master of Philosoph quite unimpaired; a good bit of the mu sic and dancing teachers, a Madame Jourdain, and the best of
as much as we want of the [illegible] vague adventurer, Dorante the problematical Dorimène. This ter is divided into two acts.

The Inserted Opera

"Ariadne auf Naxos" is the German of the opera which closes the performanc Announcement of it is made very the play. The music teacher, introduci
his pupil to Monsieur Jourdain, says: "
is a young man of extraordinary talen
He is the same one who composed t
opera 'Ariadne on Naxos,' which we hav
the honor to present to you in your hous tomorrow evening." And further on, afte
a musical bit, we have this dialogue:

Music Teacher—Now just conceive a
whole opera, heroic characters, a magnificent scene, costumes, lighting. You will be satisfied.

Jourdain—What kind of a scene will
it be?

Music Teacher—The stage represents
the desert island of Naxos, where Ariadne was deserted by Prince Theseus.

Jourdain—A desert island? That is not the kind of a scene anybody likes.
Please let it happen somewhere else.
. . . Have you taken care that the whole business shall be suitable for a widow? It must absolutely be adapted to a widow of noble station who insists on remaining a widow, yet
who finally finds it difficult to hold out.

Music Teacher—The opera "Ariadne
on Naxos," in its plot is precisely what you want. Princess Ariadne, inasmuch
as she is forever abandoned by her husband, Prince Theseus, is to be regarded as a widow in mourning; and when, at last, Bacchus approaches her and tries
to comfort her—

Jourdain—Is he a shepherd?

Music Teacher—Bacchus! I
the god Bacchus, the god of joy,
pictured as a blooming youth
on a panther, with grape leaves
hair.

Jourdain—Oh, that man. I don't
as long as he isn't a shepherd.
do have the desert island splendid and comfortable.
sparing of anything, especial lighting. I shouldn't like the when I am arranging it all cially the funny piece at what did you say it was?

Dancing Teacher—Fickle Zerb
and her four lovers.

Jourdain—Is there a reference
widow in that, too? . . .

Dancing Teacher—In a way. I about the inconstancy of women in eral.

But there is much more. Imm
after the close of the play there new scene by Hofmannsthal, con
the Bourgeois Gentilhomme with
We are in a big hall in Jourdain's
Here are two rival troupes engag
Monsieur Jourdain for the evening
tertainment—one a classic Italian
company, led by a prima donna
the auspices of the music master
other an Italian ballet and "com
dell'arte" company, consisting of binetta and four men and patron
the dancing teacher. The one is form Ariadne, the other an imp [illegible] they do not know s to come on first, and dispute a usly. The prima donna, moreov sses aristocratic scorn for Ze nd her vulgar band, while the as nothing but contempt for the pera singers. Presently a serva ounces that Monsieur Jourdain uch changing of his mind, has de ve the two shows performed s usly. Consternation and despa [illegible] the inspir oser, who finds himself obliged ts in his beloved music in orde d room for the introduction of oupe. He is comforted by the cher as follows:

Cuts are the very thing that
an opera popular, and the best
tres pride themselves on having tributed, by their cuts, at least a to the permanent success of a work as the composer has done
work he has put into it. The first the lord high director of royal tainments is accustomed to ask is whether an opera contains cuts. It is really time for a musician to suit his convenience
at the start, compose a good lot
cuts into his score.

The opera itself is short. Ariadn ken by Theseus, lies motionless
cave on the island of Naxos, Naiad and Dryad. Echo serv frain. From time to time Zerb ears as an interested spectator a mentator, and during a lull in
of the serious piece she and her
perform their little improvised
the flouting of Scaramuccio,
and Brighella by Zerbinetta and
sen Harlequin. Meanwhile shamed and hopeless, has dete die. At this point the youthf
appears drawn by a mysterious Ariadne takes him for Death and
to go with him in his boat;
turns to life and love, and th
part transformed—Bacchus ma divinity. Ariadne becomes imm
the lights are turned down,
Dorante and Dorimène make

---

as they had played Mons illumined again Mons to his amazement that
"These well-born pe
"have a natural, eas
there is nothing like give two fingers from born count or marqui indefinable something lend such distinction do!"

TRANS.

SYMPHONIES do younger generat
posers, preferring
tended forms of musi ing these "works of their elders like Elgar
among them, however
has written a symp
short and of somew
It has become a rathe
newer British music
month ago in New Yo
in America; it is to b
times in Boston at certs next week. A
Mr. Williams calls his would suggest in tone
London, the spirit
mosphere surroundin
tions they kindle.
embankment, the
ster, a solitary fiddler throngs in the streets hard-pressed and smile the scheme of a avowed delineative pur
tains itself as music.
is lengthy, two numb
the programme: Moza
flat for violin to be tive expert and eleg
inexhaustible and Chabrier's sonorous a ture to his opera, "Gw

TRANS. F

SYMPHONY PL
GIVE 14T

The 14th concert
Symphony Orchestr
at Symphony Hall
by Symphony patr
most brilliant music
season.

Conductor Monteux
rection, skillful an gether with the wor
vitski, solo pianist,
ing features of the
program, which, b
not a long one.

REGOR J.

SYMPHONY

STRAUSS'S NEW SU
FIRST T

Incidental Music to Mol
Bourgeois Gentilhomme
Has Written Nothing
and Sophistication, Old
and Modern Flavor
Schumann and Beeth
and Postlude

COMPOSERS are a
ing once put mu
are exceeding lo
to oblivion. F specially failed into orato
dure, went Handel's han
pastime of antiquarians
ures of a matured compo
carded or unfinished pag
days. Fragments of C
somehow slip into Sym
If memory holds, there
formance of Lalo's oper
in "The King of Ys," "N symphonic pieces many
much of the music. Sc
are hardly near neighbor
Scott and Messieurs Meri
Halevy are not exactly c
and there—the explorers
Bizet's "Fair Maid of P
"Carmen." And so onwa
upon instance. No wonde
follows in these well-m since if half the gossip of ilia run truly, he is of fru
other matters than music Horatio!" Thereby do
the Bavarian Highlands
apartments in Charlotte
our music even after a lon margined paper, richly g
engraved, appropriately in Nine years ago Strauss music—overture, entr'act dances, songs—to a Ger Molière's comedy, "Le B homme." He wrote it b mannsthal—his usual lib dentally, Reinhardt, the had agreed to use the and frame to a short and f
"Ariadne on Naxos"—min logical "lyric drama" in th of the seventeenth and eig with the antics of the It dell' Arte. The two-fold represented at Stuttgart in 1912; elsewhere a few othe
atres reproduced it; Sir H.
Beecham even ventured it where once the first flush passed, did the hybrid mu public. It was soon clea since theatres lack singe musical actors, "Le Bou homme" plus "Ariadne on be seldom staged. Accordin Hofmannsthal took counsel play and opera, sha
independent piece.
the truth to say that and held audienc
then, lay the incide comedy. Not to the bestowal of the young

. The excision of the plot and Turkish ceremony entails also of Covielle, Cléonte's servant, th er clown from the Italian comed masks. The opening scene of the pl evised and violently abridged, to th iment of the diverting contrast b en the mercenary musician and t timental dancing master. A third o e of Act III. is cut out, removing th rigue. Act V. is amputated, rly all of Act IV. The piece now e h the interruption of the banquet.
dame Jourdain, this last scene be written and somewhat reënforced, d lady becoming just a shade m ulent than Molière made her.
of the text is taken, virtually w change from Bierling's faith nslation—as, indeed, the announ nt on Hofmannsthal's title-p ould lead one to expect. What ve left is: first, the character of Jo ain, sufficiently intact; the Fenc aster and the Master of Philosop uite unimpaired; a good bit of the ic and dancing teachers; a touch Madame Jourdain, and the best of Nic s much as we want of the titled vague adventurer, Dorante, e problematical Dorimène. This ma r is divided into two acts.

he Inserted Opera

"Ariadne auf Naxos" is the German ti the opera which closes the performan nnouncement of it is made very early e play. The music teacher, introduci s pupil to Monsieur Jourdain, says: " a young man of extraordinary tale e is the same one who composed t era 'Ariadne on Naxos,' which we ha e honor to present to you in your hou morrow evening." And further on, aft musical bit, we have this dialogue:

Music Teacher—Now just conceive a whole opera, heroic characters, a magnificent scene, costumes, lighting. You will be satisfied.

Jourdain—What kind of a scene will it be?

Music Teacher—The stage represents the desert island of Naxos, where Ariadne was deserted by Prince Theseus.

Jourdain—A desert island? That is not the kind of a scene anybody likes. Please let it happen somewhere else. . . . Have you taken care that the whole business shall be suitable for a widow? It must absolutely be adapted to a widow of noble station who insists on remaining a widow, but who finally finds it difficult to hold out.

Music Teacher—The opera "Ariadne on Naxos," in its plot is precisely what you want. Princess Ariadne, inasmuch as she is forever abandoned by her husband, Prince Theseus, is to be regarded as a widow in mourning; and when, at last, Bacchus approaches her and tries to comfort her—

Jourdain—Is he a shepherd?

Music Teacher—Bacchus? I mea the god Bacchus, the god of joy, who pictured as a blooming youth, ridin on a panther, with grape leaves in h
hair.

Jourdain—Oh, that man. I don't car as long as he isn't a shepherd. An do have the desert island look reall splendid and comfortable. Don't b sparing of anything, especially th lighting. I shouldn't like the person fo whom I am arranging it all—but espe cially the funny piece at the en
what did you say it was?

Dancing Teacher—Fickle Zerbinett
and her four lovers.

Jourdain—Is there a reference to
widow in that, too? . . .

Dancing Teacher—In a way. It about the inconstancy of women in gen eral.

But there is much more. Immediat ter the close of the play there follo new scene by Hofmannsthal, connect e Bourgeois Gentilhomme with Ariad
e are in a big hall in Jourdain's hou ere are two rival troupes engaged onsieur Jourdain for the evening's rtainment—one a classic Italian op mpany, led by a prima donna, un e auspices of the music master;
her an Italian ballet and "comme dell'arte" company, consisting of Z netta and four men and patronized e dancing teacher. The one is to rm Ariadne, the other an improm d dance; but they do not know wh to come on first, and dispute acrimo
dy. The prima donna, moreover, sses aristocratic scorn for Zerbine
d her vulgar band, while the improv nothing but contempt for the stu
ra singers. Presently a servant nces that Monsieur Jourdain, a ch changing of his mind, has decided ve the two shows performed simulta
sly. Consternation and despair!
orst sufferer of all is the inspired c ser, who finds himself obliged to m s in his beloved music in order to d room for the introduction of the ot oupe. He is comforted by the danc acher as follows:

Cuts are the very thing that mak an opera popular, and the best the pride themselves on having co ributed, by their cuts, at least as muc to the permanent success of a music work as the composer has done by th work he has put into it. The first th the lord high director of royal en ainments is accustomed to ask ab is whether an opera contains first-cuts. It is really time for a cl musician to suit his convenience at the start, compose a good lot of cuts into his score.

The opera itself is short. Ariadne,
ken by Theseus, lies motionless b cave on the island of Naxos, pitie Naiad and Dryad. Echo serves frain. From time to time Zerbine ears as an interested spectator an spectator, and during a lull in the serious piece she and her com their little improvised co flouting of Scaramuccio, Truff Brighella by Zerbinetta and he Harlequin. Meanwhile Ar
d and hopeless, has determin
At this point the youthful B ars drawn by a mysterious attr he takes him for Death and pr with him in his boat; but to life and love, and the tr transformed—Bacchus matured Ariadne become immo

hey had planned. [illegible] Monsieur Jourdain finds ined again Monsieur Jourdain finds his amazement that his guests are gone.
hese well-born people" he declares, ave a natural, easy-going politeness—re is nothing like it! I wish I could two fingers from my hand to be a n count or marquis and possess that definable something with which they d such distinction to everything they
"

TRANS. FEB. 10.

SYMPHONIES do not often tempt the younger generation of British composers, preferring freer and less exended forms of musical expression, leavng these "works of larger dimensions" to heir elders like Elgar and Bantock. One among them, however, Vaughan Williams, has written a symphony by no means hort and of somewhat singular design. t has become a rather noted piece in the ewer British music; it was played a month ago in New York for the first times in America; it is to be heard for the first imes in Boston at the Symphony Conerts next week. A "London Symphony," Mr. Williams calls his music and in it he would suggest in tones various aspects of London, the spirit underlying, the atmosphere surrounding them, the sensations they kindle. Fog and the Thames embankment, the chimes of Westminster, a solitary fiddler in Bloomsbury, the throngs in the streets animated and gay or hard-pressed and sullen all have place in the scheme of a symphony that has avowed delineative purpose, yet well maintains itself as music. Since Mr. Williams is lengthy, two numbers only round out the programme: Mozart's Concerto in E flat for violin to be played by the sensitive expert and elegant Mr. Thibaud with inexhaustible and carressing finesse, and Chabrier's sonorous and impassioned overture to his opera, "Gwendoline."

TRANS. FEB. 12.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 14TH CONCERT

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered Friday at Symphony Hall was considered by Symphony patrons one of the most brilliant musical treats of the season.

Conductor Monteux's excellent direction, skillful and energetic, together with the work of Mischa Levitski, solo pianist, were outstanding features of the most interesting program, which, by the way, was not a long one.

RECORD. FEB. 12.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS'S NEW SUITE FOR THE FIRST TIME

Incidental Music to Moliere's Comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Written as He Has Written Nothing Else — Simplicity and Sophistication, Old-Time Suggestion and Modern Flavor in Rare Blend—Schumann and Beethoven for Prelude and Postlude

COMPOSERS are a frugal folk. Having once put music to paper, they are exceeding loth to consign it to oblivion. From operas that speedily failed into oratorios that still endure, went Handel's handiwork. It is the pastime of antiquarians to trace the measures of a matured composer back to a discarded or unfinished page of his youthful days. Fragments of Concertos forgotten somehow slip into Symphonies perennial. If memory holds, there never was a performance of Lalo's opera, "Fiesque"; but in "The King of Ys," "Namouna," and his symphonic pieces many ears have heard much of the music. Scotland and Spain are hardly near neighbors, and Sir Walter Scott and Messieurs Merimée, Meilhac, and Halévy are not exactly close kin; but here and there—the explorers of trifles say—Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth" fed Bizet's "Carmen." And so onward with instance upon instance. No wonder Richard Strauss follows in these well-marked footprints, since if half the gossip of Munich and Berlin run truly, he is of frugal mind in many other matters than music. "Thrift, thrift, Horatio!" Thereby do we gain villas in the Bavarian Highlands and sumptuous apartments in Charlottenburg, publishing our music even after a long war upon wide-margined paper, richly glazed, beautifully engraved, appropriately inscribed.

Nine years ago Strauss wrote incidental music—overture, entr'acte, "entrances," dances, songs—to a German version of Molière's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." He wrote it because he, Hofmannsthal—his usual librettist—and incidentally, Reinhardt, the theatre-director, had agreed to use the play as preface and frame to a short and fantastical opera, "Ariadne on Naxos"—mingling of mythological "lyric drama" in the "grand style" of the seventeenth and eighteenth century with the antics of the Italian Commedia dell' Arte. The two-fold piece was first represented at Stuttgart in the autumn of 1913; elsewhere a few other German theatres reproduced it; Sir H. Tree and Sir T. Beecham even ventured it in London. Nowhere, once the first flush of curiosity had passed, did the hybrid much interest the public. It was soon clear, besides, that since theatres lack singers and opera houses actors, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" plus "Ariadne on Naxos" would be seldom staged. Accordingly Strauss and Hofmannsthal took counsel with prudence, parted play and opera, shaped "Ariadne," into an independent piece. Again it would not be the truth to say that self-contained, it won and held audiences. High and dry, then, lay the incidental music to Molière's comedy. Not too often is it played on German-speaking stages; not many of them may readily assemble and practice an expert orchestra of thirty-six in Strauss's exacting score, while even before the war, the French preferred Lulli, who worked with Molière, to Strauss, who worked with Hofmannsthal. There was but one salvation, unless these incidental numbers were to go for naught—to assemble from them an Orchestral Suite for the concert-hall. At his leisure Strauss put it together, published it, despatched score and parts to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for first performance in America. Yesterday afternoon it was so played with the conductor, the prescribed band and the audience equally "on edge." All three had no small reward.

Nowhere else, seemingly, has Strauss written such music in such manner. His nearest approach to it are the so-called Mozartean passages (like the Trio at the end of the third act) in his "comedy with music" in eighteenth-century Vienna, "Der Rosenkavalier." There, however, the dimensions are larger, the pitch higher. For the incidental numbers to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Strauss reduces the orchestra to thirty-six—sixteen strings, each playing a separate part, paired woodwinds and horns, individual trumpet, trombone and decorative instruments of percussion. Keenest sacrifice to any composer in these days, he actually forswears two harps. Moreover, he uses his ornamental instruments sparingly—for the most part in only one division—while everywhere else he keeps his band at low or middle voice. Throughout, too, he writes with sedulous care of detail as though he were fashioning a fine embroidery in tones upon Molière's play. He seems not much concerned with the motivs he has invented to characterize one or another salient personage, like Monsieur Jourdain who would do as gentlemen do. In the concert-hall in particular, they come, they go, little impressing the hearer. Like the motivs whence the dances and the more decorative divisions of the Suite spring, they are no more than serviceable.

As usual with the Strauss of middle years, the treatment is everything and upon it he lavishes skill, resource, imagination. The harmonies move in delicate tracery or fanciful suggestion; the low-pitched instrumental voices speak with many tongues; the lightest of hands often sets the rhythms beating. Now, as in the overture, this incidental music runs gayly, smilingly, with little jets of mocking humor, as in the measures for pompous Jourdain. Again, as in the two Minuets, wistful melody, tinged with melancholy, marches to gentle rhythmic beat. The music of the Fencing-Master at play with his foils, glints with the light brilliance, the cut and thrust of trumpet, horns, piano. The Tailor's Journeymen are common folk; their dance shall have like savor, but harmony, instrumental voices and fancy with rhythm shall make it piquant. Leading personages upon the stage, Strauss gains the grave elegance that is the very note of stateliness in the theatre and the music of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries; while with it he charms twentieth-century hearers. It is hard to imagine more adept means, more delicate musical fancy, more felicitous illusion than he gains with his music for Cléonte and for the intermezzo of the Count and the Countess.

At every turn through these seven numbers—one more, a dance, the Courante, was omitted yesterday—the listener receives and enjoys a sophisticated simplicity. How gentle and graceful the melodies, how bright and light the rhythms, how elegant the ornament, how transparent the whole! The courtiers of Louis XIV. highly entertained by "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," might have taken hardly less pleasure in Strauss's decorations—were it not for a play of harmonies, of instrumental timbres that long outstrips their taste and time. Here is the gait, the air, the fancies and pleasantries of their music, but all savored—and so the more piquant—with the modulations, the harmonies, the timbres of quite another way and day. Tour de force is too stout a word for so delicate a thing, yet no other quite so well measures it—and a tour de force of freshness and dexterity, not of decadence or of mere bigness.

The more the pity, then, that the final and the longest division of the Suite falls below the rest. It is the music that accompanies the ceremonious dinner of Monsieur Jourdain and his guests and the dance of the young servants joined by one who has leapt from the omelette en surprise. Again Strauss, as through the whole Suite, gains fine sonorities from his little orchestra; again he makes modulation and dissonance serve the circumstances of a somewhat disturbed meal; the dance goes piquantly enough, but not quite with the animation and the fancy of the tripping tailors. The likelihood is that he is over-occupied with a delineative purpose; that he is too eager for a humor he does not always gain. We must hear Wagner's Rhine-nixies when the salmon is served from that river; the sheep must bleat for a moment out of his own "Don Quixote" when the maitre d'hotel hands the relève of mutton; as some say, the kitchen youth have heard—and remember—dances in "Electra" and "Salome" and presume (say two hundred years before) to parody them. All this, however, proves to be mere "paper-music," to be read at leisure in the score, but hardly to be heard in the quick commerce of theatre or concert-hall. Straussian taste is not impeccable in these matters; Straussian humor has been known in sundry times and places to seem humorless. As it was, the listener heard yesterday in this "dinner-music" an over-long, over-elaborated, rather mystifying and pedantic piece, written less for the play and the audience than for the composer's own satisfactions. Somehow in a Straussian garden, there must always be a patch of thistles.

The new Suite is not short. For the first time in four years, the Symphony Concerts had opened door for a novel piece from Germany. Strauss still keeps no small prestige as composer; his music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" engrossed and pleasured the audience; the flower of the orchestra joined with Mr. Monteux to match finesse with finesse and delicacy with delicacy, to gain everywhere lustre and fragrance. Inevitably the rest of the concert seemed as prelude and postlude. The prelude was Schumann's Symphony in C major, which conductors still take from the shelves, which audiences still hear and applaud because, as the English say, "it is right and proper," so to do. But test this routine and decorum by the actual music, and the actual hearing. Seldom has Schumann written more turbidly, repetitiously, monotonously than in the three Allegros. Restlessly he strives, clamorously he insists—and there is no outcome except a flash or two of the beauty of romantic vision and romantic expression that even his struggles with the symphonic form and polyphony could not subdue. Through one movement—the Adagio—he sustains both the vision and the expression. The rest with all Mr. Monteux's pains, is dusty, even dull. Far freshe went the postlude—Beethoven's Concert for Piano in C minor with Mr. Levitzki's crystalline tone for the solo part, wit Mr. Monteux and the orchestra light o hand and smooth of voice, with Beethoven's gentler beauty of song playing ou of the Largo, with his stores of fanc darting swift and sure through Allegr and Finale.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB. 12

SYMPHONY IN LATEST BY STRAUSS

Suite From "Der Burger" for First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from his opera, "Der Burger als Edelman," a German corruption, with incongruous frills, by Hugo von Hoffmansthal, of Moliere's "Le Bouregois Gentilhomme," was performed for the first time in America at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mischa Levitski was soloist, playing the Beethoven C minor piano concerto. Schumann's C major symphony opened the programme. The symphony is aging, with the exception of the slow movement, aging fast. Mr. Levitski grows constantly in poise, in technical proficency and in beauty of tone. This he showed at once, as he also showed a musicianly comprehension of Beethoven's score, for his performance was not merely the performance of a complacent virtuoso.

STRAUSS' CURIOUS BAND

The audience applauded Mr. Levitski warmly. It applauded with still more warmth the music of Strauss. It applauded until Mr. Monteux made his orchestra rise and bow. This orchestra called for by Strauss was far from the normal strength and proportions of the Boston Symphony. Strauss' orchestra for "Der Burger als Edelman" is curiously arranged.

In the string division, which consists of six violins, four violas, four violoncelli and two double basses, each player has an individual part. In addition to the strings there is a woodwind choir consisting of two flutes, one interchangeable with piccolo, two oboes, one interchangeable with English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, one interchangeable with double bassoon. The brass choir asks for a trombone, two horns and a trumpet. There are many percussive instruments, a piano, kettledrums, side drum, bass drum, tambourine, campanella, cymbals, triangle and a harp.

Hoffmansthal wrote the libretto of "Der Burger" as he had written the librettos of "Electra" and "Rosen-Kavalier." The libretto of "Der Burger" is a strained affair. Jourdain, the suddenly rich bourgeois, gives a banquet, to which he invites noble guests. A young composer whom Jourdain patronizes has been asked to compose a short opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," and a farce, to amuse the guests. As the time is passing Jourdain tells his composer that he must perform both works at the same time, and thus they are performed, cheek by jowl, now a little of this one and now a little of that. Strauss said that the thing was symbolic of a young composer of genius at the mercy of capitalists and the like. He composed in various styles, in the manner of Moliere's day, in the manner of early Italian opera and in a vein of buffoonery.

In music for the supper scene he indulges in familiar Straussian tricks. Thus, as salmon from the Rhine are placed on the table he quotes the river music from "Rhinegold," and when mutton is brought the famous orchestral imitation of the bleating of sheep, from Strauss' own "Don Quixote," is heard. At the first performance of the new opera Strauss hung out signs requesting that the critics should not write about it until it had been given three times. Some critical gentleman then remarked that he supposed this was another joke, a joke about as good as Strauss' quotation of motives by Wagner and himself. Later Strauss revised "Der Burger," and the new version was heard in 1913.

Inscribed to Boston Symphony

There are eight numbers in this suite arranged from the opera. They are as follows: Overture to Act I.—Jourdain, the Bourgeios; Minuet; The Fencing Master; Entrance and Dance of the Tailors; The Minuet of Lully; Introduction to Act II. (Intermezzo; Dorantes and Dorimene—Count and Countess); Entrance of Cleonte; The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants). Mr. Strauss, very civil in these days to American orchestras, has personally, it appears, inscribed copy No. 21 of this suite to the Boston Symphony. Of more importance is his scoring and the nature of the music.

The scoring is very ingenious. It is probably in response to criticisms of Strauss' heavy, swollen orchestration in other works that he turns around in this one to show what he can do with a comparatively few instruments. He handles them resourcefully. There is no question about that. Frequently the impression is that of a full orchestra. At other times there are opportunities for delicacies and conceits, of which the composer hastens to avail himself.

Very Clever and Very Blase

When all is said and done, however, we cannot, with the best will in the world, admire this music. It is very clever, and also it is at the bottom very blase. It appears to be the music of a composer satiated with success, confronted with the limitations of his own nature, looking eagerly about him for a new idea, freak, amusement. Strauss imitates the idiom of Moliere's period skilfully. But when does he convince? When has one any idea that this is more than a box of tricks? The two minuets are pleasing. There is deliberate vulgarity and buffoonery in other places.

Following the dinner music there is a passage of the melodious and wonderfully well adjusted melody of Strauss which tells. There is at times a suavity that mocks the situations. The spectacle on the stage, with the music, would doubtless help this suite, but we cannot believe that repeated hearings of music from "Der Burger als Ede Edelman" would at all enhance Strauss' reputation with those who admire—and no more than ourselves—the flaming genius which inscribed "Till Eulenspiegel," "Tod und Verklarung," "Zarathustra" and other of the earlier works on music paper. It is too bad. Not only singers, but composers, should stop when they have reached the height of their careers, and not attempt longer to lure the public.

POST. FEB. 12.

ENGLISH MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

"Lodnon Symphony" Given—Thibaud's Artistry as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony" was played for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, in Symphony Hall. Williams, an Englishman of 49 years, benefitted in his style because of his contact with Ravel and other modern composers, although he is sincere and authentically English in his idiom in this symphony. He has allowed to appear a programmatic explanation of his music.

FEELING AND MOOD

The symphony is in four movements. The first, one finds, may be taken as expressing London at dawn—the flowing of the Thames, the striking of "Big Ben" in Westminster tower, the noises of the Strand, the comparative hush of the Adelphi district, a district aged, run down and full of memories, and again the bustle, yells and racket of the Strand. The second movement is inspired by the thought of Bloomsbury in the foggy twilight of a November day, the Bloomsbury of poverty, of shabby streets and hollow gentility. The third movement, in carnival vein, is Saturday night in a bench of the Temple Embankment. The last movement, in the nature of an apotheosis, speaks of poverty, the march of the unemployed, the tragedy, the poetry, the enigma of London.

There is feeling and mood in this symphony, which is too long and padded. At least it is music by a composer sincere and sensitive to the atmosphere of his town. There is the echo of the din of city streets, the gayety and vulgarity of the "pub," the smack of folk tune, or rather street cry, here and there, as in the delightful quotation of "Sweet lavender; who'll buy my lavender?"

First Movement Best

The first movement seems by far the best. The introduction is imaginative—the grayness of dawn, the silence of the river, the distant chime of the clock and the pages, following which are weird and exciting. The slow movement has poetic atmosphere, though it is long drawn out. There is animation [illegible] passages of the third movement, but it is patchy, and the last movement peters out. It would have been better, it seemed to us, had Mr. Williams taken his material, condensed it and written a symphonic poem in one movement.

On the other hand, it is recognizable that here, at least is an Englishman with infinitely more consciousness of his locality than that shown by the pinchbeck Londonism of Edward Elgar. And the themes are not merely quoted. They are treated sympathetically, and are often given a special significance. At other times there is mere manipulation and treading of water. Orchestrally there is felt the influence of Strawinsky. Since the Strawinsky of one decade is not the Strawinsky of another because of his incredibly rapid evolution let us be explicit: The Strawinsky of Petrouchka, whose color scheme and rhythmic and instrumental effects haunt Mr. Williams until at times he becomes imitative. The performance was a triumph of fine nuance and brilliant virtuosity, thanks to Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud's Playing

Jacques Thibaud, violinist, gave an unforgetable performance of Mozart's E flat concerto. One is tempted to say that this concerto could not be played with greater art. We shall hesitate to go in to a concert hall when another violinist than Mr. Thibaud performs it. The perfection of line, the classic grace and continency of expression, at the same time, the warm quality of the tone and the expressive singing of lovely melodies constituted a veritable revelation of Mozart. Mr. Thibaud was warmly applauded. The applause should have been frantic in order to be proportionate, when one recalls an occasion not many weeks ago in which a young violinist played in a manner decidedly superficial and received more recalls, longer applause than did Mr. Thibaud yesterday. "Sic transit . . ."

Chabrier's Overture

Chabrier's wild and dramatic overture to "Gwendoline" ended the concert, and its superb performance was exhilarating beyond expression. Chabrier was first a temperament, then a musician, though a very gifted one, to boot. Who makes the orchestra blaze as he? Who evokes from the instruments a nobler tumult, a tumult more elemental as he thinks of the storm-swept coast of ancient Brittany, of the invaders from the north? Then there is the sensuousness and the forbidding and intensity of the love music. And then, alas, there is the atrocious musical parody of Walhalla—the climax where Chabrier not only falls short but falls clean to the ground with the barrel organ ditty which he gives his dying Harold and Gwendoline, as, expiring in the flames, they sing of Walhalla.

It is a caricature of nobility, with a Wagnerian appoggiatura to it which only increases the disgust one would feel—if the whole business were not so stirring that the one who listens can only choke and applaud!

POST FEB. 19.

THIBAUD SOLOIST

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will bring out for the first time in Boston, the "London Symphony" by the English composer, Vaughn Williams. This work, depicting the life and atmosphere of London, was introduced in this country a short time ago by Albert Coates, the English conductor, in New York. As soloist at these concerts, Jacques Thibaud will play with the orchestra Mozart's violin concerto in E-flat major (Koechel No. 268). The closing number will be the overture to "Gwendoline" by Chabrier.

HERALD. FEB. 13.

The "London Symphony" of Vaugha Williams, the English composer, chiefly known here by his song cycle "On Wenlock Edge," is an attempt to depict the life of a great modern city in music. It has been received with interest and respect, though not with marked enthusiasm by the New York critics.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 15th program. "London Symphony," Vaughn Williams; Concerto in E flat (K. 268) Mozart; Overture to "Gwendoline," Chabrier. Soloist, Jacques Thibaud.

GLOBE FEB 13

Strauss Novelty at Symphony Concerts

RICHARD STRAUSS' orchestral suite, written as incidental music to the Moliere comedy, "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," was heard for the first time in this country at the Symphony Concerts given last night and Friday afternoon.

Generally speaking, it made a very agreeable impression, although parts of it suffered through lack of the stage action which it was intended to accompany. This was particularly true of the mock-gallant scene between the count and countess and also the serio-comic dinner scene, in which Strauss pokes fun at various characters.

Among the great composers of the day none writes so skillfully for the theatre as the Bavarian genius whom so many have hailed as the successor to Wagner. His ingenuity and fund of humor and melody seem to be boundless. All the qualities vein of "Le Dépit Amoureux" dissension in the Jourdain fami the bestowal of the young lady d. The excision of the plot and Turkish ceremony entails also th of Covielle, Cléonte's servant, th er clown from the Italian comed masks. The opening scene of the pl evised and violently abridged, to th riment of the diverting contrast be een the mercenary musician and th timental dancing master. A third of re of Act III. is cut out, removing th rigue; Act V. is amputated, a arly all of Act IV. The piece now ex th the interruption of the banquet dame Jourdain, this last scene bei written and somewhat reënforced, od lady becoming just a shade mo ulent than Molière made her. T t of the text is taken, virtually wi change from Bierling's faith anslation—as, indeed, the announ ent on Hofmannsthal's title-p ould lead one to expect. What ave left is: first, the character of Jo ain, sufficiently intact; the Fenc Master and the Master of Philosop uite unimpaired; a good bit of the ic and dancing teachers; a touch Madame Jourdain, and the best of Nic as much as we want of the titled ther vague adventurer, Dorante, e problematical Dorimène. This ma r is divided into two acts.

he Inserted Opera

"Ariadne auf Naxos" is the German t the opera which closes the performan nnouncement of it is made very early e play. The music teacher, introduci s pupil to Monsieur Jourdain, says: " a young man of extraordinary tale e is the same one who composed t pera 'Ariadne on Naxos,' which we ha e honor to present to you in your hou morrow evening." And further on, aft musical bit, we have this dialogue:

Music Teacher—Now just conceive a whole opera, heroic characters, a magnificent scene, costumes, lighting. You will be satisfied.

Jourdain—What kind of a scene will it be?

Music Teacher—The stage represents the desert island of Naxos, where Ariadne was deserted by Prince Theseus.

Jourdain—A desert island? That is not the kind of a scene anybody likes. Please let it happen somewhere else. . . . Have you taken care that the whole business shall be suitable for a widow? It must absolutely be adapted to a widow of noble station who insists on remaining a widow, but who finally finds it difficult to hold out.

Music Teacher—The opera "Ariadne on Naxos," in its plot is precisely what you want. Princess Ariadne, inasmuch as she is forever abandoned by her husband, Prince Theseus, is to be regarded as a widow in mourning; and when, at last, Bacchus approaches her and tries to comfort her—

Jourdain—Is he a shepherd?

Music Teacher—Bacchus? I mea the god Bacchus, the god of joy, who pictured as a blooming youth, ridin on a panther, with grape leaves in h hair.

Jourdain—Oh, that man. I don't car as long as he isn't a shepherd. An do have the desert island look reall splendid and comfortable. Don't b sparing of anything, especially th lighting. I shouldn't like the person fo whom I am arranging it all—but espe cially the funny piece at the end what did you say it was?

Dancing Teacher—Fickle Zerbinett and her four lovers.

Jourdain—Is there a reference to widow in that, too? . . .

Dancing Teacher—In a way. It about the inconstancy of women in general.

But there is much more. Immediat fter the close of the play there follo new scene by Hofmannsthal, connect e Bourgeois Gentilhomme with Ariad Ve are in a big hall in Jourdain's hou ere are two rival troupes engaged onsieur Jourdain for the evening's rtainment—one a classic Italian op mpany, led by a prima donna, un e auspices of the music master; her an Italian ballet and "comme ell'arte" company, consisting of Z netta and four men and patronized e dancing teacher. The one is to rm Ariadne, the other an improm nd dance; but they do not know wh to come on first, and dispute acrim usly. The prima donna, moreover, sses aristocratic scorn for Zerbine d her vulgar band, while the improv s nothing but contempt for the st era singers. Presently a servant unces that Monsieur Jourdain, a uch changing of his mind, has decided ave the two shows performed simulta usly. Consternation and despair! orst sufferer of all is the inspired c oser, who finds himself obliged to m uts in his beloved music in order to rd room for the introduction of the ot oupe. He is comforted by the danc acher as follows:

Cuts are the very thing that mak an opera popular, and the best thea tres pride themselves on having co tributed, by their cuts, at least as muc to the permanent success of a music work as the composer has done by th work he has put into it. The first th the lord high director of royal en tainments is accustomed to ask a is whether an opera contains first- cuts. It is really time for a cl musician to suit his convenience musician to suit his convenience at the start, compose a good lot of cuts into his score.

The opera itself is short. Ariadne, aken by Theseus, lies motionless b cave on the island of Naxos, pit Naiad and Dryad. Echo serves efrain. From time to time Zerbinetta ears as an interested spectator and nentator, and during a lull in the f the serious piece she and her co erform their little improvised co e flouting of Scaramuccio, Tru e Brighella by Zerbinetta and be nd Harlequin. Meanwhile A Harlequin. Meanwhile has determin amed and hopeless, has determin At this point the youthful B ears drawn by a mysterious attr adne takes him for Death and pr go with him in his boat; but the t ns to life and love, and the tw t transformed—Bacchus matured immortal. vinity. Ariadne become immortal, the r lights are turned down, ante and Dorimène make their hey had planned. When the hall is mined again Monsieur Jourdain finds is amazement that his guests are gone. ese well-born people" he declares, ve a natural, easy-going politeness— re is nothing like it! I wish I could e two fingers from my hand to be a n count or marquis and possess that definable something with which they d such distinction to everything they !"

---

FEB. 16

SYMPHONIES do not often tempt the younger generation of British composers, preferring freer and less extended forms of musical expression, leaving these "works of larger dimensions" to their elders like Elgar and Bantock. One among them, however, Vaughan Williams, has written a symphony by no means short and of somewhat singular design. It has become a rather noted piece in the newer British music; it was played a month ago in New York for the first times in America; it is to be heard for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts next week. A "London Symphony," Mr. Williams calls his music and in it he would suggest in tones various aspects of London, the spirit underlying, the atmosphere surrounding them, the sensations they kindle. Fog and the Thames embankment, the chimes of Westminster, a solitary fiddler in Bloomsbury, the throngs in the streets animated and gay or hard-pressed and sullen all have place in the scheme of a symphony that has avowed delineative purpose, yet well maintains itself as music. Since Mr. Williams is lengthy, two numbers only round out the programme: Mozart's Concerto in E flat for violin to be played by the sensitive expert and elegant Mr. Thibaud with inexhaustible and carressing finesse, and Chabrier's sonorous and impassioned overture to his opera, "Gwendoline."

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 14TH CONCERT

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered Friday at Symphony Hall was considered by Symphony patrons one of the most brilliant musical treats of the season.

Conductor Monteux's excellent direction, skillful and energetic, together with the work of Mischa Levitski, solo pianist, were outstanding features of the most interesting program, which, by the way, was not a long one.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS'S NEW SUITE FOR THE FIRST TIME

Incidental Music to Moliere's Comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Written as He Has Written Nothing Else — Simplicity and Sophistication, Old-Time Suggestion and Modern Flavor in Rare Blend—Schumann and Beethoven for Prelude and Postlude

COMPOSERS are a frugal folk. Having once put music to paper, they are exceeding loth to consign it to oblivion. From operas that speedily failed into oratorios that still endure, went Handel's handiwork. It is the pastime of antiquarians to trace the measures of a matured composer back to a discarded or unfinished page of his youthful days. Fragments of Concertos forgotten somehow slip into Symphonies perennial. If memory holds, there never was a performance of Lalo's opera, "Fiesque"; but in "The King of Ys," "Namouna," and his symphonic pieces many ears have heard much of the music. Scotland and Spain are hardly near neighbors, and Sir Walter Scott and Messieurs Merimée, Meilhac, and Halévy are not exactly close kin; but here and there—the explorers of trifles say—Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth" fed Bizet's "Carmen." And so onward with instance upon instance. No wonder Richard Strauss follows in these well-marked footprints, since if half the gossip of Munich and Berlin run truly, he is of frugal mind in many other matters than music. "Thrift, thrift, Horatio!" Thereby do we gain villas in the Bavarian Highlands and sumptuous apartments in Charlottenburg, publishing our music even after a long war upon wide-margined paper, richly glazed, beautifully engraved, appropriately inscribed.

Nine years ago Strauss wrote incidental music—overture, entr'acte, "entrances," dances, songs—to a German version of Molière's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." He wrote it because he, Hofmannsthal—his usual librettist—and incidentally, Reinhardt, the theatre-director, had agreed to use the play as preface and frame to a short and fantastical opera, "Ariadne on Naxos"—mingling of mythological "lyric drama" in the "grand style" of the seventeenth and eighteenth century with the antics of the Italian Commedia dell' Arte. The two-fold piece was first represented at Stuttgart in the autumn of 1913; elsewhere a few other German theatres reproduced it; Sir H. Tree and Sir T. Beecham even ventured it in London. Nowhere, once the first flush of curiosity had passed, did the hybrid much interest the public. It was soon clear, besides, that since theatres lack singers and opera houses actors, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" plus "Ariadne on Naxos" would be seldom staged. Accordingly Strauss and Hofmannsthal took counsel with prudence, parted play and opera, shaped "Ariadne," into an independent piece. Again it would not be the truth to say that self-contained, it won and held audiences. High and dry, then, lay the incidental music to Molière's comedy. Not too often is it played on German-speaking stages; not many of them may readily assemble and practice an expert orchestra of thirty-six in Strauss's exacting score, while even before the war, the French preferred Lulli, who worked with Molière, to Strauss, who worked with Hofmannsthal. There was but one salvation, unless these incidental numbers were to go for naught—to assemble from then an Orchestral Suite for the concert-hall. At his leisure Strauss put it together, published it, despatched score and parts to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for first performance in America. Yesterday afternoon it was so played with the conductor, the prescribed band and the audience equally "on edge." All three had no small reward.

Nowhere else, seemingly, has Strauss written such music in such manner. His nearest approach to it are the so-called Mozartean passages (like the Trio at the end of the third act) in his "comedy with music" in eighteenth-century Vienna, "Der Rosenkavalier." There, however, the dimensions are larger, the pitch higher. For the incidental numbers to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Strauss reduces the orchestra to thirty-six—sixteen strings, each playing a separate part, paired woodwinds and horns, individual trumpet, trombone and decorative instruments of percussion. Keenest sacrifice to any composer in these days, he actually forswears two harps. Moreover, he uses his ornamental instruments sparingly—for the most part in only one division—while everywhere else he keeps his band at low or middle voice. Throughout, too, he writes with sedulous care of detail as though he were fashioning a fine embroidery in tones upon Molière's play. He seems not much concerned with the motivs he has invented to characterize one or another salient personage, like Monsieur Jourdain who would do as gentlemen do. In the concert-hall in particular, they come, they go, little impressing the hearer. Like the motivs whence the dances and the more decorative divisions of the Suite spring, they are no more than serviceable.

As usual with the Strauss of middle years, the treatment is everything and upon it he lavishes skill, resource, imagination. The harmonies move in delicate tracery or fanciful suggestion; the low-pitched instrumental voices speak with many tongues; the lightest of hands often sets the rhythms beating. Now, as in the overture, this incidental music runs gayly, smilingly, with little jets of mocking humor, as in the measures for pompous Jourdain. Again, as in the two Minuets, wistful melody, tinged with melancholy, marches to gentle rhythmic beat. The music of the Fencing-Master at play with his foils, glints with the light brilliance, the cut and thrust of trumpet, horns, piano. The Tailor's Journeymen are common folk; their dance shall have like savor, but harmony, instrumental voices and fancy with rhythm shall make it piquant. Leading personages upon the stage, Strauss gains the grave elegance that is the very note of stateliness in the theatre and the music of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries; while with it he charms twentieth-century hearers. It is hard to imagine more adept means, more delicate musical fancy, more felicitous illusion than he gains with his music for Cléonte and for the intermezzo of the Count and the Countess.

At every turn through these seven numbers—one more, a dance, the Courante, was omitted yesterday—the listener receives and enjoys a sophisticated simplicity. How gentle and graceful the melodies, how bright and light the rhythms, how elegant the ornament, how transparent the whole! The courtiers of Louis XIV. highly entertained by "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," might have taken hardly less pleasure in Strauss's decorations—were it not for a play of harmonies, of instrumental timbres that long outstrips their taste and time. Here is the gait, the air, the fancies and pleasantries of their music, but all savored—and so the more piquant—with the modulations, the harmonies, the timbres of quite another way and day. Tour de force is too stout a word for so delicate a thing, yet no other quite so well measures it—and a tour de force of freshness and dexterity, not of decadence or of mere bigness.

The more the pity, then, that the final and the longest division of the Suite falls below the rest It is the music that accompanies the ceremonious dinner of Monsieur Jourdain and his guests and the dance of the young servants joined by one who has leapt from the omelette en surprise. Again Strauss, as through the whole Suite, gains fine sonorites from his little orchestra; again he makes modulation and dissonance serve the circumstances of a somewhat disturbed meal; the dance goes piquantly enough, but not quite with the animation and the fancy of the tripping tailors. The likelihood is that he is over-occupied with a delineative purpose, that he is too eager for a humor he does not always gain. We must hear Wagner's Rhine-nixies when the salmon is served from that river; the sheep must bleat for a moment out of his own "Don Quixote" when the maitre d'hotel hands the relève of mutton; as some say, the kitchen youth have heard—and remember—dances in "Electra" and "Salome" and presume (say two hundred years before) to parody them. All this, however, proves to be mere "paper-music," to be read at leisure in the score, but hardly to be heard in the quick commerce of theatre or concert-hall. Straussian taste is not impeccable in these matters; Straussian humor has been known in sundry times and places to seem humorless. As it was, the listener heard yesterday in this "dinner-music" an over-long, over-elaborated, rather mystifying and pedantic piece, written less for the play and the audience than for the composer's own satisfactions. Somehow in a Straussian garden, there must always be a patch of thistles.

The new Suite is not short. For the first time in four years, the Symphony Concerts had opened door for a novel piece from Germany. Strauss still keeps no small prestige as composer; his music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" engrossed and pleasured the audience; the flower of the orchestra joined with Mr. Monteux to match finesse with finesse and delicacy with delicacy, to gain everywhere lustre and fragrance. Inevitably the rest of the concert seemed as prelude and postlude. The prelude was Schumann's Symphony in C major, which conductors still take from the shelves, which audiences still hear and applaud because, as the English say, "it is right and proper." so to do. But test this routine and decorum by the actual music and the actual hearing. Seldom has Schumann written more turbidly, repetitiously, monotonously than in the three Allegros. Restlessly he strives, clamorously he insists—and there is no outcome except a flash or two of the beauty of romantic vision and romantic expression that even his struggles with the symphonic form and polyphony could not subdue. Through one movement—the Adagio—he sustains both the vision and the expression. The rest with all Mr. Monteux's pains, is dusty, even dull. Far fresher went the postlude—Beethoven's Concerto for Piano in C minor with Mr. Levitzki's crystalline tone for the solo part, with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra light of hand and smooth of voice, with Beethoven's gentler beauty of song playing out of the Largo, with his stores of fancy darting swift and sure through Allegro and Finale.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB. 12

SYMPHONY IN LATEST BY STRAUSS

Suite From "Der Burger" for First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from his opera, "Der Burger als Edelman," a German corruption, with incongruous frills, by Hugo von Hoffmansthal, of Moliere's "Le Bouregois Gentilhomme," was performed for the first time in America at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mischa Levitski was soloist, playing the Beethoven C minor piano concerto. Schumann's C major symphony opened the programme. The symphony is aging, with the exception of the slow movement, aging fast. Mr. Levitski grows constantly in poise, in technical proficency and in beauty of tone. This he showed at once, as he also showed a musicianly comprehension of Beethoven's score, for his performance was not merely the performance of a complacent virtuoso.

STRAUSS' CURIOUS BAND

The audience applauded Mr. Levitski warmly. It applauded with still more warmth the music of Strauss. It applauded until Mr. Monteux made his orchestra rise and bow. This orchestra called for by Strauss was far from the normal strength and proportions of the Boston Symphony. Strauss' orchestra for "Der Burger als Edelman" is curiously arranged.

In the string division, which consists of six violins, four violas, four violoncelli and two double basses, each player has an individual part. In addition to the strings there is a woodwind choir consisting of two flutes, one interchangeable with piccolo, two oboes, one interchangeable with English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, one interchangeable with double bassoon. The brass choir asks for a trombone, two horns and a trumpet. There are many percussive instruments, a piano, kettledrums, side drum, bass drum, tambourine, campanella, cymbals, triangle and a harp.

Hoffmansthal wrote the libretto of "Der Burger" as he had written the librettos of "Electra" and "Rosen-Kavalier." The libretto of "Der Burger" is a strained affair. Jourdain, the suddenly rich bourgeois, gives a banquet, to which he invites noble guests. A young composer whom Jourdain patronizes has been asked to compose a short opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," and a farce, to amuse the guests. As the time is passing Jourdain tells his composer that he must perform both works at the same time, and thus they are performed, cheek by jowl, now a little of this one and now a little of that. Strauss said that the thing was symbolic of a young composer of genius at the mercy of capitalists and the like. He composed in various styles, in the manner of Moliere's day, in the manner of early Italian opera and in a vein of buffoonery.

In music for the supper scene he indulges in familiar Straussian tricks. Thus, as salmon from the Rhine are placed on the table he quotes the river music from "Rhinegold," and when mutton is brought the famous orchestral imitation of the bleating of sheep, from Strauss' own "Don Quixote," is heard. At the first performance of the new opera Strauss hung out signs requesting that the critics should not write about it until it had been given three times. Some critical gentleman then remarked that he supposed this was another joke, a joke about as good as Strauss' quotation of motives by Wagner and himself. Later Strauss revised "Der Burger," and the new version was heard in 1913.

Inscribed to Boston Symphony

There are eight numbers in this suite arranged from the opera. They are as follows: Overture to Act I.—Jourdain, the Bourgeios; Minuet; The Fencing Master; Entrance and Dance of the Tailors; The Minuet of Lully; Introduction to Act II. (Intermezzo; Dorantes and Dorimene—Count and Countess); Entrance of Cleonte; The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants). Mr. Strauss, very civil in these days to American orchestras, has personally, it appears, inscribed copy No. 21 of this suite to the Boston Symphony. Of more importance is his scoring and the nature of the music.

The scoring is very ingenious. It is probably in response to criticisms of Strauss' heavy, swollen orchestration in other works that he turns around in this one to show what he can do with a comparatively few instruments. He handles them resourcefully. There is no question about that. Frequently the impression is that of a full orchestra. At other times there are opportunities for delicacies and conceits, of which the composer hastens to avail himself.

Very Clever and Very Blase

When all is said and done, however, we cannot, with the best will in the world, admire this music. It is very clever, and also it is at the bottom very blase. It appears to be the music of a composer satiated with success, confronted with the limitations of his own nature, looking eagerly about him for a new idea, freak, amusement. Strauss imitates the idiom of Moliere's period skilfully. But when does he convince? When has one any idea that this is more than a box of tricks? The two minuets are pleasing. There is deliberate vulgarity and buffoonery in other places.

Following the dinner music there is a passage of the melodious and wonderfully well adujsted melody of Strauss which tells. There is at times a suavity that mocks the situations. The spectacle on the stage, with the music, would doubtless help this suite, but we cannot believe that repeated hearings of music from "Der Burger als Ede Edelman" would at all enhance Strauss' reputation with those who admire—and no more than ourselves—the flaming genius which inscribed "Till Eulenspiegel," "Tod und Verklarung," "Zarathustra" and other of the earlier works on music paper. It is too bad. Not only singers, but composers, should stop when they have reached the height of their careers, and not attempt longer to lure the public.

POST. FEB. 12.

ENGLISH MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

"Lodnon Symphony" Given—Thibaud's Artistry as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony" was played for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, in Symphony Hall. Williams, an Englishman of 49 years, benefitted in his style because of his contact with Ravel and other modern composers, although he is sincere and authentically English in his idiom in this symphony. He has allowed to appear a programmatic explanation of his music.

FEELING AND MOOD

The symphony is in four movements. The first, one finds, may be taken as expressing London at dawn—the flowing of the Thames, the striking of "Big Ben" in Westminster tower, the noises of the Strand, the comparative hush of the Adelphi district, a district aged, run down and full of memories, and again the bustle, yells and racket of the Strand. The second movement is inspired by the thought of Bloomsbury in the foggy twilight of a November day, the Bloomsbury of poverty, of shabby streets and hollow gentility. The third movement, in carnival vein, is Saturday night in a bench of the Temple Embankment. The last movement, in the nature of an apotheosis, speaks of poverty, the march of the unemployed, the tragedy, the poetry, the enigma of London.

There is feeling and mood in this symphony, which is too long and padded. At least it is music by a composer sincere and sensitive to the atmosphere of his town. There is the echo of the din of city streets, the gayety and vulgarity of the "pub," the smack of folk tune, or rather street cry, here and there, as in the delightful quotation of "Sweet lavender; who'll buy my lavender?"

First Movement Best

The first movement seems by far the best. The introduction is imaginative—the grayness of dawn, the silence of the river, the distant chime of the clock and the pages, following which are weird and exciting. The slow movement has poetic atmosphere, though it is long drawn out. There is animation and vivacity in passages of the third movement, but it is patchy, and the last movement peters out. It would have been better, it seemed to us, had Mr. Williams taken his material, condensed it and written a symphonic poem in one movement.

On the other hand, it is recognizable that here, at least is an Englishman with infinitely more consciousness of his locality than that shown by the pinchbeck Londonism of Edward Elgar. And the themes are not merely quoted. They are treated sympahetically, and are often given a special significance. At other times there is mere manipulation and treading of water. Orchestrally there is felt the influence of Strawinsky. Since the Strawinsky of one decade is not the Strawinsky of another because of his incredibly rapid evolution let us be explicit: The Strawinsky of Petrouchka, whose color scheme and rhythmic and instrumental effects haunt Mr. Williams until at times be becomes imitative. The performance was a triumph of fine nuance and brilliant virtuosity, thanks to Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud's Playing

Jacques Thibaud, violinist, gave an unforgetable performance of Mozart's E flat concerto. One is tempted to say that this concerto could not be played with greater art. We shall hesitate to go in to a concert hall when another violinist than Mr. Thibaud performs it. The perfection of line, the classic grace and continency of expression, at the same time, the warm quality of the tone and the expressive singing of lovely melodies constituted a veritable revelation of Mozart. Mr. Thibaud was warmly applauded. The applause should have been frantic in order to be proportionate, when one recalls an occasion not many weeks ago in which a young violinist played in a manner decidedly superficial and received more recalls, longer applause than did Mr. Thibaud yesterday. "Sic transit . . ."

Chabrier's Overture

Chabrier's wild and dramatic overture to "Gwendoline" ended the concert, and its superb performance was exhilarating beyond expression. Chabrier was first a temperament, then a musician, though a very gifted one, to boot. Who makes the orchestra blaze as he? Who evokes from the instruments a nobler tumult, a tumult more elemental as he thinks of the storm-swept coast of ancient Brittany, of the invaders from the north? Then there is the sensuousness and the forbidding and intensity of the love music. And then, alas, there is the atrocious musical parody of Walhalla—the climax where Chabrier not only falls short but falls clean to the ground with the barrel organ ditty which he gives his dying Harold and Gwendoline, as, expiring in the flames, they sing of Walhalla.

It is a caricature of nobility, with a Wagnerian appoggiatura to it which only increases the disgust one would feel—if the whole business were not so stirring that the one who listens can only choke and applaud!

POST FEB. 19.

THIBAUD SOLOIST

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will bring out for the first time in Boston, the "London Symphony" by the English composer, Vaughn Williams. This work, depicting the life and atmosphere of London, was introduced in this country a short time ago by Albert Coates, the English conductor, in New York. As soloist at these concerts, Jacques Thibaud will play with the orchestra Mozart's violin concerto in E-flat major (Koechel No. 268). The closing number will be the overture to "Gwendoline" by Chabrier.

HERALD. FEB. 13.

The "London Symphony" of Vaughn Williams, the English composer, chiefly known here by his song cycle "On Wenlock Edge," is an attempt to depict the life of a great modern city in music. It has been received with interest and respect, though not with marked enthusiasm by the New York critics.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 15th program. "London Symphony," Vaughn Williams: Concerto in E flat (K. 268) Mozart; Overture to "Gwendoline," Chabrier. Soloist, Jacques Thibaud.

GLOBE FEB 13

Strauss Novelty at Symphony Concerts

RICHARD STRAUSS' orchestral suite, written as incidental music to the Moliere comedy, "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," was heard for the first time in this country at the Symphony Concerts given last night and Friday afternoon.

Generally speaking, it made a very agreeable impression, although parts of it suffered through lack of the stage action which it was intended to accompany. This was particularly true of the mock-gallant scene between the count and countess and also the serio-comic dinner scene, in which Strauss pokes fun at various characters.

Among the great composers of the day none writes so skillfully for the theatre as the Bavarian genius whom so many have hailed as the successor to Wagner. His ingenuity and fund of humor and melody seem to be boundless. All the qualities that have distinguished his music for the twenty years are to be found in this remarkable suite. The audiences at the Symphony concerts truly reveled in its graces, its charming dance sections and its whimsical twists. After the performance Mr. Monteux and his men were given an ovation.

Alfred de Voto, the brilliant Boston pianist, assisted the small orchestra—less than forty men—that performed this most entertaining novelty.

Mischa Levitzki, who may lay claim to be the most brilliant and magnetic of the younger American pianists, was the soloist at this fourteenth pair of concerts. He chose the time-honored Beethoven concerto No. 3, in C minor. The performance was quite in the heroic Beethoven manner on the part of both Mr. Levitzki and the orchestra.

Th econcert sopened wiih a most enjoyable interpretation of the melodious Schumann symphony in C minor.

ADVERTISER FEB.13

Musical Events of Mid-Season ~~in Boston~~

CHIEF among the musical features of the last week was the pension fund concert given by the Symphony Orchestra, with an all-Wagner program, for this was the best showing made by the orchestra in the last four years. The magic power of Wagner's name was shown in the presence of an audience that crowded Symphony Hall and the splendid quality of the performance aroused enthusiasm like that which marked the recent Toscanini concerts. Mr. Monteux on this occasion demonstrated his breadth of sympathy, his heroic indifference to petty bigotries that grew out of the war and his ability to rise to a really great occasion. The orchestra vied with him in doing justice to an incomparable program.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will offer for the first time the "London Symphony" by the English composer, Vaughn Williams. Jacques Thibaud, the leading violinist of France, will play with the orchestra Mozart's violin concerto in E flat major. The closing number will be Chabriars "Gwendoline" overture.

ADVERTISER FEB.13.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, with the aid of a chorus trained by Stephen Townsend of Boston, has just given several much-praised performances of Brahms' "A German Requiem" in its home city and New York. What has become of the Boston Symphony Chorus which might have given us a similar performance of this masterpiece among such others as the Ninth Symphony?

This behavior contrasted strongly with that of the Friday Symphony audience, which weekly frequents the same august auditorium. But the supposed elite of "Society" with a capital "S" have their little ways, too, despite the fact that their multitudinous automobiles frustrate the efforts of some dozen traffic cops to "keep 'em moving" in Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues before and after each Friday Symphony.

What one perhaps irreverent young man is accustomed to call "the old ladies"—an unkind, but not inaccurate description of the audience—insist on coming late and making triumphant progresses down the long aisles, delayed by greetings to numerous acquaintances, while Mr Monteux waits with what patience he can muster to begin the second movement of the symphony.

Dr Muck used to turn a peculiarly Mephistophelean gaze upon such offenders. Mr Monteux has been seen to shrug impatient shoulders at them. Every music critic in Boston has scolded his typewriter into creeping paralysis bemoaning this lack of reverence for symphonic music, but all to no avail. The "old ladies" come when it pleases them, or their chauffeurs, with no trace of contrition in their manner when they disturb the assembled congregation by belated entrances.

Apparently they, many of them, depart when their chauffeurs please, too, for hundreds leave as nearly as possible at 10 minutes past four no matter what they are going to miss. But while they are there the "old ladies" at least refrain from chewing gum, which is a relief to one who detests the order of spearmint which sometimes hovers over other less select audiences, where younger ladies predominate.

Coming Symphony Programs

There are no Symphony concerts this week, since the orchestra is away on its final tour of the season. On Good Friday and Holy Saturday the "Graal Scene" from "Parsifal" and the preceding transformation music from the close of act one, will be given with the assistance of a mixed chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr Davison. The other numbers are Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, in F major, and Mr Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by Verlaine's poem.

On Sunday afternoon, April 10, the third and last Pension Fund concert will be given with an all-Russian program including a Tschaikowsky symphony. Wagner's music would probably draw a larger audience. A Beethoven-Debussy program also might pay better at the box office.

GLOBE FEB. 13.

Two pieces by American composers stand on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—the Suite from Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," and Mr. Schelling's "Fantastic suite," for piano and orchestra. Of the ballet-music, laid over from the concerts of last week, enough has been said in this place. The "Fantastic Suite"—with a Virginia Reel for the final movement—was first played in Boston in Dr. Muck's time with the composer himself as pianist. It then proved a fanciful, sparkling, generally amusing piece. Now Mr. Moiseiwitsch will play the piano-part. It invites his crispness of touch, his brightness of tone, the élan he can give to a displayful music. Brahms's second symphony will precede the two American numbers.

London as a New Symphony Pictures It

Vaughan Williams's Noted Music to Be Heard for the First Times in Boston

A SYMPHONY by a British composer is at last to be heard at the Symphony Concerts. For many years none such has made way into them. Mr. Fiedler in his distant days as conductor was kind to Elgar, was aware of Bantock. Dr. Muck paid no heed to English makers of music, though German audiences had listened to Elgar and been patient with Delius. Fortunately, Mr. Monteux is more open-minded, more inquiring than any of his predecessors, better disposed to make his programmes altogether catholic. Of late, besides, British composers generally have gained new standing in their own island, in the world beyond. The days of the country gentlemen who also wrote music, of the pedagogues who taught and exemplified it as a species of mathematics, have vanished. Presumably the Parrys, the Stanfords, the Mackenzies now haunt some limbo as respectable, conventional, dry and dull as their pieces. Even Elgar, Bantock, Delius seem somewhat apart from the new generation of Scott and Bax, Holst and Williams—a generation not so much younger in years as different in cast of mind, play of spirit, choice of procedure and quality of work.

In fine within these latter years, the newer British music, like the newer music of France, Italy, Spain, Hungary, has gained freedom and vigor, become the voice of imagination and individuality. Even Elgar and Bantock have felt these freshening impulses, as we shall hear when Mr. Monteux plays Bantock's symphony of the Hebrides or when if ever Elgar's new chamber-pieces make way to America. Usually the younger composers have preferred the elasticity of the tone poem, the orchestral fantasia, the orchestral suite to the more formal prescription of the symphony. Yet now and again one has chosen the more exacting form—notably Williams in the "London Symphony" to be played, for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of this week. It is already established in British concert-halls; it was heard for the first time in America when the English conductor Albert Coates visited New York and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last December; it has stirred curiosity in Boston and it promises to make lively impression.

Through the Music

In design and accomplishment, the "London Symphony" is descriptive music, suggesting a place, a life, even particular scenes and incidents, seeking to concentrate and convey therefrom imaginative and spiritualized impression. Williams himself has set no "programme" to it but Mr. Coates, who is in his confidence and who is warmly responsive to the piece has written such a note undoubtedly unfolding the composer's delineative purpose. Quoted from the programme-sheet of the New York Symphony Orchestra, it stands:

> The first movement opens (Lento) at daybreak by the river. Old Father Thames flows calm and silent under the heavy gray dawn, deep and thoughtful, shrouded in mystery. London sleeps and in the hushed stillness of early morning one hears "Big Ben" (the Westminster Chimes) solemnly strike the half-hour.
>
> Suddenly the scene changes (Allegro); one is on the Strand in the midst of the bustle and turmoil of morning traffic. This is London street life of the early hours—a steady stream of foot-passengers, hurrying, newspaper-boys shouting, messengers whistling and that typical sight of London streets, the coster-monger. Coster-'Arry, resplendent in pearl buttons and shouting some coster song-refrain at the top of a raucous voice returning from Covent Garden seated on his vegetable barrow, drawn by the inevitable little donkey. Busses, taxis, hawkers, flower-girls—a gay and careless picture, pulsating with life.
>
> Then for a few moments one turns off the Strand into one of the quiet little streets that lead down to the river and suddenly the noise ceases, shut off as though by magic. We are in that part of London known as the Adelphi, formerly the haunt of fashionable bucks and dandies about town, now merely old-fashioned houses and shabby old streets haunted principally by beggars and ragged street-urchins.
>
> We return to the Strand and are once again caught up by the bustle and life of London—gay, careless, noisy with every now and then a touch of something fiercer, something inexorable, as though one felt for a moment the iron hand of the great city, yet nevertheless full of that mixture of good, human, animal spirits and sentimentality that is so characteristic of London.
>
> SECOND MOVEMENT
>
> In the second movement (Lento) the composer paints us a picture of that region of London which lies between Holborn and Euston road, known as Bloomsbury. Dusk is falling. It is the damp and foggy twilight of a late November day. Those who know their London know this region of melancholy streets over which seems to brood an air of shabby gentility—a sad dignity of having seen better days. In the gathering gloom there is something ghostlike. A silence hangs over the neighborhood broken only by the policeman on his beat. There is tragedy, too, in Bloomsbury, and the music takes on a note of suffering; for among the many streets between Holborn and Euston there are alleys of acute poverty and worse.
>
> In front of a "pub" whose lights flare through the murky twilight stands an old musician playing the fiddle. His tune is a pathetic one played in the orchestra by the viola. The little tune breaks off, and one can see the old musician blowing on his numbed fingers trying to warm them. In the distance the "lavender cry" is heard: "Sweet lavender, who'll buy sweet lavender?" Up and down the streets the cry goes, now nearer, now further away. . . . The gloom deepens, accentuating the deep melancholy, and the movement ends with the old musician still playing his pathetic little tune.
>
> THIRD MOVEMENT
>
> In this movement (Scherzo-Nocturne) one must imagine oneself sitting late on a Saturday night on one of the benches of the Temple Embankment that part of the Thames Embankment lying between the Houses of Parliament and Waterloo Bridge). On our side of the river all is quiet and in the silence one hears from a distance coming from the other side of the river all the noises of Saturday night in the slums. (The "other" side, the south side of the River Thames, is a vast network of very poor quarters and slums). On a Saturday night these slums resemble a fair; the streets are lined with barrows, lit up by flaming torches, selling cheap fruit, vegetables, produce of all kinds; the streets and alleys are crowded with people. At street corners Coster girls in large feather hats, dance their beloved "double-shuffle jig" to the accompaniment of a mouth-organ. We seem to hear distant laughter; also every now and then what sounds like cries of suffering. Suddenly a concertina breaks out above the rest, then we hear a few bars on a hurdy-gurdy. All this softened by distance, melted into one vast hum, floats across the river to us as we sit meditating on the Temple Embankment.
>
> The music changes suddenly and one feels the Thames flowing silent, mysterious, with a touch of tragedy. On of London's sudden fogs comes dow making Slum-land and its noises seer remote. Again for a few bars, w feel the Thames flowing through th night and the picture fades into fo and silence.
>
> FOURTH MOVEMENT
>
> The last movement (Maestoso all Marcia) deals almost entirely with th crueller aspects of London, the Londo of the unemployed and unfortunate After the opening bars, in which on feels a sharp note of tragedy, we hea the "Hunger-March"—a ghostly marcl past of those whom the city grind and crushes, the great army of thos who are cold and hungry and unabl to get work. We hear agai the noise and bustle of th streets (reminiscences of the firs movement) but these now also tak on the crueller aspect. There ar sharp discords in the music. This l London as seen by the man who i "out and under." The man "out of job" who watches the other man g whistling to his work, the man who i starving watching the other man eat—and the cheerful, bustling picture of gay street life becomes distorted, a nightmare seen by the eyes of suffering. The music ends abruptly and in the short silence that follows one again hears "Big Ben" chiming from Westminster Tower.
>
> Then folows the Epilogue in which we seem to feel the great deep soul of London—London as a whole, vast and unfathomable—and the Symphony ends as it began with the river—old Father Thames flowing calm and silent, as he has flowed through the ages, the keeper of many secrets, shrouded in mystery.

Present and Past

To the matter and the method of the "London Symphony," to the whole music of Williams and to the man himself, an article in The Nation—the London weekly journal—affords further clew. "The 'London Symphony,'" it says, "is a very notable landmark in the career of a composer who is recognized by all except a handful of cranks and faddists to have been the most disturbing and vitalizing influence felt by English music for many a long day. If one says 'to have been' rather than 'to be,' that is simply because an enforced silence of five years was imposed upon Williams by the war, and we have scarcely realized that he is once more living and working amongst us. Now the silence is broken, and a drastic revision and condensation of the 'London Symphony' shows that in one respect at least the composer is unchanged. He is the same ruthless critic of his own work; more dispassionate, it may be, but no less indefatigable.

"It was always obvious both that Williams had a great deal to say and that he had a good deal of difficulty in saying it. Technical fluency did not come to him, as it often comes to smaller men, as a birthright; he has acquired it by prayer and fasting, by constant struggle and unremitting vigilance. If genius be an infinite capacity for taking pains, Williams is as clear a specimen of it as the world has yet seen. It is worth while to consider for a moment why his task has been one of such especial difficulty. And it should be borne in mind in the first place that he is no innovator for innovation's sake; he is a thorough believer in the solid structural principles exemplified in the work of the German masters; he insists, both in theory and practice, on the need of logical thematic development to give coherence to a work planned on any considerable scale. But—and here is his first difficulty—the traditional methods of symphonic development, from Hadyn's time down to those of Elgar and Franck, are based on the harmony of the scalic system, with its cut-and-dried tonalities, and cut-and-dried methods of modulating from one tonality to another. This system Williams rejects—clearly not from choice, but in obedience to some demand within.

"When one turns to see what he has put in place of the rejected system, one begins at once to realize the extraordinary difficulties to which he has subjected himself. The idiom he has ultimately evolved is the most remarkable compound of turbulent and contradictory elements. His harmony is based to a very large extent on the ecclesiastical modes. But these are not the only elements to be considered. Williams is no archaist; he speaks a language that is most emphatically of today. He borrows anything that may possibly be of use—the contrapuntal savagery of Purcell, the bold accentuations of Parry, the experimental discords of Debussy and his successors—all these he lays under contribution, and somehow, by a reckless empiricism, he manages to eliminate the finally intractable, and reduce the residue, by sheer crabbed force of will, to something like order.

"And this done, the real struggle is only beginning. Such a style of itself creates entirely new problems, not only of form, but of texture and orchestration. Hitherto he had been successful from this technical standpoint only in smaller pieces, where these problems did not all present themselves simultaneously. In the 'Mystical Songs,' for instance, the problem of abstract design does not arise; in the 'Phantasy-Quintet' he need not think of the orchestra. In the 'London Symphony,' for the first time, the problems of style, form and orchestral texture are all faced simultaneously and handled with a mastery clearly indicating that henceforth he will be able to say all that he has in him. The instrument is ready, and will be adequate for any purpose for which it is required."

Range and Fascination

"From the other point of view—emotional, spiritual, imaginative, call it what you will—one cannot speak of the 'London Symphony' with equal certainty. It is full of wonderful things, it has tremendous driving power. It is none the less premature to hail it as being all in all a greater work than the 'Sea Symphony.' You do not find in it the spacious vistas and limitless horizons of that music and of 'Toward the Unknown Region.' The 'London Symphony' is nothing if not true to its name, and London is no unknown region. It has a magic all its own, but it is a brutal and overpowering city, with something sinister in its tremendous undercurrent of vitality. And Williams's music sweeps you off your balance in much the same way; it is good and evil, sordid and majestic, enchanting and repulsive, all by turns and all together. At moments it takes on something of the menace of the underworld, then suddenly in the midst of the tumult, you come upon one of those mysterious quiet spaces in which the roar of London seems to fade, on the instant, out of one's consciousness, and one gets a glimpse of passion of tenderness, an instant of solemn and profound meditation, that seems to hint at a possible meaning behind this crowded welter of humanity—then as suddenly all is dispelled by some impish or brutal irruption that snaps the circuit and leaves you as you were before, lonely and bewildered in spite of the thronging multitudes all around you. All the throb of the city is in this music; even at its quietest one seems to be conscious of some vast undertow surging in the depths, just as in the very hush of night the rumble of London's traffic seems never to die away entirely. There is no challenging the power of this symphony, or the fearless truth of its expression, but there is something feverish and disquieting about it, and the calm at the end is the calm of reaction rather than of serenity. There is a questioning in it, and a weariness—the weariness of one who is not quite sure whether he loves London or hates her, yet knows that, loving or hating, he is forever a victim to her evil fascination."

TRANS. FEB.17.

SYMPHONY IN 15TH CONCERT

Vaughan Williams's "London" Played Here for First Time

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony was played here for the first time. The program also included Mozart's concerto, E flat major, for violin (Mr. Thibaud, violinist), and the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

When Mr. Coates came to New York as a "guest conductor" of the Symphony Society of that city, he brought out the "London" symphony (Dec. 30-31, 1920). A description of the work, signed with his initials, was then published in the Bulletin of that society. It is reasonable to suppose that this description was inspired by the composer, although he was reported as saying when the symphony was first performed seven years ago that various sights and sounds of London may have influenced him, but it would not be helpful to describe them; that the title might run, "A symphony by a Londoner"; that the work must succeed or fail as music, and in no other way. He probably had a change of heart while he was revising his work; or Mr. Coates may have persuaded him to describe the symphony, so that the hearer might not dilate with the wrong emotions or be wholly perplexed.

This description is of a pictorial, graphical, sociological nature. The first movement opens by the "calm and silent" Thames. One might add, with Mr. Coates's description: a foggy daybreak, a fog as Dickens saw it; a mysterious river, the one known to Rogue Riderhood. Then there is the noisy London of crowded streets, of shouts and whistling; the London of the costermonger. The scene changes to shabby districts. Again the Strand.

The second movement portrays a melancholy region that has seen better days. The night is falling. There is the thought of poverty and squalor. In front of a "pub" an old musician is fiddling. The cry of "Sweet lavender" is heard.

In the third movement Saturday night sounds from the slums are borne across the Thames embankment. In the streets coster-girls are dancing. There is the music of mouth-organ, concertina, hurdy-gurdy. The Thames flows on in the foggy night, and there is silence.

The finale opens with a "Hunger March" of those out of work, pinched with the cold, starving. The former gay scenes of the first movement are now distorted, as viewed by the eyes of the oppressed. There are cruel discords. At last, as in an epilogue, there is "vast and unfathomable London." The symphony ends as it began with the Thames, "the keeper of many secrets, shrouded in mystery."

Mr. Coates's description, which we have greatly condensed, is entertaining reading; but the title, "London," should be enough for one that knows that city, is imaginative and prepared to meet the composer half-way.

The symphony is profoundly impressive, musically, with or without a program. Many of the pages are sinister, even cruel, reminding one of the London through which De Quincey wandered with the poor girl who vanished, and he searched in memory in after years. A stony-hearted London! And even the reckless, vulgar gayety is not the coarse jollity of the happy and unthinking. The introduction is, perhaps, the most poetic portion of the work. It is singularly original, with its impassiveness, its remoteness from every-day life, its absence of everything earthly or spiritual. Almost as fortunate is the reproduction of street life.

It seemed to us that the slow movement steeped in melancholy, nay rather utter hopelessness, would have been more effective if it had been performed at a little faster pace; and we should have liked a madder, yes, coarser, performance of the Scherzo. There is no more vulgar mob than that of London. In this Scherzo "Arry" and "Arriet" should make the welkin ring; the street girls should dance till their hats bob tipsily, till their dishevelled hair streams in the wind. Yet the performance, as a whole, was noteworthy, one that brought out the singular talent of an English musician, whose idiom is his own, whose audacity is tempered by art, who does not see the life of London merely for the sake of musical portraiture, but suffers himself, in the [illegible] of "the complaining millions of men." A composer that looks on poverty, hunger, loneliness, merely as a novelist in search of copy, without human sympathy, could never have written the last movement.

There is so much native vigor in this music, so much realism that is not photographic; there is so strong an appeal, that chatter about the composer's technical methods, harmonic schemes, orchestral devices and inventions, would be impertinent. The symphony is worthy of the man that wrote "On Wenlock's Edge."

Seldom is such pure, chaste, classic, yet warm and sympathetic violin playing heard in Symphony Hall or any other hall as was heard yesterday. One might add the adjective "elegant" if that word were not sadly abused in these days. Mr. Thibaud played Mozart's music as Mozart would have liked to hear it. There are fiddlers. There are violinists. There are a few great artists that have chosen the violin as a means of imparting, or creating beauty; Mr. Thibaud is of them.

The concert closed with a spirited performance of Chabrier's tempestuous, tumultuous overture.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony, No. 2; Carpenter, Suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time here); Schelling, Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra (Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist).

HERALD FEB 17

New Music by Mr. Carpenter from the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Schelling's Fantastic Suite to Be Revived—Verdi's Requiem Again—Novel Pieces by Malipiero

IN the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Monteux has found room for the orchestral suite drawn by Mr. Carpenter from his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," originally composed for performance a week ago. [illegible] that have distinguished his music for the twenty years are to be found in this remarkable suite. The audiences at the Symphony concerts truly reveled in its graces, its charming dance sections and its whimsical twists. After the performance Mr. Monteux and his men were given an ovation.

Alfred de Voto, the brilliant Boston pianist, assisted the small orchestra—less than forty men—that performed this most entertaining novelty.

Mischa Levitzki, who may lay claim to be the most brilliant and magnetic of the younger American pianists, was the soloist at this fourteenth pair of concerts. He chose the time-honored Beethoven concerto No. 3, in C minor. The performance was quite in the heroic Beethoven manner on the part of both Mr. Levitzki and the orchestra.

Th econcert sopened wiih a most enjoyable interpretation of the melodious Schumann symphony in C minor.

ADVERTISER FEB. 13

Musical Events of Mid-Season in Boston

CHIEF among the musical features of the last week was the pension fund concert given by the Symphony Orchestra, with an all-Wagner program, for this was the best showing made by the orchestra in the last four years. The magic power of Wagner's name was shown in the presence of an audience that crowded Symphony Hall and the splendid quality of the performance aroused enthusiasm like that which marked the recent Toscanini concerts. Mr. Monteux on this occasion demonstrated his breadth of sympathy, his heroic indifference to petty bigotries that grew out of the war and his ability to rise to a really great occasion. The orchestra vied with him in doing justice to an incomparable program.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will offer for the first time the "London Symphony" by the English composer, Vaughn Williams. Jacques Thibaud, the leading violinist of France, will play with the orchestra Mozart's violin concerto in E flat major. The closing number will be Chabriars "Gwendoline" overture.

ADVERTISER FEB. 13.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, with the aid of a chorus trained by Stephen Townsend of Boston, has just given several much-praised performances of Brahms' "A German Requiem" in its home city and New York. What has become of the Boston Symphony Chorus which might have given us a similar performance of this masterpiece among such others as the Ninth Symphony?

This behavior contrasted strongly with that of the Friday Symphony audience, which weekly frequents the same august auditorium. But the supposed elite of "Society" with a capital "S" have their little ways, too, despite the fact that their multitudinous automobiles frustrate the efforts of some dozen traffic cops to "keep 'em moving" in Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues before and after each Friday Symphony.

What one perhaps irreverent young man is accustomed to call "the old ladies"—an unkind, but not inaccurate description of the audience—insist on coming late and making triumphant progresses down the long aisles, delayed by greetings to numerous acquaintances, while Mr Monteux waits with what patience he can muster to begin the second movement of the symphony.

Dr Muck used to turn a peculiarly Mephistophelean gaze upon such offenders. Mr Monteux has been seen to shrug impatient shoulders at them. Every music critic in Boston has scolded his typewriter into creeping paralysis bemoaning this lack of reverence for symphonic music, but all to no avail. The "old ladies" come when it pleases them, or their chauffeurs, with no trace of contrition in their manner when they disturb the assembled congregation by belated entrances.

Apparently they, many of them, depart when their chauffeurs please, too, for hundreds leave as nearly as possible at 10 minutes past four no matter what they are going to miss. But while they are there the "old ladies" at least refrain from chewing gum, which is a relief to one who detests the order of spearmint which sometimes hovers over other less select audiences, where younger ladies predominate.

Coming Symphony Programs

There are no Symphony concerts this week, since the orchestra is away on its final tour of the season. On Good Friday and Holy Saturday the "Graal Scene" from "Parsifal" and the preceding transformation music from the close of act one, will be given with the assistance of a mixed chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr Davison. The other numbers are Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, in F major, and Mr Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by Verlaine's poem.

On Sunday afternoon, April 10, the third and last Pension Fund concert will be given with an all-Russian program including a Tschaikowsky symphony. Wagner's music would probably draw a larger audience. A Beethoven-Debussy program also might pay better at the box office.

GLOBE FEB. 13.

Two pieces by American composers stand on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—the Suite from Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," and Mr. Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra. Of the ballet-music, laid over from the concerts of last week, enough has been said in this place. The "Fantastic Suite"—with a Virginia Reel for the final movement—was first played in Boston in Dr. Muck's time with the composer himself as pianist. It then proved a fanciful, sparkling, generally amusing piece. Now Mr. Moiseiwitsch will play the piano-part. It invites his crispness of touch, his brightness of tone, the élan he can give to a displayful music. Brahms's second symphony will precede the two American numb

---

London as a New Symphony Pictures It

Vaughan Williams's Noted Music to Be Heard for the First Times in Boston

A SYMPHONY by a British composer is at last to be heard at the Symphony Concerts. For many years none such has made way into them. Mr. Fiedler in his distant days as conductor was kind to Elgar, was aware of Bantock. Dr. Muck paid no heed to English makers of music, though German audiences had listened to Elgar and been patient with Delius. Fortunately, Mr. Monteux is more open-minded, more inquiring than any of his predecessors, better disposed to make his programmes altogether catholic. Of late, besides, British composers generally have gained new standing in their own island, in the world beyond. The days of the country gentlemen who also wrote music, of the pedagogues who taught and exemplified it as a species of mathematics, have vanished. Presumably the Parrys, the Stanfords, the Mackenzies now haunt some limbo as respectable, conventional, dry and dull as their pieces. Even Elgar, Bantock, Delius seem somewhat apart from the new generation of Scott and Bax, Holst and Williams—a generation not so much younger in years as different in cast of mind, play of spirit, choice of procedure and quality of work.

In fine within these latter years, the newer British music, like the newer music of France, Italy, Spain, Hungary, has gained freedom and vigor, become the voice of imagination and individuality. Even Elgar and Bantock have felt these freshening impulses, as we shall hear when Mr. Monteux plays Bantock's symphony of the Hebrides or when if ever Elgar's new chamber-pieces make way to America. Usually the younger composers have preferred the elasticity of the tone poem, the orchestral fantasia, the orchestral suite to the more formal prescription of the symphony. Yet now and again one has chosen the more exacting form—notably Williams in the "London Symphony" to be played, for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of this week. It is already established in British concert-halls; it was heard for the first time in America when the English conductor Albert Coates visited New York and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last December; it has stirred curiosity in Boston and it promises to make lively impression.

Through the Music

In design and accomplishment, the "London Symphony" is descriptive music, suggesting a place, a life, even particular scenes and incidents, seeking to concentrate and convey therefrom imaginative and spiritualized impression. Williams himself has set no "programme" to it; but Mr. Coates, who is in his confidence and who is warmly responsive to the piece, has written such a note undoubtedly unfolding the composer's delineative purpose. Quoted from the programme-sheet of the New York Symphony Orchestra, it stands:

> The first movement opens (Lento) at daybreak by the river. Old Father Thames flows calm and silent under the heavy gray dawn, deep and thoughtful, shrouded in mystery. London sleeps and in the hushed stillness of early morning one hears "Big Ben" (the Westminster Chimes) solemnly strike the half-hour.
>
> Suddenly the scene changes (Allegro); one is on the Strand in the midst of the bustle and turmoil of morning traffic. This is London street life of the early hours—a steady stream of foot-passengers, hurrying, newspaper-boys shouting, messengers whistling and that typical sight of London streets, the coster-monger. Coster-'Arry, resplendent in pearl buttons and shouting some coster song-refrain at the top of a raucous voice returning from Covent Garden seated on his vegetable barrow, drawn by the inevitable little donkey. Busses, taxis, hawkers, flower-girls—a gay and careless picture, pulsating with life.
>
> Then for a few moments one turns off the Strand into one of the quiet little streets that lead down to the river and suddenly the noise ceases, shut off as though by magic. We are in that part of London known as the Adelphi, formerly the haunt of fashionable bucks and dandies about town, now merely old-fashioned houses and shabby old streets haunted principally by beggars and ragged street-urchins.
>
> We return to the Strand and are once again caught up by the bustle and life of London—gay, careless, noisy with every now and then a touch of something fiercer, something inexorable, as though one felt for a moment the iron hand of the great city, yet nevertheless full of that mixture of good, human, animal spirits and sentimentality that is so characteristic of London.
>
> SECOND MOVEMENT
>
> In the second movement (Lento) the composer paints us a picture of that region of London which lies between Holborn and Euston road, known as Bloomsbury. Dusk is falling. It is the damp and foggy twilight of a late November day. Those who know their London know this region of melancholy streets over which seems to brood an air of shabby gentility—a sad dignity of having seen better days. In the gathering gloom there is something ghostlike . A silence hangs over the neighborhood broken only by the policeman on his beat. There is tragedy, too, in Bloomsbury, and the music takes on a note of suffering; for among the many streets between Holborn and Euston there are alleys of acute poverty and worse.
>
> In front of a "pub" whose lights flare through the murky twilight stands an old musician playing the fiddle. His tune is a pathetic one played in the orchestra by the viola. The little tune breaks off, and one can see the old musician blowing on his numbed fingers trying to warm them. In the distance the "lavender cry" is heard: "Sweet lavender, who'll buy sweet lavender?" Up and down the streets the cry goes, now nearer, now further away. . . . The gloom deepens, accentuating the deep melancholy, and the movement ends with the old musician still playing his pathetic little tune.
>
> THIRD MOVEMENT
>
> In this movement (Scherzo-Nocturne) one must imagine oneself sitting late on a Saturday night on one of the benches of the Temple Embankment that part of the Thames Embankment lying between the Houses of Parliament and Waterloo Bridge). On our side of the river all is quiet and in the silence one hears from a distance coming from the other side of the river all the noises of Saturday night in the slums. (The "other" side, the south side of the River Thames, is a vast network of very poor quarters and slums). On a Saturday night these slums resemble a fair; the streets are lined with barrows, lit up by flaming torches, selling cheap fruit, vegetables, produce of all kinds; the streets and alleys are crowded with people. At street corners Coster girls in large feather hats, dance their beloved "double-shuffle jig" to the accompaniment of a mouth-organ. We seem to hear distant laughter; also every now and then what sounds like cries of suffering. Suddenly a concertina breaks out above the rest, then we hear a few bars on a hurdy-gurdy. All this softened by distance, melted into one vast hum, floats across the river to us as we sit meditating on the Temple Embankment.
>
> The music changes suddenly and one feels the Thames flowing silent, mysterious, with a touch of tragedy. One of London's sudden fogs comes dow making Slum-land and its noises seer remote. Again for a few bars, w feel the Thames flowing through th night and the picture fades into fo and silence.
>
> FOURTH MOVEMENT
>
> The last movement (Maestoso all Marcia) deals almost entirely with th crueller aspects of London, the Londo of the unemployed and unfortunate After the opening bars, in which on feels a sharp note of tragedy, we hea the "Hunger-March"—a ghostly marcl past of those whom the city grind and crushes, the great army of thos who are cold and hungry and unabl to get work. We hear agai the noise and bustle of th streets (reminiscences of the firs movement) but these now also tak on the crueller aspect. There ar sharp discords in the music. This i London as seen by the man who i "out and under." The man "out of a job" who watches the other man g whistling to his work, the man who is starving watching the other man eat—and the cheerful, bustling picture of gay street life becomes distorted, a nightmare seen by the eyes of suffering. The music ends abruptly and in the short silence that follows one again hears "Big Ben" chiming from Westminster Tower.
>
> Then folows the Epilogue in which we seem to feel the great deep soul of London—London as a whole, vast and unfathomable—and the Symphony ends as it began with the river—old Father Thames flowing calm and silent, as he has flowed through the ages, the keeper of many secrets, shrouded in mystery.

Present and Past

To the matter and the method of the "London Symphony," to the whole music of Williams and to the man himself, an article in The Nation—the London weekly journal—affords further clew. "The 'London Symphony,'" it says, "is a very notable landmark in the career of a composer who is recognized by all except a handful of cranks and faddists to have been the most disturbing and vitalizing influence felt by English music for many a long day. If one says 'to have been' rather than 'to be,' that is simply because an enforced silence of five years was imposed upon Williams by the war, and we have scarcely realized that he is once more living and working amongst us. Now the silence is broken, and a drastic revision and condensation of the 'London Symphony' shows that in one respect at least the composer is unchanged. He is the same ruthless critic of his own work; more dispassionate, it may be, but no less indefatigable.

"It was always obvious both that Williams had a great deal to say and that he had a good deal of difficulty in saying it. Technical fluency did not come to him, as it often comes to smaller men, as a birthright; he has acquired it by prayer and fasting, by constant struggle and unremitting vigilance. If genius be an infinite capacity for taking pains, Williams is as clear a specimen of it as the world has yet seen. It is worth while to consider for a moment why his task has been one of such especial difficulty. And it should be borne in mind in the first place that he is no innovator for innovation's sake; he is a thorough believer in the solid structural principles exemplified in the work of the German masters; he insists, both in theory and practice, on the need of logical thematic development to give coherence to a work planned on any considerable scale. But—and here is his first difficulty—the traditional methods of symphonic development, from Hadyn's time down to those of Elgar and Franck, are based on the harmony of the scalic system, with its cut-and-dried tonalities, and cut-and-dried methods of modulating from one tonality to another. This system Williams rejects—clearly not from choice, but in obedience to some demand within.

"When one turns to see what he has put in place of the rejected system, one begins at once to realize the extraordinary difficulties to which he has subjected himself. The idiom he has ultimately evolved is the most remarkable compound of turbulent and contradictory elements. His harmony is based to a very large extent on the ecclesiastical modes. But these are not the only elements to be considered. Williams is no archaist; he speaks a language that is most emphatically of today. He borrows anything that may possibly be of use—the contrapuntal savagery of Purcell, the bold accentuations of Parry, the experimental discords of Debussy and his successors—all these he lays under contribution, and somehow, by a reckless empiricism, he manages to eliminate the finally intractable, and reduce the residue, by sheer crabbed force of will, to something like order.

"And this done, the real struggle is only beginning. Such a style of itself creates entirely new problems, not only of form, but of texture and orchestration. Hitherto he had been successful from this technical standpoint only in smaller pieces, where these problems did not all present themselves simultaneously. In the 'Mystical Songs,' for instance, the problem of abstract design does not arise; in the 'Phantasy-Quintet' he need not think of the orchestra. In the 'London Symphony,' for the first time, the problems of style, form and orchestral texture are all faced simultaneously and handled with a mastery clearly indicating that henceforth he will be able to say all that he has in him. The instrument is ready, and will be adequate for any purpose for which it is required."

Range and Fascination

"From the other point of view—emotional, spiritual, imaginative, call it what you will—one cannot speak of the 'London Symphony' with equal certainty. It is full of wonderful things, it has tremendous driving power. It is none the less premature to hail it as being all in all a greater work than the 'Sea Symphony.' You do not find in it the spacious vistas and limitless horizons of that music and of 'Toward the Unknown Region.' The 'London Symphony' is nothing if not true to its name, and London is no unknown region. It has a magic all its own, but it is a brutal and overpowering city, with something sinister in its tremendous undercurrent of vitality. And Williams's music sweeps you off your balance in much the same way; it is good and evil, sordid and majestic, enchanting and repulsive, all by turns and all together. At moments it takes on something of the menace of the underworld, then suddenly, in the midst of the tumult, you come upon one of those mysterious quiet spaces in which the roar of London seems to fade, on the instant, out of one's consciousness, and one gets a glimpse of passion of tenderness, an instant of solemn and profound meditation, that seems to hint at a possible meaning behind this crowded welter of humanity—then as suddenly all is dispelled by some impish or brutal irruption that snaps the circuit and leaves you as you were before, lonely and bewildered in spite of the thronging multitudes all around you. All the throb of the city is in this music; even at its quietest one seems to be conscious of some vast undertow surging in the depths, just as in the very hush of night the rumble of London's traffic seems never to die away entirely. There is no challenging the power of this symphony, or the fearless truth of its expression, but there is something feverish and disquieting about it, and the calm at the end is the calm of reaction rather than of serenity. There is a questioning in it, and a weariness--the weariness of one who is not quite sure whether he loves London or hates her, yet knows that, loving or hating, he is forever a victim to her evil fascination."

TRANS. FEB. 17.

SYMPHONY IN 15TH CONCERT

Vaughan Williams's "London" Played Here for First Time

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony was played here for the first time. The program also included Mozart's concerto, E flat major, for violin (Mr. Thibaud, violinist), and the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

When Mr. Coates came to New York as a "guest conductor" of the Symphony Society of that city, he brought out the "London" symphony (Dec. 30-31, 1920). A description of the work, signed with his initials, was then published in the Bulletin of that society. It is reasonable to suppose that this description was inspired by the composer, although he was reported as saying when the symphony was first performed seven years ago that various sights and sounds of London may have influenced him, but it would not be helpful to describe them; that the title might run, "A symphony by a Londoner"; that the work must succeed or fail as music, and in no other way. He probably had a change of heart while he was revising his work; or Mr. Coates may have persuaded him to describe the symphony, so that the hearer might not dilate with the wrong emotions or be wholly perplexed.

This description is of a pictorial, ge graphical, sociological nature. The first movement opens by the "calm and s lent" Thames. One might add to M Coates's description: a foggy daybreak, a fog as Dickens saw it; a mysterious river, the one known to Rogue Riderhood. Then there is the noisy London of crowded streets, of shouts and whistling; the London of the costermonger; the scene changes to shabby districts. Again the Strand.

The second movement portrays a melancholy region that has seen better days. The night is falling. There is the thought of poverty and squalor. In front of a "pub" an old musician is fiddling. The cry of "Sweet lavender" is heard.

In the third movement Saturday night sounds from the slums are borne across the Thames embankment. In the streets coster-girls are dancing. There is the music of mouth-organ, concertina, hurdy-gurdy. The Thames flows on in the foggy night, and there is silence.

The finale opens with a "Hunger March" of those out of work, pinched with the cold, starving. The former gay scenes of the first movement are now distorted, as viewed by the eyes of the oppressed. There are cruel discords. At last, as in an epilogue, there is "vast and unfathomable London." The symphony ends as it began with the Thames, "the keeper of many secrets, shrouded in mystery."

Mr. Coates's description, which we have greatly condensed, is entertaining reading; but the title, "London," should be enough for one that knows that city, is imaginative and prepared to meet the composer half-way.

The symphony is profoundly impressive, musically, with or without a program. Many of the pages are sinister, even cruel, reminding one of the London through which De Quincey wandered with the poor girl who vanished, and haunted his memory in after years. A stony-hearted London! And even the reckless, vulgar gayety is not the coarse jollity of the happy and unthinking. The introduction is, perhaps, the most poetic portion of the work. It is singularly original, with its impassiveness, its remoteness from everyday life, its absence of everything earthly or spiritual. Almost as fortunate is the reproduction of street life.

It seemed to us that the slow movement steeped in melancholy, say rather utter hopelessness, would have been more effective if it had been performed at a little faster pace; and we should have liked a madder, yes, coarser, performance of the Scherzo. There is no more vulgar mob than that of London. In this Scherzo "Arry" and "Arriet" should make the welkin ring; the street girls should dance till their hats bob tipsily, till their dishevelled hair streams in the wind. Yet the performance, as a whole, was noteworthy, one that brought out the singular talent of an English musician, whose idiom is his own, whose audacity is tempered by art, who does not see the life of London merely for the sake of musical portraiture, but suffers himself, is one of "the complaining millions of men." A composer that looks on poverty, hunger, loneliness, merely as a novelist in search of copy, without human sympathy, could never have written the last movement.

There is so much native vigor in this music, so much realism that is not photographic; there is so strong an appeal, that chatter about the composer's technical methods, harmonic schemes, orchestral devices and inventions, would be impertinent. The symphony is worthy of the man that wrote "On Wenlock's Edge."

Seldom is such pure, chaste, classic, yet warm and sympathetic violin playing heard in Symphony Hall or any other hall as was heard yesterday. One might add the adjective "elegant" if that word were not sadly abused in these days. Mr. Thibaud played Mozart's music as Mozart would have liked to hear it. There are fiddlers. There are violinists. There are a few great artists that have chosen the violin as a means of imparting, or creating beauty; Mr. Thibaud is of them.

The concert closed with a spirited performance of Chabrier's tempestuous, tumultuous overture.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony, No. 2; Carpenter, Suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time here); Schelling, Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra (Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist).

FEB 19

New Music by Mr. Carpenter from the Symphony Orchestra — Mr. Schelling's Fantastic Suite to Be Revived—Verdi's Requiem Again—Novel Pieces by Malipiero

IN the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has found room for the orchestral suite drawn by Mr. Carpenter from his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," originally proposed for performance a week ago. As set upon the stage last winter in New York and in Chicago, the piece retold a tale of Wilde, wherein a little Spanish princess keeps her birthday fête. To it comes a dwarf who dances in such fash as to win her eye and to touch her heart. His own responds—until he chances to discover in a mirror, his own ugly image. Disillusion drives him to a dance of despair and the little princess shrinks away from the presence of death. The constrictions of the concert-hall permit the transfer th ther of half Mr. Carpenter's pages—the music of the fête, the intermezzo of the mock bull-fight, the music of the trag end. Without the aid of action, scene, background and costumes, the Suite bears fresh witness to the composer's individual imagination and procedure. Nor has any American composer, before him, as sayed the difficult medium of mimod Brahms's Second Symphony—in D ma most pleasing of the four to many a h will precede the Suite; while the final of the programme is another numb an American composer, Ernest Sch Fantastic Suite for Piano and Orc It was first played at the Symph

a pictorial nature. The first the "calm and si-might add to Mr.
a foggy daybreak,
w it; a mysterious
own to Rogue Rider.
e is the noisy London
s, of shouts and whis-n of the costermonger;
ges to shabby districts.
nd.

ovement portrays a mel-that has seen better ht is falling. There is poverty and squalor. In " an old musician is fidy of "Sweet lavender" is movement Saturday night

e slums are borne across mbankment. In the streets
e dancing. There is the h-organ, concertina, hur-e Thames flows on in the
nd there is silence.
opens with a "Hunger
ose out of work, pinched starving. The former gay first movement are now viewed by the eyes of the
here are cruel discords.
an epilogue, there is "vast able London." The sym-
as it began with the keeper of many secrets,
ystery."
's description, which we condensed, is entertaining
the title, "London," should
r one that knows that city, ve and prepared to meet
half-way.
ony is profoundly imsically, with or without a
any of the pages are sinisuel, reminding one of the
ugh which De Quincey
th the poor girl who van-unted his memory in after ony-hearted London! And kless, vulgar gayety is not llity of the happy and une introduction is, perhaps,
etic portion of the work.
rly original, with its im-
its remoteness from everybsence of everything earthly Almost as fortunate is
tion of street life.
to us that the slow move-in melancholy, say rather ssness, would have been ve if it had been performed
aster pace; and we should madder, yes, coarser, per-
the Scherzo. There is no
mob than that of London.
erzo "Arry" and "Arriet"
the welkin ring; the street
dance till their hats bob heir dishevelled hair streams
Yet the performance, as a noteworthy, one that the singular talent of an sician, whose idiom is his audacity is tempered by es not see the life of Lon-
for the sake of musical but suffers himself, is one nplaining millions of men."
that looks on poverty, huness, merely as a novelist in copy, without human sym-
l never have written the last

o much native vigor in this much realism that is not
c; there is so strong an aphatter about the composer's ethods, harmonic schemes,
devices and inventions,
mpertinent. The symphony of the man that wrote "On Edge."
such pure, chaste, classic,
and sympathetic violin play-
in Symphony Hall or any
as was heard yesterday. One the adjective "elegant" if
were not sadly abused in
Mr. Thibaud played Mo-
ic as Mozart would have ear it. There are fiddlers.
violinists. There are a few
ts that have chosen the vio-ans of imparting, or creating
r. Thibaud is of them.
cert closed with a spirited ce of Chabrier's tempestuous s overture.
cert will be repeated tonight.
am of next week is as fol-
ahms, Symphony, No. 2; Car-
uite from the ballet "The
of the Infanta" (first time
helling, Fantastic Suite for d orchestra (Benno Moiseianist).

ALD FEB 19

sic by Mr. Carpenter from the ny Orchestra — Mr. Schelling's
ic Suite to Be Revived—Verdi's Again—Novel Pieces by Ma-

programme for the Symphony
rts of next Friday afternoon and day evening, Mr. Monteux has om for the orchestral suite drawn Carpenter from his ballet, "The
of the Infanta," originally pro-
r performance a week ago. As the stage last winter in New
d in Chicago, the piece retold a Wilde, wherein a little Spanish keeps her birthday fête. To it dwarf who dances in such fash on
in her eye and to touch her heart
n responds—until he chances to
in a mirror, his own ugly image
ion drives him to a dance of des-
d the little princess shrinks away
he presence of death. The condi-
the concert-hall permit the trans-
her of half Mr. Carpenter's pages sic of the fête, the intermezzo o k bull-fight, the music of the trag
Without the aid of action, scen
ound and costumes, the Suite bear
witness to the composer's indivi gination and procedure. Nor b erican composer, before him, e difficult medium of mimodram
s Second Symphony—in D maj
ing of the four to many a he the Suite; while the final amme is another numb
composer, Ernest Sch [illegible]

---

rts in Dr. Muck's time with the composer as pianist. Some may recall it by ne final movement, a glorified Virginia reel. Throughout, however, it is a light ed flashing music. Next week Mr. Moiseiwitsch will play the solo part and his isp touch, bright tone, rhythmic zest and rtuoso-instincts should suit the music.

TRANS FEB 19

NEW MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

The outstanding feature of the 15th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was the first performance in America of "A London Symphony," by Vaughan Williams. A great city like London is filled with mystery and romance, sadness and sorrow, joy and happiness. Its personality is a composite of humanity and human emotions. It speaks with a thousand voices. What a thought to translate these voices into a musical composition of noble proportions! To paint the hushed stillness of early morning on the calmly flowing Thames, the bustle and turmoil of traffic on the Strand with the cries of the costers, the solemnity of Westminster; to catch the spirit of quaint old-fashioned streets, the mysteries and tragedies of November fog at twilight or the sounds of revelry. This is what Vaughan Williams has done in "A London Symphony." Not that this symphony is cheaply descriptive for he is symbolic rather than literal in his translations. He paints with the brush of the impressionist and therefore more truthfully. Mr. Monteux's reading of the four movements was rich in coloring and sympathetic. Especially beautiful was the nocturne music of the Scherzo and the Allegro vivace in the third movement.

Jacques Thibaud played Mozart's concerto in E-flat major for the violin with the orchestra. This was after the intermission, the second number on the program. Mr. Thibaud's rendering was received enthusiastically. Again he proved himself an artist of high ability before a Boston audience. The concluding number was the overture to the opera "Gwendoline," by Emanuel Chabrier—music of singular and at times tempestuous beauty. The orchestra was at its best. The audience was large and freely expressed its approval. The entire program will be repeated this evening.

TRAV. FEB 19.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

OUTWORN CHABRIER AND MOZART TRANSFIGURED

The Frenchman's Resounding Overture Feels the Years—Mr. Thibaud as Divining, Transmitting and, for the Hour Flawless Violinist—The "London Symphony" Evades Mr. Monteux and the Music Suffers Accordingly

THE audience at the Symphony Con cert yesterday afternoon was un usually chary of applause. Onl when Mr. Thibaud played th solo-part in a Concerto of Mozart fo violin did piece—or rather performance—much stir it. To Vaughan Williams' new "London Symphony"—noted and n table work in kind—it returned only pe functory even desultory, plaudits and few zealots, rather than the whole lister ing company, recalled the conductor at th end and finally brought the orchestra als to its feet. Of old the public of "thes concerts" used to rise to Chabrier's Ove ture to his opera, "Gwendoline"; wherea it now whisked away homeward after few courteous clappings. Yet the qualit of neither music nor performance had ma terially diminished. The years hardl lessen Chabrier's vehemence when th marauding Danes, shouting and smitin through his first measures ravage the lan and the ear. His singing violoncellos ma still lay on and spare not with the musi of the passion of the Saxon princess fo the invading hero. No whit less loudl does Chabrier's Valhalla clang; cheapl theatrical remain the final measures o beatified vision. Chabrier does not smug ly imitate Wagner in the manner of Rabaud; he does not follow literally an of the Wagnerian formulas; yet had ther been no "Ring" operas, there would prob ably have been no "Gwendoline." Mor and more in the sifting of time, the over ture joins the other pseudo-Wagneria pieces in which Chabrier's generation o French composers was prolific. Bein such, it fails to endure. Moreover, noth ing but the composer's fire of spirit and energy of workmanship now save motiv and music from frequent commonplace while lapsing time and changing fashion are kinder to finesse than to force. Before long, the listener to Chabrier's overture suspects, there will be naught left of him in the "active repertory" but his Spanish rhapsody.

So measuring applause, audiences clearly feel these changes of the years and the modes with music, though they may not find words for them. As certainly they perceive and respond to the beauty, the poise, the insight of such violin-playing as Mr. Thibaud's in Mozart's Concerto, for which there are no words at all. In itself, it is no remarkable music. Much of it is no more and no less than workaday Mozart, even though as some say he purposed in his later years to rewrite the piece in the manner of his mature symphonies. The composer was often his own violinist; if not, according to the custom of those days, he left much to the performing virtuoso, who might be finely strung musician as well. The violin-part—and still more the accompaniment—were no more than hints from the composer. The dexterity of the orchestra would fill out his measures; the violinist, according to his degree, would add skill and taste, discernment and beauty. A first movement with two motivs in interplay, "passage-work" for the violinist's plasticity and finesse, songful measures for his sentiment; a slow movement of silken melody, melancholy of mood; a light and glinting finale and the Concerto was done—for a Mozart in perpetual flow of music through an easy-going day.

Such a violinist of Mozartean time, custom, imagination was Mr. Thibaud. His tone glowed with soft lustres; it moved in delicate undulations; it insinuated its own beauty and the beauty of the music into ear, mind, fancy. The "passage-work" of the first movement became a fine tracery of sound, a veritable embroidery upon the air, spun in tone that caught the lightest inflection of the composer, the slightest impulse of the violinist. Even the routine of the sonata-form became at Mr. Thibaud's hands an aerial, iridescent music. There were songful measures as well—in this first Allegretto, in the ensuing Adagio—played in serene and limpid flow, phrase melting into phrase, while here and there ornament ruffled like ripples the shimmering surface. Gentle sentiment played through this song while at every turn Mr. Thibaud gave it that light quiver, that delicate vibration upon air and ear which are life to such music, which are as fine flicks upon the hearer's perception and response. In this tremor—for it is hardly more—is the secret loveliness of such Mozartean song. Few musicians, playing his Concertos, his piano-pieces, singing his songs, divine it. Fewer still may impart it. In high degree Mr. Thibaud does both and in penetrating sensation upon his hearers draws from Mozart a hidden and characteristic beauty.

The violinist passed to the final Rondo, and caprice vied with elegance. Mr. Thibaud made it no "brilliant Finale." Rather, he kept the return of the motivs, the rhythmic élan, the flow of the figures, the little in-takes, as it were, of sustained song in light, fanciful, sportive play. Mozart, like the other composers of his day, would give these Rondos the voice, the air, of gay and adept improvisation—the conjurer in tones in final shake of his magic sack. Mr. Thibaud caught the intent, conveyed the illusion. Throughout the Concerto he was not merely faithful to the composer. He divined him with the keenest of perception, the truest of imagination. He served this divination with means for once free from every technical every temperamental, infirmity. Mr. Thibaud is wont to pursue an ideal perfection. Through a brief half hour yesterda he caught and held it. In years in th concert-hall he may know no fine achievement, his hearers no deeper deligh

---

Mr. Williams's "London Symphony" another, a different matter. With the bes will in the world the hearer who ha chanced to listen to it elsewhere, who ha read the composer's pages with a little imagination for sound, could not escape the impression that the music somewhat evaded M. Monteux. As a whole, it is more rugged, more forthright than he seemed to suspect. It asks bolder phrasing, sharper accents, rougher texture, more emphatic movement, progress, contrast than he chose to give it. There are British directness, even bluntness, in the "London Symphony"; where the mood and speech invite it, there is British heartiness as well. Mr. Williams designed the Symphony largely; he wrote it now with grave intensity; again with vivid imagery; in sober contemplation tinged with melancholy; often he would be sharp, strenuous, even drastic. Mr. Monteux softened him, refined upon him and the music suffered thereby.

The conductor caught the grey mystery, the subdued and haunting voice of the prelude of the river in everlasting flow beside the sleeping city; but it was possible to wish a sharper rhythm, a livelier color in the ensuing measures of morning stir and energetic folk. In the music of dusk and melancholy, of twilight shadows falling upon empty, weary places, Mr. Monteux mistook meditation for mourning. His pace seemed too slow; his phrases too long drawn; his mood too lugubrious. Mr. Williams surely designed his music of the Costers' Saturday Night to run roughshod; with intent he wrote flaringly, robustly. The conductor, as they say o drivers and horses, refused the compose his head.

Again in the so-called Hunger March—tone-picturing of the crushed and suffering, the envious and the rebellious—Mr Monteux softened harshness, subdued tumult, under-accented dissonance. So played the "London Symphony" seemed by no means its true self and made much less than full impression upon an expectant and then disappointed audience. The performance this evening may less dim and weaken [illegible] music that lacks neither light nor heat nor strength, and comment thereafter may prove more discerning and just. For the time record suffices—and regret that mischance should have overtaken new music of no small significance and worth—from a "new man," besides, with his English fellows, too little known in America.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB. 19.

Tonight's Boston Symphony Concert, 15th of the season, will be featured by an offering of "A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams. This symphony was played in Boston for the first time at Friday afternoon's concert. The program also includes Mozart's concerto in E flat major for violin, with the eminent Tihbaud as violinist, and the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

Williams' works are new here, a few of his pieces having been played in New York, however. He was a pupil of both Parry and Stamford. Conducter Monteux guided his artists through an exceptionally good offering of the English symphony. Mr. Thibaud's work on the violin at yesterday's concert was a bit of artistry which will be remembered for some time.

RECORD. FEB. 19.

WILLIAMS' LONDON SYMPHONY PLAYED

Thibaud, Violinist, Assists in Mozart Concerto

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" Overture Also in the Program

"A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams was the chief item on yesterday's Symphony program. It has been played in New York, but never before in Boston, where the composer, an Englishman, is known only by a few songs. Williams was a pupil of both Parry and Stanford, but his radical admirers praise him for having abandoned the dry principles they taught him.

True, his harmony is based not on Mendelssohn but on the modes found in old church music, yet it is seldom exceptionally dissonant. The four movements of his symphony are not constructed according to orthodox formula, but what structure they have seems to be simpler, more like a suite than like Brahms. His orchestration, except for a superabundance of percussion and brass, might be somewhat muddled Tchaikowsky.

The basic defect which should have prevented Williams from attempting anything as ambitious as a symphony is a poverty of melodic invention. He cannot, it would seem, compose a tune worthy to stand beside the strikingly original themes of Debussy.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave what seemed an unusually good performance of this symphony, and of Chabrier's trivial and bombastic overture to "Gwendoline," a piece totally unworthy of the composer of "Espana," which one hopes never to hear again at a Symphony concert.

Jacques Thibaud played the solo part in the violin concerto in E flat which goes by Mozart's name, though a large part of it, as recent investigation has shown, is not by Mozart, but the work of someone who completed it from scattered sketches left by him, as Sussmayer did with the "Requiem." Mr Thibaud produced an exquisitely lovely smooth, clear tone. His interpretation was fluent and graceful, but Mozart's vivacity escaped him. The audience received him cordially.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Next week, Moiseiwitsch, the admirable pianist who has hitherto played only once in Boston, will take the solo part in Schelling's "Fantastic Suite." The other numbers are Brahms' Second Symphony and Carpenter's Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta."

GLOBE. FEB. 19

SYMPHONY STAR IS THIBAUD

Jacques Thibaud, violinist, was the solo artist at the fifteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart's concerto in E-flat major, one of the most famous, published many years after the death of the composer and said to be not wholly of his authorship. To the lay ear it is truly Mozartian, and at all events is admirably adapted to the fine art of Mr. Thibaud. His performance was beautiful in the extreme, marked by tone of almost unearthly purity and sweetness, a technic as secure and a touch as light as the strong, fleeting wing of a bird.

He was recalled with insistence and was forced to return to the stage repeatedly in acknowledgment of applause.

The rest of the program consisted of "A London Symphony" by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, performed here for the first time; and Chabrier's overture to the opera, "Gwendoline." The symphony is of extraordinary interest; how far the music would be self-explanatory without the descriptive program invites again the futile discussion as to the interpretability of all so-called program-music. With the idea of the composer in mind, the music is engrossing, often thrilling. The London depicted does not seem the London of Dickens, but at times suggests it. There is poignancy in the last movement, depicting the gayeties of the city as seen through the distorted and heartsick vision of the unfortunate.

The performance was brilliant and sympathetic, and evoked so much applause that Mr. Monteux made the members of the orchestra rise and share the honors.

AMER. FEB. 19.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on February 18. The program follows: Vaughan Williams, a London symphony; Mozart, concerto for violin in E flat, Jacques Thibaud, soloist; Chabrier Overture to "Gwendoline."

Vaughan Williams' symphony was played for the first time here. Few modern works have made such a favorable impression. In spite of its modernity, the expression is never forced. There is never that searching for novel effects for their own sake so regretably frequent in other works of our own time. The melodic outline is always graceful and the harmony and orchestration are natural and unaffected, while at the same time interesting and original. The interpretation was sympathetic. Mr. Thibaud's playing is not suited, we are happy to say, to a public taste accustomed to the highly colored, self-assertive, flashy style of a certain school of violin playing often applauded to the echo. Mr. Thibaud is first a musician and after that a violinist of superlative attainments. His playing of Mozart's Concerto was a delight from beginning to end. Beauty of tone, nobleness of style, taste and refinement of expression were its characteristics. Such playing is all too rare and all too little appreciated by the musical public. Chabrier's Overture was brilliantly played.

MONITOR. FEB. 19.

Moiseiwitsch, recognized at his first appearance here last season as a pianist of the first rank, will be soloist at this week's Boston Symphony Concert. He has chosen to play Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," which the composer himself first played with the orchestra several years ago.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sixteenth program. Second Symphony, Brahms; Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," Carpenter; "Fantastic Suite," Schelling. Soloist, Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist.

GLOBE FEB. 20

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The first number on the program for the Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be the Second symphony of Brahms, in D major. Pierre Monteux will also conduct John Alden Carpenter's suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta." The first appearance at Symphony concerts of Benno Moiseiwitsch, the noted Russian pianist, will also be a feature. He will play Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite."

ADVERTISE-FEB. 20

Moiseiwitsch Soloist

The first number on the programme for the 16th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be the popular and melodious Second Symphony of Brahms in D major. Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert John Alden Carpenter's Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta." This music, arranged by the composer from his ballet which was so successfully produced last year, will be heard in Boston for the first time. The plot, which follows the short story of Oscar Wilde, describes the entrance of the Infanta, the dances for the guests at court, the bull fight, the entrance of the Grotesque, his fatal dance, and final tragedy.

The soloist will be Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist. He will play with the orchestra Ernest Schelling's sparkling Fantastic Suite.

POST FEB. 20.

London Symphony Introduced by Monteux

SO far as novelty is concerned, the most striking number on the fifteenth symphony program was "A London Symphony," by Ralph Vaughan Williams, a musician now living in London.

Americans first heard this interesting and in many ways admirable work when the Symphony Society of New York played it last December under the direction of Albert Coates, who then made his American debut as a conductor. Mr. Coates, whose appearances in New York aroused unusual enthusiasm, is expected to visit Boston next season. He was especially successful in his reading of his "London Symphony," which in effect is a series of tone pictures, illustrating the drab side of life in the English metropolis. The composition shows many Gallic touches.

The first movement pictures daybreak along the sluggish, misty Thames and, by way of contrast, the lively doings on the Strand, with costers singing and the crowd bustling noisily to and fro. Many passages proved to be of the same character as those depicting Paris street scenes in Puccini's "Boheme." The second movement paints the gloomy, shabby-genteel Bloomsbury section, with a fiddler scraping away before a "pub" and a sweet lavender pedler whining away with his old song. The third picture deals with "low" life echoes heard along the Thames Embankment and the last with the hungry and the unemployed. The "Hunger March" is a grisly bit.

The symphony is one of the most piquant and modern works that have come out of England since the 20th century began. Its performance was warmly applauded.

Jacques Thibaud, France's leading violinist, appeared with the orchestra in a most impressive performance of the Mozart concerto in E flat major. Thibaud again proved himself an artist of the first order.

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture was the final number on the program.

The steadily increasing brilliancy of the orchestra, guided by the skilled hand of Mr. Monteux, was marked throughout the entire performance of this well selected program.

ADVERTISER. FEB. 20.

[90]

MOISEIWITSCH SOLOIST

The first number on the program of the 16th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be the melodious Second Symphony of Brahms in D major. Mr. Monteux will also conduct at this concert Carpenter's Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta." This suite, arranged by the composer from his successful ballet, will be heard in Boston for the first time. The plot follows the short story of Oscar Wilde. Benno Moiseiwitsch, the famous Russian pianist, will play for the first time with the orchestra. Living in England for the last few years, playing in concerts of his own, and with the orchestras of Wood, Nikisch, Beacham, he has impressed the British public by the genius of his playing in a way that sets him above all others. Coming to New York last season, his concerts have won praise no less superlative in that and other cities. He gave a recital in Symphony Hall on Feb. 23 of last year. He has chosen for the Symphony concerts Ernest Schelling's sparkling Fantastic Suite.

HERALD FEB. 20.

RUSSIAN PIANIST NEXT SOLOIST

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the Russian pianist that will play at the Symphony concerts this week, was born at Odessa on Feb. 22, 1890. He studied the piano at Odessa with Dmitri Klimoff at the Music School of the Imperial Russian Musical Society, taking the Rubinstein Stipendary Prize at the age of 9. He afterward studied with Leschetitzky in Vienna. In 1909 he played in the Queen's Hall, London. Having lived in London since then, he has played repeatedly with British orchestras and given many recitals. He came to the United tSates in the season of 1919-20. In Boston he has played only once—a recital in Symphony Hall on Feb. 23, 1920. He is ranked among the very first of pianists now living. His wife is Daisy Kennedy, a celebrated English violinist, who, after a tour in Australia with her husband, came to the United States this season.

HERALD FEB 20.

of a pictorial, geo-al nature. The first s by the "calm and si-
One might add to Mr.
ction: a foggy daybreak,
ms saw it; a mysterious known to Rogue Rider-ere is the noisy London
eets, of shouts and whision of the costermonger;
nges to shabby districts.
and.
movement portrays a meln that has seen better ght is falling. There is poverty and squalor. In b" an old musician is fid-
y of "Sweet lavender" is

movement Saturday night
he slums are borne across nbankment. In the streets
e dancing. There is the
th-organ, concertina, hur-
e Thames flows on in the
nd there is silence.
opens with a "Hunger
ose out of work, pinched
starving. The former gay
first movement are now
viewed by the eyes of the
here are cruel discords.
an epilogue, there is "vast
able London." The sym-
as it began with the keeper of many secrets,
ystery."
's description, which we condensed, is entertaining
the title, "London," should
r one that knows that city,
e and prepared to meet
half-way.
hony is profoundly im-
sically, with or without a
any of the pages are sinis-
uel, reminding one of the
ugh which De Quincey
th the poor girl who van-
unted his memory in after ony-hearted London! And kless, vulgar gayety is not
llity of the happy and un-he introduction is, perhaps,
etic portion of the work.
rly original, with its im-
its remoteness from everybsence of everything earthly Almost as fortunate is
tion of street life.
to us that the slow move-l in melancholy, say rather essness, would have been ve if it had been performed
aster pace; and we should madder, yes, coarser, per-
the Scherzo. There is no
mob than that of London.
erzo "Arry" and "Arriet"
the welkin ring; the street
dance till their hats bob heir dishevelled hair streams
Yet the performance, as a noteworthy, one that
the singular talent of an sician, whose idiom is his audacity is tempered by es not see the life of Lon-
for the sake of musical
but suffers himself, is one
nplaining millions of men."
that looks on poverty, hun-
ess, merely as a novelist in
copy, without human sym-
l never have written the last

o much native vigor in this
much realism that is not
c; there is so strong an ap-
hatter about the composer's nethods, harmonic schemes,
devices and inventions,
mpertinent. The symphony
of the man that wrote "On Edge."
such pure, chaste, classic,
and sympathetic violin play-
in Symphony Hall or any
as was heard yesterday. One
the adjective "elegant" if
were not sadly abused in
. Mr. Thibaud played Mo-
ic as Mozart would have ear it. There are fiddlers.
violinists. There are a few
ts that have chosen the vio-eans of imparting, or creating
r. Thibaud is of them.
cert closed with a spirited
e of Chabrier's tempestuous, overture.
cert will be repeated tonight.
am of next week is as fol-
ahms, Symphony, No. 2; Car-
uite from the ballet "The
of the Infanta" (first time
helling, Fantastic Suite for d orchestra (Benno Moiseianist).

ALD. FEB 19

---

sic by Mr. Carpenter from the ny Orchestra — Mr. Schelling's
ic Suite to Be Revived—Verdi's
n Again—Novel Pieces by Ma-

programme for the Symphony
rts of next Friday afternoon and
day evening, Mr. Monteux has om for the orchestral suite drawn Carpenter from his ballet, "The
of the Infanta," originally pro-
r performance a week ago. As n the stage last winter in New
d in Chicago, the piece retold a Wilde, wherein a little Spanish
keeps her birthday fête. To it dwarf who dances in such fash on
in her eye and to touch her heart.
n, responds—until he chances to
in a mirror, his own ugly image.
ion drives him to a dance of des-
d the little princess shrinks away
he presence of death. The condi-
the concert-hall permit the trans-
her of half Mr. Carpenter's pages—sic of the fête, the intermezzo of ck bull-fight, the music of the tragi Without the aid of action, scenic ound and costumes, the Suite bear
witness to the composer's indivi agination and procedure. Nor ha merican composer, before him, e he difficult medium of mimodram e's Second Symphony—in D major leasing of the four to many a hear ecede the Suite; while the final it programme, is another number ican composer, Ernest Schelli Suite for Piano and Orch played at the Symphon erts in Dr. Muck's time with the com-oser as pianist. Some may recall it by he final movement, a glorified Virginia
eel. Throughout, however, it is a light
d flashing music. Next week Mr. Moisei-itsch will play the solo part and his isp touch, bright tone, rhythmic zest and rtuoso-instincts should suit the music.

TRANS FEB. 19

NEW MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

The outstanding feature of the 15th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was the first performance in America of "A London Symphony," by Vaughan Williams. A great city like London is filled with mystery and romance, sadness and sorrow, joy and happiness. Its personality is a composite of humanity and human emotions. It speaks with a thousand voices. What a thought to translate these voices into a musical composition of noble proportions! To paint the hushed stillness of early morning on the calmly flowing Thames, the bustle and turmoil of traffic on the Strand with the cries of the costers, the solemnity of Westminster; to catch the spirit of quaint old-fashioned streets, the mysteries and tragedies of November fog at twilight or the sounds of revelry. This is what Vaughan Williams has done in "A London Symphony." Not that this symphony is cheaply descriptive for he is symbolic rather than literal in his translations. He paints with the brush of the impressionist and therefore more truthfully. Mr. Monteux's reading of the four movements was rich in coloring and sympathetic. Especially beautiful was the nocturne music of the Scherzo and the Allegro vivace in the third movement.

Jacques Thibaud played Mozart's concerto in E-flat major for the violin with the orchestra. This was after the intermission, the second number on the program. Mr. Thibaud's rendering was received enthusiastically. Again he proved himself an artist of high ability before a Boston audience. The concluding number was the overture to the opera "Gwendoline," by Emanuel Chabrier—music of singular and at times tempestuous beauty. The orchestra was at its best. The audience was large and freely expressed its approval. The entire program will be repeated this evening.

[illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

OUTWORN CHABRIER AND MOZART TRANSFIGURED

The Frenchman's Resounding Overture Feels the Years—Mr. Thibaud as Divining, Transmitting and, for the Hour Flawless Violinist—The "London Symphony" Evades Mr. Monteux and the Music Suffers Accordingly

THE audience at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon was unusually chary of applause. Onl when Mr. Thibaud played th solo-part in a Concerto of Mozart fo violin did piece—or rather performance-much stir it. To Vaughan Williams' new "London Symphony"—noted and nc table work in kind—it returned only perfunctory even desultory, plaudits and few zealots, rather than the whole lister ing company, recalled the conductor at th end and finally brought the orchestra als to its feet. Of old the public of "thes concerts" used to rise to Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline"; wherea it now whisked away homeward after few courteous clappings. Yet the qualit of neither music nor performance had materially diminished. The years hardl lessen Chabrier's vehemence when th marauding Danes, shouting and smitin through his first measures ravage the lan and the ear. His singing violoncellos ma still lay on and spare not with the musi of the passion of the Saxon princess fo the invading hero. No whit less loudl does Chabrier's Valhalla clang; cheapl theatrical remain the final measures o beatified vision. Chabrier does not smuggly imitate Wagner in the manner of Rabaud; he does not follow literally an of the Wagnerian formulas; yet had ther been no "Ring" operas, there would probably have been no "Gwendoline." Mor and more in the sifting of time, the overture joins the other pseudo-Wagneriar pieces in which Chabrier's generation o French composers was prolific. Being such, it fails to endure. Moreover, nothing but the composer's fire of spirit and energy of workmanship now save motivs and music from frequent commonplace; while lapsing time and changing fashions are kinder to finesse than to force. Before long, the listener to Chabrier's overture suspects, there will be naught left of him in the "active repertory" but his Spanish rhapsody.

So measuring applause, audiences clearly feel these changes of the years and the modes with music, though they may not find words for them. As certainly they perceive and respond to the beauty, the poise, the insight of such violin-playing as Mr. Thibaud's in Mozart's Concerto, for which there are no words at all. In itself, it is no remarkable music. Much of it is no more and no less than workaday Mozart, even though as some say he purposed in his later years to rewrite the piece in the manner of his mature symphonies. The composer was often his own violinist; if not, according to the custom of those days, he left much to the performing virtuoso, who might be finely strung musician as well. The violin-part—and still more the accompaniment—were no more than hints from the composer. The dexterity of the orchestra would fill out his measures; the violinist, according to his degree, would add skill and taste, discernment and beauty. A first movement with two motivs in interplay, "passage-work" for the violinist's plasticity and finesse, songful measures for his sentiment; a slow movement of silken melody, melancholy of mood; a light and glinting finale and the Concerto was done—for a Mozart in perpetual flow of music through an easy-going day.

Such a violinist of Mozartean time, custom, imagination was Mr. Thibaud. His tone glowed with soft lustres; it moved in delicate undulations; it insinuated its own beauty and the beauty of the music into ear, mind, fancy. The "passage-work" of the first movement became a fine tracery of sound, a veritable embroidery upon the air, spun in tone that caught the lightest inflection of the composer, the slightest impulse of the violinist. Even the routine of the sonata-form became at Mr. Thibaud's hands an aerial, iridescent music. There were songful measures as well—in this first Allegretto, in the ensuing Adagio—played in serene and limpid flow, phrase melting into phrase, while here and there ornament ruffled like ripples the shimmering surface. Gentle sentiment played through this song while at every turn Mr. Thibaud gave it that light quiver, that delicate vibration upon air and ear which are life to such music, which are as fine flicks upon the hearer's perception and response. In this tremor—for it is hardly more—is the secret loveliness of such Mozartean song. Few musicians, playing his Concertos, his piano-pieces, singing his songs, divine it. Fewer still may impart it. In high degree Mr. Thibaud does both and in penetrating sensation upon his hearers draws from Mozart a hidden and characteristic beauty.

The violinist passed to the final Rondo, and caprice vied with elegance. Mr. Thibaud made it no "brilliant Finale." Rather, he kept the return of the motivs, the rhythmic élan, the flow of the figures, the little in-takes, as it were, of sustained song in light, fanciful, sportive play. Mozart, like the other composers of his day, would give these Rondos the voice, the air, of gay and adept improvisation—the conjurer in tones in final shake of his magic sack. Mr. Thibaud caught the intent, conveyed the illusion. Throughout the Concerto he was not merely faithful to the composer. He divined him with the keenest of perception, the truest of imagination. He served this divination with means for once free from every technical every temperamental, infirmity. Mr. Thibaud is wont to pursue an ideal perfection. Through a brief half hour yesterda he caught and held it. In years in th concert-hall he may know no fine achievement, his hearers no deeper deligh

Mr. Williams's "London Symphony" another, a different matter. With the bes will in the world the hearer who ha chanced to listen to it elsewhere, who ha read the composer's pages with a little imagination for sound, could not escape the impression that the music somewhat evaded M. Monteux. As a whole, it is more rugged, more forthright than he seemed to suspect. It asks bolder phrasing, sharper accents, rougher texture, more emphatic movement, progress, contrast than he chose to give it. There are British directness, even bluntness, in the "London Symphony"; where the mood and speech invite it, there is British heartiness as well. Mr. Williams designed the Symphony largely; he wrote it now with grave intensity; again with vivid imagery; in sober contemplation tinged with melancholy; often he would be sharp, strenuous, even drastic. Mr. Monteux softened him, refined upon him and the music suffered thereby.

The conductor caught the grey mystery, the subdued and haunting voice of the prelude of the river in everlasting flow beside the sleeping city; but it was possible to wish a sharper rhythm, a livelier color in the ensuing measures of morning stir and energetic folk. In the music of dusk and melancholy, of twilight shadows falling upon empty, weary places, Mr. Monteux mistook meditation for mourning. His pace seemed too slow; his phrases too long drawn; his mood too lugubrious. Mr. Williams surely designed his music of the Costers' Saturday Night to run roughshod; with intent he wrote flaringly, [illegible] robustly. The conductor, as they say o drivers and horses, refused the compose his head.

Again in the so-called Hunger March—tone-picturing of the crushed and suffering, the envious and the rebellious—Mr Monteux softened harshness, subdued tumult, under-accented dissonance. So played the "London Symphony" seemed by no means its true self and made much less than full impression upon an expectant and then disappointed audience. The performance this evening may less dim and weaken a music that lacks neither light nor heat nor strength, and comment thereafter may prove more discerning and just. For the time record suffices—and regret that mischance should have overtaken new music of no small significance and worth—from a "new man," besides, with his English fellows, too little known in America.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB. 19.

Tonight's Boston Symphony Concert, 15th of the season, will be featured by an offering of "A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams. This symphony was played in Boston for the first time at Friday afternoon's concert. The program also includes Mozart's concerto in E flat major for violin, with the eminent Tihbaud as violinist, and the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

Williams' works are new here, a few of his pieces having been played in New York, however. He was a pupil of both Parry and Stamford. Conductor Monteux guided his artists through an exceptionally good offering of the English symphony. Mr. Thibaud's work on the violin at yesterday's concert was a bit of artistry which will be remembered for some time.

RECORD. FEB. 19.

WILLIAMS' LONDON SYMPHONY PLAYED

Thibaud, Violinist, Assists in Mozart Concerto

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" Overture Also in the Program

"A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams was the chief item on yesterday's Symphony program. It has been played in New York, but never before in Boston, where the composer, an Englishman, is known only by a few songs. Williams was a pupil of both Parry and Stanford, but his radical admirers praise him for having abandoned the dry principles they taught him.

True, his harmony is based not on Mendelssohn but on the modes found in old church music, yet it is seldom exceptionally dissonant. The four movements of his symphony are not constructed according to orthodox formula, but what structure they have seems to be simpler, more like a suite than like Brahms. His orchestration, except for a superabundance of percussion and brass, might be somewhat muddled Tchaikowsky.

The basic defect which should have prevented Williams from attempting anything as ambitious as a symphony is a poverty of melodic invention. He cannot, it would seem, compose a tune worthy to stand beside the strikingly original themes of Debussy.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra gave what seemed an unusually good performance of this symphony, and of Chabrier's trivial and bombastic overture to "Gwendoline," a piece totally unworthy of the composer of "Espana," which one hopes never to hear again at a Symphony concert.

Jacques Thibaud played the solo part in the violin concerto in E flat which goes by Mozart's name, though a large part of it, as recent investigation has shown, is not by Mozart, but the work of someone who completed it from scattered sketches left by him, as Sussmayer did with the "Requiem." Mr Thibaud produced an exquisitely lovely smooth, clear tone. His interpretation was fluent and graceful, but Mozart's vivacity escaped him. The audience received him cordially.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Next week, Moiseiwitsch, the admirable pianist who has hitherto played only once in Boston, will take the solo part in Schelling's "Fantastic Suite." The other numbers are Brahms' Second Symphony and Carpenter's Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta."

GLOBE. FEB. 19

SYMPHONY STAR IS THIBAUD

Jacques Thibaud, violinist, was the solo artist at the fifteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart's concerto in E-flat major, one of the most famous, published many years after the death of the composer and said to be not wholly of his authorship. To the lay ear it is truly Mozartian, and at all events is admirably adapted to the fine art of Mr. Thibaud. His performance was beautiful in the extreme, marked by tone of almost unearthly purity and sweetness, a technic as secure and a touch as light as the strong, fleeting wing of a bird.

He was recalled with insistence and was forced to return to the stage repeatedly in acknowledgment of applause.

The rest of the program consisted of "A London Symphony" by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, performed here for the first time; and Chabrier's overture to the opera, "Gwendoline." The symphony is of extraordinary interest; how far the music would be self-explanatory without the descriptive program invites again the futile discussion as to the interpretability of all so-called program-music. With the idea of the composer in mind, the music is engrossing, often thrilling. The London depicted does not seem the London of Dickens, but at times suggests it. There is poignancy in the last movement, depicting the gayeties of the city as seen through the distorted and heartsick vision of the unfortunate.

The performance was brilliant and sympathetic, and evoked so much applause that Mr. Monteux made the members of the orchestra rise and share the honors.

AMER. FEB. 19.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on February 18. The program follows: Vaughan Williams, a London symphony; Mozart, concerto for violin in E flat, Jacques Thibaud, soloist; Chabrier Overture to "Gwendoline."

Vaughan Williams' symphony was played for the first time here. Few modern works have made such a favorable impression. In spite of its modernity, the expression is never forced. There is never that searching for novel effects for their own sake so regretably frequent in other works of our own time. The melodic outline is always graceful and the harmony and orchestration are natural and unaffected, while at the same time interesting and original. The interpretation was sympathetic. Mr. Thibaud's playing is not suited, we are happy to say, to a public taste accustomed to the highly colored, self-assertive, flashy style of a certain school of violin playing often applauded to the echo. Mr. Thibaud is first a musician and after that a violinist of superlative attainments. His playing of Mozart's Concerto was a delight from beginning to end. Beauty of tone, nobleness of style, taste and refinement of expression were its characteristics. Such playing is all too rare and all too little appreciated by the musical public. Chabrier's Overture was brilliantly played.

MONITOR. FEB. 19

Moiseiwitsch, recognized at his first appearance here last season as a pianist of the first rank, will be soloist at this week's Boston Symphony Concert. He has chosen to play Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," which the composer himself first played with the orchestra several years ago.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sixteenth program. Second Symphony, Brahms; Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," Carpenter; "Fantastic Suite," Schelling. Soloist, Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist.

GLOBE FEB. 20

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The first number on the program for the Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be the Second symphony of Brahms, in D major. Pierre Monteux will also conduct John Alden Carpenter's suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta." The first appearance at Symphony concerts of Benno Moiseiwitsch, the noted Russian pianist, will also be a feature. He will play Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite."

ADVERTISE-FEB. 20

Moiseiwitsch Soloist

The first number on the programme for the 16th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be the popular and melodious Second Symphony of Brahms in D major. Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert John Alden Carpenter's Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta." This music, arranged by the composer from his ballet which was so successfully produced last year, will be heard in Boston for the first time. The plot, which follows the short story of Oscar Wilde, describes the entrance of the Infanta, the dances for the guests at court, the bull fight, the entrance of the Grotesque, his fatal dance, and final tragedy.

The soloist will be Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist. He will play with the orchestra Ernest Schelling's sparkling Fantastic Suite.

POST FEB 20.

London Symphony Introduced by Monteux

SO far as novelty is concerned, the most striking number on the fifteenth symphony program was "A London Symphony," by Ralph Vaughan Williams, a musician now living in London.

Americans first heard this interesting and in many ways admirable work when the Symphony Society of New York played it last December under the direction of Albert Coates, who then made his American debut as a conductor. Mr. Coates, whose appearances in New York aroused unusual enthusiasm, is expected to visit Boston next season. He was especially successful in his reading of his "London Symphony," which in effect is a series of tone pictures, illustrating the drab side of life in the English metropolis. The composition shows many Gallic touches.

The first movement pictures daybreak along the sluggish, misty Thames and, by way of contrast, the lively doings on the Strand, with costers singing and the crowd bustling noisily to and fro. Many passages proved to be of the same character as those depicting Paris street scenes in Puccini's "Boheme." The second movement paints the gloomy, shabby-genteel Bloomsbury section, with a fiddler scraping away before a "pub" and a sweet lavender pedler whining away with his old song. The third picture deals with "low" life echoes heard along the Thames Embankment and the last with the hungry and the unemployed. The "Hunger March" is a grisly bit.

The symphony is one of the most piquant and modern works that have come out of England since the 20th century began. Its performance was warmly applauded.

Jacques Thibaud, France's leading violinist, appeared with the orchestra in a most impressive performance of the Mozart concerto in E flat major. Thibaud again proved himself an artist of the first order.

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture was the final number on the program.

The steadily increasing brilliancy of the orchestra, guided by the skilled hand of Mr. Monteux, was marked throughout the entire performance of this well selected program.

ADVERTISER. FEB. 20

MOISEIWITSCH SOLOIST

The first number on the program of the 16th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be the melodious Second Symphony of Brahms in D major. Mr. Monteux will also conduct at this concert Carpenter's Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta." This suite, arranged by the composer from his successful ballet, will be heard in Boston for the first time. The plot follows the short story of Oscar Wilde. Benno Moiseiwitsch, the famous Russian pianist, will play for the first time with the orchestra. Living in England for the last few years, playing in concerts of his own, and with the orchestras of Wood, Nikisch, Beacham, he has impressed the British public by the genius of his playing in a way that sets him above all others. Coming to New York last season, his concerts have won praise no less superlative in that and other cities. He gave a recital in Symphony Hall on Feb. 23 of last year. He has chosen for the Symphony concerts Ernest Schelling's sparkling Fantastic Suite.

HERALD FEB. 20.

RUSSIAN PIANIST NEXT SOLOIST

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the Russian pianist that will play at the Symphony concerts this week, was born at Odessa on Feb. 22, 1890. He studied the piano at Odessa with Dmitri Klimoff at the Music School of the Imperial Russian Musical Society, taking the Rubinstein Stipendary Prize at the age of 9. He afterward studied with Leschetitzky in Vienna. In 1909 he played in the Queen's Hall, London. Having lived in London since then, he has played repeatedly with British orchestras and given many recitals. He came to the United tSates in the season of 1919-20. In Boston he has played only once—a recital in Symphony Hall on Feb. 23, 1920. He is ranked among the very first of pianists now living. His wife is Daisy Kennedy, a celebrated English violinist, who, after a tour in Australia with her husband, came to the United States this season.

HERALD FEB 20.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Ballet-Music by Carpenter at the Symphony Concerts

The Dwarf (Mr. Bolm)

The Princess (Miss Page)

"The Birthday of the Infanta" Passes From Theatre to Concert-Hall

THE little princess—says the composer in his "Argument" for those who will hear but not see tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall—dressed in a costume of the Velasquez period, emerges from the palace alone. She is sad and depressed. She is convinced that her birthday has been forgotten. But she is interrupted by her old and ample nurse, who comes to prepare her for the great surprise. Almost at once the children, her birthday guests, begin to arrive—in twos, in fours, and finally in one gay and noisy flock. They run, they dance, they play. At the climax of their excitement a trumpet, a signal, is heard from behind the scene. Eager curiosity! Something is going to happen! A strange procession marches upon the stage. First come two enormous major-domos, with clothes and gesture bizarre and alike. They are followed by a file of solemn servants, each bearing a birthday gift, covered with mysterious wrappings, but large and satisfying.

The spectacle begins. First there are gypsy dancers, followed by a juggler and a tight-rope walker, a curious pair, the one tall and meagre, the other short and much too fat for his delicate profession. Then follows a bull fight, the best kind of all, a make-believe one with boys on hobby horses and a wonderful bull in plush.

Then comes the climax of the party. A weird and fabulous creature is brought in. He has been caught in the forest, and appears grotesque and misshapen. He is the last offering at the feast. At first he is timid and shy. His dance is one of strangely shifting moods, of fear and confidence. But in the end he achieves a dance of wild and absorbing abandon. The children applaud wildly, and the princess in her excitement throws her handkerchief to the fantastic. He is filled with extraordinary emotion. He wonders if it is a sign that she has found him beautiful. He wonders if, may be, she loves him.

The cook now comes out, a great fat creature, carrying a birthday cake with sixteen candles. There is great excitement among the children, and they follow cook into the palace. Pedro, the fantastic, cannot bear to be left alone. He follows and is repulsed by the major-domos. It is growing dark, so he clambers up to the palace windows. The scene changes; but the music does not stop, and almost at once Pedro is seen entering one of the palace chambers. It is gloomy. He can barely see. Suddenly he sees something coming toward him. He stops. It stops. Pedro has never seen a reflection, but suddenly the terrifying consciousness comes over him that this monstrous grotesque image may be his own. He holds up the handkerchief, and lo! it too appears before him. This is the last blow. H with inner agony the effect he ma made on the princess. He rep dance, only in perverted form, in he thinks it must have seemed to h he fails broken hearted and dies. T dren are seen in the background

the door as they play some game.
they come in, but they do not see th trate form. But the princess enter once detects the huddled shape of lying in the shadow to one sid steals up quietly to his side and She makes a mute appeal. Fina touches the handkerchief in his finding no response, starts back and slowly steals away.

A UNIQUE SYMPHONY

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS'S MUSIC IN RETROSPECT

A Piece That Haunts the Hearer and Seems Like No Other in Purpose and Achievement — Urban Sensation and Emotion Evoked from a Particular London Into Universal Appeal — Unusual Matter for Unusual Ends—The Baffling Measures

FIFTEEN pairs of Symphony Concerts have come and gone, plentiful in music new to Bostonian ears. Nine more pairs remain and, unless Mr. Monteux departs from precedent, they will abound also in novel pieces. From October through February none such has so deeply impressed many a hearer as Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" of last week; while none to come is likely to leave more enduring remembrance. For the first time a conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is finding place on his programmes for music from the newer generation of British composers. Mr. Monteux's earliest choice—Bax's tone-poem, "In the Fairy Hills"—was a glamorous, poetized, imaginatively conceived and finely wrought piece, flickering through sun-shot Celtic mist; yet in substance and in style, it was not far removed from much other music-making in our day. In contrast Williams's Symphony seemed as new and strange, as individual and penetrating as did four or five numbers from his song-cycle, "On Wenlock Edge," when they were heard, last winter, for the first time in Boston. Not many of the younger moderns, English, French, Italian, American, stretch so large a canvas as does he in this "London Symphony." As few fill it so amply and richly within and without, sustaining themselves to the end; for this music, unlike much other in our time, has depth as well as surface.

Throughout Williams writes with high seriousness, after much reflection and revision, in gravity of mood and intensity of expression, with controlled and directed power, never over blown, never quite exhausted. Little symphonic music of recent years is freer from rhetoric and device. The composer works with bare hand, with eye fixed on the object of his vision—the life, the aspects, the spirit of London that have wakened in him sensation and creation. Some German or other made a tone-poem, "Alt-Heidelberg," stringing together student songs and sentimental sweetmeats. (The piece was played in Boston in Dr. Muck's time.) Delius wrote a tone-picture, "Paris," too thickly stuffed and closely woven to yield any clear impression. Even Debussy in "Ibéria" sets a passing Spanish scene upon the theatre of his imagination and procedures. Again in contrast, Williams writes music of a city that has entered into his spirit, possessed and then released it. From inner impulse irresistible, not from composer's working will, seems to spring the "London Symphony."

Before music so generated and produced, the hearer takes little thought of method and means. Not in the concert-hall, but over his work-table for paper and print, does he recall Williams's architectural sense, achieving a symphony that, from first measure to last, is a unified, expanding, proportioned whole, with the end foreseen from the beginning, with the progress steadily adjusted and cumulated, without hollows as without protuberance. In such after-reflection again, the listener recalls the diversity of matter within this unity, the interweaving of tonal strands that knits it closely but not thickly, the manipulation of motivs to bind and character the music. Even in this retrospect, he may hardly define Williams's ways with harmony. The learned in such things relate them to certain churchly modes, find occasional precedent in the music of other composers. Enough that to the hearing ear they seem neither ancient nor modern nor ultra-modern, neither labored nor assimilated, but an inevitable and characterizing background to the musical thought, a play of light and shadow over the musical progress. There are composers in our day with a keener, a more imaginative ear than Williams's for individual instrumental voices; occasionally they serve his purpose; but quite as often he relies upon blended choirs in preference to isolated or accentuated timbres. And ever he remembers that in rhythm dwells the life of music. In fine, so fused are the matter and the manner, the substance and the form of the "London Symphony" that structure and procedure seem only the flow into expression of thought, mood, sensation.

Few modern symphonies begin in such sombre and mysterious splendor. In the imagery and the voice of the music the gray river changelessly encircles a gray and hidden world. Everlasting has been, everlasting will be, its flow. Like Saturn, the brooding god, so is it among streams. The light stirs, the air quivers, the veil of the mists is rent—and the music passes to the visioning of London. Variously in tones Williams sets his sensations—until of a sudden, toward the end of the Symphony, the mists regather and descend, while through them pulses the eternal river, the eternal mystery. Debussy's Spain flares itself away; Williams's London sinks and is still. Many a composer has written mysterious music; Williams's in prelude and postlude is a rarer music of austere brooding. It has depths.

Between goes a manifold London—first in ardent rhythmical and melodic tumult. The music teems with detail that only more hearings than it has yet received in Boston may reveal. There is fall of hurrying feet, quick echo of whistling lips, flicks of the syncopation which is ragtime, flecks of coster-song, this note and that in urban din. Each slips into place within an elastic, well-woven tonal fabric, within a graphic, unified impression of the stir of a city awake and in motion, of the diverse multitude peopling it, the exhilaration it quickens, the fascination it exerts, the affection it breeds. Universally, Williams evokes the zest of life and work in a multifarious and stimulating capital. It is a new emotion, a new illusion for music. By detail he characterizes as the zest and the stir of London, and still more by an intrinsically homely, hearty, warm-spirited music. To this London of morning succeeds in a later division, labelled Scherzo-Nocturne, the London of night. There is distant din of the slum that will not be stilled, that must jerk out jigs, squeak at concertina and mouth-organ, snarl and guffaw, "bask" and wheedle. Again a web of detail weaves itself into a single, vivid impression, both universal and individual. In the imagery, the voice, the color of the music are the confused murmur, the dull flare against the sky of a great town by remote. For the second time, a new evocation, a new illusion in music; yet mo particularly a London so heard and se

The flare fades; the sound settles silence. In undercurrent the everlas river pulses anew. Night as well as da may brood upon Williams's city. As e in his Symphony, there are depths, as w as surfaces.

The London that stirs not has a touched the composer's imagination. Bri as for the sake of contrast, he stills for the music of his bustling, zestful city. F the morning penetrates these quiet corne lays a wistful glow upon them. Here ge tleness hides, while tumult passes.
only a little does this intermezzo fall sh of the magic of old, forgotten, farthings. It is as though Williams—tr Englishman—would not soften too much.
Fearing sentimentality, he misses sentiment. Before it has quite charmed, the music blushes and strides away. He is less afear'd of the gray music of the gray quarters, where wintry dusks turn all thin ghostly. For them neither the tru lence of the slums, nor the swirl of t busy streets. Decay haunts them; pa has shrivelled into present; the world go by leaves them still and solitary. Eve elder city has such neighborhoods. Aga for the first time, symphonic music see to sound the melancholy, the pity them. The motiv that the horns final swell into melody haunts, as none othe outside the river-music, of Williams's i ventions. Once more he is universa though he particularize with his fragme of "Sweet Lavender," his street-musician fiddling upon the viola.

Yet another London has its measures in the music—measures that only a composer of this, our day, would write. For a while, before the postlude of the eternal river, the symphony rasps and jangles, moves to broken, distorted march rhythms. Dissonances scream and clash; the zestful motivs of the awakening city mock at themselves; the music thuds and grinds. Resentment, almost hate, cry in it. Those nown Williams's purpose say that he "under-dogs" of London, of any ity in this twentieth century, grow

r. Alive to his time, shutting himse ory tower of tone-poetry, with the h instinct, even in the arts, to fac ts, Williams has dared this mu social bitterness and feud. Even Str sky, the "savage" Stravinsky, has no tured as much. No wonder this "H March" as the analysts call it, hearers. They miss the intention. N ists, playwrights, painters, sculptors touch the issues of life in their hour world, do touch them abundantly.
music, heavenly muse! doing likewise?
upon such a fallen bedraggled Euterpe!
as some like to believe with Williams may be, Stravinsky; it is natural exp
. . . So to the end of a symphony li no other in the music of our or pre time. Nearer by, there is also a m city in kind as worthy of tones as Lo itself. Yet who among American comp has ever dreamed of a "New York S phony?"

H. T. Park

S. FEB 24

place in the list.
New music by Mr. Gilbert will be at the Symphony Concerts of next
—a series of "Indian Sketches" vi
Prelude; Invocation; Song of the Camp Dance; Nocturne; Snake Danc is good to find Mr. Monteux well dis to an American composer not too ge ously encouraged and to find him as ready with characteristic pieces. For remainder of the programme, the c ductor announces Mendelssohn's Sc Symphony; the overture to Mozart's opera, "The Elopement from the Serag and airs from "Figaro's Wedding"
"Don Juan" to be sung by Miss Nel

TRANS. 25

MOIS
SCH

Pianist Revea
of the Fi

Carpenter Acknow
His Ball

enno Moiseiwit umann's piano c yesterday's Sym
istakably a piani is no mere stee
a sensitive and t uses his remar eans to imagina
ly seconded by M estra. Moiseiwit
e and deftness have too ofte iry, lending Sch
m, almost an e ly associated w
The applause
iastic.
hn Alden Carpent from Chicago to performance her e Birthday of In to bow his ack times before a p ience. The musi more obviously the ballet for wh
the concert hal
ts, prettily and cl are, suffer fro
ity. Mr Carpent piece to be espec
d. He has suc
agreeable, up-t isten to, but hard
rd. The performa
not crisply polish
he other number Symphony, which tine of playing y other season i
been the Third.
Second. Monte
ved the First and e Muck has vouch
of the Third. It
ter, but those wh
ven, Brahms and M
in the past expe
regular rotation a ncerts.
Monteux's interp movement, ordina smyphony, restl little "effects," s
entional slips. Th er hand, usually ra Toscanini made i
ngful and poetic.
vements, like the fi
k of precise ensemb
t seemed to the liste ctor did not imagin
a whole, but mer
ould with each sepa
ardless of the c Brahms so carefully s
One doubted, too, whet
had been spent on t
hearsals.

GLOBE F

SYMPHONY OR IN 16TH

The 16th concert o
phony Orchestra will Symphony Hall tonig
Moiseiwitch at the pi
The program consi
ter, Suite from the Birthday of the Infan
Concerto, A minor
Brahms, Symphony N
Schuman's piano co
with beauty and as Moisewitsch is especi
The orchestra plays
advantage in the clos

REGARD

16TH CONC
BY SYMP

Moiseiwitsch, Pian with Orchestr
the First Ti

PROGRAM WIL
REPEATED T

By PHILIP HA

The 16th concert of the
phony Orchestra, Mr. M
uctor, took place yesterd
in Symphony Hall. Benno pianist, played here with t for the first time. The pro follows: Carpenter, Suite ballet, "The Birthday of t
(first time here); Schumann,
minor, for piano; Brahms,
No. 2, D major.
There is music composed
a drama or a ballet that performance at a Symphony reason of its contents, its inherent beauty, its value
music without regard to th which it was written. One pleasure at a concert the Suite of Lalo; Bizet's
"L'Arlesienne"; ballet music of Gretry; even the ballet Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba
stein's "Feramors." Other
be named, as that derived Faure's music for "Pell ande." The list is by no ne. Take a recent instan Gilbert's concert vers
ance in Place Congo

[redacted]

Ballet-Music by Carpenter at the Symphony Concerts

The Dwarf (Mr. Bolm)

The Princess (Miss Page)

"The Birthday of the Infanta" Passes From Theatre to Concert-Hall

THE little princess—says the composer in his "Argument" for those who will hear but not see tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall—dressed in a costume of the Velasquez period, emerges from the palace alone. She is sad and depressed. She is convinced that her birthday has been forgotten. But she is interrupted by her old and ample nurse, who comes to prepare her for the great surprise. Almost at once the children, her birthday guests, begin to arrive—in twos, in fours, and finally in one gay and noisy flock. They run, they dance, they play. At the climax of their excitement a trumpet, a signal, is heard from behind the scene. Eager curiosity! Something is going to happen! A strange procession marches upon the stage. First come two enormous major-domos, with clothes and gesture bizarre and alike. They are followed by a file of solemn servants, each bearing a birthday gift, covered with mysterious wrappings, yet large and satisfying.

The spectacle begins. First there are gypsy dancers, followed by a juggler and a tight-rope walker, a curious pair, the one tall and meagre, the other short and much too fat for his delicate profession. Then follows a bull fight, the best kind of all, a make-believe one with boys on hobby horses and a wonderful bull in plush.

Then comes the climax of the party. A weird and fabulous creature is brought in. He has been caught in the forest, and appears grotesque and misshapen. He is the last offering at the feast. At first he is timid and shy. His dance is one of strangely shifting moods, of fear and confidence, but in the end he achieves a dance of wild and absorbing abandon. The children applaud wildly, and the princess in her excitement throws her handkerchief to the fantastic. He is filled with extraordinary emotion. He wonders if it is a sign that she has found him beautiful. He wonders if, may be, she loves him.

The cook now comes out, a great fat creature, carrying a birthday cake with sixteen candles. There is great excitem among the children, and they follow into the palace. Pedro, the fantastic, cannot bear to be left alone. He follows and is repulsed by the major-domos. It is growing dark, so he clambers up to the palace window. The scene changes: the music does not stop, and a mo once Pedro is seen entering one of palace chambers. It is gloomy. He [illegible] Suddenly he sees some coming toward him. He stops. It [illegible] Pedro has never seen a reflection, but denly the terrifying consciousness over him that this monster as grote image may be his own. He holds up handkerchief, and lo! it too appears befo

A UNIQUE SYMPHONY

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS'S MUSIC IN RETROSPECT

A Piece That Haunts the Hearer and Seems Like No Other in Purpose and Achievement — Urban Sensation and Emotion Evoked from a Particular London Into Universal Appeal — Unusual Matter for Unusual Ends—The Baffling Measures

FIFTEEN pairs of Symphony Concerts have come and gone, plentiful in music new to Bostonian ears. Nine more pairs remain and, unless Mr. Monteux departs from precedent, they will abound also in novel pieces. From October through February none such has so deeply impressed many a hearer as Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" of last week; while none to come is likely to leave more enduring remembrance. For the first time a conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is finding place on his programmes for music from the newer generation of British composers. Mr. Monteux's earliest choice—Bax's tone-poem, "In the Fairy Hills"—was a glamorous, poetized, imaginatively conceived and finely wrought piece, flickering through sun-shot Celtic mist; yet in substance and in style, it was not far removed from much other music-making in our day. In contrast Williams's Symphony seemed as new and strange, as individual and penetrating as did four or five numbers from his song-cycle, "On Wenlock Edge," when they were heard, last winter, for the first time in Boston. Not many of the younger moderns, English, French, Italian, American, stretch so large a canvas as does he in this "London Symphony." As few fill it so amply and richly within and without, sustaining themselves to the end; for this music, unlike much other in our time, has depth as well as surface.

Throughout Williams writes with high seriousness, after much reflection and revision, in gravity of mood and intensity of expression, with controlled and directed power, never over blown, never quite exhausted. [illegible] of recent years is free from rhetoric and device. The composer works with bare hand, with eye fixed on the object of his vision, the life, the aspects, the spirit of London that have wakened in him sensation and emotion. [illegible] strings [illegible] and sentimental [illegible] played in Boston [illegible] orchestra [illegible] a tone-picture, "Paris," too thickly stuffed and closely woven to yield any clear impression. Even Debussy in "Iberia" sets a passing Spanish scene upon the theatre of his imagination and procedures. Again in contrast, Williams writes music of a city that has entered into his spirit, possessed and then released it. From inner impulse irresistible, not from composer's working will, seems to spring the "London Symphony."

Before music so generated and produced, the hearer takes little thought of method and means. Not in the concert-hall, but over his work-table for paper and print, does he recall Williams's architectural sense, achieving a symphony that, from first measure to last, is a unified, expanding, proportioned whole, with the end forseen from the beginning, with the progress steadily adjusted and cumulated, without hollows as without protuberance. In such after-reflection again, the listener recalls the diversity of matter within this unity, the interweaving of tonal strands that knits it closely but not thickly, the manipulation of motivs to bind and character the music. Even in this retrospect, he may hardly define Williams's ways with harmony. The learned in such things relate them to certain churchly modes, find occasional precedent in the music of other composers. Enough that to the hearing ear they seem neither ancient nor modern nor ultra-modern, neither labored nor assimilated, but an inevitable and characterizing background to the musical thought, a play of light and shadow over the musical progress. There are composers in our day with a keener, a more imaginative ear than Williams's for individual instrumental voices; occasionally they serve his purpose; but quite as often he relies upon blended choirs in preference to isolated or accentuated timbres. And ever he remembers that in rhythm dwells the life of music. In fine, so fused are the matter and the manner, the substance and the form of the "London Symphony" that structure and procedure seem only the flow into expression of thought, mood, sensation.

Few modern symphonies begin in such sombre and mysterious splendor. In the imagery and the voice of the music the gray river changelessly encircles a gray and hidden world. Everlasting has been, everlasting will be, its flow. Like Saturn, the brooding god, [illegible] streams. The light [illegible], the air quivers, the veil of the mists is rent and the music passes to the [illegible] of London. Variously in tones Williams sets his sensations until of a sudden, toward the end of the Symphony, the mists regather and descend, while through them pulses the eternal river, the eternal mystery. Debussy's Spain flares itself away; Williams's London sinks and is still. Many a composer has written mysterious music; Williams's in prelude and postlude is a rarer music of austere brooding. It has depths.

Between goes a manifold London—first in ardent rhythmical and melodic tumult. The music teems with detail that only more hearings than it has yet received in Boston may reveal. There is fall of hurrying feet, quick echo of whistling lips, flicks of the syncopation which is ragtime, flecks of coster-song, this note and that in urban din. Each slips into place within an elastic, well-woven tonal fabric, within a graphic, unified impression of the stir of a city awake and in motion, of the diverse multitude peopling it, the exhilaration it quickens, the fascination it exerts, the affection it breeds. Universally, Williams evokes the zest of life and work in a multifarious and stimulating capital. It is a new emotion, a new illusion for music. By detail he characterizes as the zest and the stir of London, and still more by an intrinsically homely, hearty, warm-spirited music. To this London of morning succeeds in a later division, labelled Scherzo-Nocturne, the London of night. There is distant din of the slum that will not be stilled, that must jerk out jigs, squeak at concertina and mouth-organ, snarl and guffaw, "bask" and wheedle. Again a web of detail weaves itself into a single vivid impression, both universal and individual. In the imagery, the voice, the color of the music are the confused murmur, the dull flare against the sky of a great town by remote. For the second time, a new ev cation, a new illusion in music, yet particularly a London so heard and se The flare fades; the sound settles silence. In undercurrent the everlas river pulses anew. Night as well as d may brood upon Williams's city. As in his Symphony, there are depths, as as surfaces.

The London that stirs not touched the composer's imaginatio as for the sake of contrast, he stills the music of his bustling, zestful city. the morning penetrates these quiet corn lays a wistful glow upon them. Here tleness hides, while tumult passes. only a little does this intermezzo fall of the magic of old, forgotten, things. It is as though William Englishman—would not soften too Fearing sentimentality, he misses ment. Before it has quite charmed, the sic blushes and strides away. He is less afear'd of the gray music of the gray quarters, where wintry dusks turn all thin ghostly. For them neither the tru lence of the slums, nor the swirl of busy streets. Decay haunts them; pa has shrivelled into present; the world go by leaves them still and solitary. Ev elder city has such neighborhoods. Ag for the first time, symphonic music se to sound the melancholy, the pity them. The motiv that the horns final swell into melody haunts, as none othe outside the river-music, of Williams's i ventions. Once more he is univers though he particularize with his fragme of "Sweet Lavender," his street-musician fiddling upon the viola.

Yet another London has its measures in the music—measures that only a composer of this, our day, would write. For a while, before the postlude of the eternal river, the symphony rasps and jangles, moves to broken, distorted march rhythms. Dissonances scream and clash; the zestful motivs of the awakening city mock at themselves; the music thuds and grinds. Resent-

---

FEB 2

New music by Mr. Gilbert will be at the Symphony Concerts of next —a series of "Indian Sketches" Prelude; Invocation; Song of the Camp Dance; Nocturne; Snake Danc is good and Mr Monteux well d to an American composer not too ge ously encouraged and to find him as ready with characteristic pieces. For remainder of the programme, the ductor announces Mendelssohn's Symphony; the overture to Mozart's opera, "The Elopement from the Sera and airs from "Figaro's Wedding" "Don Juan" to be sung by Miss Nei

---

MOISEIWITS
SCHUMA

Pianist Revea
of the Fi

Carpenter Acknow
His Balle

Benno Moiseiwits Schumann's piano c at yesterday's Sym
unmistakably a piani
He is no mere stee
but a sensitive and t who uses his remar
a means to imagina Ably seconded by M orchestra, Moiseiwit
grace and deftness others have too ofte
tawdry, lending Sch charm, almost an e monly associated w
work. The applause
thusiastic.
John Alden Carpent
on from Chicago to first performance her
"The Birthday of In out to bow his ackn eral times before a p audience. The musi be more obviously with the ballet for wh
the concert hal
effects, prettily and cl they are, suffer fro quality. Mr Carpent
the piece to be especi
and. He has suc
it, agreeable, up-t listen to, but hard
ard. The performa
not crisply polish
the other number Symphony, which routine of playing any other season
been the Third.
Second. Monte
ed the First and Muck has vouch
of the Third. It
ter, but those wh
ven, Brahms and M
in the past expe
regular rotation
certs.
Mr Monteux's interp movement, orlina
smphony, restl little "effects,"
entional slips. Th
her hand, usually r
Toscanini made i
ngful and poetic.
movements, like the f
lack of precise ensem
It seemed to the liste ductor did not imagine as a whole, but mer could with each sepa
gardless of the c Brahms so carefully
One doubted, too, whet had been spent on hearsals.

GLOBE F

SYMPHONY OR IN 16TH

The 16th concert o
phony Orchestra will Symphony Hall toni
Moiseiwitch at the pi
The program consi
ter, Suite from the Birthday of the Infa
Concerto, A mino
Brahms, Symphony N
Schuman's piano c
with beauty and as Moisewitsch is especi
The orchestra plays
advantage in the clos

RECORD

16TH CONC
BY SYMP

Moiseiwitsch, Pia with Orchest
the First Ti

PROGRAM WIL
REPEATED T

By PHILIP HA

The 16th concert of the
phony Orchestra, Mr. M ductor, took place yesterd
in Symphony Hall. Benno pianist, played here with
for the first time. The pro follows: Carpenter, Suit ballet, "The Birthday of (first time here); Schumann
minor, for piano; Brahms
No. 2, D major.
There is music composed
a drama or a ballet that performance at a Symphon reason of its contents, its inherent beauty, its value
music without regard to t which it was written. On pleasure at a concert the
Suite of Lalo; Bizet's
"L'Arlesienne"; ballet musi or Gretry; even the ballet Goldmark's "Queen of Sheb
stein's "Feramors." Other
be named, as that derived Faure's music for "Pelleas sande." The list is by no m
one. Take a recent instance
F. Gilbert's concert version
"Dance in Place Congo," wa

This is the last blow. He nner agony the effect he must on the princess. He repeat only in perverted form, in the nks it must have seemed to her s broken hearted and dies. The are seen in the background or as they play some game.
ome in, but they do not see the form. But the princess enters detects the huddled shape of
in the shadow to one side.
up quietly to his side and akes a mute appeal. Final s the handkerchief in his ha
no response, starts back
owly steals away.

lmost hate, cry in it. Those Williams's purpose say that the der-dogs" of London, of any this twentieth century, growl
ve to his time, shutting himself wer of tone-poetry, with the
inct, even in the arts, to face
Williams has dared this music itterness and feud. Even Stra
"savage" Stravinsky, has not much. No wonder this "Hu
as the analysts call it, ba They miss the intention. Ne ywrights, painters, sculptors
e issues of life in their hour
o touch them abundantly.
eavenly muse! doing likewise?
h a fallen bedraggled Euterpe!
like to believe with Williams Stravinsky, it is natural enou to the end of a symphony like in the music of our or previ
earer by, there is also a mani
ind as worthy of tones as Lon
et who among American compo
dreamed of a "New York Sy
H. T. PARKE

ANS. FEB 2

usic by Mr. Gilbert will be Symphony Concerts of next
s of "Indian Sketches" Invocation; Song of the nce; Nocturne; Snake Danc
o find Mr. Monteux well disp nerican composer not too ge ouraged and to find him as h characteristic pieces. For r of the programme, the nnounces Mendelssohn's Sco
; the overture to Mozart's li he Elopement from the Serag
from "Figaro's Wedding"
n" to be sung by Miss Niels

25

2

MOISEIWITSCH IN SCHUMANN'S PIECE

Pianist Revealed Player as of the First Rank

Carpenter Acknowleges Applause of His Ballet Suite

Benno Moiseiwitsch, who played Schumann's piano concerto in A minor at yesterday's Symphony concert, is unmistakably a pianist of the first rank. He is no mere steely-fingered virtuoso but a sensitive and thoughtful musician, who uses his remarkable technique as a means to imaginative ends.

Ably seconded by Mr Monteux and the orchestra, Moiseiwitsch put unwonted grace and deftness into music that others have too often made clumsy and tawdry, lending Schumann a plaintive charm, almost an elegance, not commonly associated with his name and work. The applause was genuinely enthusiastic.

John Alden Carpenter, who had come on from Chicago to be present at the first performance here of his suite from "The Birthday of Infanta," was called out to bow his acknowledgments several times before a politely appreciative audience. The music would doubtless be more obviously effective if heard with the ballet for which it was written.

In the concert hall the various excerpts, prettily and cleverly contrived as they are, suffer from a lack of continuity. Mr Carpenter has not tried in this piece to be especially subtle or profound. He has succeeded in writing light, agreeable, up-to-date music, easy to listen to, but hard to remember afterward. The performance was spirited but not crisply polished.

The other number was Brahms' Second Symphony, which should, if the old routine of playing each of the four every other season is to be kept up, have been the Third. Rabaud gave us the Second, Monteux has already played the First and Fourth, but no one since Muck has vouchsafed a performance of the Third. It is perhaps a small matter, but those who love their Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart symphonies have in the past expected to hear them in regular rotation at the Symphony concerts.

Mr Monteux's interpretation made the first movement, orlinarily the finest in this smyphony, restless and clogged with little "effects," some of them unintentional slips. The adagio on the other hand, usually rather dull, became as Toscanini made it the other day, songful and poetic. The other two movements, like the first, suffered from lack of precise ensemble.

It seemed to the listener that the conductor did not imagine each movement as a whole, but merely did what he could with each separate section regardless of the cumulative effect Brahms so carefully seeks to build up. One doubted, too, whether enough pains had been spent on this piece at rehearsals.

GLOBE FEB.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN 16TH CONCERT

The 16th concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra will be repeated at Symphony Hall tonight with Benno Moiseiwitch at the piano.

The program consists of Carpenter, Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta"; Schuman, Concerto, A minor for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Schuman's piano concerto is filled with beauty and as played by Mr. Moisewitsch is especially delightful. The orchestra plays to exceptional advantage in the closing number.

RECORD FEB. 26

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Moiseiwitsch, Pianist, Plays with Orchestra for the First Time

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, played here with the orchestra for the first time. The program was as follows: Carpenter, Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time here); Schumann, Concerto, A minor, for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

There is music composed originally for a drama or a ballet that is worthy of performance at a Symphony concert, by reason of its contents, its structure, its inherent beauty, its value as absolute music without regard to the stage for which it was written. One hears with pleasure at a concert the "Namouna" suite of Lalo; Bizet's music for "L'Arlesienne"; ballet music by Rameau or Gretry; even the ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba" or Rubinstein's "Feramors." Other suites could be named, as that derived from Gabriel Faure's music for "Pelleas and Melisande." The list is by no means a short one. Take a recent instance: Mr. Henry Gilbert's concert version of his ballet, "The Dance in Place Congo," was not out place at a Symphony concert last season.

---

However effective Mr. Carpenter's ballet may be in the theatre—and of this we cannot say, for we have not seen the ballet—it has little to recommend it for admission to a symphony concert program. Its possible effect depends chiefly, one is tempted to say wholly, on its association with the situations and the evolutions of the ballet. As concert music, it is disjointed, scrappy, rather common. Regarded solely as music, pure and simple, its worth is slight. There are few pages that are beautiful; few that are impressive; few that are exciting. Nor is the Suite saved by the more or less ingenious juggling with instruments in combination or in solo use. The nearest approach to a purely musical effect is in the closing measures, which accompany on the stage the death of poor Pedro and the exit of the Infanta. Here there is a direct and emotional appeal. Nor does one find adroit characterization in the Gypsy Dance; nor does one find lively suggestion in the movement of the Suite entitled "The Bull Fight."

There are some who say that Schumann's piano concerto has aged; that it is now only for a small hall; that its intimacy is ineffective in a large one. A character drawn years ago by Immermann in a satirical novel said that next to hearing music the most disagreeable thing was the hearing talk about it. We cannot understand the attitude of those objecting to Schumann's concerto, as the choice of a pianist. To us, it is one of Schumann's most romantic works, as fresh today as when he dreamed it. And yesterday it was played romantically, with the finest appreciation of its many beauties, with a tonal charm, with a rhythmic surety, with a poetic feeling, with a varied coloring that heightened the enchantment cast by the music itself. It would be impertinent to dwell on Mr. Moiseiwitsch's great abaility as a virtuoso. In this instance the accomplished virtuoso and the poetic interpreter are one and the same.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, "Scotch" symphany; Mozart, overture to "The Abdouction from the Harem"; Gilbert's "Indian Sketches" (first performance). Alice Nielsen will sing "Deh vieni non Tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Giovanni."

HERALD FEB 26.

MUSIC OF BALLET BY SYMPHONY

Moiseiwitsch Recreates Schumann Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

John Alden Carpenter's music to his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor. The composer was present, and his brilliant score was warmly applauded. Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, played for the first time at these concerts, and gave perhaps the finest, the most romantic performance of the Schumann concerto that has been heard in many years. The last item of the programme was Brahms' second symphony, and this work, too, was very fortunately interpreted by Mr. Monteux.

MUSIC FOR ACTION

Had it not been for the accidental holdup of the train, caused by stormy weather, Mr. Carpenter's ballet would have been given by the Chicago Opera Company on the 6th of last March. This would have placed the music in a more advantageous position than it occupied yesterday afternoon, because this is music for a scene, for action, pantomime, dances. The scene, suggested by Wilde's tale, is an episode of the birthday of the Infanta. In a costume of the period of Velasquez she is entertained by other children and by a spectacle devised for the occasion. There are gypsy dancers, a tight-rope juggler, a bull fight, and what not—all these episodes furnishing Mr. Carpenter opportunity for illustrative music. The crowning feature of the entertainment is the performance of a misshapen dwarf caught in the forest. He dances in a grotesque manner and when the princess throws him her handkerchief he wonders, in his joy, if she loves him. But when he attempts to follow the children into the castle for the cutting of the birthday cake the dwarf sees himself for the first time in a mirror. He knows at last how he looks, he guesses the figure he must cut in the eyes of the princess. He falls brokenhearted and dies. The child princess, discovering his still and prostrate form, draws back in horror to get away, to forget.

Mr. Carpenter's music, designed for the stage, is nevertheless effective in the concert room. He has gone a step farther in his scoring than we have known him to go before. It is a coincidence, perhaps, a mere evidence of the way in which certain ideas are afloat at certain times in the air, that his orchestra, like certain features of the score of the Vaughan symphony last week, remind one again of the orchestra of Strawinsky's "Petrouchka." That is a work which haunts the music of today, a work so individual, perhaps, that once heard a modern composer of talent and sensitiveness cannot again be the same. We hear once more the agonizing trumpet, the force and the grotesquerie of primitive rhythms treated with modern resource and ingenuity, and we have effects not merely of rhythm, but of color achieved by pulsatile instruments.

Tragedy Not Felt

As to the originality of this music, which must fit and accentuate the situation on the stage, that is another matter. We do not find in it very much originality of idiom. Nor do we feel the grim tragedy of the end of the dwarf, Pedro, as we do feel the taking off of Petrouchka. This note is absent from the excerpt played yesterday. Very possible it is struck in the score of the whole ballet, of which only selected passages were played. Lacking it, the workmanship, the myriad colors, the expert employment of rhythms and timbres, are astonishing and entertaining. Short of having done a new thing, Mr. Carpenter writes with the acme of brilliancy and style. He appeared personally on the stage in response to the applause and was repeatedly recalled.

Mr. Moiseiwitsch re-created the music of Schumann, and re-created it in the composer's image. The performance was that of a great master, and few, if any, of the pianists now before the public could have equalled it. When liberties, as some pedantic people would call them, were taken with tempi with the shaping of phrases, they made the music all the more spontaneous, free as the air, hot from the composer's heart. One thought of what Wagner said to an orchestra: "Now, gentlemen, we know this music. We are going to interpret it and I am going to stop beating time." Complete authority, complete abandonment to the musical impulse, and complete control characterized Mr. Moiseiwitsch's playing. There was felt the sure pulse of the great beats, and there was also the delightful fluctuation, and ebb and flow which makes music, and rescues it from the pump-handling of time-beaters.

Performance Lyrical

With the exception of the few declamatory passages, or the clanging chords of the principal theme of the finale, the performance was wonderfully lyrical from beginning to end. The piano sang. The intermezzo was deliciously intimate, like an improvisation of piano and orchestra. The finale swept one away with its youthful spirit. It was the undying youth of Schumann. There are pianists who come and go. This one is the earnest and objective interpreter. The other is a virtuoso who exites an audience, if he does not stir it to the depths. Another is an impressionist, and so on. All great artistic qualities which could be called into play by the Schumann concerto were at the command of Dr. Moisievitch and his performance will in all probability long stand, for the writer, as the ideal expression of the composer's thought.

Mr. Monteux caught the idyllic wood of Brahms' symphony, and he also felt what can well be called the respiration of this music. It is music which breathes quietly and deeply, like nature. The melodies of the first movement exfoliate, as it were, before one's eyes. They arrive at their complete fulfilment as inevitably as the full flower bursts from the stalk. Mr. Monteux wove the melodic strands of this movement together with as much as he showed in his observance, at the same time, of every carefully wrought detail of Brahms' form. He interpreted the slow movement with feeling and without logy pretense of profundity. We have seldom heard so much humor in the scherzo, and the vigor of the finale was in the highest degree characteristic. This was the completion of a delightful concert.

POST FEB. 26

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert on February 25. The program was as follows: Carpenter, suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta"; Schumann, concerto for piano and orchestra, op. 54; Brahms, symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 73. Benno Moiseiwitsch was the pianist.

It is difficult to speak of Mr. Carpenter's suite. As music of the theater it may be effective, but as he allows it to be played in the concert hall, it must, of course, be judged purely as music and its shortcomings cannot be excused on the ground that it is not played in its proper surroundings. Moreover, there is no reason why music, originally conceived for the ballet, should not have value apart from the purpose for which it was originally composed. Delibes, to cite only one example, wrote much charming and original music which is interesting wherever and whenever heard. To return to Mr. Carpenter's suite. As music of the concert hall it is lacking in form. Such themes as there are are not of distinction and often border dangerously on the vulgar and commonplace. The orchestration does not cover up the woeful lack of taste displayed in their selection. One asks: Why did Mr. Monteux, a man so remarkable for his refined taste, select such a composition for performance at a symphony concert? The crashes of brass drum and cymbals, the melodies played on the glockenspiel, the blatant brass are all reminiscent of the music hall. The audience received the work with enthusiasm. This kind of music is undoubtedly grateful to the ears of many but there are places where it is more appropriate than in a symphony concert. The Schumann concerto was poetically played by Mr. Moiseiwitsch and the orchestra. Brahms' D major symphony was excellently read by Mr. Monteux, who again proved himself a master in the interpretation of compositions of the most varied character.

MONITOR FEB. 26

MUSIC NOTES

Miss Alice Nielsen, who will sing as soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, started her career as the star in operettas in America and England. She made her debut on the grand opera stage in Italy, taking the part of Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust." She is now devoting her entire activities to concert appearances. She will sing with the orchestra two of the most famous arias of Mozart—"Deh 'Viene non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at these concerts Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony in A minor, No. 3, Mozart's Overture to his light opera, "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," and a new work by Henry F Gilbert, the noted American composer, entitled "Indian Sketches," which will have its first public performance on this occasion. The movements are as follows: Prelude, Invocation, Song of the Wolf, Camp Dance, Nocturne, Snake Dance.

RECORD FEB 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM CARPENTER BACK TO BRAHMS AND SCHUMANN

A Suite from the American's Ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," Bears New Conditions Well, Reveals No Small Mastery of Rhythm and Color—Mr. Monteux Reanimates a Classic and Mr. Moiseiwitsch Enriches a Concerto

AMERICAN composers are not usually innovators. Ingrained in them, as in the rest of us, is the racial instinct toward uniformity, to the regular thing in the regular way. They are excellent imitators when the model is so well established and generally approved as the newer French music. They work well in any orthodox traces, with never a gall upon their shining coats. To take their own course with their own music is another, a perilous, thing. Mr. Loeffler has dared so to do and is accounted a baffling composer; Mr. Gilbert, doing likewise, is the "eccentric Mr. Gilbert"; Mr. Carpenter, exhibiting the same preference, is an "outsider" who happens to write music. The "best people" in the little world that composes, reviews and debates American music (with not a little gossip along the way) still looks skew-eyed at him. Strange fellow! he does not frequent "musical circles"—possibly under premonition of boredom. He actually conducts a business commonly reported to be profitable; he even elects the life of a cultivated man of the world. And when he writes music, Heaven save the mark! He began symphonically with a fanciful, playful Suite about a baby's "morning-out" in a perambulator. He continued with sportive Concertino—a Concertino with rag-time in it—for piano and orchestra. "Serious" musicians, "right-thinking" American composers, do not choose such courses; while purblind and perverse are those who dare to find a clear American quality in these vagaries.

Even when Mr. Carpenter wrote a Symphony, he distinctly departed from the rules. Certain measures, certain procedures, distinctly suggesting the composers to the Russion Ballet, gave almost as much offence as the tinkling triangle in Liszt's Concerto for piano. Such things were simply "not done"—in respectable symphonic circles. By these signs, Mr. Carpenter was likely to undertake a ballet—and he did, with no better precedent in the whole range of American music than "The Dance in Place Congo" by "the eccentric Mr. Gilbert." Much of that piece in an earlier day had been a symphonic poem; but for the bleak winds of criticism upon "The Birthday of the Infanta," Mr. Carpenter had not so much as such figleaf.

Nevertheless, the piece was actually written; nay, it was mimed and danced in Chicago, in New York, almost in Boston. Any ballet, however—especially one fathered by an exacting and independently minded composer—is bound to be only occasional in American opera houses. Accordingly Mr. Carpenter sought in the music a Suite for orchestra in the concert-hall. For the first time hereabouts that Suite was played at the Symphony Concert yesterday and in disadvantageous circumstance. Few in the audience had actually seen, as well as heard, "The Birthday of the Infanta" in the theatre. Wilde's story, whence the fable comes, is not widely known. Less than half the music could be wisely transferred to the new container. There had been laborious rehearsal and consequent murmuring, while plentiful gossip affirmed that without settings, action and the general glamor of the stage, Mr. Carpenter's ballet, like the chaos of Genesis, was null and void. Yet there was Mr. Monteux holding manfully to his purpose and conducting with the practised instinct for rhythm, for color, for the vivid momentary stroke wherewith he excels in music for the theatre. There also was the orchestra missing none of the composer's flashes or filagree of detail. And there finally was an audience, plainly interested, pleased, and minded to call Mr. Carpenter not once, but twice, to the platform. Strange these perverse ears that somehow prefer pleasure to orthodoxy. Can it be that even in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons, sits a "loose" generation?

Of course, these fragments of "The Birthday of the Infanta" lose appreciably by shift to the concert-hall. If they did not, they would not be the revealing, accenuating, illuding music that they are in the theatre, knit into every detail of the action, a-quiver to every suggestion of mood and atmosphere, yet they remain anywhere an exceedingly adroit, vivid, sustained and individual music. Even in his Symphony, Mr. Carpenter has hardly achieved such an expert, artful, orchestrally fanciful a score. Like the abler and the younger composers of our day, he thinks, feels, writes in the terms of the orchestra. He is becoming more and more sensitive to the individuality, the suggestion of instrumental voices. He gains in ingenious and imaginative manipulation of them, in contrast, in combination, in stark separation, in manifold play of enhancing color. The Suite of yesterday teems with vivid instrumental and harmonic strokes; it abounds no less in felicitous harmonic and instrumental details. Both are audible even in the quick passage of new music upon unprepared ears. Mr. Carpenter writes to be heard in theatre or concert-hall as well as to be read in "the closet."

All this, moreover, is no mere technical virtuosity. It seeks and gains delineative, poetizing, atmospheric ends—achieves them with economy, precision, directness of means. A few measures of introduction suggest the tragic fantasy which is the mood of the whole mimodrama; not so many more measures at the end suffice to summon the dwarf dead of piteous disillusion; the little princess shrinking away in as piteous bewilderment over these blows of fate; the whole descent out of courtly and ornate fantasy into a woful tragedy of inner confusions and self-deceits. The birthday of the infanta and gay fetes for the royal child. The birthday of the infanta and a dwarf who hugs illusions of beauty and of love and pays for them; a girl-princess who learns in such an hour that life is not a pretty, playful, simple thing. So in the music, even in the concert-hall, has Mr. Carpenter wrought the finer illusion of his ballet. The means may be harmonies and color, rhythm and motiv, but the source is the imagination, the sensibility, the sustaining will, of the composer.

In theatre or concert-hall, music of fete necessarily abounds in "The Birthday of the Infanta." The children of the court stream into the princess's party; a ceremonious retinue bears the gifts appropriate to the occasion and her state. There are dances of festival before the dwarf comes with dances of the heart. There is even a mimic, but no less flaunting, bull-fight. In all these "numbers," as the elder ballet-masters would call them, Mr. Carpenter's instinct for rhythm—his best and most characteristic ability—serves him richly and variously. The motivs whence spring say, the capering of the children, the dance of the gypsies, the procession with the gifts, are not remarkable in themselves. They are no more than serviceable material. Yet once Mr. Carpenter has animated them with his vivid and plastic rhythms, once clothed them in his rainbow play of harmonies and timbres, set in a vivid detail here, a shadowy detail there, forthwith comes the illusion that he seeks. In the concert-hall, the listener, with two grains of imagination, feels the occasion, catches the illusion.

That illusion is by no means simple. To and fro goes the bull-fight; the ear hears, the eye sees, the feints and the rushes; trumpets flare; red cloths wave; yet somehow the music does remind him that all this is mimic for an infanta's birthday. Stately indeed are the bearers of gifts; a turn of rhythm, a dash of color and we auditors hear and see them, as Mr. Carpenter heard and saw, a little grotesquely. Of a sudden across the introductory measures, of a sudden again, across the final bars, falls the dull, distant clang of the great bell of the palace. The rhythm is stark, the notes bare; yet there is omen and there fulfilment of the dwarf's tragedy. It is by the means, the fruitful means of the composers of our day, that Mr. Carpenter achieves this illusion—by imaginative command of rhythm, harmonies, instrumental color, by the divination that is resource glorified. Why reproach him because he discards others with which elder composers have worked; because he is not too fertil in these older invntions and too fertile in these older inventions and means so long as they bring to pass his chosen end. Even in the concert-hall—and three-fold more in the theatre—"The Birthday of the Infanta" works the illusion Mr. Carpenter would compass. Once more he has written an unflagging music.

Two other pieces filled the remainder of the concert with familiar, anticipated pleasure—Schumann's Concerto for Piano, with Mr. Moiseiwitsch playing the solo part, and Brahms's Second Symphony with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra rich-voiced in instrumental song. Once more returned the familiar and unexplained anomaly that French conductors will take German music more slowly than do German leaders; whereas those same Germans similarly stay the pace of French pieces. Otherwise, Mr. Monteux excelled himself with a classical symphony; while at every turn the orchestra gave him back a depth, warmth, suppleness of tone worthy of its best days. No roughness marred the texture of the music, no stiffness impeded its flow. The conductor found, developed, sustained Brahms's melodies, the orchestra gave them life and glow. Not often does a symphony of the nineteenth century, hallowed though it be, yield such an impression of pure and vernal instrumental song as did the first movement, yesterday, of this symphony in D major. The succeeding Adagio renewed such wealth of songful beauty. By ever so little Mr. Monteux seemed to touch the Scherzo with Gallic caprice, especially in the quick, glinting measures that twice return. Thereby Brahms was the gainer, as he was in the same symphony, two months ago, under Mr. Toscanini's Ital-

This is the last blow. He r
nner agony the effect he must
on the princess. He repeat
only in perverted form, in the nks it must have seemed to he
s broken hearted and dies. The re seen in the background p or as they play some game. F ome in, but they do not see the orm. But the princess enters letects the huddled shape of
in the shadow to one side
up quietly to his side and nakes a mute appeal. Fina
s the handkerchief in his ha
no response, starts back in
owly steals away.

lmost hate, cry in it. Those Williams's purpose say that the der-dogs" of London, of any g
this twentieth century, growl ve to his time, shutting himself i wer of tone-poetry, with the
inct, even in the arts, to face
Villiams has dared this music tterness and feud. Even Stra
"savage" Stravinsky, has not
much. No wonder this "Hu
as the analysis call it, ba They miss the intention. No
ywrights, painters, sculptors
e issues of life in their hour
o touch them abundantly.
eavenly muse! doing likewise?
h a fallen bedraggled Euterpe!
like to believe with Williams Stravinsky, it is natural eno to the end of a symphony li in the music of our or pre
earer by, there is also a mani
ind as worthy of tones as Lon
et who among American compo
dreamed of a "New York Sy

H. T. PARKE

ANS. FEB. 24

music by Mr. Gilbert will be Symphony Concerts of next
s of "Indian Sketches" vi Invocation; Song of the Wol
nce; Nocturne; Snake Danc
o find Mr. Monteux well disp merican composer not too ge
ouraged and to find him as h characteristic pieces. For of the programme, the c
nnounces Mendelssohn's Sco
y; the overture to Mozart's he Elopement from the Seragl
from "Figaro's Wedding"
n" to be sung by Miss Niels

RANS. 25

MOISEIWITSCH IN SCHUMANN'S PIECE

Pianist Revealed Player as of the First Rank

Carpenter Acknowleges Applause of His Ballet Suite

Benno Moiseiwitsch, who played Schumann's piano concerto in A minor at yesterday's Symphony concert, is unmistakably a pianist of the first rank. He is no mere steely-fingered virtuoso but a sensitive and thoughtful musician, who uses his remarkable technique as a means to imaginative ends.

Ably seconded by Mr Monteux and the orchestra, Moiseiwitsch put unwonted grace and deftness into music that others have too often made clumsy and tawdry, lending Schumann a plaintive charm, almost an elegance, not commonly associated with his name and work. The applause was genuinely enthusiastic.

John Alden Carpenter, who had come on from Chicago to be present at the first performance here of his suite from "The Birthday of Infanta," was called out to bow his acknowledgments several times before a politely appreciative audience. The music would doubtless be more obviously effective if heard with the ballet for which it was written. In the concert hall the various excerpts, prettily and cleverly contrived as they are, suffer from a lack of continuity. Mr Carpenter has not tried in this piece to be especially subtle or profound. He has succeeded in writing light, agreeable, up-to-date music, easy to listen to, but hard to remember afterward. The performance was spirited but not crisply polished.

The other number was Brahms' Second Symphony, which should, if the old routine of playing each of the four every other season is to be kept up have been the Third. Rabaud gave us the Second. Monteux has already played the First and Fourth, but no one since Muck has vouchsafed a performance of the Third. It is perhaps a small matter, but those who love their Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart symphonies have in the past expected to hear them in regular rotation at the Symphony concerts.

Mr Monteux's interpretation made the first movement, orlinarily the finest in this smyphony, restless and clogged with little "effects," some of them unintentional slips. The adagio on the other hand, usually rather dull, became as Toscanini made it the other day, songful and poetic. The other two movements, like the first, suffered from lack of precise ensemble.

It seemed to the listener that the conductor did not imagine each movement as a whole, but merely did what he could with each separate section regardless of the cumulative effect Brahms so carefully seeks to build up. One doubted, too, whether enough pains had been spent on this piece at rehearsals.

GLOBE FEB.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN 16TH CONCERT

The 16th concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra will be repeated at Symphony Hall tonight with Benno Moiseiwitch at the piano.

The program consists of Carpenter, Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta"; Schuman, Concerto, A minor for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Schuman's piano concerto is filled with beauty and as played by Mr. Moisewitsch is especially delightful. The orchestra plays to exceptional advantage in the closing number.

[illegible] FEB.

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Moiseiwitsch, Pianist, Plays with Orchestra for the First Time

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, played here with the orchestra for the first time. The program was as follows: Carpenter, Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time here); Schumann, Concerto, A minor, for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

There is music composed originally for a drama or a ballet that is worthy of performance at a Symphony concert, by reason of its contents, its structure, its inherent beauty, its value as absolute music without regard to the stage for which it was written. One hears with pleasure at a concert the "Namouna" suite of Lalo; Bizet's music for "L'Arlesienne"; ballet music by Rameau and Gretry; even the ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba" or Rubinstein's "Feramors." Other suites could be named, as that derived from Gabriel Faure's music for "Pelleas and Melisande." The list is by no means a short one. Take a recent instance: Mr. Henry F. Gilbert's concert version of his ballet "Dance in Place Congo," was not out of place at a Symphony concert last season.

However effective Mr. Carpenter's ballet may be in the theatre—and of this we cannot say, for we have not seen the ballet—it has little to recommend it for admission to a symphony concert program. Its possible effect depends chiefly, one is tempted to say wholly, on its association with the situations and the evolutions of the ballet. As concert music, it is disjointed, scrappy, rather common. Regarded solely as music, pure and simple, its worth is slight. There are few pages that are beautiful; few that are impressive; few that are exciting. Nor is the Suite saved by the more or less ingenious juggling with instruments in combination or in solo use. The nearest approach to a purely musical effect is in the closing measures, which accompany on the stage the death of poor Pedro and the exit of the Infanta. Here there is a direct and emotional appeal. Nor does one find adroit characterization in the Gypsy Dance; nor does one find lively suggestion in the movement of the Suite entitled "The Bull Fight."

There are some who say that Schumann's piano concerto has aged; that it is now only for a small hall; that its intimacy is ineffective in a large one. A character drawn years ago by Immermann in a satirical novel said that next to hearing music the most disagreeable thing was the hearing talk about it. We cannot understand the attitude of those objecting to Schumann's concerto, as the choice of a pianist. To us, it is one of Schumann's most romantic works, as fresh today as when he dreamed it. And yesterday it was played romantically, with the finest appreciation of its many beauties, with a tonal charm, with a rhythmic surety, with a poetic feeling, with a varied coloring that heightened the enchantment cast by the music itself. It would be impertinent to dwell on Mr. Moiseiwitsch's great abaility as a virtuoso. In this instance the accomplished virtuoso and the poetic interpreter are one and the same.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, "Scotch" symphany; Mozart, overture to "The Abdouction from the Harem"; Gilbert's "Indian Sketches" (first performance). Alice Nielsen will sing "Deh vieni non Tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Giovanni."

HERALD FEB 26.

MUSIC OF BALLET BY SYMPHONY

Moiseiwitsch Recreates Schumann Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

John Alden Carpenter's music to his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor. The composer was present, and his brilliant score was warmly applauded. Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, played for the first time at these concerts, and gave perhaps the finest, the most romantic performance of the Schumann concerto that has been heard in many years. The last item of the programme was Brahms' second symphony, and this work, too, was very fortunately interpreted by Mr. Monteux.

MUSIC FOR ACTION

Had it not been for the accidental holdup of the train, caused by stormy weather, Mr. Carpenter's ballet would have been given by the Chicago Opera Company on the 6th of last March. This would have placed the music in a more advantageous position than it occupied yesterday afternoon, because this is music for a scene, for action, pantomime, dances. The scene, suggested by Wilde's tale, is an episode of the birthday of the Infanta. In a costume of the period of Velasquez she is entertained by other children and by a spectacle devised for the occasion. There are gypsy dancers, a tight-rope juggler, a bull fight, and what not—all these episodes furnishing Mr. Carpenter opportunity for illustrative music. The crowning feature of the entertainment is the performance of a misshapen dwarf caught in the forest. He dances in a grotesque manner and when the princess throws him her handkerchief he wonders, in his joy, if she loves him. But when he attempts to follow the children into the castle for the cutting of the birthday cake the dwarf sees himself for the first time in a mirror. He knows at last how he looks, he guesses the figure he must cut in the eyes of the princess. He falls brokenhearted and dies. The child princess, discovering his still and prostrate form, draws back in horror to get away, to forget.

Mr. Carpenter's music, designed for the stage, is nevertheless effective in the concert room. He has gone a step farther in his scoring than we have known him to go before. It is a coincidence, perhaps, a mere evidence of the way in which certain ideas are afloat at certain times in the air, that his orchestra, like certain features of the score of the Vaughan symphony last week, remind one again of the orchestra of Strawinsky's "Petrouchka." That is a work which haunts the music of today, a work so individual, perhaps, that once heard a modern composer of talent and sensitiveness cannot again be the same. We hear once more the agonizing trumpet, the force and the grotesquerie of primitive rhythms treated with modern resource and ingenuity, and we have effects not merely of rhythm, but of color achieved by pulsatile instruments.

Tragedy Not Felt

As to the originality of this music, which must fit and accentuate the situation on the stage, that is another matter. We do not find in it very much originality of idiom. Nor do we feel the grim tragedy of the end of the dwarf, Pedro, as we do feel the taking off of Petrouchka. This note is absent from the excerpt played yesterday. Very possible it is struck in the score of the whole ballet, of which only selected passages were played. Lacking it, the workmanship, the myriad colors, the expert employment of rhythms and timbres, are astonishing and entertaining. Short of having done a new thing, Mr. Carpenter writes with the acme of brilliancy and style. He appeared personally on the stage in response to the applause and was repeatedly recalled.

Mr. Moiseiwitsch re-created the music of Schumann, and re-created it in the composer's image. The performance was that of a great master, and few, if any of the pianists now before t lic could have equalled it. When liberties, as some pedantic people w call them, were taken with tempi with the shaping of phrases, they ma the music all the more spontaneous, fre as the air, hot from the composer heart. One thought of what Wagner said to an orchestra: "Now, gentlemen, we know this music. We are going to interpret it and I am going to stop beating time." Complete authority, complete abandonment to the musical impulse, and complete control characterized Mr. Moiseiwitsch's playing. There was felt the sure pulse of the great beats, and there was also the delightful fluctuation, and ebb and flow which makes music, and rescues it from the pump-handling of time-beaters.

Performance Lyrical

With the exception of the few declamatory passages, or the clanging chords of the principal theme of the finale, the performance was wonderfully lyrical from beginning to end. The piano sang. The intermezzo was deliciously intimate, like an improvisation of piano and orchestra. The finale swept one away with its youthful spirit. It was the undying youth of Schumann. There are pianists who come and go. This one is the earnest and objective interpreter. The other is a virtuoso who exites an audience, if he does not stir it to the depths. Another is an impressionist, and so on. All great artistic qualities which could be called into play by the Schumann concerto were at the command of Dr. Moisievitch and his performance will in all probability long stand, for the writer, as the ideal expression of the composer's thought.

Mr. Monteux caught the idyllic wood of Brahms' symphony, and he also felt what can well be called the respiration of this music. It is music which breathes quietly and deeply, like nature. The melodies of the first movement exfoliate, as it were, before one's eyes. They arrive at their complete fulfilment as inevitably as the full flower bursts from the stalk. Mr. Monteux wove the melodic strands of this movement together with as much as he showed in his observance, at the same time, of every carefully wrought detail of Brahms' form. He interpreted the slow movement with feeling and without logy pretense of profundity. We have seldom heard so much humor in the scherzo, and the vigor of the finale was in the highest degree characteristic. This was the completion of a delightful concert.

POST FEB. 26

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert on February 25. The program was as follows: Carpenter, suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta"; Schumann, concerto for piano and orchestra, op. 54; Brahms, symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 73. Benno Moiseiwitsch was the pianist.

It is difficult to speak of Mr. Carpenter's suite. As music of the theater it may be effective, but as he allows it to be played in the concert hall, it must, of course, be judged purely as music and its shortcomings cannot be excused on the ground that it is not played in its proper surroundings. Moreover, there is no reason why music, originally conceived for the ballet, should not have value apart from the purpose for which it was originally composed. Delibes, to cite only one example, wrote much charming and original music which is interesting wherever and whenever heard. To return to Mr. Carpenter's suite. As music of the concert hall it is lacking in form. Such themes as there are are not of distinction and often border dangerously on the vulgar and commonplace. The orchestration does not cover up the woeful lack of taste displayed in their selection. One asks: Why did Mr. Monteux, a man so remarkable for his refined taste, select such a composition for performance at a symphony concert? The crashes of brass drum and cymbals, the melodies played on the glockenspiel, the blatant brass are all reminiscent of the music hall. The audience received the work with enthusiasm. This kind of music is undoubtedly grateful to the ears of many but there are places where it is more appropriate than in a symphony concert. The Schumann concerto was poetically played by Mr. Moiseiwitsch and the orchestra. Brahms' D major symphony was excellently read by Mr. Monteux, who again proved himself a master in the interpretation of compositions of the most varied character.

MONITOR FEB. 26.

MUSIC NOTES

Miss Alice Nielsen, who will sing as soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, started her career as the star in operettas in America and England. She made her debut on the grand opera stage in Italy, taking the part of Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust." She is now devoting her entire activities to concert appearances. She will sing with the orchestra two of the most famous arias of Mozart—"Deh 'Viene non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at these concerts Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony in A minor, No. 3, Mozart's Overture to his light opera, "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," and a new work by Henry F Gilbert, the noted American composer, entitled "Indian Sketches," which will have its first public performance on this occasion. The movements are as follows: Prelude, Invocation, Song of the Wolf, Camp Dance, Nocturne, Snake Dance.

RECORD FEB 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM CARPENTER BACK TO BRAHMS AND SCHUMANN

A Suite from the American's Ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," Bears New Conditions Well, Reveals No Small Mastery of Rhythm and Color—Mr. Monteux Reanimates a Classic and Mr. Moiseiwitsch Enriches a Concerto

AMERICAN composers are not usually innovators. Ingrained in them, as in the rest of us, is the racial instinct toward uniformity, to the regular thing in the regular way. They are excellent imitators when the model is so well established and generally approved as the newer French music. They work well in any orthodox traces, with never a gall upon their shining coats. To take their own course with their own music is another, a perilous, thing. Mr. Loeffler has dared so to do and is accounted a baffling composer; Mr. Gilbert, doing likewise, is the "eccentric Mr. Gilbert"; Mr. Carpenter, exhibiting the same preference, is an "outsider" who happens to write music. The "best people" in the little world that composes, reviews and debates American music (with not a little gossip along the way) still looks skew-eyed at him. Strange fellow! he does not frequent "musical circles"—possibly under premonition of boredom. He actually conducts a business commonly reported to be profitable; he even elects the life of a cultivated man of the world. And when he writes music, Heaven save the mark! He began symphonically with a fanciful, playful Suite about a baby's "morning-out" in a perambulator. He continued with sportive Concertino—a Concertino with rag-time in it—for piano and orchestra. "Serious" musicians, "right-thinking" American composers, do not choose such courses; while purblind and perverse are those who dare to find a clear American quality in these vagaries.

Even when Mr. Carpenter wrote a Symphony, he distinctly departed from the rules. Certain measures, certain procedures, distinctly suggesting the composers to the Russion Ballet, gave almost as much offence as the tinkling triangle in Liszt's Concerto for piano. Such things were simply "not done"—in respectable symphonic circles. By these signs, Mr. Carpenter was likely to undertake a ballet—and he did, with no better precedent in the whole range of American music than "The Dance in Place Congo" by "the eccentric Mr. Gilbert." Much of that piece in an earlier day had been a symphonic poem; but for the bleak winds of criticism upon "The Birthday of the Infanta," Mr. Carpenter had not so much as such figleaf.

Nevertheless, the piece was actually written; nay, it was mimed and danced in Chicago, in New York, almost in Boston. Any ballet, however—especially one fathered by an exacting and independently minded composer—is bound to be only occasional in American opera houses. Accordingly Mr. Carpenter sought in the music a Suite for orchestra in the concert-hall. For the first time hereabouts that Suite was played at the Symphony Concert yesterday and in disadvantageous circumstance. Few in the audience had actually seen, as well as heard, "The Birthday of the Infanta" in the theatre. Wilde's story, whence the fable comes, is not widely known. Less than half the music could be wisely transferred to the new container. There had been laborious rehearsal and consequent murmuring, while plentiful gossip affirmed that without settings, action and the general glamor of the stage, Mr. Carpenter's ballet, like the chaos of Genesis, was null and void. Yet there was Mr. Monteux holding manfully to his purpose and conducting with the practised instinct for rhythm, for color, for the vivid momentary stroke wherewith he excels in music for the theatre. There also was the orchestra missing none of the composer's flashes or filagree of detail. And there finally was an audience, plainly interested, pleased, and minded to call Mr. Carpenter not once, but twice, to the platform. Strange these perverse ears that somehow prefer pleasure to orthodoxy. Can it be that even in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons, sits a "loose" generation?

Of course, these fragments of "The Birthday of the Infanta" lose appreciably by shift to the concert-hall. If they did not, they would not be the revealing, accenuating, illuding music that they are in the theatre, knit into every detail of the action, a-quiver to every suggestion of mood and atmosphere, yet they remain anywhere an exceedingly adroit, vivid, sustained and individual music. Even in his Symphony, Mr. Carpenter has hardly achieved such an expert, artful, orchestrally fanciful a score. Like the abler and the younger composers of our day, he thinks, feels, writes in the terms of the orchestra. He is becoming more and more sensitive to the individuality, the suggestion of instrumental voices. He gains in ingenious and imaginative manipulation of them, in contrast, in combination, in stark separation, in manifold play of enhancing color. The Suite of yesterday teems with vivid instrumental and harmonic strokes; it abounds no less in felicitous harmonic and instrumental details. Both are audible even in the quick passage of new music upon unprepared ears. Mr. Carpenter writes to be heard in theatre or concert-hall as well as to be read in "the closet."

All this, moreover, is no mere technical virtuosity. It seeks and gains delineative, poetizing, atmospheric ends—achieves them with economy, precision, directness of means. A few measures of introduction suggest the tragic fantasy which is the mood of the whole mimodrama; not so many more measures at the end suffice to summon the dwarf dead of piteous disillusion; the little princess shrinking away in as piteous bewilderment over these blows of fate; the whole descent out of courtly and ornate fantasy into a woful tragedy of inner confusions and self-deceits. The birthday of the infanta and gay fetes for the royal child. The birthday of the infanta and a dwarf who hugs illusions of beauty and of love and pays for them; a girl-princess who learns in such an hour that life is not a pretty, playful, simple thing. So in the music, even in the concert-hall, has Mr. Carpenter wrought the finer illusion of his ballet. The means may be harmonies and color, rhythm and motiv, but the source is the imagination, the sensibility, the sustaining will, of the composer.

In theatre or concert-hall, music of fete necessarily abounds in "The Birthday of the Infanta." The children of the court stream into the princess's party; a ceremonious retinue bears the gifts appropriate to the occasion and her state. There are dances of festival before the dwarf comes with dances of the heart. There is even a mimic, but no less flaunting, bull-fight. In all these "numbers," as the elder ballet-masters would call them, Mr. Carpenter's instinct for rhythm—his best and most characteristic ability—serves him richly and variously. The motivs whence spring say, the capering of the children, the dance of the gypsies, the procession with the gifts, are not remarkable in themselves. They are no more than serviceable material. Yet once Mr. Carpenter has animated them with his vivid and plastic rhythms, once clothed them in his rainbow play of harmonies and timbres, set in a vivid detail here, a shadowy detail there, forthwith comes the illusion that he seeks. In the concert-hall, the listener, with two grains of imagination, feels the occasion, catches the illusion.

That illusion is by no means simple. To and fro goes the bull-fight; the ear hears, the eye sees, the feints and the rushes; trumpets flare; red cloths wave; yet somehow the music does remind him that all this is mimic for an infanta's birthday. Stately indeed are the bearers of gifts; a turn of rhythm, a dash of color and we auditors hear and see them, as Mr. Carpenter heard and saw, a little grotesquely. Of a sudden across the introductory measures, of a sudden again, across the final bars, falls the dull, distant clang of the great bell of the palace. The rhythm is stark, the notes bare; yet there is omen and there fulfilment of the dwarf's tragedy. It is by the means, the fruitful means of the composers of our day, that Mr. Carpenter achieves this illusion—by imaginative command of rhythm, harmonies, instrumental color, by the divination that is resource glorified. Why reproach him because he discards others with which elder composers have worked; because he is not too fertil in these older invntions and too fertile in these older inventions and means so long as they bring to pass his chosen end. Even in the concert-hall—and three-fold more in the theatre—"The Birthday of the Infanta" works the illusion Mr. Carpenter would compass. Once more he has written an unflagging music.

Two other pieces filled the remainder of the concert with familiar, anticipated pleasure—Schumann's Concerto for Piano, with Mr. Moiseiwitsch playing the solo part, and Brahms's Second Symphony with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra rich-voiced in instrumental song. Once more returned the familiar and unexplained anomaly that French conductors will take German music more slowly than do German leaders; whereas those same Germans similarly stay the pace of French pieces. Otherwise, Mr. Monteux excelled himself with a classical symphony; while at every turn the orchestra gave him back a depth, warmth, suppleness of tone worthy of its best days. No roughness marred the texture of the music, no stiffness impeded its flow. The conductor found, developed, sustained Brahms's melodies, the orchestra gave them life and glow. Not often does a symphony of the nineteenth century, hallowed though it be, yield such an impression of pure and vernal instrumental song as did the first movement, yesterday, of this symphony in D major. The succeeding Adagio renewed such wealth of songful beauty. By ever so little Mr. Monteux seemed to touch the Scherzo with Gallic caprice, especially in the quick, glinting measures that twice return. Thereby Brahms was the gainer, as he was in the same symphony, two months ago, under Mr. Toscanini's Ital-[illegible] in the Finale, it was exhilarating to hear the rhythms stride, the phrases leap. Mr. Monteux has done the Boston Orchestra and its public many services—not the least when he keeps this, that and the other "classic" a living music, cut free from the bonds of repertory and routine.

Over the Concerto, it is possible to blaspheme, saying that some of us have heard quite enough symphonic Schumann for one musical year. Yet, as always, the Schumann of the piano is not the Schumann of the orchestra, though in this particular piece he joins the two together. Seemingly the piano stimulates his orchestral imagination, and he achieves the lovely Euphonies of the Concerto. Seemingly the piano quickens his sense of form and the music flows unclouded by thick repetition. Again fancy makes flashing play with rhythm as through the syncopations of the Finale. Again out of romantic vision rises melody, as in the first movement and the intermezzo, that returns ever fresh and strange and beautiful. Even for the over-fed the Piano-Concerto renews the transporting Schumann—the Schumann that Mr. Moiseiwitsch served yesterday not merely with inexhaustible technical means, with apt touch and glamoring tone, but with the insight and the imagination that out of rhythm and melody weave the magic of sudden beauty—the spell of romance upon familiar things.

H. T. Parker

TRANS FEB 26.

Alice Nielsen

Soprano, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TRIBUNE

TRIBUNE

ss: Providence, R. I.

27 1921

NEILSON NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

At the last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one, which is to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 8, at 8:15, the soloist will be Miss Alice Nielsen, the soprano who has obtained much fame as prima donna in opera. The symphony at this concert will be the 3rd by Felix Mendelssohn in A minor, which is entitled the "Scotch" symphony. Pierre Monteux will also conduct two famous numbers by Richard Wagner, the "Prelude to Lohengrin" and the "Overture to Tannhauser." Miss Alice Nielsen will sing, with the orchestra, two of the immortal arias of Mozart, to sing which, few singers living are more finely equipped. They will be "Deh vieni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti batti" from "Don Giovanni."

As a young girl Miss Nielsen first attracted public attention by the charm of her presence, and the loveliness and singular purity of her voice in light opera in America and in England. She had, however, secret aspirations to become a grand opera singer, and completing an engagement in London she studied four months in Italy, in which time she mastered the role of Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust." She surprised and delighted the Italian public when she made her debut in that role in the Teatro Bellini, the very same theatre in which Caruso made his debut, similarly unknown, and at a salary 16 lire less than that bestowed on the impetuous young American from Nashville, Tenn. The pronounced success of her debut led to appearances in the principal opera houses in Italy and to an engagement during the following season at the Covent Garden Opera in London. She returned to America in 1906 to sing with Lillian Nordica's San Carlo Opera Company. Subsequently she filled engagements with the Boston Opera Company, and became a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1912. Recently, however, she had been confining her activities entirely to concert appearances.

• • •

JOURNAL 27 1921

Providence, R. I.

Rarely have music lovers of the city and State had the number and variety of concert programmes on a Sunday as are offered to-day. This afternoon there are three attractions and to-night another. Roswell H. Fairman and the Providence Orchestral Association will give a programme at Fays Theatre this afternoon; Mme. Rosa Raisa and Giacomo Rimini will make their first appearance here in the first of two extra Steinert recitals at the Shubert Majestic, and the Providence Theatrical Mutual Association will give a miscellaneous programme of band music, instrumental and vocal solos at the Strand Theatre. The programme will be repeated in the

---

From JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

Alice Nielson, lyric soprano, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday night, March 8, the last but one of the present season in this city. At this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony No. 3 in A minor, considered generally one of the composer's most popular symphonies. Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser" are also on the programme.

Miss Nielson will sing two of Mozart's arias, the "Deh vieni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti batti" from Don Giovanni," pieces to which the lyric quality of the singer's voice are admirably suited. Miss Nielson is remembered as one of the finest and most popular prima donnas of the famous Bostonians and as a star of her own comic opera companies, in which she appeared in this city for many seasons. Her voice justified her and her ambitions led her to undertake the more serious task of grand opera. Her first role was Marguerite in "Faust" with which she scored a triumph in Italy. It is said she made her debut after only four months study of the part. Her success led to her engagement in several of the large opera houses of Italy and subsequently to appearances at Covent Garden, London, where her Zerlina in "Don Giovanni," Mimi in "La Boheme" and Nedda in "Pagliacci" were accorded high favor and praise.

The "Verdandi" (Swedish Male Chorus) will give its annual concert at the Strand Theatre Sunday afternoon, March 13. The chorus is now entering upon its 27th year of activity in this city during which time it has increased steadily its musical influence and list of friends and patrons. The soloist will be Harald Lindau of New York, a young dramatic tenor, whose voice is said to possess unusual brilliancy and power. Most of his musical training has been in New York. The concert will mark his first appearance in Providence.

Nielsen Symphony Soloist

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the Third, in A minor, will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, and a new work by Henry F. Gilbert, the noted American composer, entitled "Indian Sketches," will have its first public performance at these concerts. The movements are as follows: Prelude; Invocation; Song of the Wolf; Camp Dance; Nocturne; Snake Dance. Mozart's Overture to his light opera, "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" will introduce two of the most famous arias by the same composer, to be sung by Miss Alice Nielsen, who has long been noted for her skill in this music. They will be "Deh Vieni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni."

Miss Nielsen is well remembered by many Bostonians from the days when she was prima donna of the Boston Opera Company. Prominent in her girlhood in light opera in this country and in England, she early realized that her true career lay in the field of grand opera, and accordingly, after studying in Italy, made her debut as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust" at tse Teatro Bellini, where Caruso also made his debut. The success of this venture led to numerous appearances in the opera houses of Italy and thence she made her London debut at Covent Garden as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni." Her Micaela, Mimi and Nedda were all enthusiastically praised and led to her engagement in 1906 in America with Nordica's San Carlo Opera Company, in 1909 to her contract with the Boston Opera Company, and in the season of 1912-13 to appearances in the Metropolitan Opera House. She is now confining her activities to concert appearances.

POST FEB 27.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Seventeenth program "Scotch" Symphony, Mendelssohn; "Indian Sketches," Gilbert (first time); overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," and "Deh vieni non tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart. Soloist, Alice Nielsen, soprano.

At the Symphony concerts on Good Friday and Holy Saturday the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will sing the Graal scene from Wagner's "Parsifal." The Glee Club will also assist at the third and final Pension Fund concert next month.

GLOBE, FEB 27.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, and a new work by Henry F. Gilbert, entitled "Indian Sketches," will have its first public performance here. Alice Nielsen, the soloist, will sing Mozart's "Deh Vieni non tardar," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni." A Mozart overture will also be played.

ADVERTISER FEB. 27.

APPEARING THIS WEEK

ALICE NIELSEN, SOPRANO, TO SING AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Ballet Music at the Symphony Concerts

ADVERTISER

SYMPHONY music written by a hardware merchant is to be counted among the art curiosities of the century.

But the suite from the ballet pantomime, "The Birthday of the Infanta," composed by John Alden Carpenter of Chicago, was one of the most imaginative and entertaining numbers on the sixteenth Symphony program. The music is based on the celebrated story by Oscar Wilde. The ballet was to have been done here last season, during the Chicago Opera Company engagement; but a blizzard interfered with the arrival of the dancers. The music is delightful, even without the dancing—which cannot be said of all ballet music—and it was capitally performed by the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux excels as an interpreter of dance music.

Mr. Carpenter, who came to Boston to attend the performances, acknowledged the applause from the stage. He looks like a typical Western business man. Nevertheless, he is one of the country's foremost amateur musicians. He studied music at Harvard. Since his college days he has successfully combined art and merchandising.

Another flattering reception, at the matinee, was given the soloist, Benno Morseiwitsh, a brilliant pianist, who in recent years has been living in New York. He is a Russian by birth and a pupil of the famous Leschetizky. Last year he gave a recital here. His selection for his Symphony debut was the Schumann concerto in A minor, which had last been played here by Paderewski. It is a melodious work, with many fine lyrical and sparkling passages for the piano. The soloist did ample justice to the classic concerto and was recalled several times.

The concert closed with an extremely poetic performance of the second Brahms symphony, the second and third movements of which, with their numerous melodic beauties, were done better than at any concert here in the last four years.

Items and Announcements

Mr. Monteux is laudably classic with his programmes. For the Symphony Concerts of next week, he proposes five short and relatively light pieces, none of which is the symphony of custom and formula. Once in so often it is good to find it—or the equivalent, the long symphonic poem—missing from the list. The conductor's numbers are:

Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"......Weber
Concerto in D major for Violoncello with Orchestra ....Haydn
(Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti)
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus"..............Liszt
Noble and Sentimental Waltzes...........Ravel
Two Movements (Romeo Alone: Fête at the Capulets') from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"..................Berlioz

The "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes," some of which happen also to be ironic, are, of course, Ravel's early piano-pieces as recently scored for orchestra by the composer. Epilogue included, there are eight of them.

MAR 3. TRANS

Mr. Gilbert's Indian Sketches

Ten years ago, Mr. Henry F. Gilbert had a part in the preparation of Edward S. Curtis's exhaustive treatise on the North American Indian. Mr. Curtis had a large staff of field-workers who went among the Indians of the various tribes and made phonograph-records of their tribal melodies, war-whoops and ceremonial songs. These records were sent to Mr. Gilbert at his home in Cambridge, and from them he notated and arranged the music for publication. Later when Mr. Curtis planned a lecture tour, Mr. Gilbert was commissioned to compose twenty-one pieces that might be used in connection with the lantern-slides by which Mr. Curtis purposed to illustrate his talks. In writing this music Mr. Gilbert made use of the material which he had collected, and the pieces were scored for a small orchestra, conducted on the tour by the composer himself. In his "Chapter of Reminiscence," appearing in the current issues of the "New Music Review," Mr. Gilbert tells the following amusing anecdote.

> At Providence, R. I., after our performance, a lady, one of the audience, stepped up to me and questioned me with considerable intelligence concerning the Indians and their music. But I noticed that as she did so she was a little bit diffident and stand-offish—did not seem to care to come very near me. Afterwards I learned that she went to Mr. Curtis and said, "What a very intelligent Indian you have leading the orchestra." I concluded that my Indian music was a success if it could actually fool the public into the belief that I myself was an Indian.

From the kernel of these short pieces has developed the far more ambitious set of six Indian sketches which will receive first performance at the Symphony concerts of this week. They consist of a Prelude (or "Barbarous Mood"), Invocation, "Song of the Wolf," Camp Dance, Nocturn (sic) and Snake Dance. The composer has made judicious use of the Indian melodies which he collected so long ago but in no instances has he merely harmonized the aboriginal tunes. Instead, he has reworked the melodies, or fragments of them, into expressive themes of his own. The title of each piece is a sufficient explanation of his intention with it, and it is only necessary to recall Mr. Gilbert's skill in releasing primitive moods and emotions, his gift for pictorial ex-

---

ALICE NIELSEN SOLO

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony will be conducted by Mr. Monteux, also a new work by Henry F. Gilbert, the noted American composer, entitled "Indian Sketches," which will have its first public performance at these concerts. The movements are as follows: Prelude, Invocation, Song of the Wolf, Camp Dance, Nocturne, Snake Dance. Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" will also be played. Alice Nielsen will sing "Deh Vieni non Tardar," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni."

Miss Nielsen is well remembered by many Bostonians. Prominent in her girlhood in light opera in this country and in England, she studied in Italy and made her debut as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust" at the Teatro Bellini. She afterward sang in cities of Italy and then made her debut at Covent Garden as Zerlina. Her Micaela, Mimi and Nedda were praised. This led to her engagement in 1906 in America with the San Carlo opera company, in 1909 to her contract with the Boston Opera Company, and in the season of 1912-13 to appearances in the Metropolitan Opera House.

[illegible] FEB 27.

MUSIC

Boston Notes

The seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on March 4, was as follows: Mendelssohn, Scotch Symphony, op. 56; Mozart, overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"; Mozart, arias from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni," Alice Nielsen, soloist; Gilbert, Indian sketches.

The performance of Mendelssohn's symphony was a particularly fine one. The music sounded singularly fresh, only in the development section of the first allegro giving evidence of age and other fashions. The whole work was given a new life and meaning by Mr. Monteux's spirited and sympathetic reading. The delicacy of the scherzo and the rich tone of the first violins and 'cellos in the adagio were noteworthy.

Mr. Gilbert's sketches were played for the first time. To many they will seem rough and uncultured, needlessly uncouth. Yet they are not to be dismissed with a careless word or two. They represent a distinct phase of American music. They are blatantly American. Every page might bear the "Made in America" stamp, and, like them or not, their sincerity must be admitted. This is American music and if you find it crude it is because, when stripped of our foreign musical trappings, we are crude. Mr. Gilbert has a fine courage. He dares to be absolutely himself in his music and there is not one note which does not bear witness to his sturdy independence of thought and freedom from conventional restraint.

These sketches might easily be criticized. There are many things to shock the average listener. The point is, however, in the spirit of their conception, and shortcomings in the execution must be excused. Mr. Gilbert's work, in its graphic realism, national character and, as well, in its often inadequate technical working out, reminds one of the Russian Moussorgsky. Later American composers will reap full harvest from Mr. Gilbert's courageous pioneer work, as did so many of the successors of the great Russian.

MONITOR, MAR. 5

An Appreciation

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brockton on Feb. 20, in spite of the storm. The Brockton Times of the 21st voiced the delight of the audience. "The last number was Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, in A major, Op. 11, No. 1, and its last melodious chords mingled softly with sighs of regret from the listeners, who for more than two hours had drifted happily on the sea of soul-stirring music." Mr. Richard Burgin was the soloist. He "exhibited rare skill as the sweet voice of his violin rose and fell in charming interpretations of dreamy, passionate and vivacious phases" (sic). The symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World." "All who understood the technique and sympathetic understanding necessary for successful intonations were impressed with the faultless blending of the violins, violas, flutes, trumpets and other instruments which make up the ensemble of the perfect melody producers."

[illegible] MAR 5

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program at the 18th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and to be followed by the last tour of the orchestra: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus;" Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." As soloist, Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the 'cello section, will be heard in Haydn's Violoncello Concerto in D

RECORD MAR

[93]

...an intensities. In the Finale, it was exhilarating to hear the rhythms stride, the phrases leap. Mr. Monteux has done the Boston Orchestra and its public many services—not the least when he keeps this, that and the other "classic" a living music, cut free from the bonds of repertory and routine.

Over the Concerto, it is possible to blaspheme, saying that some of us have heard quite enough symphonic Schumann for one musical year. Yet, as always, the Schumann of the piano is not the Schumann of the orchestra, though in this particular piece he joins the two together. Seemingly the piano stimulates his orchestral imagination, and he achieves the lovely Euphonies of the Concerto. Seemingly the piano quickens his sense of form and the music flows unclouded by thick repetition. Again fancy makes flashing play with rhythm as through the syncopations of the Finale. Again out of romantic vision rises melody, as in the first movement and the intermezzo, that returns ever fresh and strange and beautiful. Even for the over-fed the Piano-Concerto renews the transporting Schumann—the Schumann that Mr. Moiseiwitsch served yesterday not merely with inexhaustible technical means, with apt touch and glamoring tone, but with the insight and the imagination that out of rhythm and melody weave the magic of sudden beauty—the spell of romance upon familiar things.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS FEB

Alice Nielsen

Soprano, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TRIBUNE

Providence, R. I.

* * *

NEILSON NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

At the last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one, which is to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 8, at 8:15, the soloist will be Miss Alice Nielsen, the soprano who has obtained much fame as prima donna in opera. The symphony at this concert will be the 3rd by Felix Mendelssohn in A minor, which is entitled the "Scotch" symphony. Pierre Monteux will also conduct two famous numbers by Richard Wagner, the "Prelude to Lohengrin" and the "Overture to Tannhauser." Miss Alice Nielsen will sing, with the orchestra, two of the immortal arias of Mozart, to sing which, few singers living are more finely equipped. They will be "Deh vieni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti batti" from "Don Giovanni."

As a young girl Miss Nielsen first attracted public attention by the charm of her presence, and the loveliness and singular purity of her voice in light opera in America and in England. She had, however, secret aspirations to become a grand opera singer, and completing an engagement in London she studied four months in Italy, in which time she mastered the role of Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust." She surprised and delighted the Italian public when she made her debut in that role in the Teatro Bellini, the very same theatre in which Caruso made his debut, similarly unknown, and at a salary 16 lire less than that bestowed on the impetuous young American from Nashville, Tenn. The pronounced success of her debut led to appearances in the principal opera houses in Italy and to an engagement during the following season at the Covent Garden Opera in London. She returned to America in 1906 to sing with Lillian Nordica's San Carlo Opera Company. Subsequently she filled engagements with the Boston Opera Company, and became a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1912. Recently, however, she had been confining her activities entirely to concert appearances.

* * *

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Rarely have music lovers of the city and State had the number and variety of concert programmes on a Sunday as are offered to-day. This afternoon there are three attractions and to-night another. Roswell H. Fairman and the Providence Orchestral Association will give a programme at Fays Theatre this afternoon; Mme. Rosa Raisa and Giacomo Rimini will make their first appearance here in the first of two extra Steinert recitals at the Shubert Majestic, and the Providence Theatrical Mutual Association will give a miscellaneous programme of band music, instrumental and vocal solos at the Strand Theatre. The latter programme will be repeated in the evening.

---

from
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Alice Nielson, lyric soprano, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday night, March 8, the last but one of the present season in this city. At this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony No. 3 in A minor, considered generally one of the composer's most popular symphonies. Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser" are also on the programme.

Miss Nielson will sing two of Mozart's arias, the "Deh vieni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti batti" from Don Giovanni," pieces to which the lyric quality of the singer's voice are admirably suited. Miss Nielson is remembered as one of the finest and most popular prima donnas of the famous Bostonians and as a star of her own comic opera companies, in which she appeared in this city for many seasons. Her voice justified her and her ambitions led her to undertake the more serious task of grand opera. Her first role was Marguerite in "Faust" with which she scored a triumph in Italy. It is said she made her debut after only four months study of the part. Her success led to her engagement in several of the large opera houses of Italy and subsequently to appearances at Covent Garden, London, where her Zerlina in "Don Giovanni," Mimi in "La Boheme" and Nedda in "Pagliacci" were accorded high favor and praise.

The "Verdandi" (Swedish Male Chorus) will give its annual concert at the Strand Theatre Sunday afternoon, March 13. The chorus is now entering upon its 27th year of activity in this city during which time it has increased steadily its musical influence and list of friends and patrons. The soloist will be Harald Lindau of New York, a young dramatic tenor, whose voice is said to possess unusual brilliancy and power. Most of his musical training has been in New York. The concert will mark his first appearance in Providence.

Nielsen Symphony Soloist

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the Third, in A minor, will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, and a new work by Henry F. Gilbert, the noted American composer, entitled "Indian Sketches," will have its first public performance at these concerts. The movements are as follows: Prelude; Invocation; Song of the Wolf; Camp Dance; Nocturne; Snake Dance. Mozart's Overture to his light opera, "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" will introduce two of the most famous arias by the same composer, to be sung by Miss Alice Nielsen, who has long been noted for her skill in this music. They will be "Deh Vieni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni."

Miss Nielsen is well remembered by many Bostonians from the days when she was prima donna of the Boston Opera Company. Prominent in her girlhood in light opera in this country and in England, she early realized that her true career lay in the field of grand opera, and accordingly, after studying in Italy, made her debut as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust" at tse Teatro Bellini, where Caruso also made his debut. The success of this venture led to numerous appearances in the opera houses of Italy and thence she made her London debut at Covent Garden as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni." Her Micaela, Mimi and Nedda were all enthusiastically praised and led to her engagement in 1906 in America with Nordica's San Carlo Opera Company, in 1909 to her contract with the Boston Opera Company, and in the season of 1912-13 to appearances in the Metropolitan Opera House. She is now confining her activities to concert appearances.

POST FEB 27

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Seventeenth program "Scotch" Symphony, Mendelssohn; "Indian Sketches," Gilbert (first time); overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," and "Deh vieni non tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart. Soloist, Alice Nielsen, soprano.

At the Symphony concerts on Good Friday and Holy Saturday the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will sing the Graal scene from Wagner's "Parsifal." The Glee Club will also assist at the third and final Pension Fund concert next month.

GLOBE, FEB. 27

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, and a new work by Henry F. Gilbert, entitled "Indian Sketches," will have its first public performance here. Alice Nielsen, the soloist, will sing Mozart's "Deh Vieni non tardar," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni." A Mozart overture will also be played.

ADVERTISER
FEB. 27.

APPEARING THIS WEEK

ALICE NIELSEN, SOPRANO, TO SING AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Ballet Music at the Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY music written by a hardware merchant is to be counted among the art curiosities of the century.

But the suite from the ballet pantomime, "The Birthday of the Infanta," composed by John Alden Carpenter of Chicago, was one of the most imaginative and entertaining numbers on the sixteenth Symphony program. The music is based on the celebrated story by Oscar Wilde. The ballet was to have been done here last season, during the Chicago Opera Company engagement, but a blizzard interfered with the arrival of the dancers. The music is delightful, even without the dancing—which cannot be said of all ballet music—and it was capitally performed by the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux excels as an interpreter of dance music.

Mr. Carpenter, who came to Boston to attend the performances, acknowledged the applause from the stage. He looks like a typical Western business man. Nevertheless, he is one of the country's foremost amateur musicians. He studied music at Harvard. Since his college days he has successfully combined art and merchandising.

Another flattering reception, at the matinee, was given the soloist, Benno Morseiwitsh, a brilliant pianist, who in recent years has been living in New York. He is a Russian by birth and a pupil of the famous Leschetizky. Last year he gave a recital here. His selection for his Symphony debut was the Schumann concerto in A minor, which had last been played here by Paderewski. It is a melodious work, with many fine lyrical and sparkling passages for the piano. The soloist did ample justice to the classic concerto and was recalled several times.

The concert closed with an extremely poetic performance of the second Brahms symphony, the second and third movements of which, with their numerous melodic beauties, were done better than at any concert here in the last four years.

Items and Announcements

Mr. Monteux is laudably elastic with his programmes. For the Symphony Concerts of next week, he proposes five short and relatively light pieces, none of which is the symphony of custom and formula. Once in so often it is good to find it—or the equivalent, the long symphonic poem—missing from the list. The conductor's numbers are:

Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"......Weber
Concerto in D major for Violoncello with Orchestra ....Haydn
(Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti)
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus"..............Liszt
Noble and Sentimental Waltzes...........Ravel
Two Movements (Romeo Alone; Fête at the Capulets') from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"..................Berlioz

The "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes," some of which happen also to be ironic, are, of course, Ravel's early piano-pieces as recently scored for orchestra by the composer. Epilogue included, there are eight of them.

MAR. 5

Mr. Gilbert's Indian Sketches

Ten years ago, Mr. Henry F. Gilbert had a part in the preparation of Edward S. Curtis's exhaustive treatise on the North American Indian. Mr. Curtis had a large staff of field-workers who went among the Indians of the various tribes and made phonograph-records of their tribal melodies, war-whoops and ceremonial songs. These records were sent to Mr. Gilbert at his home in Cambridge, and from them he notated and arranged the music for publication. Later when Mr. Curtis planned a lecture tour, Mr. Gilbert was commissioned to compose twenty-one pieces that might be used in connection with the lantern-slides by which Mr. Curtis purposed to illustrate his talks. In writing this music Mr. Gilbert made use of the material which he had collected, and the pieces were scored for a small orchestra, conducted on the tour by the composer himself. In his "Chapter of Reminiscence," appearing in the current issues of the "New Music Review," Mr. Gilbert tells the following amusing anecdote.

> At Providence, R. I., after our performance, a lady, one of the audience, stepped up to me and questioned me with considerable intelligence concerning the Indians and their music. But I noticed that as she did so she was a little bit diffident and stand-offish—did not seem to care to come very near me. Afterwards I learned that she went to Mr. Curtis and said, "What a very intelligent Indian you have leading the orchestra." I concluded that my Indian music was a success if it could actually fool the public into the belief that I myself was an Indian.

From the kernel of these short pieces has developed the far more ambitious set of six Indian sketches which will receive first performance at the Symphony concerts of this week. They consist of a Prelude (or "Barbarous Mood"), invocation, "Song of the Wolf," Camp Dance, Nocturn (sic) and Snake Dance. The composer has made judicious use of the Indian melodies which he collected so long ago, but in no instances has he merely harmonized the aboriginal tunes. Instead, he has reworked the melodies, or fragments of them, into expressive themes of his own. The title of each piece is a sufficient explanation of his intention with it, and it is only necessary to recall Mr. Gilbert's skill in releasing primitive moods and emotions, his gift for pictorial ex-

---

ALICE NIELSEN SOLOIST

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony will be conducted by Mr. Monteux, also a new work by Henry F. Gilbert, the noted American composer, entitled "Indian Sketches," which will have its first public performance at these concerts. The movements are as follows: Prelude, Invocation, Song of the Wolf, Camp Dance, Nocturne, Snake Dance. Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" will also be played. Alice Nielsen will sing "Deh Vieni non Tardar," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni."

Miss Nielsen is well remembered by many Bostonians. Prominent in her girlhood in light opera in this country and in England, she studied in Italy and made her debut as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust" at the Teatro Bellini. She afterward sang in cities of Italy and then made her debut at Covent Garden as Zerlina. Her Micaela, Mimi and Nedda were praised. This led to her engagement in 1906 in America with the San Carlo opera company, in 1909 to her contract with the Boston Opera Company, and in the season of 1912-13 to appearances in the Metropolitan Opera House.

FEB. 27.

MUSIC

Boston Notes

The seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on March 4, was as follows: Mendelssohn, Scotch Symphony, op. 56; Mozart, overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"; Mozart, arias from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni," Alice Nielsen, soloist; Gilbert, Indian sketches.

The performance of Mendelssohn's symphony was a particularly fine one. The music sounded singularly fresh, only in the development section of the first allegro giving evidence of age and other fashions. The whole work was given a new life and meaning by Mr. Monteux's spirited and sympathetic reading. The delicacy of the scherzo and the rich tone of the first violins and 'cellos in the adagio were noteworthy.

Mr. Gilbert's sketches were played for the first time. To many they will seem rough and uncultured, needlessly uncouth. Yet they are not to be dismissed with a careless word or two. They represent a distinct phase of American music. They are blatantly American. Every page might bear the "Made in America" stamp, and, like them or not, their sincerity must be admitted. This is American music and if you find it crude it is because, when stripped of our foreign musical trappings, we are crude. Mr. Gilbert has a fine courage. He dares to be absolutely himself in his music and there is not one note which does not bear witness to his sturdy independence of thought and freedom from conventional restraint.

These sketches might easily be criticized. There are many things to shock the average listener. The point is, however, in the spirit of their conception, and shortcomings in the execution must be excused. Mr. Gilbert's work, in its graphic realism, national character and, as well, in its often inadequate technical working out, reminds one of the Russian Moussorgsky. Later American composers will reap full harvest from Mr. Gilbert's courageous pioneer work, as did so many of the successors of the great Russian.

MAR. 5

An Appreciation

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brockton on Feb. 20, in spite of the storm. The Brockton Times of the 21st voiced the delight of the audience. "The last number was Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, in A major, Op. 11, No. 1, and its last melodious chords mingled softly with sighs of regret from the listeners, who for more than two hours had drifted happily on the sea of soul-stirring music." Mr. Richard Burgin was the soloist. He "exhibited rare skill as the sweet voice of his violin rose and fell in charming interpretations of dreamy, passionate and vivacious phases" (sic). The symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World." "All who understood the technique and sympathetic understanding necessary for successful intonations were impressed with the faultless blending of the violins, violas, flutes, trumpets and other instruments which make up the ensemble of the perfect melody producers."

MAR. 5

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program at the 18th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and to be followed by the last tour of the orchestra: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus;" Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." As soloist, Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the 'cello section, will be heard in Haydn's Violoncello Concerto in D

RECORD MAR

GILBER PIECES SYMP
dian Sket
rst Time—M
sen Sol

BY OLIN DO

endelssohn's Scot
ed without pause
ements, as was th
composer, opened t he concert of the y Orchestra, Pie
uctor, yesterday
phony Hall. Miss soloist. She sang art, "Deh vieni" fr
ding" and "Batti, Giovanni." Th
d as prelude to t overture to Moz
from the Seragli
F. Gilbert's "Indi number, were p

[93]

Mendelssohn
will be conducted a new work by he noted American
"Indian Sketches,"
s first public perncerts. The move-
: Prelude, Invoca-Volf, Camp Dance,
nce. Mozart's Over-
tfuhrung aus dem
layed. Alice Nielsen
i non Tardar," from Figaro," and "Batti, Giovanni."
well remembered by Prominent in her
pera in this country
she studied in Italy
ut as Marguerite in
at the Teatro Bellini
g in cities of Italy debut at Covent Gar-er Micaela, Mimi and
sed. This led to her in America with the ompany, in 1909 to her Boston Opera Comseason of 1912-13 to e Metropolitan Opera

FEB 27

USIC

on Notes

n program of the Bos-Orchestra, given on follows: Mendelssohn,
ny, op. 56; Mozart,
Entführung aus dem
arias from the "Mar-
and "Don Giovanni," oloist; Gilbert, Indian

nce of Mendelssohn's
a particularly fine
ic sounded singularly
e development section
gro giving evidence of fashions. The whole
a new life and mean-
ux's spirited and
The delicacy of the rich tone of the first os in the adagio were sketches were played

e. To many they will uncultured, needless-
et they are not to be careless word or two.
a distinct phase of
c. They are blatantly
ry page might bear the rica" stamp, and, like heir sincerity must be
is American music
it crude it is because,
of our foreign musical
are crude. Mr. Gilbert rage. He dares to be self in his music and ne note which does not
to his sturdy indepenght and freedom from restraint.
nes might easily be criti-
re many things to shock
listener. The point is,
he spirit of their con-
hortcomings in the exe-
e excused. Mr. Gilbert's
raphic realism, national as well, in its often hnical working out, re-
the Russian Moussorgmerican composers will vest from Mr. Gilbert's ioneer work, as did so successors of the great

R MAR. 5

Appreciation
Symphony Orchestra gave Brockton on Feb. 20, in
orm. The Brockton Times
ed the delight of the audi-
last number was Enesco,
hapsody, in A major, Op.
its last melodious chords
with sighs of regret from who for more than two ifted happily on the sea of music." Mr. Richard Bursoloist. He "exhibited rare weet voice of his violin rose harming interpretations of onate and vivacious phases"
symphony was Dvorak's
New World." "All who un-technique and sympathetic ng necessary for successful were impressed with the ending of the violins, violas, pets and other instruments
e up the ensemble of the ody producers."

MAR. 5

Monteux will conduct the program at the 18th pair
Symphony concerts, to be
Symphony Hall next Fri-
rnoon and Saturday eve-
to be followed by the last
e orchestra: Weber's Over-
"Euryanthe;" Liszt's Sym-
oem, "Orpheus;" Maurice
"Valses Nobles et Senti-
" and the Ball Scene from Symphony, "Romeo and
As soloist, Jean Bedetti, ous leader of the 'cello ll be heard in Haydn's Concerto in D major

RD MAR 5

Alice Nielsen Returns to Boston

The charming prima donna of the old Boston Opera Company days, who is shown in this interesting study with her favorite pet, is scheduled to sing once again in town this week. Isn't her chow dog remarkable? It is such intelligent animals as he that adds fame to the whole canine family.

POST FEB 27.

GILBERT'S PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Indian Sketches for First Time—Miss Nielsen Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, played without pause between the movements, as was the intention of the composer, opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Alice Nielsen was soloist. She sang two airs of Mozart, "Deh vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." The orchestra played as prelude to these airs the jocose overture to Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio." Finally, Henry F. Gilbert's "Indian Sketches," six in number, were played for the first time.

FRAGMENT FROM CHANT

These Indian sketches have been evolved from fragments of Indian folk-melody. The process of evolution is clearly and aptly described by the composer, thus quoted in the programme book: "I have in but one instance quoted an Indian melody verbatim. (I have used short phrases of a measure or so from which to develop more extended melodies in the same spirit.) Most of these barbaric chants are to me but potent suggestions pointing in the direction of an unexplored domain of musical color. While comparatively few of these primitive songs have musical value, while a dreamy monotony is one of their frequent characteristics, there are yet scattered here and there through the mass of this material, certain striking and piquant musical phrases which give one a positive and distinct impression of racial color. I have used certain of these phrases as hints; as suggestive musical nubs, which I have developed; striving never to lose touch with the barbaric character of the original melodic germ."

Are Masterpieces

In concentration of expression, in mastery of orchestration, in the establishment of mood by relatively simple means, these sketches are the most advanced and the most finished thing Mr. Gilbert has done. He has employed wider canvasses before. He has called more instruments to his service. But he has never handled his material so well, and has never thought in a stronger, more rugged, more lofty spirit. Of the American composers of today, he is the only one who, on occasion, achieves grandeur. In this music is echoed the stern, barbaric nobility of a dying race.

There is also felt the background of wild and spacious nature—nature, not that of a tropical and sensuous South, but of great reaches, one fancies, of the Northwest.

Mr. Gilbert, in these Indian sketches, has not only come in contact with an unexplored domain of musical color, which would in itself have justified the composition of his remarkable suite, but he has felt and responded to deeper things, which one is prone to believe existent in the nature, in the spiritual fastnesses of the Indian.

Extraordinary Rhythmic Force

It is not possible to discuss in detail these sketches. They are distinguished by extraordinary rhythmic novelty and force; by clear and significant orchestration, with novel use of percussion instruments; by a prophetic vigor, and, on occasion, poetic imagery, which is the composer's own contribution. The sketch which made the quickest impression was that of the "Campfire Dance," with its thudding of Indian drums and its humorous character. This is for the writer the least of them all. The prelude is a masterly building up of a barbaric, misshapen musical phrase which extends itself and rears its head over cross rhythms of percussion instruments. (Percussion instruments are in this suite often used not merely for rhythm but for color.) The "Invocation" has a noble sweep and a fanatical crescendo to its climax. The Song of the Wolf is one of the most haunting passages, the stern cry echoing through exquisite vistas of orchestral color. The nocturne is simple but supremely suggestive in its evocation of mood, and the "Snake Dance" is even more remarkable than the prelude for the wildness and impact of its rude, swinging rhythms.

Strange and Fascinating

This music is not sentimental perspective of the Indian, nor is it, on the other hand, musical photography or inartistic realism. It is the product of a creative nature quick to respond to the excitant of novel material, to sense in this material the spirit of a race and the grand nature from which that race has derived its being. The music is so strong, so uncompromising in its vigor and its directness and logic of expression that it puzzled the audience, which, however, as the performance proceeded, warmed more and more to a strange and fascinating art, and at last recalled the composer several times to the stage.

Miss Neilsen's Singing

Far, indeed, was this from the music of Mozart! Miss Nielsen sang the introductory measures of recitative of the air from "Figaro's Wedding" with exemplary musicianship and fineness of nuance. She has become each year a more thoughtful interpreter. Add to this her inborn qualifications for the interpretation of Mozart. A singer who interprets, for example, the character of Zerlina, with her song of pleading to the discomfited and sorely tried Masetto, must have in her own artistic nature a certain naivete and youthfulness, a spontaneity and innocence of sentiment, which are either felt and present, or else absent, for they cannot be manufactured. In her phrasing and in her sentiment Miss Nielsen was very fortunate. She was, it is true, less spontaneous, less carefree, in her vocalization, than she ordinarily is.

Why do singers betray such accursed caution every time they rise before a Boston Symphony audience? The reservation about Miss Nielsen's singing is this comparative lack of ease and of contagious enthusiasm which is one of the gratifying and distinguishing characteristics of her art. In all probability these things will be in evidence this evening, after the first sight of a motionless audience and the plaster casts frowning down from the niches in Symphony Hall. That is not opera. That is not the stage for which Miss Nielsen is born, but on the other hand she is one of the few opera singers whose performances in the concert room sustain careful and critical examinations, and the audience recalled her repeatedly yesterday afternoon.

POST MAR 5

[94]

17TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Eloquent Performance by Conductor Monteux and Orchestra

MISS NIELSEN IN SONGS OF MOZART

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Symphony in A Minor, "Scotch"; Mozart, overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; Gilbert, Indian Sketches (first performance). Miss Alice Nielsen sang "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni."

As the ultra-radical Alfredo Casella astonished his countrymen and others by praising the music of Rossini, so Darius Milhaud, a composer of ultra-modern tendencies, has surprised Frenchmen by stating that Mendelssohn was the greatest classic of the 19th century. The symphony played yesterday—Mr. Monteux and the superb orchestra gave an eloquent performance—is about 80 years old. Hearing it, one can grasp Milhaud's meaning; for Mendelssohn, a stickler for form, yet occasionally a romanticist, observed the orthodox conventions with constant attention to a beauty that had not the strangeness in its nature commended by Bacon in his essay. It was very seldom that Mendelssohn let himself go as he did in "The First Walpurgis Night." He seldom screamed, for screaming would not have been well-bred. He measured carefully his effects; he made his points neatly. Overpraised in his life-time, too long a petish in England, he has since been under-rated. He was the incarnation of musical orthodoxy. His radical feeling, if he had any, is not to be detected in his music. He never exulted in it as Mr. Bloch does today.

Yet, when all is said, this "Scotch" symphony contains beautiful and delightful pages. The work has not aged greatly; it is fresher than many orchestral works written a few years ago. Only in the sentimental Adagio does one find the weaker Mendelssohn, the composer of many "Songs Without Words." Without using Scottish tunes, he gave the symphony a Scottish character, for he had been impressed by his visit to Holyrood; by the story of Mary and Rizzio; by the melancholy surroundings. The melancholy is gentle, contemplative in his music; the composer was not in doleful dumps; and in the gay and exquisitely scored scherzo the Mendelssohn, constitutionally joyous—joyous always in gentlemanly fashion—is revealed. The performance without pauses, as the composer wished, was an exceedingly fine one. After the great performance of Brahms's symphony last Saturday night, after the performance of Mendelssohn's Symphony yesterday, the doubting Thomases, if there are still a few, who sigh for "a conductor that is in sympathy with German music" and speak disparagingly of the orchestra, which was never in a higher estate, should hold their peace.

Some years ago Mr. Gilbert of Cambridge transcribed for Mr. Curtis's elaborate work, "The North American Indian," melodies and tribal songs from phonographic cylinders. The character of the melodic fragments, their wildness and their rhythmic capriciousness, aroused his enthusiasm. In this Suite of six movements, using phrases as hints, he has endeavored to present various moods of Indian life. He has been eminently successful in portraying these moods and at the same time writing music that holds the attention and stirs the blood without purely ethnological consideration. Of the movements, the Prelude, the Invocation, and the Song of the Wolf, especially the latter two, are the most effective, though the Camp Dance will always probably make the most immediate appeal to audiences in general. The Nocturne has less decided character; it is more conventional in sentiment and expression. Mr. Gilbert has long been recognized as a composer of singular individuality. He does not belong to any school; he does not worship in any chapel. He might say proudly with Walt Whitman, "Solitary, singing in the West, I strike up for a New World." We find in these "Indian Sketches" an advance in the presentation of his musical ideas. His instrumentation is clearer and more varied; his contrasts are more frequent and more effective; what seemed in former works a certain and needless brutality has turned into true virility. There are pages of the "Sketches" that are distinguished by what Henley said with reference to Hazlitt's open letter to Gifford, "splendid savagery." The subject chosen called for this.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Neilsen were introduced by an overture of Mozart that had not been played at these concerts since 1895. Miss Neilsen has long been known as an accomplished singer of Mozart's music. To sing this music, which "comes from the air and returns to it," is a singer's severest test. At first Miss Neilsen was apparently nervous, or not wholly "in voice"; but she recovered herself and sang the two songs with the requisite simplicity and smoothness; with an agreeable vocal quality. "Deh Vieni" admits for the sake of melodic continuity a little faster tempo than was taken; and we should have liked a more marked emotional contrast beginning with "Vieni, ben mio!"

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Weber's overture to "Euryanthe"; Haydn's Concerto in D major for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti); Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, and "Romeo Alone and Ball at Capulet's," from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

Alice Nielsen Returns to Boston

The charming prima donna of the old Boston Opera Company days, who is shown in this interesting study with her favorite pet, is scheduled to sing once again in town this week. Isn't her chow dog remarkable? It is such intelligent animals as he that adds fame to the whole canine family.

POST FEB. 27.

GILBERT'S PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Indian Sketches for First Time—Miss Nielsen Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, played without pause between the movements, as was the intention of the composer, opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Alice Nielsen was soloist. She sang two airs of Mozart, "Deh vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." The orchestra played as prelude to these airs the jocose overture to Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio." Finally, Henry F. Gilbert's "Indian Sketches," six in number, were played for the first time.

FRAGMENT FROM CHANT

These Indian sketches have been evolved from fragments of Indian folk-melody. The process of evolution is clearly and aptly described by the composer, thus quoted in the programme book: "I have in but one instance quoted an Indian melody verbatim. (I have used short phrases of a measure or so from which to develop more extended melodies in the same spirit.) Most of these barbaric chants are to me but potent suggestions pointing in the direction of an unexplored domain of musical color. While comparatively few of these primitive songs have musical value, while a dreamy monotony is one of their frequent characteristics, there are yet scattered here and there through the mass of this material, certain striking and piquant musical phrases which give one a positive and distinct impression of racial color. I have used certain of these phrases as hints; as suggestive musical nubs, which I have developed; striving never to lose touch with the barbaric character of the original melodic germ."

Are Masterpieces

In concentration of expression, in mastery of orchestration, in the establishment of mood by relatively simple means, these sketches are the most advanced and the most finished thing Mr. Gilbert has done. He has employed wider canvasses before. He has called more instruments to his service. But he has never handled his material so well, and has never thought in a stronger, more rugged, more lofty spirit. Of the American composers of today, he is the only one who, on occasion, achieves grandeur. In this music is echoed the stern, barbaric nobility of a dying race.

There is also felt the background of wild and spacious nature—nature, not that of a tropical and sensuous South, but of great reaches, one fancies, of the Northwest.

Mr. Gilbert, in these Indian sketches, has not only come in contact with an unexplored domain of musical color, which would in itself have justified the composition of his remarkable suite, but he has felt and responded to deeper things, which one is prone to believe existent in the nature, in the spiritual fastnesses of the Indian.

Extraordinary Rhythmic Force

It is not possible to discuss in detail these sketches. They are distinguished by extraordinary rhythmic novelty and force; by clear and significant orchestration, with novel use of percussion instruments; by a prophetic vigor, and, on occasion, poetic imagery, which is the composer's own contribution. The sketch which made the quickest impression was that of the "Campfire Dance," with its thudding of Indian drums and its humorous character. This is for the writer the least of them all. The prelude is a masterly building up of a barbaric, misshapen musical phrase which extends itself and rears its head over cross rhythms of percussion instruments. (Percussion instruments are in this suite often used not merely for rhythm but for color.) The "Invocation" has a noble sweep and a fanatical crescendo to its climax. The Song of the Wolf is one of the most haunting passages, the stern cry echoing through exquisite vistas of orchestral color. The nocturne is simple but supremely suggestive in its evocation of mood, and the "Snake Dance" is even more remarkable than the prelude for the wildness and impact of its rude, swinging rhythms.

Strange and Fascinating

This music is not sentimental perspective of the Indian, nor is it, on the other hand, musical photography or inartistic realism. It is the product of a creative nature quick to respond to the excitant of novel material, to sense in this material the spirit of a race and the grand nature from which that race has derived its being. The music is so strong, so uncompromising in its vigor and its directness and logic of expression that it puzzled the audience, which, however, as the performance proceeded, warmed more and more to a strange and fascinating art, and at last recalled the composer several times to the stage.

Miss Neilsen's Singing

Far, indeed, was this from the music of Mozart! Miss Nielsen sang the introductory measures of recitative of the air from "Figaro's Wedding" with exemplary musicianship and fineness of nuance. She has become each year a more thoughtful interpreter. Add to this her inborn qualifications for the interpretation of Mozart. A singer who interprets, for example, the character of Zerlina, with her song of pleading to the discomfited and sorely tried Masetto, must have in her own artistic nature a certain naivete and youthfulness, a spontaneity and innocence of sentiment, which are either felt and present, or else absent, for they cannot be manufactured. In her phrasing and in her sentiment Miss Nielsen was very fortunate. She was, it is true, less spontaneous, less carefree, in her vocalization, than she ordinarily is.

Why do singers betray such accursed caution every time they rise before a Boston Symphony audience? The reservation about Miss Nielsen's singing is this comparative lack of ease and of contagious enthusiasm which is one of the gratifying and distinguishing characteristics of her art. In all probability these things will be in evidence this evening, after the first sight of a motionless audience and the plaster casts frowning down from the niches in Symphony Hall. That is not opera. That is not the stage for which Miss Nielsen is born, but on the other hand she is one of the few opera singers whose performances in the concert room sustain careful and critical examinations, and the audience recalled her repeatedly yesterday afternoon.

POST MAR. 5

[94]

17TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Eloquent Performance by Conductor Monteux and Orchestra

MISS NIELSEN IN SONGS OF MOZART

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Symphony in A Minor, "Scotch"; Mozart, overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; Gilbert, Indian Sketches (first performance). Miss Alice Nielsen sang "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni."

As the ultra-radical Alfredo Casella astonished his countrymen and others by praising the music of Rossini, so Darius Milhaud, a composer of ultra-modern tendencies, has surprised Frenchmen by stating that Mendelssohn was the greatest classic of the 19th century. The symphony played yesterday—Mr. Monteux and the superb orchestra gave an eloquent performance—is about 80 years old. Hearing it, one can grasp Milhaud's meaning; for Mendelssohn, a stickler for form, yet occasionally a romanticist, observed the orthodox conventions with constant attention to a beauty that had not the strangeness in its nature commended by Bacon in his essay. It was very seldom that Mendelssohn let himself go as he did in "The First Walpurgis Night." He seldom screamed, for screaming would not have been well-bred. He measured carefully his effects; he made his points neatly. Overpraised in his life-time, too long a petish in England, he has since been under-rated. He was the incarnation of musical orthodoxy. His radical feeling, if he had any, is not to be detected in his music. He never exulted in it as Mr. Bloch does today.

Yet, when all is said, this "Scotch" symphony contains beautiful and delightful pages. The work has not aged greatly; it is fresher than many orchestral works written a few years ago. Only in the sentimental Adagio does one find the weaker Mendelssohn, the composer of many "Songs Without Words." Without using Scottish tunes, he gave the symphony a Scottish character, for he had been impressed by his visit to Holyrood; by the story of Mary and Rizzio; by the melancholy surroundings. The melancholy is gentle, contemplative in his music; the composer was not in doleful dumps; and in the gay and exquisitely scored scherzo the Mendelssohn, constitutionally joyous—joyous always in genlemanly fashion—is revealed. The performance without pauses, as the composer wished, was an exceedingly fine one. After the great performance of Brahms's symphony last Saturday night, after the performance of Mendelssohn's Symphony yesterday, the doubting Thomases, if there are still a few, who sigh for "a conductor that is in sympathy with German music" and speak disparagingly of the orchestra, which was never in a higher estate, should hold their peace.

Some years ago Mr. Gilbert of Cambridge transcribed for Mr. Curtis's elaborate work, "The North American Indian," melodies and tribal songs from phonographic cylinders. The character of the melodic fragments, their wildness and their rhythmic capriciousness, aroused his enthusiasm. In this Suite of six movements, using phrases as hints, he has endeavored to present various moods of Indian life. He has been eminently successful in portraying these moods and at the same time writing music that holds the attention and stirs the blood without purely ethnological consideration. Of the movements, the Prelude, the Invocation, and the Song of the Wolf, especially the latter two, are the most effective, though the Camp Dance will always probably make the most immediate appeal to audiences in general. The Nocturne has less decided character; it is more conventional in sentiment and expression. Mr. Gilbert has long been recognized as a composer of singular individuality. He does not belong to any school; he does not worship in any chapel. He might say proudly with Walt Whitman, "Solitary, singing in the West, I strike up for a New World." We find in these "Indian Sketches" an advance in the presentation of his musical ideas. His instrumentation is clearer and more varied; his contrasts are more frequent and more effective; what seemed in former works a certain and needless brutality has turned into true virility. There are pages of the "Sketches" that are distinguished by what Henley said with reference to Hazlitt's open letter to Gifford, "splendid savagery." The subject chosen called for this.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Neilsen were introduced by an overture of Mozart that had not been played at these concerts since 1895. Miss Neilsen has long been known as an accomplished singer of Mozart's music. To sing this music, which "comes from the air and returns to it," is a singer's severest test. At first Miss Neilsen was apparently nervous, or not wholly "in voice"; but she recovered herself and sang the two songs with the requisite simplicity and smoothness; with an agreeable vocal quality. "Deh Vieni" admits for the sake of melodic continuity a little faster tempo than was taken; and we should have liked a more marked emotional contrast beginning with "Vieni, ben mio!"

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Weber's overture to "Euryanthe"; Haydn's Concerto in D major for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti); Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, and "Romeo Alone and Ball at Capulet's," from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

EN SOLOIST
mphony concerts in Friday afternoon
ing Mendelssohn's will be conducted
so a new work by
he noted American
"Indian Sketches,"
s first public per-oncerts. The moves: Prelude, Invoca-Wolf, Camp Dance,
nce. Mozart's Over-
tfuhrung aus dem
layed. Alice Nielsen
l non Tardar," from Figaro," and "Batti, Giovanni."
well remembered by Prominent in her
pera in this country
she studied in Italy
ut as Marguerite in
at the Teatro Bellini
ng in cities of Italy
r debut at Covent Garler Micaela, Mimi and
sed. This led to her e in America with the
ompany, in 1909 to her e Boston Opera Come season of 1912-13 to he Metropolitan Opera

F 17.

USIC .

on Notes

h program of the Bos-Orchestra, given on
follows: Mendelssohn,
ny, op. 56; Mozart,
Entführung aus dem
arias from the "Mar-
and "Don Giovanni," oloist; Gilbert, Indian

nce of Mendelssohn's
a particularly fine
ic sounded singularly
e development section
gro giving evidence of fashions. The whole
a new life and mean-
eux's spirited and sym-
The delicacy of the rich tone of the first los in the adagio were

sketches were played
e. To many they will uncultured, needless-
et they are not to be a careless word or two.
a distinct phase of
c. They are blatantly
ry page might bear the
rica" stamp, and, like heir sincerity must be
is American music
it crude it is because,
of our foreign musical
are crude. Mr. Gilbert urage. He dares to be nself in his music and ne note which does not
to his sturdy indepen-
ght and freedom from restraint.

hes might easily be criti-
re many things to shock
listener. The point is,
he spirit of their con-
hortcomings in the exe-
e excused. Mr. Gilbert's
raphic realism, national l, as well, in its often chnical working out, re-
the Russian Moussorg-American composers will vest from Mr. Gilbert's pioneer work, as did so successors of the great

[illegible]

Appreciation

Symphony Orchestra gave Brockton on Feb. 20, in
orm. The Brockton Times
ced the delight of the audi-
last number was Enesco,
Rhapsody, in A major, Op.
its last melodious chords
y with sighs of regret from
who for more than two ifted happily on the sea of
music." Mr. Richard Bursoloist. He "exhibited rare sweet voice of his violin rose charming interpretations of ionate and vivacious phases"
symphony was Dvorak's
New World." "All who une technique and sympathetic ing necessary for successful
were impressed with the lending of the violins, violas, npets and other instruments
ke up the ensemble of the lody producers."

ALD MAR 5

Monteux will conduct the program at the 18th pair
Symphony concerts, to be
Symphony Hall next Fri-
rnoon and Saturday eve-
to be followed by the last he orchestra: Weber's Over-
"Euryanthe," Liszt's Sym-
Poem, "Orpheus;" Maurice
"Valses Nobles et Senti-
," and the Ball Scene from Symphony, "Romeo and
As soloist, Jean Bedetti, strious leader of the 'cello will be heard in Haydn's ello Concerto in D

ECORD MAR 5

Alice Nielsen Returns to Boston

The charming prima donna of the old Boston Opera Company days, who is shown in this interesting study with her favorite pet, is scheduled to sing once again in town this week. Isn't her chow dog remarkable? It is such intelligent animals as he that adds fame to the whole canine family.

POST FEB.27.

GILBERT'S PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Indian Sketches for First Time—Miss Nielsen Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, played without pause between the movements, as was the intention of the composer, opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Alice Nielsen was soloist. She sang two airs of Mozart, "Deh vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." The orchestra played as prelude to these airs the jocose overture to Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio." Finally, Henry F. Gilbert's "Indian Sketches," six in number, were played for the first time.

FRAGMENT FROM CHANT

These Indian sketches have been evolved from fragments of Indian folk-melody. The process of evolution is clearly and aptly described by the composer, thus quoted in the programme book: "I have in but one instance quoted an Indian melody verbatim. (I have used short phrases of a measure or so from which to develop more extended melodies in the same spirit.) Most of these barbaric chants are to me but potent suggestions pointing in the direction of an unexplored domain of musical color. While comparatively few of these primitive songs have musical value, while a dreamy monotony is one of their frequent characteristics, there are yet scattered here and there through the mass of this material, certain striking and piquant musical phrases which give one a positive and distinct impression of racial color. I have used certain of these phrases as hints; as suggestive musical nubs, which I have developed; striving never to lose touch with the barbaric character of the original melodic germ."

Are Masterpieces

In concentration of expression, in mastery of orchestration, in the establishment of mood by relatively simple means, these sketches are the most advanced and the most finished thing Mr. Gilbert has done. He has employed wider canvasses before. He has called more instruments to his service. But he has never handled his material so well, and has never thought in a stronger, more rugged, more lofty spirit. Of the American composers of today, he is the only one who, on occasion, achieves grandeur. In this music is echoed the stern, barbaric nobility of a dying race.

There is also felt the background of wild and spacious nature—nature, not that of a tropical and sensuous South, but of great reaches, one fancies, of the Northwest.

Mr. Gilbert, in these Indian sketches, has not only come in contact with an unexplored domain of musical color, which would in itself have justified the composition of his remarkable suite, but he has felt and responded to deeper things, which one is prone to believe existent in the nature, in the spiritual fastnesses of the Indian.

Extraordinary Rhythmic Force

It is not possible to discuss in detail these sketches. They are distinguished by extraordinary rhythmic novelty and force; by clear and significant orchestration, with novel use of percussion instruments; by a prophetic vigor, and, on occasion, poetic imagery, which is the composer's own contribution. The sketch which made the quickest impression was that of the "Campfire Dance," with its thudding of Indian drums and its humorous character. This is for the writer the least of them all. The prelude is a masterly building up of a barbaric, misshapen musical phrase which extends itself and rears its head over cross rhythms of percussion instruments. (Percussion instruments are in this suite often used not merely for rhythm but for color.) The "Invocation" has a noble sweep and a fanatical crescendo to its climax. The Song of the Wolf is one of the most haunting passages, the stern cry echoing through exquisite vistas of orchestral color. The nocturne is simple but supremely suggestive in its evocation of mood, and the "Snake Dance" is even more remarkable than the prelude for the wildness and impact of its rude, swinging rhythms.

Strange and Fascinating

This music is not sentimental perspective of the Indian, nor is it, on the other hand, musical photography or inartistic realism. It is the product of a creative nature quick to respond to the excitant of novel material, to sense in this material the spirit of a race and the grand nature from which that race has derived its being. The music is so strong, so uncompromising in its vigor and its directness and logic of expression that it puzzled the audience, which, however, as the performance proceeded, warmed more and more to a strange and fascinating art, and at last recalled the composer several times to the stage.

Miss Neilsen's Singing

Far, indeed, was this from the music of Mozart! Miss Nielsen sang the introductory measures of recitative of the air from "Figaro's Wedding" with exemplary musicianship and fineness of nuance. She has become each year a more thoughtful interpreter. Add to this her inborn qualifications for the interpretation of Mozart. A singer who interprets, for example, the character of Zerlina, with her song of pleading to the discomfited and sorely tried Masetto, must have in her own artistic nature a certain naivete and youthfulness, a spontaneity and innocence of sentiment, which are either felt and present, or else absent, for they cannot be manufactured. In her phrasing and in her sentiment Miss Nielsen was very fortunate. She was, it is true, less spontaneous, less carefree, in her vocalization, than she ordinarily is.

Why do singers betray such accursed caution every time they rise before a Boston Symphony audience? The reservation about Miss Nielsen's singing is this comparative lack of ease and of contagious enthusiasm which is one of the gratifying and distinguishing characteristics of her art. In all probability these things will be in evidence this evening, after the first sight of a motionless audience and the plaster casts frowning down from the niches in Symphony Hall. That is not opera. That is not the stage for which Miss Nielsen is born, but on the other hand she is one of the few opera singers whose performances in the concert room sustain careful and critical examinations, and the audience recalled her repeatedly yesterday afternoon.

POST MAR 5

17TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Eloquent Performance by Conductor Monteux and Orchestra

MISS NIELSEN IN SONGS OF MOZART

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Symphony in A Minor, "Scotch"; Mozart, overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; Gilbert, Indian Sketches (first performance). Miss Alice Nielsen sang "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni."

As the ultra-radical Alfredo Casella astonished his countrymen and others by praising the music of Rossini, so Darius Milhaud, a composer of ultra-modern tendencies, has surprised Frenchmen by stating that Mendelssohn was the greatest classic of the 19th century. The symphony played yesterday—Mr. Monteux and the superb orchestra gave an eloquent performance—is about 80 years old. Hearing it, one can grasp Milhaud's meaning; for Mendelssohn, a stickler for form, yet occasionally a romanticist, observed the orthodox conventions with constant attention to a beauty that had not the strangeness in its nature commended by Bacon in his essay. It was very seldom that Mendelssohn let himself go as he did in "The First Walpurgis Night." He seldom screamed, for screaming would not have been well-bred. He measured carefully his effects; he made his points neatly. Overpraised in his life-time, too long a petish in England, he has since been under-rated. He was the incarnation of musical orthodoxy. His radical feeling, if he had any, is not to be detected in his music. He never exulted in it as Mr. Bloch does today.

Yet, when all is said, this "Scotch" symphony contains beautiful and delightful pages. The work has not aged greatly; it is fresher than many orchestral works written a few years ago. Only in the sentimental Adagio does one find the weaker Mendelssohn, the composer of many "Songs Without Words." Without using Scottish tunes, he gave the symphony a Scottish character, for he had been impressed by his visit to Holyrood; by the story of Mary and Rizzio; by the melancholy surroundings. The melancholy is gentle, contemplative in his music; the composer was not in doleful dumps; and in the gay and exquisitely scored scherzo the Mendelssohn, constitutionally joyous—joyous always in genlemanly fashion—is revealed. The performance without pauses, as the composer wished, was an exceedingly fine one. After the great performance of Brahms's symphony last Saturday night, after the performance of Mendelssohn's Symphony yesterday, the doubting Thomases, if there are still a few, who sigh for "a conductor that is in sympathy with German music" and speak disparagingly of the orchestra, which was never in a higher estate, should hold their peace.

Some years ago Mr. Gilbert of Cambridge transcribed for Mr. Curtis's elaborate work, "The North American Indian," melodies and tribal songs from phonographic cylinders. The character of the melodic fragments, their wildness and their rhythmic capriciousness, aroused his enthusiasm. In this Suite of six movements, using phrases as hints, he has endeavored to present various moods of Indian life. He has been eminently successful in portraying these moods and at the same time writing music that holds the attention and stirs the blood without purely ethnological consideration. Of the movements, the Prelude, the Invocation, and the Song of the Wolf, especially the latter two, are the most effective, though the Camp Dance will always probably make the most immediate appeal to audiences in general. The Nocturne has less decided character; it is more conventional in sentiment and expression. Mr. Gilbert has long been recognized as a composer of singular individuality. He does not belong to any school; he does not worship in any chapel. He might say proudly with Walt Whitman, "Solitary, singing in the West, I strike up for a New World." We find in these "Indian Sketches" an advance in the presentation of his musical ideas. His instrumentation is clearer and more varied; his contrasts are more frequent and more effective; what seemed in former works a certain and needless brutality has turned into true virility. There are pages of the "Sketches" that are distinguished by what Henley said with reference to Hazlitt's open letter to Gifford, "splendid savagery." The subject chosen called for this.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Neilsen were introduced by an overture of Mozart that had not been played at these concerts since 1895. Miss Neilsen has long been known as an accomplished singer of Mozart's music. To sing this music, which "comes from the air and returns to it," is a singer's severest test. At first Miss Neilsen was apparently nervous, or not wholly "in voice"; but she recovered herself and sang the two songs with the requisite simplicity and smoothness; with an agreeable vocal quality. "Deh Vieni" admits for the sake of melodic continuity a little faster tempo than was taken; and we should have liked a more marked emotional contrast beginning with "Vieni, ben mio!"

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Weber's overture to "Euryanthe";

HERALD, MAR 5

"He Called for His Pipe,
He Called for His Bowl,
He Called for His Fiddlers Three"

Henry F. Gilbert

(Photograph by Bachrach)

Composer of the "Indian Sketches" Played at the Symphony Concerts Today and of Other Pieces Heretofore Played There

---

TRANS. MAR 4.

NATIVE WORKS PLAYED AT SYMPHONY

Gilbert's Indian Sketches Admirably Interpreted; Miss Neilsen Gives Fine Performance

Alice Neilsen as soloist at the seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra compensated, in great measure, for the infliction of three consecutive numbers by Mozart, and the performance of the four movements of Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony without a break.

Another compensation was a suite of Indian sketches by Henry F. B. Gilbert of Cambridge. The Mozart numbers were his overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; "Deh Vieni," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni."

FOUR MOVEMENTS SEPARATE.

Why the symphony should have been played without a break, while patrons of the orchestra, helpless victims of Boston traffic conditions cooled their heels in the corridors outside for almost three-quarters of an hour, is not clear. The composer wished it to be so performed, it is true; but other liberties are taken with the wishes of composers long dead without detriment to the performance.

The four movements are distinct in form and character. The breaks were noticeable, and the audience, moved to childlike pleasure by the bagpipe airs in the scherzo, broke into applause at the end. Many scores of patrons outside were forced to hear an interruption which did not avail them, as the doors remained obdurately closed.

The plan of closing the doors during each number is an excellent one; no fair-minded and discriminating concert-goer would have it otherwise. But there is no need that an auditor should be obliged to lose the entire symphony as penalty for a few minutes' delay in arrival.

MISS NEILSEN IN GOOD VOICE.

Miss Neilsen sang the two arias with much skill. Her voice sounded fresh, was under good control and showed to a marked degree the strides in bel canto that she has made since the days when she sang in "Robin Hood" and other favorites. It would be a pleasure to hear her in them now. It would have been a greater pleasure at the concert to hear her in one of Mimi's airs.

Mr. Gilbert's Indian Suite, performed for the first time, after the dulcet numbers of earlier composers, lent character and variety to the program. It consists of six movements: a prelude is "Barbaric Mood," Invocation, Song of the Wolf, Camp Dance, Nocturne and Snake Dance. They are based an phonographic studies made by Mr. Gilbert, of songs actually sung by North American Indians for the purpose. The composer has used themes, but has not whole songs, which have a great deal of repetition. The suite was beautifully performed, and at the end Mr. Monteux brought the composer from the wings to bow his acknowledgments.

AMER. MAR 5.

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Monteux proposes a programme of five short and relatively light pieces among which there is no symphony or no lengthy tone-poem. The chosen numbers are:

Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe" ...... Weber
Concerto in D major for Violoncello with Orchestra .... Haydn
(Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti)
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus" .... Liszt
Noble and Sentimental Waltzes .... Ravel
Two Movements (Romeo Alone; Fête at the Capulets") from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" .... Berlioz

The "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes," some of which happen also to be ironic, are, of course, Ravel's early piano-pieces as recently scored for orchestra by the composer. Epilogue included, there are eight of them. It is pleasant to see Mr. Monteux find place for such romantic music as that of Liszt and Berlioz; while, as for Mr. Bedetti, few of the wandering violoncellists excel him, sit though he does from week to week in the Symphony Orchestra.

TRANS. MAR 5.

GILBERT'S "INDIAN SKETCHES" PLAYED

GLOBE MAR 5

Alice Nielsen Assists in Symphony Concert

Toscanini and La Scala Orchestra Wins Warm Acclaim

The only novelty on yesterday's Symphony program was Mr Gilbert's "Indian Sketches," performed for the first time in public. The audience showed its enjoyment of the new piece by remaining at the end, which was also the end of the concert, long enough to recall the composer to the stage to acknowledge enthusiastic applause.

The music, like other work from the same hand, shows genuine originality and independence of convention. Mr Gilbert has taken themes suggested by the study of phonographic records of actual Indian tunes and wrought them into musical mood pictures by using the coloristic resources of the orchestra and the technique of melodic development. He has caught the spirit of Indian life the better for not being too literal in reproducing Indian music. His sketches are, on the other hand, far more lifelike than the sentimentalizing of MacDowell's familiar "Indian Suite."

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony fared better at Mr Monteux' hands than routine classics usually fare now that the orchestra must be drilled carefully in everything it plays. It received an imaginative performance which brought out the intrinsic melancholy and fantasy of the music.

This symphony is among the works by Mendelssohn which thoroughly deserve to survive the inevitable diminishing of his once exaggerated reputation. The introduction to the first allegro, and the scherzo have an individual and distinctive beauty which is still vital.

Alice Nielsen has sung many times in Boston since her first appearance here in 1896, as a girl of 20. Her "Batti, Batti" yesterday was a performance of Mozart's wonderful aria which few living singers could equal. This music is a touchstone for sopranos. Few of them have the breath control, the understanding of "bel canto," the perception of Mozart's dramatic purpose needed, even among those who have the necessary vocal endowment.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra provided a rather slipshod accompaniment for this aria, and for the inferior companion piece, "Deh Vieni Non Tardar." In the remaining number of a surprisingly miscellaneous program, the overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus de Serail," leader and orchestra did Mozart more justice. The audience received all three Mozart numbers coldly.

Toscanini, Monteux, Pizzetti, Gilbe

Double Day of Conductors and Composers, Old and New, with Plenteous and Various Harvest

WITH the usual Symphony Concert in the afternoon and the final concert of Mr. Toscanini and his Milanese orchestra in the evening, Boston fed full, yesterday of symphonic music. For both occasions there were ample but manifestly different audiences. To Symphony Hall in the afternoon went the company that, half by habit and half by inclination, frequents the matinées of the Symphony Orchestra. Bye and large it is a public that takes much joy of itself—and most things on the stage for granted. Above the usual it was in that mood on Friday. What stranger within our gates, listening to the faint clapping of hands as Miss Alice Nielsen came to the platform, would have suspected that she had been a conspicuous ornament of the Boston Opera House; that, girl and woman, this town had known her more than twenty years? No wonder that after such chilly greeting her singing of two airs from Mozart lacked the eager impulse with which she sang them—and with no accompanying orchestra—in the same room last May. Barely courteous, moreover, were the listeners when at the end of the concert and of his new "Indian Sketches," Mr. Gilbert joined Mr. Monteux, to acknowledge exceptionally cool plaudits. The composer as he has a right to do, may choose his own way in living and music-making; he may not be "quite one of us" and all that sort of nonsense. Yet it is the custom of audiences at the Symphony Concerts to applaud a composer warmly—especially a resident composer—when he is present to hear a first performance of his music, even if that music is more baffling and less meritorious than Mr. Gilbert's happened to be. Seemingly the cold without had also nipped within, and the "Symphony Matinée," as they would call it in New York, was uncommonly "institutional."

Different, indeed, was Mr. Toscanini's audience in the evening. Those whom custom sends to Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons, go not to hear visiting conductors, however eminent and stimulating; but some of those who take eagerly the pleasure of orchestral music, whenever and wherever it is to be had, found themselves capable of two concerts and enjoyment thereof—within the short space of eight hours. The connoisseurs of music and the performance of music in this town do not miss a concert by Mr. Toscanini and he is sure to attract not a few from the social fringe, so to say, that likes to savor the rarities of the arts. Youth as well abounds at his concerts—exhilarating to see and to feel in this city of middle-aged audiences. Best of all, men hear Mr. Toscanini gladly, especially the men of his own race. Old and young, rich and poor, in dinner-coats and in worsted sweaters, they abounded last evening in Symphony Hall, alert with attention and quick with applause, kindling like the rest of us at the conductor's largest or finest fires. Yet, as a whole, the concert, "farewell" though it was, lacked a little of the zest of the three preceding it. Perhaps the chosen music was in itself less interesting; perhaps it could not heat Mr. Toscanini orchestra and audience to highest pitch; perhaps, even, we hearers are becoming accustomed to the conductor and his ways. Strangeness has departed from him, while time has not yet deepened familiarity.

Plentiful Mozart

As composers went, the day was Mozartean. At the Symphony Concert, Miss Nielsen sang two familiar airs—Susanna's "Deh! Vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and Zerlina's "Batti, Batti!" from "Don Juan"; while for preface Mr. Monteux set the overture to the light opera, "The Abduction from the Harem." (The original German title is nearly as formidable; long since the Italians wisely condensed it into "Il Seraglio.") In turn, in the evening, Mr. Toscanini began his concert with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat.

Unless it be the two airs none of this music is of the perfect Mozart. The habitual music-maker, at the day's work, does creep into the symphony, while certainly the resurrected overture is, as they say in the Middle West, of such "output." There are round reverberant measures in it, as becomes the heartiness of a German "singspiel" such as Mozart designed "Il Seraglio" to be—no better measures, though it be blasphemy to suggest as much, than the despised Nessler set into the overture of his nineteenth-century piece, equally shaped for a "popular" audience, "The Trumpeter of Sakkingen." Nessler, however, writing songfully in his preluding, swims through thick Teutonic sentimentality, whereas Mozart, similarly minded, instinctively writes gracefully, tenderly transparently. These periods preserve the overture in the concert hall, as an air or two—say with a Hempel to sing it—preserves the whole opera. Even so, far enough are they from the long, light, gleaming line, the undulating inflections, the mingled charm of sensuous longing and sensuous melancholy that fills "Deh! vieni" with silvery beauty, or the playful insinuating grace that winds through "Batti, Batti!" and sheds the smile that half mocks over the tear that half en-treats. In both goes Mozart, the [illegible] fanciful, the superlatively delicate [illegible] and the melodist as well who ma[illegible] song the very voice of character, [illegible] mood. Often Miss Nielsen, singing, wa[illegible] one with him; but lack of confidence [illegible] and there dulled the soft resonance [illegible] tones; while excess of pains with every [illegible] coloring or modulation of the music [illegible] its flow. Yet few in these days sing [illegible] airs of Mozart with such transparency [illegible] tenderness and taste as does she, [illegible] voice gains the limpidity of the music [illegible] spirit catches its fineness.

It was in the symphony, however, [illegible] Mr. Toscanini crowned Mozart. [illegible] when Richard Strauss was conducting [illegible] well as composer, he so excelled [illegible] him; more recently, Dr. Muck [illegible] glorious moments by his side; but [illegible] as memory recalls him, quite surpassed himself at the Italian's level of [illegible] He used as full an orchestra as the [illegible] permitted—the whole string choir, the usual doubled winds—yet nowhere did [illegible] of tone stay the pace, stiffen the suppleness of the music, or make angular the lithe and curving progress. Full-throated, but never thickly, sang Mr. Toscanini's orchestra when Mozart would have it so. Yet, on the instant at conductor's and composer's bidding—as delicate as it had been robust—it spun the contrasting arabesques of melody and ornament. The conductor, moreover, has schooled it to phrase this music as a singer phrases song—sensitively, suavely, limpidly, with artful sense of proportion and flow. Mr. Toscanini's wind choir may contain few virtuosi, but from him it gains the [illegible] quality which is the essence and the glamor of Mozart to us of the twentieth century. Moreover, what the [illegible] whatever the texture of the music [illegible] wind-voices always "shone through."

Everywhere, too, the conductor was all for a Mozart songful. From him were "workings-out," as the analysts call them, to fill a form, mere play with figures for the sake of such light sport, gained [illegible] cent and color of melody. Now in one choir, now in another went this song; sometimes the whole orchestra, again a few instruments, gave it voice. As in the preluding or the Andante it might be pensive; as in the Finale, it might be [illegible] and gay; as in the first Allegro, it might be now bright, now shadowes; but ever under Mr. Toscanani's hand, it sang and [illegible] many as the moods were the voices, [illegible] clear, light, supple were the rhythms [illegible] call the mingled grace and animation of the Minuet. As unfailing was the elegance, [illegible] true the aristocratic note of the performance. Fleet and gay was Mozart in the Finale, yet never did he merely race and caper. Formal he might be until the second melody enters the first movement, but what an air of high-bred workmanship the conductor gave the music! How was Mozart transfigured—and in his own spirit. Mr. Toscanini's miracles do not begin and end with the moderns.

From Beethoven to Elgar

As the course of the two concerts ran, other classic composers likewise had hearing. Mr. Monteux has quietly and wisely waived not a few "traditions" of the Symphony Concerts; but he seems still to respect the precedent that once in a musical year ordains a Symphony by Mendelssohn. Last winter he resurrected "The Reformation Symphony" and it gratified an interest of curiosity. Yesterday his choice lighted upon the "Scotch Symphony." Next season, presumably, it will be the turn of the "Italian Symphony." Yet, peradventure, one or another of Mendelssohn's overtures—"Fingal's Cave" or the sea-piece—would yield as much pleasure as characteristic music, returns none too often to Symphony Hall. Yet the "Scotch Symphony" played as songfully, rhythmically, plastically and warmly as it was yesterday, is still engaging to hear. In Mendelssohn's present, fate was exceptionally kind to him; for his future it was hardly less benignant. It gave him two preservative virtues: the ability to say lucidly, persuasively, what he wished to say and no little mastery over pure workmanship.

It is easy in these days to say that Mendelssohn's musical ideas lack depth; that his musical moods miss fervor; that he neither exalts nor penetrates. Yet, somehow, those ideas remain quite untarnished by the passing years; while the moods keep no less their animation. There are rust-stains even on Berlioz; there are wrinkles and cracks upon Liszt among the romanticists of seventy-five years ago; but the surface of Mendelssohn, the classicist, still shines smooth, bright, mirror-like to whatever is within the music. How well jointed, how well polished a surface it is! Every prescription of form seems to fall into natural place; every detail is as apt as aptness can be, while at every turn falls the little stroke of fancy or of skill. To this day, the harmonies, the instrumental color please; felicity guides them; the matter and the spirit of the music shines through them. A master of style was Mendelssohn, and so smooth, so firm and fine-textured them with that gnawing time may not gain tooth-hold.

Mr. Toscanini's classics were the [illegible] "Leonora Overture" of Beethoven, the "Good Friday Music" from the third act of Wagner's "Parsifal" and, as some Englishmen would mildly but firmly say, Elgar's "Enigma Variations." The overture—it is little exaggeration to say—falls before conducting, gains only in degree by fine conducting. As the part of Hamlet is presumed to be "actor-proof," so is it well nigh "conductor-proof." Within long memory only Mr. Stokowski has been able to over-cloud and dull it—by inconsequent refinements, by excessive finicking [illegible]

most se, to e
music.
ispense,
fied them almo
ure; gathered them, hei
ing instant; then releas
as inevitable as seemed notes of the distant tru
ing of the orchestra int
or of exultation. Once
Mr. Toscanini and his passion, outspread mi
Those who would hav
Haydn, Mozart and the
of Beethoven say that led it into these evil w frenzy and that a who posers have but follow
Toscanini ingrains both
pense and surge that r
stubble—although far fr
epitome become epic.
The chivalric clang
the Grail-Knights pass
fragment from "Parsif
the perdurable loveli
melody of awakening
holy spell of holy da
Toscanini plied his pow tra might give back f
spiritual evocation. I
music of inspiration,
measures in which Wa
glow, the tremor, the
of awakening spring in
the earth, to human ey
For an instant, he i
the poignant motiv of l
through and through
blessing may still pang.
Mr. Toscanini's fiery po
as this reveal also hi
ing deeply human se another side, w
the virtuoso cond
There they are and not so much one was omitte
earing, who care aled, the enigmati ccording to the nd in background hall is no
e speculative wo
also, unless he ha
d's intimate circl
limning of his frie riation? Enough at Lady Elgar
tain Mr. Sinclai atic organist. As ct sake, audience ctors play the m
because it offers characterization
a variation spark of harmonies and it flash the more with the "Dorabell
they can swell the breadth and the dep
tion until the audi
use. Or they can ground to the varia
cello; keep the lo of the sea-vari
mical impetuosity
the striding pa of the Finale. T
ickly as they ma that are mere not three or four such Toscanini impotent.

New Music as Well

either concert, the Loyal to the "
sts," in just deser
ly proves—Mr. Tos more of them—the P
ealous and fantast
Ildebrando da
h he were mediev chosen pieces were Suite for concert-usa music to the poet's of the Cyprus o
and cruel, pious a and intriguing, ragi accompanies the ris
a scene by the qu
hants and the shipm
observant, loungin
ng-men running hi sky bright, the thron alone the figure, am dumb courtesan ba er beauty. Pizzetti's bodied, harmonically pungent, catches t e, the glow of the sc an admirable direct and when for a wh amorous image of th
the warmth, the pit
there is an individua of directly imagin
c-making.
e grave Dance of a slow, a stately Sa of the royal househol rtance, with the b os wherein his ho
hake their bells—st
as well as of deline gain the music has final dance, wherein hered under the roses
e vindictive queen—
n loved the courtes
ned—proceeds in hea
ough premonition o
ed down the dancer
d inevitable doom.
Again the listene
ness of imagination
ss of resource. He apart from the thea destined, is a compo
d stout, of large, qu
nd candid means.
ta should disclose mo
ly, gratefully.
Monteaux's novel n
Indian Sketches" of
s of which from e
usage of this abo
ment to lectures, h
d in this place. A re work of the

[95]

"He Called for His Pipe,
He Called for His Bowl,
He Called for His Fiddlers Three"

(Photograph by Bachrach)

Henry F. Gilbert

Composer of the "Indian Sketches" Played at the Symphony Concerts Today and of Other Pieces Heretofore Played There

---

TRANS. MAR 4

NATIVE WORKS PLAYED AT SYMPHONY

Gilbert's Indian Sketches Admirably Interpreted; Miss Neilsen Gives Fine Performance

Alice Neilsen as soloist at the seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra compensated, in great measure, for the infliction of three consecutive numbers by Mozart, and the performance of the four movements of Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony without a break.

Another compensation was a suite of Indian sketches by Henry F. B. Gilbert of Cambridge. The Mozart numbers were his overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; "Deh Vieni," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni."

FOUR MOVEMENTS SEPARATE.

Why the symphony should have been played without a break, while patrons of the orchestra, helpless victims of Boston traffic conditions cooled their heels in the corridors outside for almost three-quarters of an hour, is not clear. The composer wished it to be so performed, it is true; but other liberties are taken with the wishes of composers long dead without detriment to the performance.

The four movements are distinct in form and character. The breaks were noticeable, and the audience, moved to childlike pleasure by the bagpipe airs in the scherzo, broke into applause at the end. Many scores of patrons outside were forced to hear an interruption which did not avail them, as the doors remained obdurately closed.

The plan of closing the doors during each number is an excellent one; no fair-minded and discriminating concert-goer would have it otherwise. But there is no need that an auditor should be obliged to lose the entire symphony as penalty for a few minutes' delay in arrival.

MISS NEILSEN IN GOOD VOICE.

Miss Neilsen sang the two arias with much skill. Her voice sounded fresh, was under good control and showed to a marked degree the strides in bel canto that she has made since the days when she sang in "Robin Hood" and other favorites. It would be a pleasure to hear her in them now. It would have been a greater pleasure at the concert to hear her in one of Mimi's airs.

Mr. Gilbert's Indian Suite, performed for the first time, after the dulcet numbers of earlier composers, lent character and variety to the program. It consists of six movements: a prelude is "Barbaric Mood," Invocation, Song of the Wolf, Camp Dance, Nocturne and Snake Dance. They are based an phonographic studies made by Mr. Gilbert, of songs actually sung by North American Indians for the purpose. The composer has used themes, but has not whole songs, which have a great deal of repetition. The suite was beautifully performed, and at the end Mr. Monteux brought the composer from the wings to bow his acknowledgments.

GILBERT'S "INDIAN SKETCHES" PLAYED

Alice Nielsen Assists in Symphony Concert

Toscanini and La Scala Orchestra Wins Warm Acclaim

The only novelty on yesterday's Symphony program was Mr Gilbert's "Indian Sketches," performed for the first time in public. The audience showed its enjoyment of the new piece by remaining at the end, which was also the end of the concert, long enough to recall the composer to the stage to acknowledge enthusiastic applause.

The music, like other work from the same hand, shows genuine originality and independence of convention. Mr Gilbert has taken themes suggested by the study of phonographic records of actual Indian tunes and wrought them into musical mood pictures by using the coloristic resources of the orchestra and the technique of melodic development. He has caught the spirit of Indian life the better for not being too literal in reproducing Indian music. His sketches are, on the other hand, far more lifelike than the sentimentalizing of MacDowell's familiar "Indian Suite."

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony fared better at Mr Monteux' hands than routine classics usually fare now that the orchestra must be drilled carefully in everything it plays. It received an imaginative performance which brought out the intrinsic melancholy and fantasy of the music.

This symphony is among the works by Mendelssohn which thoroughly deserve to survive the inevitable diminishing of his once exaggerated reputation. The introduction to the first allegro, and the scherzo have an individual and distinctive beauty which is still vital.

Alice Nielsen has sung many times in Boston since her first appearance here in 1896, as a girl of 20. Her "Batti, Batti" yesterday was a performance of Mozart's wonderful aria which few living singers could equal. This music is a touchstone for sopranos. Few of them have the breath control, the understanding of "bel canto," the perception of Mozart's dramatic purpose needed, even among those who have the necessary vocal endowment.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra provided a rather slipshod accompaniment for this aria, and for the inferior companion piece, "Deh Vieni Non Tardar." In the remaining number of a surprisingly miscellaneous program, the overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus de Serail," leader and orchestra did Mozart more justice. The audience received all three Mozart numbers coldly.

AMER. MAR 5.

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Monteux proposes a programme of five short and relatively light pieces among which there is no symphony or no lengthy tone-poem. The chosen numbers are:

Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe" ...... Weber
Concerto in D major for Violoncello with Orchestra ...... Haydn
(Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti)
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus" ...... Liszt
Noble and Sentimental Waltzes ...... Ravel
Two Movements (Romeo Alone; Fête at the Capulets") from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" ...... Berlioz

The "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes," some of which happen also to be ironic, are, of course, Ravel's early piano-pieces as recently scored for orchestra by the composer. Epilogue included, there are eight of them. It is pleasant to see Mr. Monteux find place for such romantic music as that of Liszt and Berlioz; while, as for Mr. Bedetti, few of the wandering violoncellists excel him, sit though he does from week to week in the Symphony Orchestra.

TRANS. MAR 5.

Toscanini, Monteux, Pizzetti, Gilbe

Double Day of Conductors and Composers, Old and New, with Plenteous and Various Harvest

WITH the usual Symphony Concert in the afternoon and the final concert of Mr. Toscanini and his Milanese orchestra in the evening, Boston fed full, yesterday, of symphonic music. For both occasions there were ample but manifestly different audiences. To Symphony Hall in the afternoon went the company that, half by habit and half by inclination, frequents the matinées of the Symphony Orchestra. Bye and large it is a public that takes much joy of itself—and most things on the stage for granted. Above the usual it was in that mood on Friday. What stranger within our gates, listening to the faint clapping of hands as Miss Alice Nielsen came to the platform, would have suspected that she had been a conspicuous ornament of the Boston Opera House, that, girl and woman, this town had known her more than twenty years? No wonder that after such chilly greeting her singing of two airs from Mozart lacked the eager impulse with which she sang them—and with no accompanying orchestra—in the same room last May. Barely courteous, moreover, were the listeners when at the end of the concert and of his new "Indian Sketches," Mr. Gilbert joined Mr Monteux, to acknowledge exceptionally cool plaudits. The composer as he has a right to do, may choose his own way in living and music-making; he may not be "quite one of us" and all that sort of nonsense. Yet it is the custom of audiences at the Symphony Concerts to applaud a composer warmly—especially a resident composer—when he is present to hear a first performance of his music, even if that music is more baffling and less meritorious than Mr. Gilbert's happened to be. Seemingly the cold without had also nipped within, and the "Symphony Matinée," as they would call it in New York, was uncommonly "institutional."

Different, indeed, was Mr. Toscanini's audience in the evening. Those whom custom sends to Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons, go not to hear visiting conductors, however eminent and stimulating; but some of those who take eagerly the pleasure of orchestral music, whenever and wherever it is to be had, found themselves capable of two concerts—and enjoyment thereof—within the short space of eight hours. The connoisseurs of music and the performance of music in this town do not miss a concert by Mr. Toscanini and he is sure to attract not a few from the social fringe, so to say, that likes to savor the rarities of the arts. Youth as well abounds at his concerts—exhilarating to see and to feel in this city of middle-aged audiences. Best of all, men hear Mr. Toscanini gladly, especially the men of his own race. Old and young, rich and poor, in dinner-coats and in worsted sweaters, they abounded last evening in Symphony Hall, alert with attention and quick with applause, kindling like the rest of us at the conductor's largest or finest fires. Yet, as a whole, the concert, "farewell" though it was, lacked a little of the zest of the three preceding it. Perhaps the chosen music was in itself less interesting; perhaps it could not heat Mr. Toscanini orchestra and audience to highest pitch; perhaps, even, we hearers are becoming accustomed to the conductor and his ways. Strangeness has departed from him, while time has not yet deepened familiarity.

Plentiful Mozart

As composers went, the day was Mozartean. At the Symphony Concert, Miss Nielsen sang two familiar airs—Susanna's "Deh! Vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and Zerlina's "Batti, Batti!" from "Don Juan"; while for preface Mr. Monteux set the overture to the light opera, "The Abduction from the Harem." (The original German title is nearly as formidable; long since the Italians wisely condensed it into "Il Seraglio.") In turn, in the evening, Mr. Toscanini began his concert with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat.

Unless it be the two airs none of this music is of the perfect Mozart. The habitual music-maker, at the day's work, does creep into the symphony, while certainly the resurrected overture is, as they say in the Middle West, of such "output." There are round reverberant measures in it, as becomes the heartiness of a German "singspiel" such as Mozart designed "Il Seraglio" to be—no better measures, though it be blasphemy to suggest as much, than the despised Nessler set into the overture of his nineteenth-century piece, equally shaped for a "popular" audience, "The Trumpeter of Sakkingen." Nessler, however, writing songfully in his preluding, swims through thick Teutonic sentimentality, whereas Mozart, similarly minded, instinctively writes gracefully, tenderly transparently. These periods preserve the overture in the concert hall, as an air or two—say with a Hempel to sing it—preserves the whole opera. Even so, far enough are they from the long, light, gleaming line, the undulating inflections, the mingled charm of sensuous longing and sensuous melancholy that fills "Deh! vieni" with silvery beauty, or the playful insinuating grace that winds through "Batti, Batti!" and sheds the smile that half mocks over the tear that half entreats. In both goes Mozart, the fanciful, the superlatively delicate m and the melodist as well who mak song the very voice of character, mood. Often Miss Nielsen, singing, w one with him; but lack of confidence and there dulled the soft resonance of tones; while excess of pains with every coloring or modulation of the music its flow. Yet few in these days sing airs of Mozart with such transparency, tenderness and taste as does she. voice gains the limpidity of the music, an spirit catches its fineness.

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Toscanini crowned Mozart. Of when Richard Strauss was conductor as well as composer, he so excelled with him; more recently, Dr. Muck touched glorious moments by his side; but never, as memory recalls him, quite sustained himself at the Italian's level of felicity. He used as full an orchestra as the score permitted—the whole string choir, the usual doubled winds—yet nowhere did weight of tone stay the pace, stiffen the suppleness of the music, or make angular the lithe and curving progress. Full-throated, but never thickly, sang Mr. Toscanini's orchestra when Mozart would have it so. Yet, on the instant at conductor's and composer's bidding—as delicate as it had been robust—it spun the contrasting arabesques of melody and ornament. The conductor, moreover, has schooled it to phrase his music as a singer phrases song—sensitively, suavely, limpidly, with artful sense of proportion and flow. Mr. Toscanini's wind choir may contain few virtuosi, but from him it gains the aerial quality which is the essence and the glamor of Mozart to us of the twentieth century. Moreover, what the pace, whatever the texture of the music, these wind-voices always "shone through."

Everywhere, too, the conductor was all for a Mozart songful. From him mere "workings-out," as the analysts call them, to fill a form, mere play with figures for the sake of such light sport, gained accent and color of melody. Now in one choir, now in another went this song; sometimes the whole orchestra, again a few instruments, gave it voice. As in the preluding or the Andante it might be pensive; as in the Finale, it might be fleet and gay; as in the first Allegro, it might be now bright, now shadowes; but ever under Mr. Toscanani's hand, it sang and as many as the moods were the voices. As clear, light, supple were the rhythms—recall the mingled grace and animation of the Minuet. As unfailing was the elegance, as true the aristocratic note of the performance. Fleet and gay was Mozart in the Finale, yet never did he merely race and caper. Formal he might be until the second melody enters the first movement, but what an air of high-bred workmanship the conductor gave the music! Here was Mozart transfigured—and in his own spirit. Mr. Toscanini's miracles do not begin and end with the moderns.

From Beethoven to Elgar

As the course of the two concerts ran, other classic composers likewise had their innings. Mr. Monteux has quietly and wisely waived not a few "traditions" of the Symphony Concerts; but he seems still to respect the precedent that once in a musical year ordains a Symphony by Mendelssohn. Last winter he resurrected "The Reformation Symphony" and it gratified an interest of curiosity. Yesterday his choice lighted upon the "Scotch Symphony." Next season, presumably, it will be the turn of the "Italian Symphony." Yet, peradventure, one or another of Mendelssohn's overtures—"Fingal's Cave" or the sea-piece—would yield as much pleasure is as characteristic music, returns none too often to Symphony Hall. Yet the "Scotch Symphony" played as songfully, rhythmically, plastically and warmly as it was yesterday, is still engaging to hear. In Mendelssohn's present, fate was exceptionally kind to him; for his future it was hardly less benignant. It gave him two preservative virtues: the ability to say lucidly, persuasively, what he wished to say and no little mastery over pure workmanship.

It is easy in these days to say that Mendelssohn's musical ideas lack depth, that his musical moods miss fervor; that he neither exalts nor penetrates. Yet, somehow, those ideas remain quite untarnished by the passing years; while the moods keep no less their animation. There are rust-stains even on Berlioz; there are wrinkles and cracks upon Liszt among the romanticists of seventy-five years ago; but the surface of Mendelssohn, the classicist, still shines smooth, original, mirror-like to whatever is within the music. How well jointed, how well polished a surface it is! Every prescription of form seems to fall into natural place; every detail is as apt as aptness can be; while at every turn falls the little stroke of fancy or of skill. To this day, the harmonies, the instrumental color please; felicity guides them; the matter and the spirit of the music shines through them. A master of style was Mendelssohn, and so smooth, so firm and fine-textured that with that gnawing time may not gain tooth-hold.

Mr. Toscanini's classics were the third "Leonora Overture" of Beethoven, the "Good Friday Music" from the third act of Wagner's "Parsifal" and, as some Englishmen would mildly but firmly say, Elgar's "Enigma Variations." The overture—it is little exaggeration to say—falls before conducting, gains only in degree by conducting. As the part of Hamlet is presumed to be "actor-proof," so is it well nigh "conductor-proof." Within long memory only Mr. Stokowski has been to over-cloud and dull it—by incongruous refinements, by excessive finicking trails. For a century and a quarter

entially
the co an of Beethoven's on canini—almost needless to release, to enhance of the music. Often h tonal suspense, expans sified them almost from ure; gathered them, hel
ing instant; then releas
as inevitable as seemed
notes of the distant tru
ing of the orchestra int
or of exultation. Once
Mr. Toscanini and his passion, outspread mi
Those who would hav
Haydn, Mozart and the
of Beethoven say that led it into these evil w frenzy and that a whol
posers have but follow
Toscanini ingrains both
pense and surge that r
stubble—although far f
epitome become epic.

The chivalric clang
the Grail-Knights pass
fragment from "Parsif
the perdurable loveli
melody of awakening
holy spell of holy da
Toscanini plied his pow
tra might give back f
spiritual evocation. I
music of inspiration,
measures in which Wa
glow, the tremor, the
of awakening spring in
the earth, to human ey
For an instant, he i
the poignant motiv of l
through and through blessing may still pang
Mr. Toscanini's fiery p
as this reveal also hi
ing, deeply human se

For another side, w tions the virtuoso con flink. There they are them and not so much ure one was omitte
the hearing, who car con aled, the enigmat but according to the roo nd in background
Yor concert hall is no
the speculative
Wh also, unless he ha
Ed rd's intimate circ ton imming of his frie to riation? Enough say hat Lady Elgar
a tain Mr. Sinclai acr atic organist. As abs ct sake, audience con ctors play the m p a because it offers ity characterization
Wh a variation spark play of harmonies and mak it flash the more nini with the "Dorabell him, they can swell the the breadth and the dep variation until the audi applause. Or they can background to the varia
violoncello; keep the lo throb of the sea-vari rhythmical impetuosity hands the striding pa vigor of the Finale. T as quickly as they ma
tions that are mere not are three or four such Toscanini impotent.

New Music as Well

At either concert, the music. Loyal to the "
phonists," in just dese steadily proves—Mr. Tos one more of them—the over-zealous and fantast named Ildebrando da
though he were mediæ
The chosen pieces were in Suite for concert-usa dental music to the poet's ella of the Cyprus bloody and cruel, pious ing and intriguing, ragi
One accompanies the ris
upon a scene by the q merchants and the shipm
lants observant, loungin serving-men running hi
the sky bright, the thron and alone the figure, am the dumb courtesan ba for her beauty. Pizzetti's full bodied, harmonically tally pungent, catches bustle, the glow of the sc with an admirable direc vigor; and when for a wh the amorous image of t come the warmth, the pit
Yet there is an individua
note of directly imagin music-making.

The grave Dance of sues—a slow, a stately Sa cer of the royal househol importance, with the b mettos wherein his ho to shake their bells—st skill as well as of delinea
So again the music has
The final dance, wherei smothered under the roses
by the vindictive queen—ho on loved the courtes
ned—proceeds in hea
though premonition o
ed down the dancer
d inevitable doom,
Again the listene
ness of imagination
ess of resource. He apart from the the destined, is a compo
nd stout, of large, qu and candid means.
a should disclose mo
ly, gratefully.

Monteaux's novel n
"Indian Sketches" of
s of which from e
usage of this abo
ement to lectures, h
d in this place. As are work of the
when he can wield
d or in massed modulation, learn onteux, zetti, Gilber

treats. In both goes Mozart, the endless fanciful, the superlatively delicate melodist and the melodist as well who made such song the very voice of character, incident mood. Often Miss Nielsen, singing, was at one with him; but lack of confidence here and there dulled the soft resonance of her tones; while excess of pains with every lovely coloring or modulation of the music stayed its flow. Yet few in these days sing the airs of Mozart with such transparency tenderness and taste as does she. Her voice gains the limpidity of the music, her spirit catches its fineness.

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Toscanini crowned Mozart. Of old, when Richard Strauss was conductor as well as composer, he so excelled with him; more recently. Dr. Muck touched glorious moments by his side; but neither, as memory recalls him, quite sustained himself at the Italian's level of felicity. He used as full an orchestra as the score ermitted—the whole string choir, the usual doubled winds—yet nowhere did weight of tone stay the pace, stiffen the suppleness of the music, or make angular the ithe and curving progress. Full-throated, but never thickly, sang Mr. Toscanini's rchestra when Mozart would have it so. Yet, on the instant at conductor's and composer's bidding—as delicate as it had een robust—it spun the contrasting arabesques of melody and ornament. The onductor, moreover, has schooled it to hrase this music as a singer phrases song—sensitively, suavely, limpidly, with artful sense of proportion and flow. Mr. Toscanini's wind choir may contain few virtuosi, but from him it gains the aerial uality which is the essence and the lamor of Mozart to us of the twentieth entury. Moreover, what the pace, hatever the texture of the music, these ind-voices always "shone through."

Everywhere, too, the conductor was all or a Mozart songful. From him mere workings-out," as the analysts call them, o fill a form, mere play with figures for he sake of such light sport, gained accent and color of melody. Now in one hoir, now in another went this song; ometimes the whole orchestra, again a ew instruments, gave it voice. As in the reluding or the Andante it might be pensive; as in the Finale, it might be fleet nd gay; as in the first Allegro, it might e now bright, now shadowes; but ever under Mr. Toscanani's hand, it sang and as many as the moods were the voices. As lear, light, supple were the rhythms—recall the mingled grace and animation of the Minuet. As unfailing was the elegance, as rue the aristocratic note of the performance. Fleet and gay was Mozart in the inale, yet never did he merely race and aper. Formal he might be until the second melody enters the first movement, ut what an air of high-bred workmanship the conductor gave the music! Here was Mozart transfigured—and in his own pirit. Mr. Toscanini's miracles do not egin and end with the moderns.

rom Beethoven to Elgar

s the course of the two concerts ran, ther classic composers likewise had ining. Mr. Monteux has quietly and wisely aived not a few "traditions" of the Symhony Concerts; but he seems still to respect the precedent that once in a musical ear ordains a Symphony by Mendelssohn. ast winter he resurrected "The Reformation Symphony" and it gratified an inerest of curiosity. Yesterday his choice ighted upon the "Scotch Symphony." ext season, presumably, it will be the rn of the "Italian Symphony." Yet, perdventure, one or another of Mendelsohn's overtures—"Fingal's Cave" or the a-piece—would yield as much pleasure. as characteristic music, returns none o often to Symphony Hall. Yet the Scotch Symphony" played as songfully, ythmically, plastically and warmly as was yesterday, is still engaging to hear. Mendelssohn's present, fate was excepnally kind to him; for his future it was ardly less benignant. It gave him two reservative virtues: the ability to say ucidly, persuasively, what he wished to ay and no little mastery over pure workanship.

It is easy in these days to say that endelssohn's musical ideas lack depth; at his musical moods miss fervor; that e neither exalts nor penetrates. Yet omehow, those ideas remain quite untarished by the passing years; while their oods keep no less their animation. here are rust-stains even on Berlioz here are wrinkles and cracks upon Lisz mong the romanticists of seventy-five ears ago; but the surface of Mendelssohn e classicist, still shines smooth, bright irror-like to whatever is within th usic. How well jointed, how well pol ned a surface it is! Every prescriptio form seems to fall into natural place ery detail is as apt as aptness can be ile at every turn falls the little strok fancy or of skill. To this day, the ha nies, the instrumental color pleas city guides them; the matter and th t of the music shines through then master of style was Mendelssohn, a ooth, so firm and fine-textured ther that gnawing time may not ga hold.

Toscanini's classics were the th ra Overture" of Beethoven, Friday Music" from the third act r's "Parsifal" and, as some Englis uld mildly but firmly say, Elga Variations." The overture—it ggeration to say—falls before s gains only in degree by As the part of Hamlet is he "actor-proof," so is it w ctor-proof." Within long m r. Stokowski has been [illegible] and dull it—by incon [illegible]

n essentially tone-poem, music-drama little, the concentration, the glorifican of Beethoven's only opera. Mr. Tosnini—almost needless to say—was quick release, to enhance the dramatic voice the music. Often he began low with nal suspense, expansion, ascent; intenled them almost from measure to meas re; gathered them, held them for quiverg instant; then released them in climax s inevitable as seemed yesterday the first otes of the distant trumpet or the floodng of the orchestra into song of devotion r of exultation. Once within this song, Mr. Toscanini and his orchestra deepened passion, outspread might and splendor. Those who would have music end with Haydn, Mozart and the early symphonies of Beethoven say that it was he who first led it into these evil ways of ecstacy and frenzy and that a whole century of composers have but followed after him. Mr. Toscanini ingrains both with a tonal suspense and surge that runs as fire through stubble—although far from stubble is this epitome become epic.

The chivalric clang of the music of the Grail-Knights passed quickly in the fragment from "Parsifal." It was upon the perdurable loveliness of Wagner's melody of awakening nature under the holy spell of holy day upon which Mr. Toscanini plied his powers that his orchestra might give back fadeless beauty and spiritual evocation. If ever there was music of inspiration, it is these brief measures in which Wagner summons the glow, the tremor, the magic and miracle of awakening spring in light and air upon the earth, to human eye and human heart. For an instant, he interweaves with it the poignant motiv of longing that threads through and through "Parsifal," that blessing may still pang. Every one knows Mr. Toscanini's fiery power; such moments as this reveal also his poetizing, visioning, deeply human sensibilities.

For another side, with Elgar's Variations, the virtuoso conductor had deserved fling. There they are—a full fourteen of them and not so much as one or a measure of one was omitted last evening. In the hearing, who cares a penny for the concealed, the enigmatical motiv, unheard but according to the composer lying at root and in background to the whole piece [illegible] concert hall is not exactly the place for the speculative solution of puzzles Who also, unless he happens to know Sir Edward's intimate circle can guess at his tonal limning of his friends from variation to variation? Enough for the cynics to say that Lady Elgar must be dull and a certain Mr. Sinclair an exceedingly acrobatic organist. As music for its own abstract sake, audiences must hear and conductors play the music. Possibly they play it because it offers them rich opportunity for characterization and differentiation. When a variation sparkles with fancy and play of harmonies and timbres, they can make it flash the more as did Mr. Toscanini with the "Dorabella" variation. Like him, they can swell the sonorous advan the breadth and the depth of the "Nimrod" variation until the audience cannot resist applause. Or they can set in the dark background to the variation of the singing violoncello; keep the long flow and slow throb of the sea-variation; speed the rhythmical impetuosity of another; enhance the striding pace, the resonant vigors of the Finale. They can also move as quickly as they may past the variations that are mere note-weaving. There are three or four such that left even Mr. Toscanini impotent.

New Music as Well

At either concert, there was also novel music. Loyal to the "new Italian symphonists," in just desert as their music steadily proves—Mr. Toscanini introduced one more of them—the Pizzetti, whom the over-zealous and fantastic d'Annunzio renamed Ildebrando da Parma, quite as though he were mediæval, not modern. The chosen pieces were three numbers set in Suite for concert-usage from the incidental music to the poet's play, "La Pisanella," of the Cyprus of the Crusades—bloody and cruel, pious and lustful, feasting and intriguing, raging and dreaming. One accompanies the rising of the curtain upon a scene by the quayside, with the merchants and the shipmen astir, the gallants observant, lounging, truculent, the serving-men running hither and thither, the sky bright, the throng noisy—and afar and alone the figure, among the bales, of the dumb courtesan banished from Pisa for her beauty. Pizzetti's music, full voiced, full bodied, harmonically rich, instrumentally pungent, catches the diversity, the bustle, the glow of the scene. It is written with an admirable directness, candor and vigor; and when for a while it would evoke the amorous image of the Pisan woman, come the warmth, the pith of Italian song. Yet there is an individual note—again the note of directly imagined and clear-cut music-making.

The grave Dance of the Falconer ensues—a slow, a stately Saraband of an officer of the royal household conscious of his importance, with the briefest of intermezzos wherein his hooded birds seem to shake their bells—stroke of musical skill as well as of delineative imagination. So again the music has individual flavor. The final dance, wherein the Pisan dies smothered under the roses heaped upon her by the vindictive queen—vengeful because her son loved the courtesan and with love returned—proceeds in heavy sensuousness, as though premonition of impending fate weighed down the dancer, then rushes as toward inevitable doom, ends as a music stifled. Again the listener feels Pizzetti's directness of imagination, directness and richness of resource. Here, then, and in music apart from the theatre for which it was destined, is a composer of fibre both fine and stout, of large, quick spirit, of ample and candid means. His impending Sonata should disclose more of him interestingly, gratefully.

Mr. Monteux's novel numbers were the six "Indian Sketches" of Mr. Gilbert, the origins of which from early studies and early usage of this aboriginal music as supplement to lectures, have already been printed in this place. As they stand now they are work of the composer's riper years, when he can wield an orchestra in divided or in massed tone, has mastered rugged modulation, learned the secrets of iterated and broken rhythm, can lay on his harmonic and instrumental color boldly, broadly, in stimulating fierceness of will and outcome. Now and again in his music, Mr. Gilbert's expressive and suggestive means have seemed to fall short of his imaginative and delineative design. He has wrestled and written. In the "Indian sketches, clearly, purpose and accomplishment are better matched, and in three or four of the six, he has fulfilled himself above both the "Comedy Overture" and the Prelude to Synge's peasant tragedy, "Riders to the Sea." One sketch may be dismissed as the inevitable necessity to such a Suite—the number that shall exhale gentle song in pensive mood. Mr. Gilbert calls it a Nocturne, would suggest in it night-paddling upon forest-clad, solitary rivers. Actually, he achieves hardly more than a conventionally musing, a conventionally developed and harmonized melody. At a single hearing it evokes a dutiful composer, but neither night nor solitude, darkling stream or shadowy forest. Another sketch, "The Camp Dance" may also pass as no more than graphic, sportive rhythm—"young barbarians"—and not so barbarous at that—"all at play."

Four more Sketches—a Prelude of "Barbaric Mood," an Invocation, a Wolf-Song and a Snake-Dance—are of another matter and manner. The rhythm drums iterantly, leaps brokenly, strides largely or flings about as in frenzy. The melody is bold and bald. It whines out of the distance in the Prelude; it roughens and deepens; whines away again. In the Invocation, it is sheer piercing insistence. The gods shall hear their vehement servant. In the Wolf-Song, it is clear feat of imagination and power, when it swells from scant Indian suggestion into wildness and weirdness, the massed cry tearing the night, of a whole tribe of wolflings. In the Snake-Dance comes again the note of savagery, less sharp than dull. The rhythm, first, the melody next, is the life, the illusion of all this music, but upon it Mr. Gilbert lays patches of smouldering or flashing harmonic color or bids this instrument or that choir cut fiercely into the music. He only of American composers dares strike this barbarous note. Probably he only can strike it. Tonic and savory it falls upon many an ear. Not all music need be civilized. Not a little of it is too civilized by half. Savages bring something to it—when Mr. Gilbert, standing half-way between, is their prophet.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR. 5.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 18th program: Overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Concerto for violoncello, Haydn; "Orpheus," Liszt; "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," Ravel; Two Movements from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz. Soloist, Jean Bedetti.

GLOBE. MAR. 6.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," Haydn's violoncello concerto, in which the soloist will be Jean Bedetti; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," which will have its first performance in Boston, and the ball scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

ADVERTISER-MAR. 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and followed by the last regular tour of the orchestra, Mr. Monteux has arranged this program: Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Haydn's violoncello concerto, in which the soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first violoncellist of the orchestra; Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus"; Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," which will be heard for the first time in Boston, and Romeo Alone and the Grand Festival at Capulet's house, from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

HERALD. MAR. 6.

Boston Symphony

For the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Haydn's violoncello concerto, in which the soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra; Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," which will have its first performance in Boston, and the ball scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

POST MAR. 6.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS WORKS OF OLD COMPOSERS

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the feature number at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall last evening. It was a good, substantial programme, devoid of novelties, but interesting and exceedingly well played, that Mr. Monteux presented. Alice Neilsen was the soloist, two Mozart arias serving to reveal her vocal ability. A big audience enjoyed the concert, in which the numbers were given in the following order:

Mendelssohn.......Symphony No. 3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56.
Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato, Vivace non troppo.
Adagio.
Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestro assai.
Wagner....................Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Mozart.........Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Mozart...............Aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni."
Wagner..............Overture to "Tannhauser"

In these days when feverish desire for something new and strange in orchestral music afflicts conductors and the modernist is placed upon a pedestal, the average concertgoer sits through a symphony like the Mendelssohn No. 3 in A-minor with a feeling of calm contentment. This is not a profound work, neither is it one that quickens the pulse or deeply stirs the listener. It is rather a beautiful musical picture born in the mind of a great tone poet and fashioned with the skill of a master musician. It faithfully reflects the composer's impressions of the land of mists, mountains and valleys. Mendelssohn's artistic nature led him to create the spirit of Scottish scenes by delicate rather than by direct method. He hints at big pipes and by use of characteristic rythmn provides delightfully the appropriate "atmosphere." In the first movement one may easily imagine him musing over some tragic incident in Scotland's history. It is pure music throughout. Mr. Monteux gave the work a sympathetic reading, in which he was joined by his players.

The Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser," also old favorites, were played with expression and technical unity. The opening measures for strings and the repetition at the close have been heard here with purer tone and more finish. Nevertheless, as a whole, it was exceptionally well played, the gradual increase in number of orchestral voices reaching a fine climax with full-throated brass and percussion instruments, which soon faded into the final ethereal tones of the violins.

A magnificent rendition of the "Tannhauser" was the orchestra's last offering. The brass in the "Pilgrim's Chorus" was splendid in sonorous volume. The violins in their restless accompanying figure work were accurate and effective. The audience seemed particularly pleased with this number.

Miss Neilsen, remembered by many in the audience for her artistic singing at many former appearances here, received a flattering tribute of applause after her two arias. The melodious and singable excerpts suited her voice and she gave them with the intelligence and good style which have long been associated with her singing. Her voice retains much of the quality of her earlier operatic days and it is flexible and well managed. She returned several times to acknowledge applause after her last air, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni."

A. F. P.

PROV. BULL. MAR. 9

SYMPHONY PLAYERS IN FOURTH CONCERT

"Scotch Symphony" Finely Played under Direction of Conductor Monteux.

An audience of gratifying proportions heard the fourth concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra series last evening at Infantry Hall, Providence, and thoroughly enjoyed a programme of tried worth, beautifully executed. Alice Neilsen was the soloist, and the programme was as follows:

Mendessohn, symphony No. 3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Andante con moto, Allegro un poco agitato, Vivace non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo, Allegro maestro assai; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin;" Mozart, aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro;" Mozart, aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni;" Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

Mendelssohn's third, familiarly known as the "Scotch Symphony," is one of the most beautiful of the composer's works, most characteristic of his finished art. Inspired by a visit to the "land of the heather," it represents the effort of the composer to record his impression of the country. Long one of the most popular of his symphonies, it is undoubtedly one of his best, and is always welcome on a programme. It was sympathetically interpreted by Mr. Morteaux and played with superb finish by the orchestra.

The other orchestral numbers were also played with splendid effect, particularly the "Tannhauser" overture, which brought the concert to a close. Probably no single number regularly played at a symphony concert in Providence is heard with greater pleaseure than this. It has had a place on one of the programmes in every course here for years, and if any conductor ever leaves it off for a whole season it will be sadly missed. Its rendition last evening was no less than magnificent, evoking thunderous applause at the close.

Miss Neilsen's two numbers were sung with the taste, finish and intelligence always to be expected from this thoroughly artistic singer. The two arias called forth a most sincere tribute of applause, particularly the "Batti Batti" number from "Don Giovanni." She was recalled to the stage several times to acknowledge the plaudits.

PAWTUCKET-TIMES
MAR. 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES CONCERT SERIES

Devoid of novelties, but interesting and well-rendered, was the programme presented last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the feature.

Miss Alice Neilsen, remembered for her many pleasing concerts here, was flatteringly received after her two offerings last night. Both were Mozart arias.

The programme: Symphony No. 3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Mendelssohn; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

PROV. NEWS MAR. 9.

Symphony Concert

The fourth concert of the season of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place in Infantry Hall last evening.

Miss Alice Neilson was the soloist and a very large audience listened with delight to the following unusually fine program; Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Mendelssohn, Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato, Vivace non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai, Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner, Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, Aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart, overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra gave a truly magnificent performance of the symphony, the deep tenderness of the introductory Andante holding the audience tense until the end of the movement, when a volume of applause spoke eloquently of the effect upon the hearers, who did not fail to note the sound of bagpipes in the distance, suggesting the atmosphere of the Scottish hills.

The Scotch symphony in A Minor is acknowledged to be one of the most beautiful ever written and indeed after the immortal Ninth by Beethoven, no symphony is more perfect in form than this or of charm more enduring. As is well known it is supposed to owe its inspiration to Mendelsohnn's recollections of Scotland. It is full of wild, tender, melancholy melody and coloring, notably in the first two movements, while the scherzo is full of sunny playfulness.

The prelude to Lohengrin received a perfect rendering with its sweeping movements, beautiful phrasing and precision of attack.

A superb performance of the Tannhauser brought the concert to a close, the "Pilgrim's Chorus" in this number proving a telling feature of the program, the brasses rising above the orchestra in a splendid volume of sound and the whole merging into wonderfully rich and beautiful harmony.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Neilson proved an outstanding feature of the concert, for Miss Neilson has been widely heralded as a successful vocal exponent of Mozart's music.

She sang the two difficult songs with simplicity and smoothness. Her voice is large and of a very agreeable quality but lacking in emotionalism. She was several times recalled at the end of her last number, "Batt, Batt," from "Don Giovanni.

N. B. P.

PROV. TRIBUNE, MAR

Mr. Burgin, the first violinist of th Symphony Orchestra, will deservingly play a Concerto—Glazunov's—at its final concer in New York on Saturday afternoon of nex week. Other numbers chosen by Mr Monteux for his hearers are Brams' Second Symphony, Mendelssohn's Scotcl Symphony, Ravel's "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes," Liszt's tone-poem, "Orpheus," the fragments to be heard in Boston today and tomorrow of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and Chabrier's to "Gwendoline."

TRANS. MAR. 11.

18TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" Played Here for First Time

BEDETTI PLAYS HAYDN CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 4 "Orpheus"; Ravel, Valses Nobles et Sentimentales (first time in Boston); Berlioz, "Romeo alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets," from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Ravel wrote his waltzes for the piano and they were played. He then orchestrated them for a ballet, "Adelaide: or the Language of Flowers," which was performed. Mr. Monteux was the first to bring out in Paris (Feb. 15, 1814,) the waltzes as a concert piece, four years after the piano waltzes were composed, two years after the ballet was performed. It is not necessary to discuss the question whether this music suffers by transference from the theatre to the stage; yet it is possible that Ravel thought vaguely of a ballet in the future, as today his "Valse" for orchestra brought out as a concert piece is turned into a ballet for Vienna. Dancers are still "interpreting" music that was never intended for the ballet, and seems singularly inappropriate. Not long ago a daring young woman danced a "Philosophical Ballet," to Cesar Franck's prelude, Choral and Fugue; Debussy's "Nocturnes," Wagner's "Parsifal" and "Tristan" have been "illustrated" by scantily clad maidens skipping about in Paris. It would not be surprising if Miss Duncan's pupils should soon dance to the music of Bach's Passion according to Matthew, sacred dances, of course, yet with the customary prancing and bounding and tossing arms aloft.

When Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" were first played on a piano at a concert where the names of the composers were not announced, the program gave the motto chosen by Ravel, a saying of Henri de Regnier: "The delightful and always novel pleasure of a useless occupation." M. Cornet then inquired whether this "useless occupation" was in hearing the waltzes or in composing them; a merry quip that probably was not appreciated by M. Ravel. Mr. Rosenfeld speaks of the waltzes as "a slightly ironical and disillusioned, if smiling and graceful and delicate commentary, to the season of love." This sentence may be taken by some as a subtle description; but can music be of itself, without any program or suggestive title, ironical? If one points to the last movement of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony or the Mephistopheles section in Liszt's "Faust," the answer is: Berlioz wrote an elaborate program; Goethe's Mephistopheles was justly celebrated for his irony.

Let us take Ravel's music, as music, without gloss or commentary. Some of the pages are charming, but does not the charm consist chiefly in dexterous instrumentation, in fleeting harmonic moments, not in substantial, or even emotional musical ideas? Is there not a monotony induced by constant piquancy and continual surprises? To some of us the music has the artificiality of the ballroom, though there are suggestions, as in life, of sentimental couples, of amorous words hastily exchanged, of encircling arms for a moment after the music has died away.

The Waltzes were played with the requisite euphony—modern euphony calls for elbowing harmonies and prickling dissonances; they were played with the necessary delicacy and finesse. We have never heard a more eloquent performance of Weber's overture than the one of yesterday: there was grandiose and fiery treatment; there was the stirring expression of Weber's chivalric vein; while the reading of the free fantasia section after the unearthly pianissimo measures—and there was a pianissimo of a nature seldom heard before Mr. Monteux came to us—was singularly impressive. Even the fugato measures, which as a rule seem out of place, if not boresome, were yesterday significant. Brilliant, too, was the performance of the excerpt from Berlioz's symphony, so brilliant that the ball music no longer seemed common; while the oboe, played by Mr. Longy with his accustomed skill, was the very voice of the love-smitten Romeo.

Liszt's "Orpheus" had not been heard at these concerts for 15 years. The neglect is unaccountable, for it is free from the bombast, hifalutin, sawdust pomp that disfigure the more familiar "Tasso" and even portions of too familiar "Preludes." In "Orpheus" Liszt is more truly poetical. One should not read his preface; reading it, one might be disinclined to hear his music. The performance was effective; the different solo passages were beautifully played.

Mr. Bedetti gave a remarkable performance of Haydn's concerto; a performance distinguished for its elegance and taste; for its unostentatious brilliance. The adagio was played with a simplicity and a tenderness of expression that came from the heart of the violoncellist and touched the heart of the hearer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of March 25-26 is as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Transformation Music and Closing Scene from Act I of "Parsifal." The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have been trained by Dr. Davison.

HERALD MAR. 12.

Monteux, zzetti, Gilber

treats. In both goes Mozart, the endlessl fanciful, the superlatively delicate melodis and the melodist as well who made suc song the very voice of character, inciden mood. Often Miss Nielsen, singing, was a one with him; but lack of confidence here and there dulled the soft resonance of he tones; while excess of pains with every lovely coloring or modulation of the music stayed its flow. Yet few in these days sing the airs of Mozart with such transparency tenderness and taste as does she. Her voice gains the limpidity of the music, her spirit catches its fineness.

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Toscanini crowned Mozart. Of old, when Richard Strauss was conductor as well as composer, he so excelled with him; more recently, Dr. Muck touched glorious moments by his side; but neither, as memory recalls him, quite sustained himself at the Italian's level of felicity. He used as full an orchestra as the score ermitted—the whole string choir, the usual doubled winds—yet nowhere did weight of tone stay the pace, stiffen the suppleness of the music, or make angular the ithe and curving progress. Full-throated, but never thickly, sang Mr. Toscanini's rchestra when Mozart would have it so. Yet, on the instant at conductor's and composer's bidding—as delicate as it had been robust—it spun the contrasting arabesques of melody and ornament. The conductor, moreover, has schooled it to phrase this music as a singer phrases song—sensitively, suavely, limpidly, with artful sense of proportion and flow. Mr. Toscanini's wind choir may contain few virtuosi, but from him it gains the aerial quality which is the essence and the glamor of Mozart to us of the twentieth century. Moreover, what the pace, whatever the texture of the music, these wind-voices always "shone through."

Everywhere, too, the conductor was all for a Mozart songful. From him mere "workings-out," as the analysts call them, to fill a form, mere play with figures for the sake of such light sport, gained accent and color of melody. Now in one choir, now in another went this song; sometimes the whole orchestra, again a few instruments, gave it voice. As in the preluding or the Andante it might be pensive; as in the Finale, it might be fleet and gay; as in the first Allegro, it might be now bright, now shadowes; but ever under Mr. Toscanani's hand, it sang and as many as the moods were the voices. As clear, light, supple were the rhythms—recall the mingled grace and animation of the Minuet. As unfailing was the elegance, as true the aristocratic note of the performance. Fleet and gay was Mozart in the Finale, yet never did he merely race and caper. Formal he might be until the second melody enters the first movement, but what an air of high-bred workmanship the conductor gave the music! Here was Mozart transfigured—and in his own spirit. Mr. Toscanini's miracles do not begin and end with the moderns.

rom Beethoven to Elgar

As the course of the two concerts ran, other classic composers likewise had inning. Mr. Monteux has quietly and wisely waived not a few "traditions" of the Symphony Concerts; but he seems still to respect the precedent that once in a musical year ordains a Symphony by Mendelssohn. Last winter he resurrected "The Reformation Symphony" and it gratified an interest of curiosity. Yesterday his choice lighted upon the "Scotch Symphony." Next season, presumably, it will be the turn of the "Italian Symphony." Yet, peradventure, one or another of Mendelssohn's overtures—"Fingal's Cave" or the sea-piece—would yield as much pleasure. is as characteristic music, returns none too often to Symphony Hall. Yet the "Scotch Symphony" played as songfully, rhythmically, plastically and warmly as it was yesterday, is still engaging to hear. In Mendelssohn's present, fate was exceptionally kind to him; for his future it was hardly less benignant. It gave him two preservative virtues: the ability to say lucidly, persuasively, what he wished to say and no little mastery over pure workmanship.

It is easy in these days to say that Mendelssohn's musical ideas lack depth; that his musical moods miss fervor; that he neither exalts nor penetrates. Yet somehow, those ideas remain quite untarnished by the passing years; while the moods keep no less their animation. There are rust-stains even on Berlioz; here are wrinkles and cracks upon Lisz among the romanticists of seventy-fiv years ago; but the surface of Mendelssohn, the classicist, still shines smooth, bright, mirror-like to whatever is within th music. How well jointed, how well pol ished a surface it is! Every prescriptio of form seems to fall into natural place very detail is as apt as aptness can be while at every turn falls the little strok fancy or of skill. To this day, the har onies, the instrumental color pleas licity guides them; the matter and th pirit of the music shines through them master of style was Mendelssohn, an smooth, so firm and fine-textured ther ith that gnawing time may not ga oth-hold.

r. Toscanini's classics were the th eonora Overture" of Beethoven, ood Friday Music" from the third act gner's "Parsifal" and, as some Englis would mildly but firmly say, Elga nigma Variations." The overture—it exaggeration to say—falls before acting, gains only in degree by a acting. As the part of Hamlet is p to be "actor-proof," so is it w "conductor-proof." Within long me Mr. Stokowski has been ly cloud and dull it—by incongr ts, by excessive finicking wit

n essentially tone-poem, music-drama little, the concentration, the glorifica- of Beethoven's only opera. Mr. Toscanini—almost needless to say—was quick release, to enhance the dramatic voice the music. Often he began low with al suspense, expansion, ascent; inten- ed them almost from measure to meas- e; gathered them, held them for quiver- g instant; then released them in climax inevitable as seemed yesterday the first otes of the distant trumpet or the flood- g of the orchestra into song of devotion r of exultation. Once within this song, Mr. Toscanini and his orchestra deepened passion, outspread might and splendor. Those who would have music end with Haydn, Mozart and the early symphonies of Beethoven say that it was he who first led it into these evil ways of ecstacy and frenzy and that a whole century of composers have but followed after him. Mr. Toscanini ingrains both with a tonal suspense and surge that runs as fire through stubble—although far from stubble is this epitome become epic.

The chivalric clang of the music of the Grail-Knights passed quickly in the fragment from "Parsifal." It was upon the perdurable loveliness of Wagner's melody of awakening nature under the holy spell of holy day upon which Mr. Toscanini plied his powers that his orchestra might give back fadeless beauty and spiritual evocation. If ever there was music of inspiration, it is these brief measures in which Wagner summons the glow, the tremor, the magic and miracle of awakening spring in light and air upon the earth, to human eye and human heart. For an instant, he interweaves with it the poignant motiv of longing that threads through and through "Parsifal," that blessing may still pang. Every one knows Mr. Toscanini's fiery power; such moments as this reveal also his poetizing, visioning, deeply human sensibilities.

For another side, with Elgar's Variations, the virtuoso conductor had deserve fling. There they are—a full fourteen o them and not so much as one or a measure of one was omitted last evening. I the hearing, who cares a penny for th concealed, the enigmatical motiv, unheard but according to the composer lying a root and in background to the whole piece concert hall is not exactly the plac for the speculative solution of puzzles Who also, unless he happens to know Si Edward's intimate circle can guess at hi tonal limning of his friends from variation to variation? Enough for the cynics to say that Lady Elgar must be dull and a certain Mr. Sinclair an exceedingly acrobatic organist. As music for its own abstract sake, audiences must hear and conductors play the music. Possibly they play it because it offers them rich opportunity for characterization and differentiation. When a variation sparkles with fancy and play of harmonies and timbres, they can make it flash the more as did Mr. Toscanini with the "Dorabella" variation. Like him, they can swell the sonorous advan- the breadth and the depth of the "Nimrod" variation until the audience cannot resist applause. Or they can set in the dark background to the variation of the singing violoncello; keep the long flow and slow throb of the sea-variation; speed the rhythmical impetuosity of another; enhance the striding pace, the resonant vigors of the Finale. They can also move as quickly as they may past the variations that are mere note-weaving. There are three or four such that left even Mr. Toscanini impotent.

New Music as Well

At either concert, there was also novel music. Loyal to the "new Italian symphonists," in just desert as their music steadily proves—Mr. Toscanini introduced one more of them—the Pizzetti, whom the over-zealous and fantastic d'Annunzio renamed Ildebrando da Parma, quite as though he were mediæval, not modern. The chosen pieces were three numbers set in Suite for concert-usage from the incidental music to the poet's play, "La Pisanella," of the Cyprus of the Crusades—bloody and cruel, pious and lustful, feasting and intriguing, raging and dreaming. One accompanies the rising of the curtain upon a scene by the quayside, with the merchants and the shipmen astir, the gallants observant, lounging, truculent, the serving-men running hither and thither, the sky bright, the throng noisy—and afar and alone the figure, among the bales, of the dumb courtesan banished from Pisa for her beauty. Pizzetti's music, full voiced, full bodied, harmonically rich, instrumentally pungent, catches the diversity, the bustle, the glow of the scene. It is written with an admirable directness, candor and vigor; and when for a while it would evoke the amorous image of the Pisan woman, come the warmth, the pith of Italian song. Yet there is an individual note—again the note of directly imagined and clear-cut music-making.

The grave Dance of the Falconer ensues—a slow, a stately Saraband of an officer of the royal household conscious of his importance, with the briefest of intermezzos wherein his hooded birds seem to shake their bells—stroke of musical skill as well as of delineative imagination. So again the music has individual flavor. The final dance, wherein the Pisan dies smothered under the roses heaped upon her by the vindictive queen—vengeful because her son loved the courtesan and with love returned—proceeds in heavy sensuousness, as though premonition of impending fate weighed down the dancer, then rushes as toward inevitable doom, ends as a music stifled. Again the listener feels Pizzetti's directness of imagination, directness and richness of resource. Here, then, and in music apart from the theatre for which it was destined, is a composer of fibre both fine and stout, of large, quick spirit, of ample and candid means. His impending Sonata should disclose more of him interestingly, gratefully.

Mr. Monteaux's novel numbers were the six "Indian Sketches" of Mr. Gilbert, the origins of which from early studies and early usage of this aboriginal music as supplement to lectures, have already been printed in this place. As they stand now they are work of the composer's riper years, when he can wield an orchestra in divided or in massed tone, has mastered rugged modulation, learned the secrets of reiterated and broken rhythm, can lay on his harmonic and instrumental color boldly, broadly, in stimulating fierceness of will and outcome. Now and again in his music, Mr. Gilbert's expressive and suggestive means have seemed to fall short of his imaginative and delineative design. He has wrestled and written. In the "Indian sketches, clearly, purpose and accomplishment are better matched, and in three or four of the six, he has fulfilled himself above both the "Comedy Overture" and the Prelude to Synge's peasant tragedy, "Riders to the Sea." One sketch may be dismissed as the inevitable necessity to such a Suite—the number that shall exhale gentle song in pensive mood. Mr. Gilbert calls it a Nocturne, would suggest in it night-paddling upon forest-clad, solitary rivers. Actually, he achieves hardly more than a conventionally musing, a conventionally developed and harmonized melody. At a single hearing it evokes a dutiful composer, but neither night nor solitude, darkling stream or shadowy forest. Another sketch, "The Camp Dance" may also pass as no more than graphic, sportive rhythm—"young barbarians"—and not so barbarous at that—"all at play."

Four more Sketches—a Prelude of "Barbaric Mood," an Invocation, a Wolf-Song and a Snake-Dance—are of another matter and manner. The rhythm drums iterantly, leaps brokenly, strides largely or flings about as in frenzy. The melody is bold and bald. It whines out of the distance in the Prelude; it roughens and deepens; whines away again. In the Invocation, it is sheer piercing insistence. The gods shall hear their vehement servant. In the Wolf-Song, it is clear feat of imagination and power, when it swells from scant Indian suggestion into wildness and weirdness, the massed cry tearing the night, of a whole tribe of wolflings. In the Snake-Dance comes again the note of savagery, less sharp than dull. The rhythm, first, the melody next, is the life, the illusion of all this music, but upon it Mr. Gilbert lays patches of smouldering or flashing harmonic color or bids this instrument or that choir cut fiercely into the music. He only of American composers dares strike this barbarous note. Probably he only can strike it. Tonic and savory it falls upon many an ear. Not all music need be civilized. Not a little of it is too civilized by half. Savages bring something to it—when Mr. Gilbert, standing half-way between, is their prophet.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR. 5.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 18th program: Overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Concerto for violoncello, Haydn; "Orpheus," Liszt; "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," Ravel; Two Movements from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz. Soloist, Jean Bedetti.

GLOBE, MA

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," Haydn's violoncello concerto, in which the soloist will be Jean Bedetti; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," which will have its first performance in Boston, and the ball scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

ADVERTISER-MAR. 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and followed by the last regular tour of the orchestra, Mr. Monteux has arranged this program: Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Haydn's violoncello concerto, in which the soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first violoncellist of the orchestra; Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus"; Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," which will be heard for the first time in Boston, and Romeo Alone and the Grand Festival at Capulet's house, from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

HERALD. MAR. 6.

Boston Symphony

For the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Haydn's violoncello concerto, in which the soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra; Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," which will have its first performance in Boston, and the ball scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

POST MAR. 6.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS WORKS OF OLD COMPOSERS

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the feature number at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall last evening. It was a good, substantial programme, devoid of novelties, but interesting and exceedingly well played, that Mr. Monteux presented. Alice Neilsen was the soloist, two Mozart arias serving to reveal her vocal ability. A big audience enjoyed the concert, in which the numbers were given in the following order:

Mendelssohn.....Symphony No. 3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56.
Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. Vivace non troppo.
Adagio.
Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestro assai.
Wagner................Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Mozart........Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Mozart..............Aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni."
Wagner..............Overture to "Tannhauser"

In these days when feverish desire for something new and strange in orchestral music afflicts conductors and the modernist is placed upon a pedestal, the average concertgoer sits through a symphony like the Mendelssohn No. 3 in A-minor with a feeling of calm contentment. This is not a profound work, neither is it one that quickens the pulse or deeply stirs the listener. It is rather a beautiful musical picture born in the mind of a great tone poet and fashioned with the skill of a master musician. It faithfully reflects the composer's impressions of the land of mists, mountains and valleys. Mendelssohn's artistic nature led him to create the spirit of Scottish scenes by delicate rather than by direct method. He hints at big pipes and by use of characteristic rythmn provides delightfully the appropriate "atmosphere." In the first movement one may easily imagine him musing over some tragic incident in Scotland's history. It is pure music throughout. Mr. Monteux gave the work a sympathetic reading, in which he was joined by his players.

The Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser," also old favorites, were played with expression and technical unity. The opening measures for strings and the repetition at the close have been heard here with purer tone and more finish. Nevertheless, as a whole, it was exceptionally well played, the gradual increase in number of orchestral voices reaching a fine climax with full-throated brass and percussion instruments, which soon faded into the final ethereal tones of the violins.

A magnificent rendition of the "Tannhauser" was the orchestra's last offering. The brass in the "Pilgrim's Chorus" was splendid in sonorous volume. The violins in their restless accompanying figure work were accurate and effective. The audience seemed particularly pleased with this number.

Miss Neilsen, remembered by many in the audience for her artistic singing at many former appearances here, received a flattering tribute of applause after her two arias. The melodious and singable excerpts suited her voice and she gave them with the intelligence and good style which have long been associated with her singing. Her voice retains much of the quality of her earlier operatic days and it is flexible and well managed. She returned several times to acknowledge applause after her last air, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni."

A. F. P.

PROV. BULL. MAR. 9

SYMPHONY PLAYERS IN FOURTH CONCERT

"Scotch Symphony" Finely Played under Direction of Conductor Monteux.

An audience of gratifying proportions heard the fourth concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra series last evening at Infantry Hall, Providence, and thoroughly enjoyed a programme of tried worth, beautifully executed. Alice Neilsen was the soloist, and the programme was as follows:

Mendessohn, symphony No. 3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Andante con moto, Allegro un poco agitato, Vivace non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo, Allegro maestro assai; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin;" Mozart, aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro;" Mozart, aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni;" Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

Mendelssohn's third, familiarly known as the "Scotch Symphony," is one of the most beautiful of the composer's works, most characteristic of his finished art. Inspired by a visit to the "land of the heather," it represents the effort of the composer to record his impression of the country. Long one of the most popular of his symphonies, it is undoubtedly one of his best, and is always welcome on a programme. It was sympathetically interpreted by Mr. Morteaux and played with superb finish by the orchestra.

The other orchestral numbers were also played with splendid effect, particularly the "Tannhauser" overture, which brought the concert to a close. Probably no single number regularly played at a symphony concert in Providence is heard with greater pleaseure than this. It has had a place on one of the programmes in every course here for years, and if any conductor ever leaves it off for a whole season it will be sadly missed. Its rendition last evening was no less than magnificent, evoking thunderous applause at the close.

Miss Neilsen's two numbers were sung with the taste, finish and intelligence always to be expected from this thoroughly artistic singer. The two arias called forth a most sincere tribute of applause, particularly the "Batti Batti" number from "Don Giovanni." She was recalled to the stage several times to acknowledge the plaudits.

PAWTUCKET TIMES
MAR. 9.

[96]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES CONCERT SERIES

Devoid of novelties, but interesting and well-rendered, was the programme presented last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the feature.

Miss Alice Neilsen, remembered for her many pleasing concerts here, was flatteringly received after her two offerings last night. Both were Mozart arias.

The programme: Symphony No. 3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Mendelssohn; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

PROV. NEWS MAR. 9.

Symphony Concert

The fourth concert of the season of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place in Infantry Hall last evening.

Miss Alice Neilson was the soloist and a very large audience listened with delight to the following unusually fine program: Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Mendelssohn, Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato, Vivace non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai, Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner, Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, Aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart, overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra gave a truly magnificent performance of the symphony, the deep tenderness of the introductory Andante holding the audience tense until the end of the movement, when a volume of applause spoke eloquently of the effect upon the hearers, who did not fail to note the sound of bagpipes in the distance, suggesting the atmosphere of the Scottish hills.

The Scotch symphony in A Minor is acknowledged to be one of the most beautiful ever written and indeed after the immortal Ninth by Beethoven, no symphony is more perfect in form than this or of charm more enduring. As is well known it is supposed to owe its inspiration to Mendelsohn's recollections of Scotland. It is full of wild, tender, melancholy melody and coloring, notably in the first two movements, while the scherzo is full of sunny playfulness.

The prelude to Lohengrin received a perfect rendering with its sweeping movements, beautiful phrasing and precision of attack.

A superb performance of the Tannhauser brought the concert to a close, the "Pilgrim's Chorus" in this number proving a telling feature of the program, the brasses rising above the orchestra in a splendid volume of sound and the whole merging into wonderfully rich and beautiful harmony.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Neilson proved an outstanding feature of the concert, for Miss Neilson has been widely heralded as a successful vocal exponent of Mozart's music.

She sang the two difficult songs with simplicity and smoothness. Her voice is large and of a very agreeable quality but lacking in emotionalism. She was several times recalled at the end of her last number, "Batt, Batt," from "Don Giovanni.

N. B. P.

PROV. TRIBUNE, MAR

Mr. Burgin, the first violinist of the Symphony Orchestra, will deservingly play a Concerto—Glazunov's—at its final concer in New York on Saturday afternoon of nex week. Other numbers chosen by Mr Monteux for his hearers are Brams' Second Symphony, Mendelssohn's Scotc Symphony, Ravel's "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes," Liszt's tone-poem, "Orpheus," the fragments to be heard in Boston today and tomorrow of Berlioz's "Romeo an Juliet," Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and Chabrier's to "Gwendoline."

TRANS. MAR. 11.

18TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" Played Here for First Time

BEDETTI PLAYS HAYDN CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 4 "Orpheus"; Ravel, Valses Nobles et Sentimentales (first time in Boston); Berlioz, "Romeo alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets," from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Ravel wrote his waltzes for the piano and they were played. He then orchestrated them for a ballet, "Adelaide: or the Language of Flowers," which was performed. Mr. Monteux was the first to bring out in Paris (Feb. 15, 1914,) the waltzes as a concert piece, four years after the piano waltzes were composed, two years after the ballet was performed. It is not necessary to discuss the question whether this music suffers by transference from the theatre to the stage; yet it is possible that Ravel thought vaguely of a ballet in the future, as today his "Valse" for orchestra brought out as a concert piece is turned into a ballet for Vienna. Dancers are still "interpreting" music that was never intended for the ballet, and seems singularly inappropriate. Not long ago a daring young woman danced a "Philosophical Ballet," to Cesar Franck's prelude, Choral and Fugue; Debussy's "Nocturnes," Wagner's "Parsifal" and "Tristan" have been "illustrated" by scantily clad maidens skipping about in Paris. It would not be surprising if Miss Duncan's pupils should soon dance to the music of Bach's Passion according to Matthew, sacred dances, of course, yet with the customary prancing and bounding and tossing arms aloft.

When Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" were first played on a piano at a concert where the names of the composers were not announced, the program gave the motto chosen by Ravel, a saying of Henri de Regnier: "The delightful and always novel pleasure of a useless occupation." M. Cornet then inquired whether this "useless occupation" was in hearing the waltzes or in composing them; a merry quip that probably was not appreciated by M. Ravel. Mr. Rosenfeld speaks of the waltzes as "a slightly ironical and disillusioned, if smiling and graceful and delicate commentary, to the season of love." This sentence may be taken by some as a subtle description; but can music be of itself, without any program or suggestive title, ironical? If one points to the last movement of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony or the Mephistopheles section in Liszt's "Faust," the answer is: Berlioz wrote an elaborate program; Goethe's Mephistopheles was justly celebrated for his irony.

Let us take Ravel's music, as music, without gloss or commentary. Some of the pages are charming, but does not the charm consist chiefly in dexterous instrumentation, in fleeting harmonic moments, not in substantial, or even emotional musical ideas? Is there not a monotony induced by constant piquancy and continual surprises? To some of us the music has the artificiality of the ballroom, though there are suggestions, as in life, of sentimental couples, of amorous words hastily exchanged, of encircling arms for a moment after the music has died away.

The Waltzes were played with the requisite euphony—modern euphony calls for elbowing harmonies and prickling dissonances; they were played with the necessary delicacy and finesse. We have never heard a more eloquent performance of Weber's overture than the one of yesterday: there was grandiose and fiery treatment; there was the stirring expression of Weber's chivalric vein; while the reading of the free fantasia section after the unearthly pianissimo measures—and there was a pianissimo of a nature seldom heard before Mr. Monteux came to us—was singularly impressive. Even the fugato measures, which as a rule seem out of place, if not boresome, were yesterday significant. Brilliant, too, was the performance of the excerpt from Berlioz's symphony, so brilliant that the ball music no longer seemed common; while the oboe, played by Mr. Longy with his accustomed skill, was the very voice of the love-smitten Romeo.

Liszt's "Orpheus" had not been heard at these concerts for 15 years. The neglect is unaccountable, for it is free from the bombast, hifalutin, sawdust pomp that disfigure the more familiar "Tasso" and even portions of too familiar "Preludes." In "Orpheus" Liszt is more truly poetical. One should not read his preface; reading it, one might be disinclined to hear his music. The performance was effective; the different solo passages were beautifully played.

Mr. Bedetti gave a remarkable performance of Haydn's concerto; a performance distinguished for its elegance and taste; for its unostentatious brilliance. The adagio was played with a simplicity and a tenderness of expression that came from the heart of the violoncellist and touched the heart of the hearer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of March 25-26 is as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Transformation Music and Closing Scene from Act I of "Parsifal." The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have been trained by Dr. Davison.

HERALD MAR. 12.

SYMPHONY IN MASTER FORM AGAIN

Bedetti, Cellist, Soloist —Shares Honors With Monteux

BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most brilliant of the recent concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. We do not remember any performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture so stirring as that given on this occasion, a performance which resurrected the youthful and knightly spirit of Weber, the glow of his romanticism, and the supremely imaginative music—witness the middle part of the overture—which one finds in the midst of the poorest of his scores.

BEDETTI PROVES HIMSEIF

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was soloist. He played Haydn's D major concerto, and in so doing proved himself, still a young man, not only a gifted and proficient 'cellist, but really a great musician. It was the afternoon of the orchestra, and Mr. Monteux, who again surpassed himself in the reading of Liszt's "Orpheus," of Ravel's witty and ironical "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," and in the interpretation of the poignant music which Berlioz wrote in the sections "Romeo Alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets" of the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Ravel's music is more effective—it was originally composed for piano—as arranged by the composer for orchestra. The thought of Ravel is usually made clearer and more striking when he orchestrates it, for his musical thought is intimately connected with other arts than music, and the strongly contrasting, coloristic effects of the orchestra, which he handles with a magic of his own impress, his vision on the hearer as no single instrument could.

Flirting With Flowers

The programme book tells us of the performance of these waltzes in Paris to the ballet arranged for Mme. Trouhanowa, the dancer, in April, 1912. The ballet was called "Adelaide, or the Language of Flowers," "a delightful piece of early 19th century artificiality, in high-waisted frocks and turbans and puce suits and frills. Adelaide and Loredan flirt with delicious affectation in the language of flowers throughout a ball in a violently green and blue drawing room, and fall into each other's arms at last before the balcony opening onto an impossibly blue sea after Loredan, casting at her feet a sprig of cypress to tell his despair, has placed a pistol to his temple without firing it. The same amusing artificiality is in the theme, the staging, the dancing and the music."

This outline of the ballet seems to us to furnish a better indication of the spirit of Ravel's "jeux d'esprit" than any critic's or descriptive phraseology.

Berlioz and Liszt, fellow-sinners of a period when exaggeration of an emotional and pictorial kind was evident in all arts, supplemented each other yesterday—Liszt on one side, Berlioz on the other, of the sophisticated badinage of Ravel. Liszt has certainly written one of the best and most coherent tone-poems under the title of "Orpheus," but in moving intensity of utterance, in exquisite poetry, in dramatic blood, the kindled the i mus

hardly have been given a more eloquent performance.

Haydn's concert was delicious to the ear. It is one of the new 'cello concertos so simple and well made, so brisk, so melodious, that the 'cello does not sound cumbersome and long-winded, or the concerto a bore. Had the music been less interesting, however, Mr. Bedetti would have distinguished it by

POST MAR. 12.

of Haydn's music. It had polish. It did not over-emphasize. Never once did the music, so to speak, step out of its frame. It kept the 18th century manner and the spirit of 18th century art, and we must candidly admit, in these days when all reviewers su o know anything speak with sion of 18th century art, th of the 18th century seems re-

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITHOUT A SYMPHONY

Varied but Interesting Program Played

Hislop, Singer, and Nicastro, Cello, Score in Joint Recital

Yesterday afternoon the Symphony concert, by exception, contained no symphony, though a single movement from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" was the concluding number of an interestingly varied program. Mr Monteux doubtless planned to dispose of as many routine items as possible in a batch when he jumbled together Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," the inevitable annual concerto for the first 'cellist, Mr Bedetti; a tone poem by Liszt, and a novelty which was not new to frequenters of piano recitals, the orchestral arrangement of Ravel's familiar "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales"; yet the result proved as attractive as many carefully arranged programs.

If one must hear a 'cello concerto, something many concert goers could live happily without, Haydn's in D major is less tiresome than most such pieces. Mr Bedetti gave a thoroughly musicianly performance, avoiding as far as possible the deadly monotony of tone color which makes all except very brief 'cello solos a weariness to the flesh. But he might have spared us at least one of the cadenzas. His mastery of his instrument is well known.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture wears far better than most routine pieces by second rate composers. The introductory theme is boisterously vital, the famous largo passage has not lost all its thrill. The performance was appropriately dramatic, but the orchestra did not keep quite together in the fugato. It must, however, be difficult at times for the players to follow Mr Monteux's somewhat indefinite beat, which, seen from the audience, appears less readily intelligible than the gesticulations of such conductors as Toscanini.

Liszt's "Orpheus," unheard since 1906, if less admirable than his "Preludes," was new to many hearers and characteristic in its harmonic and orchestral ingenuities. The performance was adequate. Berlioz' music, illustrating Romeo's first meeting with Juliet at Capulet's ball, is among his best. Mr Monteux' phrasing and accentuation might have been more subtle.

Ravel's Valses in the original piano had a motto, "The delightful and always novel pleasure of a useless occupation." The orchestral arrangement is extremely ingenious, the music thoroughly entertaining, in a sophisticated fashion. The composer has achieved all he attempted, in short.

GLOBE MAR. 12

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RAVEL AND THREE CONTRASTING "ROMANTICS"

His Super-Sophisticated Waltzes for the First Time in Boston—Ironic and Mocking Pastime—Weber, Liszt and Berlioz Variously and Familiarly—The Orchestra on Its Mettle and Mr. Bedetti Master-'Cellist

FOR the most part, romantic composers from the first half of the last century engaged Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra and their audience yesterday. Had not Mr. Bedetti's solo-piece—the Concerto for Violoncello by Haydn—intruded, the conductor would have escaped narrowly the "unified" programme of Dr. Muck's day. True, upon it were the "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes" of Ravel, as yet not ten years old, and by no means in the vein or the manner of Weber, Liszt and Berlioz. With those pieces, however, Ravel might have passed as devil's advocate at this canonization, so to say, of the "romantics." The inference is that his title for his music is designedly ironical. Nowhere are the waltzes "noble" either in content or procedure; while the chemist in tones would report hardly "a trace" of "sentiment." On the very title-page, the composer's line from Regnier about "the pleasures of useless occupation" hints mocking purpose toward "nobility" as stock pose and pompous platitude, at sentiment as giddy or treacly gush. They were such in the days when "noble" waltzes were actually written—Schumann, for example, so labels one of the divisions of his "Carneval"—when truly sentimental waltzes abounded in the music-shops and strewed the pages of "ladies' annuals." They will probably remain such until human nature is born again and in new pattern; while artists of Ravel's mind and temperament will as everlastingly gird at them.

The method of this girding is, of course, musical. The habitual maker of "noble and sentimental waltzes," say in Victorian days, sought the flatulent phrase, the pulpy period. In every detail he was pink of propriety. His chest swelled, his eye glowed—or moistened—as he released himself in tones to triple rhythm. Such pieces were Jos. Sedley's music. To this day the attentive ear may hear them echoing from the pages of "Vanity Fair." Beyond mistaking, Ravel is of another mind and manner with his waltzes—in the piano-pieces they originally were, in the version for orchestra played yesterday for the first time in Boston, as the ballet they briefly became in the Paris of 1918. From dry, precise little motives, etched in the orchestral voices, springs his music. They are too meagre to be "noble," too prosaic to be "sentimental," and so seeming to fulfil his ironic purpose. He makes play with them and, apparently, his one desire is to avoid the resounding platitudes of "nobility," the sugared stream of "sentiment."

the waltz moves straightforwardly enough. Thereafter, at every other turn a peppery modulation, a sub-acid harmonic detail, an instrumental stroke, bitter-sweet; while throughout goes an air of light sport in dexterity and sophistry.

Ravel is never insistent upon this innuendo; to be such would be that foolish thing, the striking of an attitude. He is quite content to insinuate it; and so to achieve the antithesis of "nobility" and "sentiment"—to achieve it, most of all, perhaps, in the theatre when this music as "Adelaide or The Language of Flowers," went hand in hand with a courtesan smelling tube-roses, a noble duke laying his heart and his purse at her feet in other blossoms, a sentimental youth sighing out his amorous soul in sprigs of cypress and bunches of heliotrope. In his waltzes Ravel is dry and thin; in theirs the purveyors of "nobility" and "sentiment" were watery and rotund. They sprawled and slavered when they wrote; he is exact and elegant. They retailed pompous commonplaces of procedure; he chooses to be adeptly piquant. They smiled a large and oily smile out of the sentiment in which they fondly wallowed. He lifts an ironic eyebrow and is amused—even sighs on occasion in the waltzes a pretty tonal sigh of disillusion. Admittedly altogether sophisticated sport of the composing table, of the piano or the orchestra in the concert-hall, pastime of a certain cast of mind and temperament for kindred spirits, "caviare to the general"—and thankfully as Ravel might have whispered to himself with a glint of satisfaction. But it is his custom to assume an audience—or a few in it—as sophisticated as himself and to believe at will in the answering ironic twitch. Besides, adeptness at anything—music-making in our day included—is a pleasing game.

With reason Weber, Liszt, Berlioz seemed large-minded, warm-hearted, outspoken, when they replied with the overture to "Euryanthe," the tone-poem of "Orpheus," the soliloquy and fete from the music of "Romeo and Juliet," to this devil's advocate of super-sophistication. Well at least did two of them bear the sifting years, the change of mental and emotional attitude, the shifting fashions of life and a world that breed Ravels and Ravelian music-making. Weber still strikes fire in the impetuous ardor with which his overture begins and ends, still works fantasmal illusion in the middle measures of ghostly apparition. Heats of imagination, glow of power were in him when he wrote the preludes to his three surviving operas. He knew the brilliant, the direct means. They seem flung off—and how surely!—in a single zestful hour of concentrated creation. Ravels or no Ravels, the clang, the rush, the flare of them quicken ears and stir hearts. They are of the romantical army with banners; and when it halts and Weber would sound the note of romantical strangeness, ghostly tremor still quivers through the apparition. War-horses of the concert-hall may be these Weberian overtures, but war-horses whose manes still toss, whose hoofs yet beat.

Proof against the years, the fashions, the attitudes is also Liszt's tone-poem of "Orpheus." Agreed that the design is soaring romantic convention — Orpheus's song to sound again, the music wherewith he tamed beast, lured bird, conquered Hades, softened stocks, stones and woman's heart. Agreed that Liszt might have written it as "nobly and sentimentally" as the overblown note upon his title-page forebodes. As many of his tone-poems—or at the least many a division therein—suggest, he was quite capable of grandiose pulp and platitude, even rejoiced as he made it. Liszt, however, was far better romantic executant than romantic theorist—no poet in words but once and again poet in tones. In "Orpheus" he invents melody, gains and sustains instrumental song that hardly flag through the whole course of the tone-poem. It may not be song to summon the magic, mystery or might of Orpheus—that, probably, must ever remain aural vision uncaught, super-incarnation of the whole body and spirit of music—but it is song engrossing the ear, touching the heart, awakening illusion, unfolded and diversified in abiding beauty. "Orpheus" dates from Liszt's carnal days; yet the Liszt of "St. Elizabeth" and other pietistic baggage is nowhere so celestial as in this tone-poem of pagan legend. Oftener than some will believe—overhaunted by his pomps and platitudes—Liszt knew inspiration.

Berlioz probably believed he knew it as well, was exercising it, when he wrote his symphony of "Romeo and Juliet." Not too much of the music now survives actively; as the composer said, it is the equivalent of an opera—disembodied in the concert hall; and of those fragments Mr. Monteux played yesterday all but the "Queen Mab" music. Once more, however, "the grand fête" in Capulet's house seemed musically a dull, commonplace, noisy party much needing trappings of the stage to mask it; while even the characteristic melody of Romeo's soliloquy in the garden is losing pith and pungency. The Capulets, according to Berlioz, distinctly lacked fine taste in choice of dance-rhythms; they had clear preference for din; maybe the young Veronese "jazzed"—in a mediaeval manner—at their parties. It is the virtue of Berlioz's melody to be stripped and piercing, a fine and penetrating line. Yet time in this music of Romeo is surely wearing it thin and numb. Irony and workmanship, Ravel might say with his dry smile, getter bear this sifting than romance and exuberance. 1950 may decide.

In all these pieces, from Ravel to Berlioz and back again, conductor and orchestra excelled themselves. The overture to "Euryanthe," though the stage, even in Germany, nowadays hardly knows the opera, is music of the theatre. Therefore Mr. Monteux warmed to it, made it stride, flash and glow at beginning and end, gained in the ghostly measures a quivering, expectant hush worthy of Toscanini himself. Under the conductor's design every detail in Ravel's Waltzes—and they are almost wholly detail—fell into place; while in the playing of the orchestra few passed unnoted, unfelt. Light went the mocking rhythms; there was point in the harmonic innuendo. In turn the Capulets' orchestra considerably excelled the Capulets' music, and it was not the fault of singing wood-wind or of strings throbbing beneath that Berlioz's "Romeo," musically, seemed rather a moon-calf. Best of all, however, was the orchestra in Liszt's tone-poem, since there, for the while, it regained in instrumental song the mellow depths, surface-shimmer, lustrous transparency, mingled warmth and sensibility of an earlier but vividly remembered day. To such quality—and at the cost of what care and pains!—Mr. Monteux can now on occasion bring it. Then in truth only Mr. Stock's Chicagoans rival it in American concert halls.

As Mr. Monteux has worked to this goal, so have his forces worked with him. Of what manner of men most of these hundred are, there was proof yesterday in the quality of Mr. Bedetti, master-violoncellist. Haydn's Concerto might hardly have been played with a graver richness of tone, a serener beauty of simple pensive song than he gained in the slow movement; with a lighter bow and a brighter tone (as 'cello-tone goes) than he plied in the rhythmic give-and-take of the finale; with more exactness, elasticity and elegance upon the nearly endless figures and ornament of the Allegro. The cadenzas did but heap proof on proof of Mr. Bedetti's abilities as virtuoso. As musician equally he shone out of them since they accorded with Haydn's substance and style; while in the Adagio blended poise and poetry praised him. Not by ability only but by work the more, do these perfections come. Of such is the present spirit of Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

H. T. PARKER.

Friday afternoon, March 25, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. The programme traverses Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," suggested by verses of Verlaine; and the music for the rites of the Grail in the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal." The choruses of knights, esquires and boys will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by Dr. Davison.

Saturday evening, March 26, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and the programme above printed.

TRANS. MAR. 12

Easter Concert

An appropriate choral program will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next pair of concerts which, by virtue of the fact that the orchestra will be away on tour next week, will befall in Holy Week, Friday afternoon, March 25, and Saturday evening, March 26. The impressive choral music which closes the first act of "Parsifal," the transformation music and Holy Grail scene, will be conducted by Piere Monteux. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, which have been so finely trained by Dr. Archibard T. Davison of Harvard assisting.

Pension Fund Concert

The last Pension Fund concert this season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the net proceeds, as usual, to swell the fund in aid of retired musicians of the orchestra, will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30.

TRANS. MAR. 12

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Following the last tour of the orchestra, which will occupy this week, the 18th pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place on Friday afternoon, March 25, and Saturday evening, March 26. In observance of Holy Week, Mr. Monteux will conduct the Transformation music and the Holy Grail scene which closes the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal." The impressive choral portion of the music will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The program will also include Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine), and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

CONCERT NOTES

The last Pension Fund concert this season to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra for the fund in aid of retired musicians of the orchestra will take place at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30. The program will consist entirely of Russian music, including a symphony of Tschaikowsky.

HERALD MAR. 13.

At the six Symphony Concerts that remain to round out the season, there will be only two "assisting artists." Both are pianists—Mr. Rubinstein and Mr. Gebhard. The one is likely to play a modern Concerto; the other will be heard in Arthur Shepherd's Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra.

TRANS. MAR. 14.

A program consisting entirely of Tschaikowsky music will make the last Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, an event of unusual musical interest. It will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10.

The Transformation Music and the impressive Holy Grail Scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal," will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the next pair of Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 24 and 25.

RECORD MAR. 19.

[97]

PENSION FUND CONC

A program consisting entire the music of Tschaikowsky will m the last pension fund concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra sea an event of unusual interest. It be given at Symphony Hall on S day afternoon, April 10.

Pierre Monteux is compiling a p gram of the great Russian mast finest symphonic music. Soloists be Richard Burgin and Jean Bede

---

FAMOUS CHOIRS AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Transformation music and H Grail scene from the first act of W ner's "Parsifal" will be perform in observance of Holy Week at Symphony concerts next Friday aft noon and Saturday evening.

The choral music will be sung the Harvard Glee Club and the R cliffe Choral Club. Pierre Mont will also conduct Beethoven's " toral" Symphony and Charles M Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bo Chanson."

MAR. 20

Choral Music by Symphony

The Transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the next pair of Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 24 and 25.

The choral portions of this music, which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have attained such a notable degree of skill in singing under the training of Dr. Archibald T. Davison of Harvard. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, No. 6, in F major, and Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by the poem of Verlaine.

Tschaikowsky for Pension Concert

A programme consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky will make the last pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event of unusual musical interest. It will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10.

There will be two soloists at the concert—Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first cellist.

MAR. 20

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail Scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The choral portions of this music, which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have been trained by Dr. Davison of Harvard. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, No. 6, in F major, and Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by a poem of Verlaine.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

A program consisting entirely of Tschaikowsky's music will make the last pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event of unusual musical interest. The concert will take place in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 10. Mr. Monteux is compiling a program of the great Russian master's finest symphonic music. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first violoncellist.

Mr. Monteux Announces a Fragment of "Parsifal" with Chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe—Mme. Gauthier and Notable New Music — Mr. Moiseiwitsch, Able and Interesting Pianist

MEN'S voices and women's will be joined to the instrumental voices of the Symphony Orchestra at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr. Monteux has set on the programme two fragments of Wagner's opera, "Parsifal." The first, for the orchestra only, is the so-called Transformation Music that years Parisfal and Gurnemanz from the lakeside to the castle of the Grail. The second is the solemn rite of the Grail Knights, a sublimated operatic Eucharist, in which their choruses, the choruses of the esquires and the measures for boys' voices will be sung by choirs from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Dr. Davison, as choral conductor, has prepared them in the music and by recent proof of their abilities they should sing it well. Since Dr. Muck ventured the final scene of "Die Walküre" the Symphony Concerts have known no such large Wagnerian enterprise; while, of old, Mr. Monteux was able operatic conductor. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony will begin the concert. For middle piece, the conductor has chosen Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," as revised by the composer for performance two years ago. Verses of Verlaine suggested it.

On Thursday evening, with Miss Niel as assisting singer, the Symphony Orchestra will play in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge in the sixth of its current series of concerts. The program traverses Beethoven's Pastoral

---

"Euryanthe" ov
soliloquy and the b
from Berlioz's symp Juliet." Miss Niels
of Mozart—"Deh! Vi Wedding" and "E
"Don Juan."
Sunday afternoon,
phony Hall, a concer
Orchestra, with Mr.
for the profit of its programme will be dra
music of Chaikovsky w or his fifth Symphony
the town knows the n
tle of the orchestra an ductor's powers.

TRANS

Events and Com Affairs of The Harvard Glee
cliffe Choral Societ
Dr Davison, achieve earned distinction
the Symphony Orch
regular concerts.
ly sung at Pension
The Symphony C
doned for next seas
certs it has for so
nually in Philadelp
Washington. This
available for work
haps more young
more concerts in cities. Detailed an will be made later
only speculate.

Friday at 2:30 and
ton Symphony Orch
Sixth Symphony, Be Chanson," Loeffle
Music and "Graal S
fal," Wagner. The
and the Radcliffe Ch
by Dr A. T. Daviso
"Graal Scene."

GLOB

tems and Incidents
At the concert of t
tra for its Pension
Hall on Sunday afte
Burgin, the first viol
the first violoncello,
solo-pieces from Chaik
outstanding figures o
Mr. Burgin, by the part in Glazunov's C
the concert of the Sy
New York last Satur
Times said justly of h
His appearance w
pretentious; his pla
unusually excellent haps, in all respects
not expected that shall step to the f
and return to it, sh
acteristics of a pla
brilliancy and bravu
ances—but of a ma
ment in tone and
competent to interp
culties of the comp
sympathetic with its gin won much appla
of recalls.

TRANS

Philadelphia, the Bo
Attitude—Recent C
Policy—Harrison
—New Choral Pie
American Composer

SUNDRY newspa
weep aloud an abandonment b
of monthly visits to
they recount the virt
band "under Hensch
Paur, Fiedler, Muck
any mention of the large, fine and exac
teux has done. So c
ductors, they set dow
and leave him unm
excels either on eve
has outstripped th
under far more d
Similarly these new heavens the Higginso
not a word to say of guarantors who save
from war-time extin
Mr. Monteux aiding, desertion. These edit
in the "splendid reco
twenty, ten years
other the "bede-Philadelphian bauble
achievement.
In spite of these r
purpose is plain and
belittle the present es
ductor of the orchestr
final days of Dr. Muc
Mr. Monteux has many a Philadel
Philadelphians of pri
chestra bettered itse
though Mr. Mo
gradually drew near there were non
would not hea
to print, as t a strange the innuendo signal artistic orchestra, when for Philadelphi
ness considerations
public so minded. U
chestra worthily bo phia may still sleep
the comparative le
Symphony Orchest
it will give two
certs.

SYMPHONY IN MASTER FORM AGAIN

Bedetti, Cellist, Soloist —Shares Honors With Monteux

BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most brilliant of the recent concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. We do not remember any performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture so stirring as that given on this occasion, a performance which resurrected the youthful and knightly spirit of Weber, the glow of his romanticism, and the supremely imaginative music—witness the middle part of the overture—which one finds in the midst of the poorest of his scores.

BEDETTI PROVES HIMSEIF

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was soloist. He played Haydn's D major concerto, and in so doing proved himself, still a young man, not only a gifted and proficient 'cellist, but really a great musician. It was the afternoon of the orchestra, and Mr. Monteux, who again surpassed himself in the reading of Liszt's "Orpheus," of Ravel's witty and ironical "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," and in the interpretation of the poignant music which Berlioz wrote in the sections "Romeo Alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets" of the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Ravel's music is more effective—it was originally composed for piano—as arranged by the composer for orchestra. The thought of Ravel is usually made clearer and more striking when he orchestrates it, for his musical thought is intimately connected with other arts than music, and the strongly contrasting, coloristic effects of the orchestra, which he handles with a magic of his own impress, his vision on the hearer as no single instrument could.

Flirting With Flowers

The programme book tells us of the performance of these waltzes in Paris to the ballet arranged for Mme. Trouhanowa, the dancer, in April, 1912. The ballet was called "Adelaide, or the Language of Flowers," "a delightful piece of early 19th century artificiality, in high-waisted frocks and turbans and puce suits and frills. Adelaide and Loredan flirt with delicious affectation in the language of flowers throughout a ball in a violently green and blue drawing room; and fall into each other's arms at last before the balcony opening onto an impossibly blue sea after Loredan, casting at her feet a sprig of cypress to tell his despair, has placed a pistol to his temple without firing it. The same amusing artificiality is in the theme, the staging, the dancing and the music."

This outline of the ballet seems to us to furnish a better indication of the spirit of Ravel's "jeux d'esprit" than any critical or descriptive phraseology.

Berlioz and Liszt, fellow-sinners of a period when exaggeration of an emotional and pictorial kind was evident in all arts, supplemented each other yesterday—Liszt on one side, Berlioz on the other, of the sophisticated badinage of Ravel. Liszt has certainly written one of the best and most coherent tone-poems under the title of "Orpheus," but in moving intensity of utterance, in exquisite poetry, in dramatic blood, the [illegible] kindled the [illegible] mus[illegible]

hardly have been given a more eloquent performance.

Haydn's concert was delicious to the ear. It is one of the new 'cello concertos so simple and well made, so brisk, so melodious, that the 'cello does not sound cumbersome and long-winded, or the concerto a bore. Had the music been less interesting, however, Mr. Bedetti would have distinguished it by [illegible]

POST MAR. 12.

of Haydn's music. It had polish. It did not over-emphasize. Never once did the music, so to speak, step out of its frame. It kept the 18th century manner and the spirit of 18th century art, and we must candidly admit, in these days when all reviewers su[illegible]o know anything speak with [illegible]sion of 18th century art, th[illegible] of the 18th century seems [illegible] re-

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITHOUT A SYMPHONY

Varied but Interesting Program Played

Hislop, Singer, and Nicastro, Cello, Score in Joint Recital

Yesterday afternoon the Symphony concert, by exception, contained no symphony, though a single movement from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" was the concluding number of an interestingly varied program. Mr Monteux doubtless planned to dispose of as many routine items as possible in a batch when he jumbled together Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," the inevitable annual concerto for the first 'cellist, Mr Bedetti; a tone poem by Liszt, and a novelty which was not new to frequenters of piano recitals, the orchestral arrangement of Ravel's familiar "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales"; yet the result proved as attractive as many carefully arranged programs.

If one must hear a 'cello concerto, something many concert goers could live happily without, Haydn's in D major is less tiresome than most such pieces. Mr Bedetti gave a thoroughly musicianly performance, avoiding as far as possible the deadly monotony of tone color which makes all except very brief 'cello solos a weariness to the flesh. But he might have spared us at least one of the cadenzas. His mastery of his instrument is well known.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture wears far better than most routine pieces by second rate composers. The introductory theme is boisterously vital, the famous largo passage has not lost all its thrill. The performance was appropriately dramatic, but the orchestra did not keep quite together in the fugato. It must, however, be difficult at times for the players to follow Mr Monteux's somewhat indefinite beat, which, seen from the audience, appears less readily intelligible than the gesticulations of such conductors as Toscanini.

Liszt's "Orpheus," unheard since 1906, if less admirable than his "Preludes," was new to many hearers and characteristic in its harmonic and orchestral ingenuities. The performance was adequate. Berlioz' music, illustrating Romeo's first meeting with Juliet at Capulet's ball, is among his best. Mr Monteux' phrasing and accentuation might have been more subtle.

Ravel's Valses in the original piano had a motto, "The delightful and always novel pleasure of a useless occupation." The orchestral arrangement is extremely ingenious, the music thoroughly entertaining, in a sophisticated fashion. The composer has achieved all he attempted, in short.

GLOBE MAR. 12

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RAVEL AND THREE CONTRASTING "ROMANTICS"

His Super-Sophisticated Waltzes for the First Time in Boston—Ironic and Mocking Pastime—Weber, Liszt and Berlioz Variously and Familiarly—The Orchestra on Its Mettle and Mr. Bedetti Master-'Cellist

FOR the most part, romantic composers from the first half of the last century engaged Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra and their audience yesterday. Had not Mr. Bedetti's solo-piece—the Concerto for Violoncello by Haydn—intruded, the conductor would have escaped narrowly the "unified" programme of Dr. Muck's day. True, upon it were the "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes" of Ravel, as yet not ten years old, and by no means in the vein or the manner of Weber, Liszt and Berlioz. With those pieces, however, Ravel might have passed as devil's advocate at this canonization, so to say, of the "romantics." The inference is that his title for his music is designedly ironical. Nowhere are the waltzes "noble" either in content or procedure; while the chemist in tones would report hardly "a trace" of "sentiment." On the very title-page, the composer's line from Regnier about "the pleasures of useless occupation" hints mocking purpose toward "nobility" as stock pose and pompous platitude, at sentiment as giddy or treacly gush. They were such in the days when "noble" waltzes were actually written—Schumann, for example, so labels one of the divisions of his "Carneval"—when truly sentimental waltzes abounded in the music-shops and strewed the pages of "ladies' annuals." They will probably remain such until human nature is born again and in new pattern; while artists of Ravel's mind and temperament will as everlastingly gird at them.

The method of this girding is, of course, musical. The habitual maker of "noble and sentimental waltzes," say in Victorian days, sought the flatulent phrase, the pulpy period. In every detail he was pink of propriety. His chest swelled, his eye glowed—or moistened—as he released himself in tones to triple rhythm. Such pieces were Jos. Sedley's music. To this day the attentive ear may hear them echoing from the pages of "Vanity Fair." Beyond mistaking, Ravel is of another mind and manner with his waltzes—in the piano-pieces they originally were, in the version for orchestra played yesterday for the first time in Boston, as the ballet they briefly became in the Paris of 1913. From dry, precise little motivs, etched in the orchestral voices, springs his music. They are too meagre to be "noble," too prosaic to be "sentimental," and so seeming to fulfil his ironic purpose. He makes play with them and, apparently, his one desire is to avoid the resounding platitudes of "nobility," the sugared stream of "sentiment." He develops a motiv for half a moment, the waltz moves straightforwardly enough. Thereafter, at every other turn a peppery modulation, a sub-acid harmonic detail, an instrumental stroke, bitter-sweet; while throughout goes an air of light sport in dexterity and sophistry.

Ravel is never insistent upon this innuendo; to be such would be that foolish thing, the striking of an attitude. He is quite content to insinuate it; and so to achieve the antithesis of "nobility" and "sentiment"—to achieve it, most of all, perhaps, in the theatre when this music as "Adelaide or The Language of Flowers," went hand in hand with a courtesan smelling tube-roses, a noble duke laying his heart and his purse at her feet in other blossoms, a sentimental youth sighing out his amorous soul in sprigs of cypress and bunches of heliotrope. In his waltzes Ravel is dry and thin; in theirs the purveyors of "nobility" and "sentiment" were watery and rotund. They sprawled and slavered when they wrote; he is exact and elegant. They retailed pompous commonplaces of procedure; he chooses to be adeptly piquant. They smiled a large and oily smile out of the sentiment in which they fondly wallowed. He lifts an ironic eyebrow and is amused—even sighs on occasion in the waltzes a pretty tonal sigh of disillusion. Admittedly altogether sophisticated sport of the composing table, of the piano or the orchestra in the concert-hall, pastime of a certain cast of mind and temperament for kindred spirits, "caviare to the general"—and thankfully as Ravel might have whispered to himself with a glint of satisfaction. But it is his custom to assume an audience—or a few in it—as sophisticated as himself and to believe at will in the answering ironic twitch. Besides, adeptness at anything—music-making in our day included—is a pleasing game.

With reason Weber, Liszt, Berlioz seemed large-minded, warm-hearted, outspoken, when they replied with the overture to "Euryanthe," the tone-poem of "Orpheus," the soliloquy and fete from the music of "Romeo and Juliet," to this devil's advocate of super-sophistication. Well at least did two of them bear the sifting years, the change of mental and emotional attitude, the shifting fashions of life and a world that breed Ravels and Ravelian music-making. Weber still strikes fire in the impetuous ardor with which his overture begins and ends, still works fantasmal illusion in the middle measures of ghostly apparition. Heats of imagination, glow of power were in him when he wrote the preludes to his three surviving operas. He knew the brilliant, the direct means. They seem flung off—and how surely!—in a single zestful hour of concentrated creation. Ravels or no Ravels, the clang, the rush, the flare of them quicken ears and stir hearts. They are of the romantical army with banners; and when it halts and Weber would sound the note of romantical strangeness, ghostly tremor still quivers through the apparition. War-horses of the concert-hall may be these Weberian overtures, but war-horses whose manes still toss, whose hoofs yet beat.

Proof against the years, the fashions, the attitudes is also Liszt's tone-poem of "Orpheus." Agreed that the design is soaring romantic convention — Orpheus's song to sound again, the music wherewith he tamed beast, lured bird, conquered Hades, softened stocks, stones and woman's heart. Agreed that Liszt might have written it as "nobly and sentimentally" as the overblown note upon his title-page forebodes. As many of his tone-poems —or at the least many a division therein—suggest, he was quite capable of grandiose pulp and platitude, even rejoiced as he made it. Liszt, however, was far better romantic executant than romantic theorist—no poet in words but once and again poet in tones. In "Orpheus" he invents melody, gains and sustains instrumental song that hardly flag through the whole course of the tone-poem. It may not be song to summon the magic, mystery or might of Orpheus—that, probably, must ever remain aural vision uncaught, super-incarnation of the whole body and spirit of music—but it is song engrossing the ear, touching the heart, awakening illusion, unfolded and diversified in abiding beauty. "Orpheus" dates from Liszt's carnal days; yet the Liszt of "St. Elizabeth" and other pietistic baggage is nowhere so celestial as in this tone-poem of pagan legend. Oftener than some will believe—overhaunted by his pomps and platitudes—Liszt knew inspiration.

Berlioz probably believed he knew it as well, was exercising it, when he wrote his symphony of "Romeo and Juliet." Not too much of the music now survives actively; as the composer said, it is the equivalent of an opera—disembodied in the concert hall; and of those fragments Mr. Monteux played yesterday all but the "Queen Mab" music. Once more, however, "the grand fête" in Capulet's house seemed musically a dull, commonplace, noisy party much needing trappings of the stage to mask it; while even the characteristic melody of Romeo's soliloquy in the garden is losing pith and pungency. The Capulets, according to Berlioz, distinctly lacked fine taste in choice of dance-rhythms; they had clear preference for din; maybe the young Veronese "jazzed"—in a mediaeval manner—at their parties. It is the virtue of Berlioz's melody to be stripped and piercing, a fine and penetrating line. Yet time in this music of Romeo is surely wearing it thin and numb. Irony and workmanship, Ravel might say with his dry smile, getter bear this sifting than romance and exuberance. 1950 may decide.

In all these pieces, from Ravel to Berlioz and back again, conductor and orchestra excelled themselves. The overture to "Euryanthe," though the stage, even in Germany, nowadays hardly knows the opera, is music of the theatre. Therefore Mr. Monteux warmed to it, made it stride, flash and glow at beginning and end, gained in the ghostly measures a quivering, expectant hush worthy of Toscanini himself. Under the conductor's design every detail in Ravel's Waltzes—and they are almost wholly detail—fell into place; while in the playing of the orchestra few passed unnoted, unfelt. Light went the mocking rhythms; there was point in the harmonic innuendo. In turn the Capulets' orchestra considerably excelled the Capulets' music, and it was not the fault of singing wood-wind or of strings throbbing beneath that Berlioz's "Romeo," musically, seemed rather a moon-calf. Best of all, however, was the orchestra in Liszt's tone-poem, since there, for the while, it regained in instrumental song the mellow depths, surface-shimmer, lustrous transparency, mingled warmth and sensibility of an earlier but vividly remembered day. To such quality—and at the cost of what care and pains!—Mr. Monteux can now on occasion bring it. Then in truth only Mr. Stock's Chicagoans rival it in American concert halls.

As Mr. Monteux has worked to this goal, so have his forces worked with him. Of what manner of men most of these hundred are, there was proof yesterday in the quality of Mr. Bedetti, master-violoncellist. Haydn's Concerto might hardly have been played with a graver richness of tone, a serener beauty of simple pensive song than he gained in the slow movement; with a lighter bow and a brighter tone (as 'cello-tone goes) than he plied in the rhythmic give-and-take of the finale; with more exactness, elasticity and elegance upon the nearly endless figures and ornament of the Allegro. The cadenzas did but heap proof on proof of Mr. Bedetti's abilities as virtuoso. As musician equally he shone out of them since they accorded with Haydn's substance and style; while in the Adagio blended poise and poetry praised him. Not by ability only but by work the more, do these perfections come. Of such is the present spirit of Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

H. T. PARKER

Friday afternoon, March 25, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. The programme traverses Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," suggested by verses of Verlaine; and the music for the rites of the Grail in the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal." The choruses of knights, esquires and boys will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by Dr. Davison.

Saturday evening, March 26, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and the programme above printed.

TRANS. [illegible]

Easter Concert

An appropriate choral program will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next pair of concerts which, by virtue of the fact that the orchestra will be away on tour next week, will befall in Holy Week, Friday afternoon, March 25, and Saturday evening, March 26. The impressive choral music which closes the first act of "Parsifal," the transformation music and Holy Grail scene, will be conducted by Piere Monteux. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, which have been so finely trained by Dr. Archibard T. Davison of Harvard assisting.

Pension Fund Concert

The last Pension Fund concert this season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the net proceeds, as usual, to swell the fund in aid of retired musicians of the orchestra, will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30.

TRANS. MAR. 12

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Following the last tour of the orchestra, which will occupy this week, the 18th pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place on Friday afternoon, March 25, and Saturday evening, March 26. In observance of Holy Week, Mr. Monteux will conduct the Transformation music and the Holy Grail scene which closes the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal." The impressive choral portion of the music will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The program will also include Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine), and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

CONCERT NOTES

The last Pension Fund concert this season to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra for the fund in aid of retired musicians of the orchestra will take place at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30. The program will consist entirely of Russian music, including a symphony of Tschaikowsky.

HERALD MAR 18.

At the six Symphony Concerts that remain to round out the season, there will be only two "assisting artists." Both are pianists—Mr. Rubinstein and Mr. Gebhard. The one is likely to play a modern Concerto; the other will be heard in Arthur Shepherd's Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra.

TRANS. MAR 14.

A program consisting entirely of Tschaikowsky music will make the last Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, an event of unusual musical interest. It will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10.

The Transformation Music and the impressive Holy Grail Scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal," will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the next pair of Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 24 and 25.

RECORD MAR 19.

PENSION FUND CONCE

A program consisting entire the music of Tschaikowsky will m the last pension fund concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra sea an event of unusual interest. It be given at Symphony Hall on S day afternoon, April 10.

Pierre Monteux is compiling a pr gram of the great Russian maste finest symphonic music. Soloists w be Richard Burgin and Jean Bedet

FAMOUS CHOIRS AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Transformation music and H Grail scene from the first act of W ner's "Parsifal" will be perform in observance of Holy Week at Symphony concerts next Friday aft noon and Saturday evening.

The choral music will be sung the Harvard Glee Club and the Rad cliffe Choral Club. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Beethoven's "Pa toral" Symphony and Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson."

Choral Music by Symphony

The Transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the next pair of Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 24 and 25.

The choral portions of this music which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have attained such a notable degree of skill in singing under the training of Dr. Archibald T. Davison of Harvard. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, No. in F major, and Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by the poem of Verlaine.

Tschaikowsky for Pension Concert

A programme consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky will make the last pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event of unusual musical interest. It will be given at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 10.

There will be two soloists at the concert—Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Bedetti, the illustrious first cellist.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail Scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The choral portions of this music, which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have been trained by Dr. Davison of Harvard. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, No. 6, in F major, and Loeffler's orchestral poem "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by a poem of Verlaine.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

A program consisting entirely of [illegible]kowsky's music will make the [illegible] pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event [illegible] interest. The concert will take place in Symphony Hall [illegible] afternoon, April 10. Mr. Monteux [illegible] a program of the [illegible] Russian masters' finest sym[illegible]. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first violoncellist.

Mr. Monteux Announces a Fragment of "Parsifal" with Chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe—Mme. Gauthier and Notable New Music — Mr. Moiseiwitsch, Able and Interesting Pianist

MEN'S voices and women's will be joined to the instrumental voices of the Symphony Orchestra at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr Monteux has set on the programme two fragments of Wagner's opera, "Parsifal." The first, for the orchestra only, is the so-called Transformation Music that bears Parisfal and Gurnemanz from the lakeside to the castle of the Grail. The second is the solemn rite of the Grail Knights, a sublimated operatic Eucharist, in which their choruses, the choruses of the esquires and the measures for boys' voices will be sung by choirs from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Dr. Davison, as choral conductor, has prepared them in the music and by recent proof of their abilities they should sing it well. Since Dr. Muck ventured the final scene of "Die Walküre" the Symphony Concerts have known no such large Wagnerian enterprise; while, of old, Mr. Monteux was able operatic conductor. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony will begin the concert. For middle piece, the conductor has chosen Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," as revised by the composer for performance two years ago. Verses of Verlaine suggested it.

On Thursday evening, with Miss Nielsen as assisting singer, the Symphony Orchestra will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge in the sixth of its current series of concerts. The programme traverses Beethoven's Pastoral S

---

phony; Weber's Ov
"Euryanthe" and
soliloquy and the b
from Berlioz's symp Juliet." Miss Niels
of Mozart—"Deh! V Wedding" and "
"Don Juan."
Sunday afternoon,
phony Hall, a concer
Orchestra, with Mr.
for the profit of its programme will be dra
music of Chaikovsky w or his fifth Symphony
the town knows the n
tle of the orchestra an ductor's powers.

TRANS

Events and Com Affairs of

The Harvard Glee
cliffe Choral Societ
Dr Davison, achieve earned distinction
the Symphony Orch
regular concerts. T
ly sung at Pension

The Symphony C
doned for next seas
certs it has for so
nually in Philadelp
Washington. This
available for work
haps more young
more concerts in cities. Detailed an will be made later
only speculate.

Friday at 2:30 and
ton Symphony Orch
Sixth Symphony, Be
Chanson." Loeffle
Music and "Graal S
fal," Wagner. The
and the Radcliffe Ch
by Dr A. T. Daviso
"Graal Scene."

GLOB

tems and Incidents

At the concert of t
tra for its Pension
Hall on Sunday afte
Burgin, the first vio
the first violoncello,
solo-pieces from Chaik
outstanding figures o
Mr. Burgin, by the
part in Glazunov's C
the concert of the Sy
New York last Satur
Times said justly of His appearance w
pretentious; his pla
unusually excellent
haps, in all respects
not expected that shall step to the f
and return to it, sh
acteristics of a pla
brilliancy and bravu
ances—but of a ma
ment in tone and
competent to interp
culties of the comp
sympathetic with its gin won much appla
of recalls.

TRANS

Philadelphia, the Bos Attitude—Recent C of Policy—Harrison —New Choral Pie American Composer

SUNDRY newspa
weep aloud an abandonment b
of monthly visits to
they recount the virt
band "under Hensch
Paur, Fiedler, Muck
any mention of the large, fine and exa
teux has done. So c
ductors, they set dow
and leave him unn excels either on ev
has outstripped th
under far more d
Similarly these new heavens the Higginso
not a word to say o
guarantors who save
from war-time extin
Mr. Monteux aiding, desertion. These edi
in the "splendid reco ty, twenty, ten years gether the "bede-Philadelphian bauble
achievement.
In spite of these r
purpose is plain and
belittle the present es
ductor of the orchestr
final days of Dr. Muc of Mr. Monteux has many a Philadel
Philadelphians of pri
chestra bettered itse
, though Mr. Mo
gradually drew near
there were non
would not hea
to print, as t
, a strange v
the innuendo
signal artistic orchestra, when
for Philadelphi
business considerations
public so minded. U
orchestra worthily bo Philadelphia may still sleep
the comparative le
Symphony Orchest
, it will give two
certs.

TRANS M

A program consisting entire[ly of] the music of Tschaikowsky will m[ake] the last pension fund concert of t[he] Boston Symphony Orchestra sea[son] an event of unusual interest. It w[ill] be given at Symphony Hall on Sun- day afternoon, April 10.

Pierre Monteux is compiling a pro- gram of the great Russian master's finest symphonic music. Soloists wi[ll] be Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti.

FAMOUS CHOIRS AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Transformation music and Holy Grail scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed in observance of Holy Week at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The choral music will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson."

ADVERTISER MAR 20

Choral Music by Symphony

The Transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the next pair of Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 24 and 25.

The choral portions of this music, which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have attained such a notable degree of skill in singing under the training of Dr. Archibald T. Davison of Harvard. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, No. 6, in F major, and Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by the poem of Verlaine.

Tschaikowsky for Pension Concert

A programme consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky will make the last pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event of unusual musical interest. It will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10.

There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the first cellist.

POST MAR. 20

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail Scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston symphony orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The choral portions of this music, which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have been trained by Dr. Davison of Harvard. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, No. 6 in F major, and Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by a poem of Verlaine.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

A program consisting entirely of Tschaikowsky's music will make the last pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event of unusual musical interest. The concert will take place in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 10. Mr. Monteux is compiling a program of the great Russian master's finest symphonic music. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first violoncellist.

HERALD MAR

Mr. Monteux Announces a Fragment of "Parsifal" with Chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe—Mme. Gauthier and Notable New Music — Mr. Moiseiwitsch Able and Interesting Pianist

MEN'S voices and women's will be joined to the instrumental voices of the Symphony Orchestra at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr. Monteux has set on the programme two fragments of Wagner's opera, "Parsifal." The first, for the orchestra only, is the so-called Transformation Music that bears Parsifal and Gurnemanz from the lake-side to the castle of the Grail. The second is the solemn rite of the Grail Knights, in which sublimated operatic Eucharist, in their choruses, the choruses of the esquires and the measures for boys' voices will be sung by choirs from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Dr. Davison, as choral conductor, has prepared them in the music and by recent proof of their abilities they should sing it well. Since Dr. Muck ventured the final scene of "Die Walküre" the Symphony Concerts have known no such large Wagnerian enterprise; while, of old, Mr. Monteux was able operatic conductor. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony will begin the concert. For middle piece, the conductor has chosen Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," as revised by the composer for performance two years ago. Verses of Verlaine suggested it.

On Thursday evening, with Miss Nielsen as assisting singer, the Symphony Orchestra will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge in the sixth of its current concerts. The program

---

...hony; Weber's Overture to his Opera, "Euryanthe" and Romeo's orchestral soliloquy and the ball at the Capulets' from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." Miss Nielsen will sing two airs of Mozart—"Deh! Vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti Batti!" from "Don Juan."

Sunday afternoon, April 10, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting for the profit of its Pension Fund. The programme will be drawn wholly from the music of Chalkovsky with either his fourth or his fifth Symphony included. Already the town knows the newer and finer mettle of the orchestra and applauds the conductor's powers.

TRANS. MAR

Events and Comments About Affairs of Current Interest

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both trained by Dr Davison, achieve this week the well earned distinction of appearing with the Symphony Orchestra at a pair of regular concerts. They have previously sung at Pension Fund concerts only.

The Symphony Orchestra has abandoned for next season the series of concerts it has for some years given annually in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. This means more time available for work nearer home, perhaps more young people's concerts and more concerts in other New England cities. Detailed announcement of plans will be made later until then one can only speculate.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra; 19th program. Sixth Symphony, Beethoven; "La Bonne Chanson," Loeffler; Transformation Music and "Graal Scene" from "Parsifal," Wagner. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr A. T. Davison, will assist in the "Graal Scene."

GE MAR

Items and Incidents

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, Mr. Burgin, the first violin, and Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, will both be heard in solo-pieces from Chalkovsky. They are the outstanding figures of the string choir.

Mr. Burgin, by the way, played the solo-part in Glazunov's Concerto for Violin at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York last Saturday afternoon. The Times said justly of him:

> His appearance was unassuming, unpretentious; his playing was that of an unusually excellent musician, not, perhaps, in all respects of a virtuoso—it is not expected that a concert master shall step to the front from his desk and return to it, showing all the characteristics of a player devoted to the brilliancy and bravura of solo performances—but of a master of his instrument in tone and technique, wholly competent to interpret all the difficulties of the composition and quite sympathetic with its spirit. Mr. Burgin won much applause and a number of recalls.

TRANS. MAR. 21

Philadelphia, the Boston Orchestra and an Attitude—Recent Comment on a Change of Policy—Harrison Potter the Promising—New Choral Pieces Impending from American Composers

SUNDRY newspapers in Philadelphia weep aloud and in public over the abandonment by the Boston Orchestra of monthly visits to that city. At length they recount the virtues and glories of the band "under Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler, Muck," but stop short at any mention of the recuperative work—large, fine and exacting—that Mr. Monteux has done. So calling the roll of conductors, they set down a Fiedler or a Paur and leave him unmentioned, though he excels either on every score, though he has outstripped them in achievement under far more difficult circumstance. Similarly these newspapers extol to the heavens the Higginsonian régime and have not a word to say of the trustees and the guarantors who saved the orchestra first from war-time extinction and then, with Mr. Monteux aiding, from dissolution under desertion. These editorial articles wallow in the "splendid record" of the band thirty, twenty, ten years ago; they string together the "bede-roll"—whatever that Philadelphian bauble may be—of ancient achievement.

In spite of these rhetorical veilings, the purpose is plain and smug and mean—to belittle the present estate, the present conductor of the orchestra. Of such from the final days of Dr. Muck to the present days of Mr. Monteux has been the disposition of many a Philadelphian, especially the Philadelphians of print. Though the orchestra bettered itself monthly in their ears, though Mr. Monteux both held and gradually drew near to the old standards, yet there were none so deaf as those who would not hear. Meanwhile they put to print, as they are putting it now, a strange verbiage, of which only the innuendo was clear, about "the signal artistic lustral period" of the orchestra, when "it meant everything for Philadelphia." With reason—business considerations aside—it is quitting a public so minded. Undisturbed by a new orchestra worthily born of an old, Philadelphia may still sleep snug—and deaf.

H. T. P.

In the comparative leisure of April, when the Symphony Orchestra makes few journeys, it will give two more young people's concerts.

TRANS. MAR

BEETHOVEN AND MR. MONTEUX AT CAMBRIDGE

An Unheard Symphony of Sibelius in Prospect—Mr. Kreisler and the Harvard Glee Club—Summer Operetta for Boston—Pizzetti's Sonata Again—Newly Published Songs of Palmgren—Items, Incidents, Impressions

THE most interesting incident of the Symphony Concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening, was the performance—the first that Mr. Monteux has given here—of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. The remaining numbers were culled from recent Boston programmes, even to the two arias of Mozart sung by Miss Alice Nielsen. In its one hundredth and thirteenth year of existence the Pastoral can be variously appraised. Thematically and structurally—in short, as absolute music—it falls below all the other symphonies of Beethoven, save the first and perhaps the second, but its programme, naïve as it seems in these days of descriptive and delineative music, gives it a borrowed interest, and for the most part the piece makes diverting entertainment. Only the introductions to "Die Walküre" and "Otello" have surpassed in effectiveism, and even in realism, the storm-music and this, and the movements of gaiety and rejoicing which precede and follow it are today the freshest portion of the symphony. Both the serene and reflective opening and the succeeding "Scene by the Brook-side"—once rated a masterpiece of naturalistic music—now seem monotonous and over-long. Each clings too closely to its "centre key" and its characteristic figuration. Mr. Monteux's "reading" of the symphony is admirable. He avoids dangerous slowness of pace in the Andante, he makes the tempest vivid and dramatic and the music as a whole luminous and supple.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and "Romeo Alone; Grand Fête at the Capulets" from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," completed the purely orchestral part of the concert, and Miss Nielsen's songs were the Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Juan." Last evening Miss Nielsen's voice seemed tired, her tones at times a little "edged," but she sang with her accustomed skill, with the purity of style that Mozart's music demands. As to the songs themselves, the former, one of the most beautiful of Mozart's melodies, has best withstood the years; heard dispassionately, "Batti, Batti"—famed though it is and widely popular—seems now over-ingenuous, almost insipid and as inappropriate to the words that prompted it as anything in Donizetti. No doubt there are many who still take pleasure in this Overture of Weber with its sonorous and effective instrumentation, its rhetoric, its "fat" tune, its measures of unearthly quietness. At least Weber knew what he wished to do, and he accomplished his end unhesitatingly. But Berlioz, more richly endowed and less thoroughly, less severely schooled, daring greatly, dreaming ecstatically, sometimes struck fire and sometimes lost himself in mere fritterings and empty clatter. There are better things in his "Romeo and Juliet" than this music of the hall and of the solitary Romeo.

W. S. S.

Programmes in Prospect

The first and second symphonies of Sibelius have been played often in Boston; the baffling fourth has been heard occasionally; the composer himself will bring the new fifth next autumn. The third has been generally overlooked by conductors; but it pleases Mr. Monteux, and at the Symphony Concerts of next week it will be the outstanding item of the programme. Beethoven's Fourth Concerto (in G major) for Piano and Orchestra, with Arthur Rubinstein in the solo-part, and Mr. Chadwick's overture, "Melpomene," are the other numbers.

Mr. Monteux has also assembled the programme for the concert of Chaikovsky's music at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, for the increase of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. It comprises his Fifth Symphony (in E minor) unheard here for long, his "Italian Caprice" and "Slavic March"; the first movement of his Concerto for Violin and his Rococo Variations for Violoncello. In the Concerto and the Variations, Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti of the string choir will play the solo-parts.

TRANS. MAR. 25

CHORUSES SING WITH SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Assist in "Parsifal"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave its 19th programme of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony"; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" after Verlaine, and the transformation music and closing scene from act one of Wagner's "Parsifal." This scene was performed with the assistance of a chorus of male and female voices selected from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and coached for this performance by their leader, Dr. Archibald Davison, of the music department of Harvard University.

LEADER APPLAUDS AUTHOR

Astonishing was the appeal made by Beethoven's symphony to the audience. It was applauded for minutes after the performance. After many years a master symphonist's early attempt at impressionism was fresh and eloquent. The performance was sympathetic in spirit and finished in detail. The tempo of the second movement, "Scene by the Brookside," was not too slow, as it often has been. On the other hand, the tempo of the next movement was a trifle too fast.

Only the last movement seemed over-long yesterday. But over all was the great spirit of Beethoven and the very fragrance of nature.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem had also a very enthusiastic reception. From his conductor's stand Mr. Monteux applauded the composer, while the composer from his seat in the audience applauded Mr. Monteux and his men for their excellent performance, and finally rose twice to acknowledge the applause. For us this symphonic poem, after repeated hearings, is too long and too rich in ideas. There is with the musician, as well as the poet, the thought of a certain unusual form. "As the poem of Verlaine"—we quote from the programme book—"is a theme with interruption, so the musical paraphrase may be described as variants of a theme, with corresponding interruptions."

Luxuriance of Detail

This plan is followed out with notable mastery of harmonic and instrumental color, with constant ingenuity and invention, and an exquisite sense of beauty, but for us it makes the music too episodic. If such a composer as Mr. Loeffler cannot follow the form of Verlaine's poem with the most successful results in his musical structure, then we are convinced that this procedure is almost a practical impossibility in the musical art. Inevitably, there is luxuriance, and impediment, of detail. The final climax is anticipated.

The thread of the narrative becomes a little tangled. Directness of development is thus impaired.

With these important reservations—as a matter of personal opinion on the part of the writer—it may be said that Mr. Loeffler's music is of rare beauty and imagination, if not of sufficiently simple and architectural line.

Music From "Parsifal"

The music from "Parsifal" was played with glorious virtuosity by the orchestra and in a devotional spirit on the part of Mr. Monteux. The performance of the singers, while there was not the ideal tonal balance, reflected credit on the work of Dr. Davison and on the earnestness and talent of the chorus. Correct balance would be hard to get under any such circumstances. A foot of difference in the precise distance of the boys' voices—these parts being taken by women's voices—from the stage, would make a change of sonority. The men standing back of the orchestra sang rather too loudly and hence with an inevitable coarseness of tone out of place in this music. In the opera house it would not have been too loud.

The audience liked the performance. Many were deeply moved. They thought of the opera and its mystical name, and of the season of the year, and what was not in the score was in the feelings with which they listened to it. We are writing a reviewer's retrospect of a concert. This reviewer must say, in common honesty, that he has always considered much of "Parsifal" rather poor music. The music has lacked, to him, the force, the beauty, the sincerity, of other of Wagner's music dramas. The religiosity of "Parsifal" does not ring wholly true in his ears. It is too subtle and self-conscious. It is mixed up with too many philosophic qualities, as it was the product of a strangely variegated set of ideas on the part of the composer. Also, to this reviewer, there is an over-use of the same musical motives, tiresome in the concert room. He was glad to hear the last of it.

In the opera house an extremely impressive scene makes the music expressive if only by association. In the concert hall this music does not belong. The orchestral music of the "Good Friday Spell" would have been a hundred times better and in place.

In the first place, it is more inspired and less worked over and drawn out. In the second place, it sounds to infinitely better advantage in a hall. In the third place, there is not that crazy quilt of motives, repeated to the limit of physical and mental endurance, associated with these personages and principles on the stage. In the fourth place, the concert was too long by half an hour.

POST MAR. 26

Two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in Greater Boston.

A splendid program, consisting entirely of the music of Tchaikowsky, has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for performance by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10th, at 3.30.

RECORD. MAR 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ANTICIPATION, BELIED AND ALSO EXCEEDED

Fragments of "Parsifal" Fail Under Unescapable Conditions to Work Illusion—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony Reborn in Fresh Delights—The Paradox of Mr. Loeffler's Tone-Poem, "La Bonne Chanson"

AS the run of the Symphony Concert went yesterday afternoon the piece and the performance that had raised expectation fell below it; while the piece and the performance that might have passed as routine excelled anticipation. Rarely is so ample a fragment of an opera by Wagner set in Symphony Hall as the "Transformation-Music" and the "Grail Scene" from the first act of "Parsifal." To the orchestra it added choirs from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, summoned for the first time to a "regular" Symphony Concert; it was boon to an operaless city; it reillumined the halo that for many an ear and imagination still circles Wagner's "consecrational festival-play." With reason, expectation rose high. It was disappointed because, as soon appeared, such music of the theatre loses illusion under conditions of the concert-hall, however eloquently sung and played there.

On the other hand, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony is a "repertory piece" of as long standing as are the years of the orchestra. Time and again, it has come and gone in relatively routine performance—conductor and band at ease of work, audience at ease of pleasure. Once and again even such comfortable performance has been marred by too willing acceptance of ready-made conventions. It pleased Mr. Monteux to restudy this music with fresh eye and ear; to impart it for itself regardless of "the tradition;" to put the orchestra to its mettle. The outcome of this wisdom and energy was a performance that made the Pastoral Symphony bloom anew. The fanciful listener heard it—it was pleasant to believe—as it sounded a hundred-odd years ago in a Vienna to which it was "new: first time." Between Beethoven and Wagner, Mr. Loeffler, warmly applauded by a public that has long set him high, had place with "La Bonne Chanson," tone-poem to verses of Verlaine, first heard in revised version two years and more ago. Again the music made mixed impression. Not a few measures seemed over-long and over-elaborate for the poet's, if not composer's design; while as many more stirred by beauty of suggestion and power of delineation.

The fragment of "Parsifal" left anticipation unfulfilled because, in large part, the rites of the Grail depend for illusion upon unescapable and untransferable conditions of the theatre. The briefer "Transformation-Music" is, fortunately, more independent of them. It is the orchestral interlude, to which the old knight, Gurnemanz, leads Parsifal from the demesne of the Grail within the sanctuary. Of old it sounded against moving scenery; now, by common consent of opera-houses the world over, that undeceptive background is left to imagination. The music is largely, richly, sonorously written; it moves in grave progress. Within it, mystery, suspense, exaltation rise gradually until it shivers into chime of nearing bells. Throughout it approximates "absolute" music. It was well played yesterday, though Mr. Monteux, absorbed, seemingly, in detail of motiv and euphony, might have plied an ampler eloquence.

Of other nature and circumstance is the music of the succeeding rite. The stage discloses the shadowed sanctuary of Holy Cup and Holy Lance, isolated shrine deep within the castle. Gaunt and time-stained frescoes look from the walls; above shines the sunlit azure of the dome; bathed in white glow is the Holy Table. Knights, esquires, boyish servitors defile in long, slow-paced line, threaded with the red and white of their mantles. The bread, the wine, pass become as the body and blood of Jesus. Holy canticles rise from knightly throats; high in the dome boys' voices make ethereal answer. There is music of solemn ceremony, holy hymn, mounting ecstasy, descending benediction. As nearly as he dared, as nearly as he could, Wagner sought and achieved a mystical operatic Eucharist.

Within the theatre, music, action, picture make the audience like to Parsifal on the stage—moved, mystified, spectator in presence of holy rite and rhapsody. In the concert-hall, only the music engages the company—one element, even if it be the most considerable, in the whole illusion. It is heard, moreover, from an uncovered orchestra; whereas Wagner designed it for an orchestra within an enclosed pit. The change, sensitive as Mr. Monteux was to it, seems to coarsen texture and timbres. The music of ritual tends to become a music of subdued pageantry; the celestial glow, the ethereal tremor, sound less as spiritual aspiration, touched with divine benediction. Upon the stage, again, high in the dome sing youth and boys. In Symphony Hall, these voices were but set behind the platform, sounding on the same plane as the voices of the knightly choir—no doubt an unescapable procedure, yet fatal to illusion of remote and gleaming height. Throughout, the orchestra played with no little beauty and fineness of tone, at moments with loveliness of soft accent and melting euphony. Mr. Monteux was operatic conductor expert with means, sensitive to ends. The visible singers from the Harvard Glee Club, sonorous of tone, ample and rounded of phrase, precise and elastic of rhythm, struck both the chivalric and the churchly note in the canticles of the knights. The invisible singers from the Radcliffe Choral society, still a little abashed by the exacting intervals of the music within the dome, conveyed a measure of its mystical voice of bliss. Both Mr. Monteux and Dr. Davison, as leaders of orchestra and choirs, had evidently done their utmost. Through no fault of theirs enfolding, transporting illusion came not, as it usually comes in the theatre. It was absent because Wagner, to compass it, fused inextricably with the music all the factors of his stage.

Ample amends was the performance of the Pastoral Symphony. Fancy it, of all the symphonies of Beethoven, except, possibly, the Eighth, making new sensation upon a practised audience in March of 1921, a round 112 years after it came first into the world! Far was Mr. Monteux, and far he kept the orchestra, from the routine that needs another symphony of Beethoven, takes down the Pastoral, runs through it once or twice by way of preparation for perfunctory or Stranskian performance. He read it as with brightening eyes; he heard it as with kindling ears; he played it as though the composer had laid it, treasure trove, only the other day, upon his doorstep. Best of all, he comprehended it with sympathetic imagination, transmitted it with true divination.

Monsieur d'Indy may be as solemn as two owls about "the tranquillity of Beethoven's soul in the presence of Nature"; for it is the prime business of his Beethoven to be as much as possible like that same Monsieur d'Indy. Yet what is the beginning of the Pastoral Symphony but a glinting, tripping, gay-spirited operetta-tune—Beethoven lightly glad, sportively merry? Precisely so Mr. Monteux paced, phrased, rhythmed the music, and it was delight again. Lightly he subdued it as the playfulness softens into musing. Into the second movement the conductor carried this sunny, pensive mood. Not once did he cloud it with thick sentimentality; not once did he turn Beethoven, alive with quick-coming fancies, into dawdling moon-calf. The arabesques of the wood-winds smiled out the tonal web; the whole music went limpidly, songfully, in gentle sparkle. Beethoven could be homely and homely were the rhythms, the quality of tone to which the conductor animated and charactered the Scherzo. Stravinsky himself could hardly have made the piping oboe, the grumbling bassoon more individual.

Usually twentieth-century audiences listen to Beethoven's tonal thunder-shower with the smile of sophisticated condescension. Mr. Monteux, penetrating the simplicity of the composer's means, made it ominous, restless, disturbing. As he had made the first movement gay, so once the shepherd's song had been gently sung, he kept the Finale jolly. Scrape away the crust of "tradition," rub away sentimental smear, put by pious posturings—in other words, search Beethoven's score— and is not this Pastoral Symphony of Mr. Monteux the veritable Pastoral Symphony? Back to Beethoven went Mr. Toscanini with the Seventh Symphony, and there was new thrill manifold in the music. Back to Beethoven goes Mr. Monteux with the Pastoral and the music is as full of new delight. Sometimes "the tradition" is as superfluous as it is solemn.

The fifth poem, "Avant que tu ne t'en Ailles," of Verlaine's slender volume, "La Bonne Chanson," is a simple little poem. Twenty short lines is the span of it; terse and bare are the words, albeit artfully joined and modulated; as direct is the imagery. The world stirs to the tremors of the dawn; the lover's heart stirs with the tremors of desire. The sun rises; shines also love. Thrice familiar course of French lyric poetry, minded to link the motions and the moods of nature with the stirrings and the sensations of love; thrice familiar inspiration, as well, to Gallic composers and composers of kindred mind and temperament. Upon these simple verses as slender foundation Mr. Loeffler has reared a complex and elaborate tone-poem. The design is the treatment of a single motiv—tremor of earth, tremor of longing—in successive variation with digression here and digression there, until the whole music shall concentrate itself into climax of risen sun, into gentler postlude of amorous, expectant ardor. Fulfilling this purpose, Mr. Loeffler writes measure after measure of meditated harmonies, page after page of adroit, imaginative play with instrumental voices. Variant succeeds variant in the progress of the motiv through an intricate music. A "bonne chanson" becomes almost a "grande chanson."

The censorious might reproach the composer with a prolix, an overweighted music. Enough to repeat that through many a moment, especially in the middle measures, it seems over-long and over-elaborate, a piece of too recondite invention and procedure. Keener upon memory, more characteristic of the Loeffler of other tone-poems, of the symphony, of the memorial string-quartet, are incidental play of imagination, incidental use of incisive delineative means. The prelude of the tremulous world in the pallor that is interlude between fading night and flushing dawn touches beauty. The postlude of the lover's gentle, deep and quivering desire no less attains it. Flashes of detail, as in the tonal beam through the orchestra in answer to the first beam of the sun; tremors that thread its choirs like fleck of morning song or rustle of dewy leaf; transitions from idyllic to amorous mood pierce the hearing ear, cut deep into answering vision or emotion. Mr. Loeffler is no maker of paradoxes, but such parts of his "Bonne Chanson" much outweigh the whole.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR 26.

Sunday afternoon, April 10, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting, for the profit of its Pension Fund. The programme will be drawn wholly from the music of Chaikovsky—his Fifth Symphony of the songful slow movement; his "Italian Caprice" and "Slavic March"; his first movement of his Concerto for Violin, with Mr. Burgin in the solo-part, and his Rococo Variations for Violoncello, with Mr. Bedetti as soloist. They are the twin glories of the present string-choir. Already the town knows the newer and finer mettle of the orchestra and applauds the conductor's powers.

TRANS. MAR 2

PENSION FUND CONCER

A program consisting entirely the music of Tschaikowsky will mak the last pension fund concert of th Boston Symphony Orchestra seaso an event of unusual interest. It wi be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10.

Pierre Monteux is compiling a program of the great Russian master finest symphonic music. Soloists wi be Richard Burgin and Jean Bedett

---

FAMOUS CHOIRS AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Transformation music and Holy Grail scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed in observance of Holy Week at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The choral music will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson."

ADVER

Choral Music by Symphony

The Transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the next pair of Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 24 and 25.

The choral portions of this music, which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have attained such a notable degree of skill in singing under the training of Dr. Archibald T. Davison of Harvard. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, No. 6, in F major, and Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by the poem of Verlaine.

Tschaikowsky for Pension Concert

A programme consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky will make the last pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event of unusual musical interest. It will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10.

There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first cellist.

POST

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The transformation music and the impressive Holy Grail Scene from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will be performed by the Boston symphony Orchestra in observance of Holy Week at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The choral portions of this music, which are sung both on and off stage, thus representing the near and distant choirs of the ceremony, will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have been trained by Dr. Davison of Harvard. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, No. 6, in F major, and Loeffler's orchestral poem, "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by a poem of Verlaine.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

A program consisting entirely of Tschaikowsky's music will make the last pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season an event of unusual musical interest. The concert will take place in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 10. Mr. Monteux is compiling a program of the great Russian master's finest symphonic music. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first violoncellist.

HERALD

Mr. Monteux Announces a Fragment of "Parsifal" with Chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe—Mme. Gauthier and Notable New Music — Mr. Moiseiwitsch, Able and Interesting Pianist

MEN'S voices and women's will be joined to the instrumental voices of the Symphony Orchestra at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr. Monteux has set on the programme two fragments of Wagner's opera, "Parsifal." The first, for the orchestra only, is the so-called Transformation Music that bears Parisfal and Gurnemanz from the lake-side to the castle of the Grail. The second is the solemn rite of the Grail Knights, a sublimated operatic Eucharist, in which their choruses, the choruses of the esquires and the measures for boys' voices will be sung by choirs from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Dr. Davison, as choral conductor, has prepared them in the music and by recent proof of their abilities they should sing it well. Since Dr. Muck ventured the final scene of "Die Walküre" the Symphony Concerts have known no such large Wagnerian enterprise; while, of old, Mr. Monteux was able operatic conductor. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony will begin the concert. For middle piece, the conductor has chosen Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," as revised by the composer for performance two years ago. Verses of Verlaine suggested it.

On Thursday evening, with Miss Nielsen as assisting singer, the Symphony Orchestra will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge in the sixth of its current series of concerts. The programme [illegible] Beethoven's Pastoral [illegible]

---

phony; Weber's Overture to his Opera, "Euryanthe" and Romeo's orchestral soliloquy and the ball at the Capulets' from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." Miss Nielsen will sing two airs of Mozart—"Deh! Vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti Batti!" from "Don Juan."

Sunday afternoon, April 10, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting for the profit of its Pension Fund. The programme will be drawn wholly from the music of Chaikovsky with either his fourth or his fifth Symphony included. Already the town knows the newer and finer mettle of the orchestra and applauds the conductor's powers.

[illegible]

Events and Comments About Affairs of Current Interest

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both trained by Dr Davison, achieve this week the well earned distinction of appearing with the Symphony Orchestra at a pair of regular concerts. They have previously sung at Pension Fund concerts only.

The Symphony Orchestra has abandoned for next season the series of concerts it has for some years given annually in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. This means more time available for work nearer home, perhaps more young people's concerts and more concerts in other New England cities. Detailed announcement of plans will be made later until then one can only speculate.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra; 19th program. Sixth Symphony, Beethoven; "La Bonne Chanson," Loeffler; Transformation Music and "Graal Scene" from "Parsifal," Wagner. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr A. T. Davison, will assist in the "Graal Scene."

Items and Incidents

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, Mr. Burgin, the first violin, and Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, will both be heard in solo-pieces from Chaikovsky. They are the outstanding figures of the string choir.

Mr. Burgin, by the way, played the solo-part in Glazunov's Concerto for Violin at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York last Saturday afternoon. The Times said justly of him:

> His appearance was unassuming, unpretentious; his playing was that of an unusually excellent musician, not, perhaps, in all respects of a virtuoso—it is not expected that a concert master shall step to the front from his desk and return to it, showing all the characteristics of a player devoted to the brilliancy and bravura of solo performances—but of a master of his instrument in tone and technique, wholly competent to interpret all the difficulties of the composition and quite sympathetic with its spirit. Mr. Burgin won much applause and a number of recalls.

Philadelphia, the Boston Orchestra and an Attitude—Recent Comment on a Change of Policy—Harrison Potter the Promising—New Choral Pieces Impending from American Composers

SUNDRY newspapers in Philadelphia weep aloud and in public over the abandonment by the Boston Orchestra of monthly visits to that city. At length they recount the virtues and glories of the band "under Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler, Muck," but stop short at any mention of the recuperative work—large, fine and exacting—that Mr. Monteux has done. So calling the roll of conductors, they set down a Fiedler or a Paur and leave him unmentioned, though he excels either on every score, though he has outstripped them in achievement under far more difficult circumstance. Similarly these newspapers extol to the heavens the Higginsonian régime and have not a word to say of the trustees and the guarantors who saved the orchestra first from war-time extinction and then, with Mr. Monteux aiding, from dissolution under desertion. These editorial articles wallow in the "splendid record" of the band thirty, twenty, ten years ago; they string together the "bede-roll"—whatever that Philadelphian bauble may be—of ancient achievement.

In spite of these rhetorical veilings, the purpose is plain and smug and mean—to belittle the present estate, the present conductor of the orchestra. Of such from the final days of Dr. Muck to the present days of Mr. Monteux has been the disposition of many a Philadelphian, especially the Philadelphians of print. Though the orchestra bettered itself monthly in their ears, though Mr. Monteux both held and gradually drew near to the old standards, yet there were none so deaf as those who would not hear. Meanwhile they put to print, as they are putting it now, a strange verbiage, of which only the innuendo was clear, about "the signal artistic lustral period" of the orchestra, when "it meant everything for Philadelphia." With reason—business considerations aside—it is quitting a public so minded. Undisturbed by a new orchestra worthily born of an old, Philadelphia may still sleep snug—and deaf.

H. T. P.

In the comparative leisure of April, when the Symphony Orchestra makes few journeys, it will give two more young people's concerts.

TRANS. MA

BEETHOVEN AND MR. MONTEUX AT CAMBRIDGE

An Unheard Symphony of Sibelius in Prospect—Mr. Kreisler and the Harvard Glee Club—Summer Operetta for Boston—Pizzetti's Sonata Again—Newly Published Songs of Palmgren—Items, Incidents, Impressions

THE most interesting incident of the Symphony Concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening, was the performance—the first that Mr. Monteux has given here—of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. The remaining numbers were culled from recent Boston programmes, even to the two arias of Mozart sung by Miss Alice Nielsen. In its one hundredth and thirteenth year of existence the Pastoral can be variously appraised. Thematically and structurally—in short, as absolute music—it falls below all the other symphonies of Beethoven, save the first and perhaps the second, but its programme, naïve as it seems in these days of descriptive and delineative music, gives it a borrowed interest, and for the most part the piece makes diverting entertainment. Only the introductions to "Die Walküre" and "Otello" have surpassed in effectiveism, and even in realism, the storm-music and this, and the movements of gaiety and rejoicing which precede and follow it are today the freshest portion of the symphony. Both the serene and reflective opening and the succeeding "Scene by the Brook-side"—once rated a masterpiece of naturalistic music—now seem monotonous and over-long. Each clings too closely to its "centre key" and its characteristic figuration. Mr. Monteux's "reading" of the symphony is admirable. He avoids dangerous slowness of pace in the Andante, he makes the tempest vivid and dramatic and the music as a whole luminous and supple.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and "Romeo Alone; Grand Fête at the Capulets" from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," completed the purely orchestral part of the concert, and Miss Nielsen's songs were the Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Juan." Last evening Miss Nielsen's voice seemed tired, her tones at times a little "edged," but she sang with her accustomed skill, with the purity of style that Mozart's music demands. As to the songs themselves, the former, one of the most beautiful of Mozart's melodies, has best withstood the years; heard dispassionately, "Batti, Batti"—famed though it is and widely popular—seems now over-ingenuous, almost insipid and as inappropriate to the words that prompted it as anything in Donizetti. No doubt there are many who still take pleasure in this Overture of Weber with its sonorous and effective instrumentation, its rhetoric, its "fat" tune, its measures of unearthly quietness. At least Weber knew what he wished to do, and he accomplished his end unhesitatingly. But Berlioz, more richly endowed and less thoroughly, less severely schooled, daring greatly, dreaming ecstatically, sometimes struck fire and sometimes lost himself in mere fritterings and empty clatter. There are better things in his "Romeo and Juliet" than this music of the hall and of the solitary Romeo.

W. S. S.

Programmes in Prospect

The first and second symphonies of Sibelius have been played often in Boston; the baffling fourth has been heard occasionally; the composer himself will bring the new fifth next autumn. The third has been generally overlooked by conductors; but it pleases Mr. Monteux, and at the Symphony Concerts of next week it will be the outstanding item of the programme. Beethoven's Fourth Concerto (in G major) for Piano and Orchestra, with Arthur Rubinstein in the solo-part, and Mr. Chadwick's overture, "Melpomene," are the other numbers.

Mr. Monteux has also assembled the programme for the concert of Chaikovsky's music at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, for the increase of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. It comprises his Fifth Symphony (in E minor) unheard here for long, his "Italian Caprice" and "Slavic March"; the first movement of his Concerto for Violin and his Rococo Variations for Violoncello. In the Concerto and the Variations, Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti of the string choir will play the solo-parts.

TRANS. MAR. 25

CHORUSES SING WITH SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Assist in "Parsifal"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave its 19th programme of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony"; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" after Verlaine, and the transformation music and closing scene from act one of Wagner's "Parsifal." This scene was performed with the assistance of a chorus of male and female voices selected from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and coached for this performance by their leader, Dr. Archibald Davison, of the music department of Harvard University.

LEADER APPLAUDS AUTHOR

Astonishing was the appeal made by Beethoven's symphony to the audience. It was applauded for minutes after the performance. After many years a master symphonist's early attempt at impressionism was fresh and eloquent. The performance was sympathetic in spirit and finished in detail. The tempo of the second movement, "Scene by the Brookside," was not too slow, as it often has been. On the other hand, the tempo of the next movement was a trifle too fast.

Only the last movement seemed over-long yesterday. But over all was the great spirit of Beethoven and the very fragrance of nature.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem had also a very enthusiastic reception. From his conductor's stand Mr. Monteux applauded the composer, while the composer from his seat in the audience applauded Mr. Monteux and his men for their excellent performance, and finally rose twice to acknowledge the applause. For us this symphonic poem, after repeated hearings, is too long and too rich in ideas. There is with the musician, as well as the poet, the thought of a certain unusual form. "As the poem of Verlaine"—we quote from the programme book—"is a theme with interruption, so the musical paraphrase may be described as variants of a theme, with corresponding interruptions."

Luxuriance of Detail

This plan is followed out with notable mastery of harmonic and instrumental color, with constant ingenuity and invention, and an exquisite sense of beauty, but for us it makes the music too episodic. If such a composer as Mr. Loeffler cannot follow the form of Verlaine's poem with the most successful results in his musical structure, then we are convinced that this procedure is almost a practical impossibility in the musical art. Inevitably, there is luxuriance, and impediment, of detail. The final climax is anticipated.

The thread of the narrative becomes a little tangled. Directness of development is thus impaired.

With these important reservations—as a matter of personal opinion on the part of the writer—it may be said that Mr. Loeffler's music is of rare beauty and imagination, if not of sufficiently simple and architectural line.

Music From "Parsifal"

The music from "Parsifal" was played with glorious virtuosity by the orchestra and in a devotional spirit on the part of Mr. Monteux. The performance of the singers, while there was not the ideal tonal balance, reflected credit on the work of Dr. Davison and on the earnestness and talent of the chorus. Correct balance would be hard to get under any such circumstances. A foot of difference in the precise distance of the boys' voices—these parts being taken by women's voices—from the stage, would make a change of sonority. The men standing back of the orchestra sang rather too loudly and hence with an inevitable coarseness of tone out of place in this music. In the opera house it would not have been too loud.

The audience liked the performance. Many were deeply moved. They thought of the opera and its mystical name, and of the season of the year, and what was not in the score was in the feelings with which they listened to it. We are writing a reviewer's retrospect of a concert. This reviewer must say, in common honesty, that he has always considered much of "Parsifal" rather poor music. The music has lacked, to him, the force, the beauty, the sincerity, of other of Wagner's music dramas. The religiosity of "Parsifal" does not ring wholly true in his ears. It is too subtle and self-conscious. It is mixed up with too many philosophic qualities, as it was the product of a strangely variegated set of ideas on the part of the composer. Also, to this reviewer, there is an overuse of the same musical motives, tiresome in the concert room. He was glad to hear the last of it.

In the opera house an extremely impressive scene makes the music expressive if only by association. In the concert hall this music does not belong. The orchestral music of the "Good Friday Spell" would have been a hundred times better and in place.

In the first place, it is more inspired and less worked over and drawn out. In the second place, it sounds to infinitely better advantage in a hall. In the third place, there is not that crazy quilt of motives, repeated to the limit of physical and mental endurance, associated with these personages and principles on the stage. In the fourth place, the concert was too long by half an hour.

POST MAR. 26

Two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in Greater Boston.

A splendid program, consisting entirely of the music of Tchaikowsky, has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for performance by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10th, at 3.30.

RECORD. MAR 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ANTICIPATION, BELIED AND ALSO EXCEEDED

Fragments of "Parsifal" Fail Under Unescapable Conditions to Work Illusion—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony Reborn in Fresh Delights—The Paradox of Mr. Loeffler's Tone-Poem, "La Bonne Chanson"

AS the run of the Symphony Concert went yesterday afternoon the piece and the performance that had raised expectation fell below it; while the piece and the performance that might have passed as routine excelled anticipation. Rarely is so ample a fragment of an opera by Wagner set in Symphony Hall as the "Transformation-Music" and the "Grail Scene" from the first act of "Parsifal." To the orchestra it added choirs from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, summoned for the first time to a "regular" Symphony Concert; it was boon to an operaless city; it reillumined the halo that for many an ear and imagination still circles Wagner's "consecrational festival-play." With reason, expectation rose high. It was disappointed because, as soon appeared, such music of the theatre loses illusion under conditions of the concert-hall, however eloquently sung and played there.

On the other hand, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony is a "repertory piece" of as long standing as are the years of the orchestra. Time and again, it has come and gone in relatively routine performance—conductor and band at ease of work, audience at ease of pleasure. Once and again even such comfortable performance has been marred by too willing acceptance of ready-made conventions. It pleased Mr. Monteux to restudy this music with fresh eye and ear; to impart it for itself regardless of "the tradition;" to put the orchestra to its mettle. The outcome of this wisdom and energy was a performance that made the Pastoral Symphony bloom anew. The fanciful listener heard it—it was pleasant to believe—as it sounded a hundred-odd years ago in a Vienna to which it was "new: first time." Between Beethoven and Wagner, Mr. Loeffler, warmly applauded by a public that has long set him high, had place with "La Bonne Chanson," tone-poem to verses of Verlaine, first heard in revised version two years and more ago. Again the music made mixed impression. Not a few measures seemed over-long and over-elaborate for the poet's, if not composer's design; while as many more stirred by beauty of suggestion and power of delineation.

The fragment of "Parsifal" left anticipation unfulfilled because, in large part, the rites of the Grail depend for illusion upon unescapable and untransferable conditions of the theatre. The briefer "Transformation-Music" is, fortunately, more independent of them. It is the orchestral interlude, to which the old knight, Gurnemanz, leads Parsifal from the demesne of the Grail within the sanctuary. Of old it sounded against moving scenery; now, by common consent of opera-houses the world over, that undeceptive background is left to imagination. The music is largely, richly, sonorously written; it moves in grave progress. Within it, mystery, suspense, exaltation rise gradually until it shivers into chime of nearing bells. Throughout it approximates "absolute" music. It was well played yesterday, though Mr. Monteux, absorbed, seemingly, in detail of motiv and euphony, might have plied an ampler eloquence.

Of other nature and circumstance is the music of the succeeding rite. The stage discloses the shadowed sanctuary of Holy Cup and Holy Lance, isolated shrine deep within the castle. Gaunt and time-stained frescoes look from the walls; above shines the sunlit azure of the dome; bathed in white glow is the Holy Table. Knights, esquires, boyish servitors defile in long, slow-paced line, threaded with the red and white of their mantles. The bread, the wine, pass become as the body and blood of Jesus. Holy canticles rise from knightly throats; high in the dome boys' voices make ethereal answer. There is music of solemn ceremony, holy hymn, mounting ecstasy, descending benediction. As nearly as he dared, as nearly as he could, Wagner sought and achieved a mystical operatic Eucharist.

Within the theatre, music, action, picture make the audience like to Parsifal on the stage—moved, mystified, spectator in presence of holy rite and rhapsody. In the concert-hall, only the music engages the company—one element, even if it he the most considerable, in the whole illusion. It is heard, moreover, from an uncovered orchestra; whereas Wagner designed it for an orchestra within an enclosed pit. The change, sensitive as Mr. Monteux was to it, seems to coarsen texture and timbres. The music of ritual tends to become a music of subdued pageantry; the celestial glow, the ethereal tremor, sound less as spiritual aspiration, touched with divine benediction. Upon the stage, again, high in the dome sing youth and boys. In Symphony Hall, these voices were but set behind the platform, sounding on the same plane as the voices of the knightly choir—no doubt an unescapable procedure, yet fatal to illusion of remote and gleaming height. Throughout, the orchestra played with no little beauty and fineness of tone, at moments with loveliness of soft accent and melting euphony. Mr. Monteux was operatic conductor expert with means, sensitive to ends. The visible singers from the Harvard Glee Club, sonorous of tone, ample and rounded of phrase, precise and elastic of rhythm, struck both the chivalric and the churchly note in the canticles of the knights. The invisible singers from the Radcliffe Choral society, still a little abashed by the exacting intervals of the music within the dome, conveyed a measure of its mystical voice of bliss. Both Mr. Monteux and Dr. Davison, as leaders of orchestra and choirs, had evidently done their utmost. Through no fault of theirs enfolding, transporting illusion came not, as it usually comes in the theatre. It was absent because Wagner, to compass it, fused inextricably with the music all the factors of his stage.

Ample amends was the performance of the Pastoral Symphony. Fancy it, of all the symphonies of Beethoven, except, possibly, the Eighth, making new sensation upon a practised audience in March of 1921, a round 112 years after it came first into the world! Far was Mr. Monteux, and far he kept the orchestra, from the routine that needs another symphony of Beethoven, takes down the Pastoral, runs through it once or twice by way of preparation for perfunctory or Stranskian performance. He read it as with brightening eyes; he heard it as with kindling ears; he played it as though the composer had laid it, treasure trove, only the other day, upon his doorstep. Best of all, he comprehended it with sympathetic imagination, transmitted it with true divination.

Monsieur d'Indy may be as solemn as two owls about "the tranquillity of Beethoven's soul in the presence of Nature"; for it is the prime business of his Beethoven to be as much as possible like that same Monsieur d'Indy. Yet what is the beginning of the Pastoral Symphony but a glinting, tripping, gay-spirited operetta-tune—Beethoven lightly glad, sportively merry? Precisely so Mr. Monteux paced, phrased, rhythmed the music, and it was delight again. Lightly he subdued it as the playfulness softens into musing. Into the second movement the conductor carried this sunny, pensive mood. Not once did he cloud it with thick sentimentality; not once did he turn Beethoven, alive with quick-coming fancies, into dawdling moon-calf. The arabesques of the wood-winds smiled out the tonal web; the whole music went limpidly, songfully, in gentle sparkle. Beethoven could be homely and homely were the rhythms, the quality of tone to which the conductor animated and charactered the Scherzo. Stravinsky himself could hardly have made the piping oboe, the grumbling bassoon more individual.

Usually twentieth-century audiences listen to Beethoven's tonal thunder-shower with the smile of sophisticated condescension. Mr. Monteux, penetrating the simplicity of the composer's means, made it ominous, restless, disturbing. As he had made the first movement gay, so once the shepherd's song had been gently sung, he kept the Finale jolly. Scrape away the crust of "tradition," rub away sentimental smear, put by pious posturings—in other words, search Beethoven's score— and is not this Pastoral Symphony of Mr. Monteux the veritable Pastoral Symphony? Back to Beethoven went Mr. Toscanini with the Seventh Symphony, and there was new thrill manifold in the music. Back to Beethoven goes Mr. Monteux with the Pastoral and the music is as full of new delight. Sometimes "the tradition" is as superfluous as it is solemn.

The fifth poem, "Avant que tu ne t'en Ailles," of Verlaine's slender volume, "La Bonne Chanson," is a simple little poem. Twenty short lines is the span of it; terse and bare are the words, albeit artfully joined and modulated; as direct is the imagery. The world stirs to the tremors of the dawn; the lover's heart stirs with the tremors of desire. The sun rises; shines also love. Thrice familiar course of French lyric poetry, minded to link the motions and the moods of nature with the stirrings and the sensations of love; thrice familiar inspiration, as well, to Gallic composers and composers of kindred mind and temperament. Upon these simple verses as slender foundation Mr. Loeffler has reared a complex and elaborate tone-poem. The design is the treatment of a single motiv—tremor of earth, tremor of longing—in successive variation with digression here and digression there, until the whole music shall concentrate itself into climax of risen sun, into gentler postlude of amorous, expectant ardor. Fulfilling this purpose, Mr. Loeffler writes measure after measure of meditated harmonies, page after page of adroit, imaginative play with instrumental voices. Variant succeeds variant in the progress of the motiv through an intricate music. A "bonne chanson" becomes almost a "grande chanson."

The censorious might reproach the composer with a prolix, an overweighted music. Enough to repeat that through many a moment, especially in the middle measures, it seems over-long and over-elaborate, a piece of too recondite invention and procedure. Keener upon memory, more characteristic of the Loeffler of other tone-poems, of the symphony, of the memorial string-quartet, are incidental play of imagination, incidental use of incisive delineative means. The prelude of the tremulous world in the pallor that is interlude between fading night and flushing dawn touches beauty. The postlude of the lover's gentle, deep and quivering desire no less attains it. Flashes of detail, as in the tonal beam through the orchestra in answer to the first beam of the sun; tremors that thread its choirs like fleck of morning song or rustle of dewy leaf; transitions from idyllic to amorous mood pierce the hearing ear, cut deep into answering vision or emotion. Mr. Loeffler is no maker of paradoxes, but such parts of his "Bonne Chanson" much outweigh the whole.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR 26.

Sunday afternoon, April 10, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting, for the profit of its Pension Fund. The programme will be drawn wholly from the music of Chaikovsky—his Fifth Symphony of the songful slow movement; his "Italian Caprice" and "Slavic March"; his first movement of his Concerto for Violin, with Mr. Burgin in the solo-part, and his Rococo Variations for Violoncello, with Mr. Bedetti as soloist. They are the twin glories of the present string-choir. Already the town knows the newer and finer mettle of the orchestra and applauds the conductor's powers.

TRANS MAR 26

A Neglected Symphony of Sibelius from Mr. Monteux—Two Afternoons for Young People and the Symphony Orchestra—Miss Novaes Anew—Miss Ponselle for the First Time—Impending Recitals

TWO Symphonies by Sibelius have not yet been heard in Boston—the new fifth, lately played in London, which the composer will probably bring over-seas next year; the older third to which conductors have usually preferred the first, the second or even the baffling fourth. These three are relatively familiar to the public of the Symphony Concerts. To them next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will add the third, of which more will be written within a few days in this place. The middle piece for the two concerts is Beethoven's Fourth Concerto (in G major) for piano and orchestra with Arthur Rubinstein to play the solo part. The Concerto rivals, if it does not excel, the more celebrated Fifth; while Mr. Rubinstein needs no heralding as expert and eloquent pianist. Mr. Chadwick's long overlooked overture, "Melpomene"—the muse of tragedy—rounds out the programme.

Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will return to their concerts for young people on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons next, at four o'clock in Symphony Hall. The same short and vivid pieces will be heard at both concerts—the March from Saint-Säens's "Algerian Suite;" the slow movement from Haydn's "Surprise Symphony;" three Norwegian Dances by Grieg; a German Dance with sleigh-bells from Mozart; the long-drawn song from Chaikovsky's string quartet (Op. 11) as arranged for full string orchestra; and the overture to Rossini's opera, "William Tell." All the tickets for Thursday and nearly all for Tuesday have been distributed through the schools. If any remain untaken, they will be on sale at the box office of Symphony Hall, next Monday.

TRANS. MAR 26.

Rubenstein Next Soloist

Arthur Rubinstein, after his long absence abroad, has returned to this country and will be heard as soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 1 and 2, in Symphony Hall.

TRAV. MAR. 26.

HARVARD GLEE CLUB ASSISTS SYMPHONY

Students from Radcliff[illegible] Also Join in Chorus Music From "Parsifal"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, deviated from its custom, observed for many years past, of holding the afternoon concert of Holy Week on Thursday instead of on Good Friday. As in previous years, however, the program included an excerpt from Wagner's "Parsifal," with the added feature this year of the assistance of the Harvard Glee and Radcliffe Choral Clubs.

The program in full was as follows: Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and the Holy Grail music from "Parsifal," in which the student clubs sang the vocal passages.

A beautiful and stately program, the solemnity of which was relieved by the unique beauty of Mr. Loeffler's piece. The "Chanson" was a joy to hear, both for its inherent and haunting appeal and for the masterly performance given by the players under Mr. Monteux. It was also a pleasure to hear the well-trained student choir in the Wagner number, still popularly regarded as the ne plus ultra in music of "sacred" character, and wonderfully thrilling to those who find in it other and more poignant qualities.

The performance of both orchestra and singers was admirable, and was appreciated in full measure by the audience. Few concerts of this season have made so deep an impression.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Two concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in Greater Boston.

The tickets for these concerts are being distributed through the schools and settlements of Boson. A few seats for the Tuesday concert may be left over after this distribution. If such is the case, these will be placed on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall, beginning Monday morning, March 28, at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no tax.

The program for both concerts follows:

Saint-Saens. March from the "Alegrian Suite"
Haydn—Andante from the Symphony in G major, "Surprise."
Grieg..............Three Norwegian Dances
Tschaikowsky — Adante Cantabile from the String Quartet, Op. 11.
Mozart.....German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride"
Rossini..........Overture to "William Tell"

AMER. MAR. 26

COLLEGE SINGERS ASSIST ORCHESTRA

Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses in "Parsifal"

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Loeffler's Poem Given

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisted at yesterday's Symphony concert in the performance of a condensed version of the closing scene of act 1 of Wagner's "Parsifal," in commemoration of Good Friday. Dr Davison led the girls, whose voices replaced the boys Wagner wrote for, off stage. Mr Monteux conducted the Harvard men, who were placed just behind the orchestra, on the stage.

The choruses sang with accuracy and imagination. They had been more rigidly drilled than the orchestra, which did its part in rather perfunctory fashion. The music demands a more sensuous tone than that of the girls' voice yesterday, despite Wagner's directions to the contrary. It is intrinsically more passionate than celestial. The men made their attacks a bit too crisp and sharp and chopped off their phrases without rounding the edges of them.

Mr Monteux deserves hearty congratulations on the excellent performance of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which he has never conducted here before. The surprising improvement made by the orchestra during the present season in precision and tone quality is largely due to his patient effort in the face of many serious difficulties.

For once a familiar classic called forth no regretful comparisons with performances before the war in the listener's mind. The "Scene by the Brookside" in particular has never seemed more imaginatively poetic than it did yesterday. Much of this symphony is of the Beethoven that no other composer has yet been able to imitate. There is in all music nothing more perfect than the theme of the "Shepherd's song" as it first enters.

Mr Loeffler was obliged to rise in his place in the balcony and bow repeatedly after the eloquent performance of his "La Bonne Chanson." This piece, suggested by the fifth poem in Verlaine's little volume and not by the whole cycle, as the title would lead one to suppose, was first heard here in 1902, then more accurately called "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles." The present revised version was played in 1918. The music is overcarefully written, often turgid and labored, but with moments of rare beauty. As a whole it fails to reproduce the morbid delicacy of Verlaine's poem.

Next week Arthur Rubinstein will play Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. The other numbers are Sibelius' Third Symphony, and Mr Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture.

GLOBE MAR. 26

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Loeffler's Poem Given Between Beethoven and Wagner Yesterday

COLLEGE CHORUS AID IN "PARSIFAL"

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Loeffler, Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Transformation Music and Closing Scene from Act I of "Parsifal." The orchestra was assisted in the performance of Wagner's music by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, which had been well trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison.

There was a remarkably fine performance of the Symphony; the most beautiful, the most appealing we have ever heard. As a rule, this symphony is anticipated with dread: Many conductors take it too seriously, laboriously, lead it with a heavy hand; they are often unfortunate in the choice of tempi, and so the hearer is bored, not yawning visibly out of respect to Beethoven or fearing lest a neighbor may frown on him, regarding him coldly, counting him disrespectful, irreverent, no doubt a dissolute person. But yesterday the Symphony was indeed pastoral, light hearted, something more than a fearsome length relieved only by the little ornithological passage in which nightingale, quail, and cuckoo are neatly imitated; at least, it is fair to suppose this: we have never heard the nightingale sing. Jean Cocteau, in his amusing little book, full of aphroisms, designed to make the bourgeois sit up, says that the nightingale sings badly. So we must not be unduly prejudiced by praise of the bird coming from Milton, Matthew Arnold and other poetical enthusiasts. Yesterday there was a thunderstorm, a tempest to use the good country term that has come down from Shakespeare and before him. How admirably Mr. Monteux interpreted this section of the Symphony, which is often a laughable little shower, hardly warranting a spread umbrella or a flight to shelter. How charming the first two movements as played yesterday by the superb orchestra! To borrow the Host's characterization of Master Fenton, the Symphony yesterday smelt April and May.

Singularly euphonious and also eloquent was the performance of Mr. Loeffler's poem, which is truly a poem, whereas certain musical compositions so entitled might be described as vers libre—too free—or as pedestrian prose. It is based, as all know, on a charming little lyric of Varlaines. There is genuine lyrical spirit in Mr. Loeffler's work, there is warmth, there is passion, an abiding sense of beauty; needless to say, mastery of technic is displayed throughout. While the music is generally lyrical there are moments when the composer in his rhapsodic plight leads one to forget the simplicity, the naivete of Varlaine's verse. If there is any adverse criticism to be made, one might say that there is at times over-elaboration; over-conscientiousness in the treatment of details. The audience was fully appreciative of the music and the performance. Mr. Loeffler acknowledged the long-continued applause.

The performance of Wagner's music impressed the audience. To some "Parsifal" is a "sacred" work, on account of the communion scene and the Good Friday Spell. As a matter of fact, the communion scene depends largely for its effect on the stage setting, the stage management and theatrical devices, such as putting the choir of boys aloft, so that their voices come as from high above—celestial voices. In the year of the production at Bayreuth, 1882, this scene was memorable, and so for some years afterward until the Widow Cosima and the ambitious young Siegfried made up their minds that they knew how "Parsifal" should be performed better than the spouse and father. The music itself suffers necessarily when it is taken from Bayreuth and performed in an ordinary opera house. It suffers still more when it is performed in a concert hall. As a concert performance that of yesterday was creditable. At Bayreuth in 1882 we heard bells out-of-tune, if not jangled, nor was the intonation of the boys in the dome invariably pure.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Chadwick, "Melpomene" overture; Sibelius, Symphony No. 3 (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Piano Concerto in G major, No. 4 (Arthur Rubinstein, pianist).

HERALD MAR. 26

RUBINSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Arthur Rubinstein, who has returned to this country in the full maturity of his powers will be heard as soloist at the next Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. He will play with the orchestra Beethoven's piano concerto in G. major, No. 4. Mr. Monteux will conduct at the same concerto the Third Symphony of Sibelius in C major. This will be the first performance of this work in Boston, although the First, Second and Fourth Symphonies by the Finnish composer have often been played and applauded at these concerts. The remaining number will be Chadwick's Dramatic Overture "Melmomene."

TSCHAIKOWSKY

A program, consisting entirely of music of Tschaikowsky, has been arranged by Mr. Monteux for performance by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the first movement of the Violin Concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the first violoncellist, who will be heard in the Rococo Variations. The remaining orchestral numbers will be the Italian Caprice and the "Marche Slave."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Two concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Mr. Monteux, will be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in greater Boston.

The tickets for these concerts are being distributed through the schools a[illegible] settlements of Boston. A few seat[illegible] the Tuesday concert may be [illegible] after this distribution. If such [illegible] case, these will be placed on [illegible] the box office, Symphony Hall, [illegible]ning tomorrow (Monday), at the [illegible]inal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no t[illegible]

The program for both concerts is [illegible] follows:

Saint-Saens—March from the "Algerian Suite."
Haydn—Andante from the Symphony in G major, "Surprise."
Grieg—Three Norwegian Dances
Tschaikowsky — Andante Cantabile from the String Quartet, Op. 11.
Mozart—German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride"
Rossini—Overture to "William Tell."

HERALD. MAR. 27

Rubinstein Symphony Soloist

Some years ago Arthur Rubinstein, then a mere boy, played with notable skill at a concert in Boston. After a long absence abroad he has returned to this country in the full maturity of his powers and will be heard as soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 1 and 2, in Symphony Hall. He will play with the Orchestra Beethoven's great pianoforte concerto in G major, No. 4.

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same pair of concerts the Third Symphony of Sibelius in C major. This will be the first performance of this work in Boston, although the first, second and fourth symphonies by this noted Finnish composer have often been played and applauded at these concerts.

The remaining number will be George W. Chadwick's dramatic overture, "Melmomene."

POST MAR. 27.

Sibelius' Third Symphony

Mr. Monteux Offers an Unheard Symphony of an Extremely Unusual and Forceful Composer

Mr. Monteux plays Sibelius' third symphony this week, a symphony which has not yet been heard in Boston. It is in three movements. It gives, from a superficial perusal of the score, a curious sense of incompleteness. Perhaps it is wrong to warn the reader that both by the opinion of reviewers of other cities who have heard the work, and also by one's own impressions of the printed page, this is the weakest of the four symphonies in which Sibelius has struck a completely new note in modern music, a note of well-nigh fabulous force, imagination and elemental color.

Sibelius has not had since the days of Fiedler and Muck the representation that such a composer should have had in Boston. Mr. Monteux has played the first symphony. The second is greater, romantic and fascinating in its Nordic spirit as the first symphony is. He now plays the third, which should be heard, for it is not known here, and every note by this Finnish master should be carefully scrutinized. The fourth, which we have not heard since the days of Muck, is the most original of all the Sibelius symphonies known in Boston. It is a new school of composition in itself, or would be a new school were not Sibelius a man of all men to abhor schools and abhor the slavish set of followers and imitators which even great modern composers have in some instances been willing to have about them. As it is the most original of these symphonies, it is also, perhaps the most difficult to fully understand and it should be heard at least every other season. Eventually it will be, for in spite of the fact that the grimness the power, the savage splendor of Sibelius shock and make uneasy many respectable citizens of this thrice respectable community, he will come into his own, as must every composer who produces living art.

Mr. Monteux should play not only the third symphony of Sibelius. He should again play the second, a work which in its long lines and its sinewy form represents the apex of Sibelius earliest period. He should play, in addition to the ultra-modern fourth symphony, the early symphonic poem, "En Saga"; the symphonic poem, "Pohjola's Daughter," one of the most beautiful pieces of northern impressionism we know; the singular "Nightrise and Sunrise" the "Oceanidee." And there are smaller works of Sibelius not known here, some of them in the Boston Symphony library.

He is the most incredible of modern composers. Yes, more incredible even than Richard Strauss in his "Thus Spake Zarathustra," or the still more incredible "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" of Debussy. Let us not be misunderstood. We don't mean that Sibelius is necessarily the greatest of these three composers. He is most incredible. He is incredible because of the manner in which he emerges from the north, a giant of a far gone, heroic, antique past. No one living in America can possibly understand how such a composer can exist today. His music is a saga. It is a tale of great deeds of yore, of things supernatural which confronted the fathers of men, of a pagan past which—thank the Christian God—still smoulders under northern snows. Other composers are of today. Debussy's fantasy of the faun is pagan, antique if you like, but it is the antiquity of a very high civilization, a thousand years more modern, two thousand years ago, than that of the north, which snows and fastnesses have apparently, in the person of Sibelius, preserved.

Sibelius is no intellectual like Strauss, and still less is he the representative of centuries of a marvellous culture, like Debussy. He has no sophistication, as have both the other men. He is primeval. He has the magnificent, lowering gloom of the north, and a heroic stride which had long disappeared from any art. Looking back, he was the only man whose music, before 1914, rumbled and reverberated war-red war. This note, so stern, so terrible, in the music of perhaps the one man we know whose expression is supremely touching and yet utterly devoid of the note of sex, appears in a retrospect so prophetic that one wonders, after all, if any composers, simple or sophisticated, know what they are writing about. One wonders if the spirit of the old heroic north did not elevate itself to some height from which it could view the acts, the thoughts and the soul of the whole world, and then, descending again to earth, send out its message in the person of this Sibelius, whose name, anyhow, is a symphony of sweet sounds.

We know, in the modern musical art, of no sterner rebuke to prevalent superficiality and foolishness than this legendary music of a Finn.

Why has no manager toured Sibelius in America? He can conduct. We have heard him. Carl Stoeckel, who directs and maintains the festivals of music, unique in the whole world, given each June on his own estate at Norfolk, Conn., invited Sibelius to compose an orchestral work and conduct this work, with other of his own compositions, at the Norfolk festival of 1913. The invitation resulted in the composition of the "Oceanidee," previously mentioned in this article, a fantasy of the ocean, with three successive and stupendous climaxes, each one greater than the other, like the crash of so many waves, and in the appearance of Sibelius himself as conductor. Never shall we forget that occasion. It was necessary to perform some short things, and so there were heard two or three comparatively trivial compositions of Sibelius—the pieces with which he is principally associated in the popular mind, the "Valse triste," and "Finlandia." Also the early symphonic poem, "The Swan of Tuonela," also "Pohjola's Daughter." Sibelius, by no means a virtuoso conductor, but on the contrary a composer with something to say, took up the baton and simply wove a spell. The "Valse triste" was positively sublimated in his hands. Its melancholy was no longer cheap. It searched the very soul, and when the composer turned around to bow it was as if he had still before his eyes the scene in the theatre to which this waltz was conceived as accompaniment—the dying mother, recalling her youthful days, rising slowly and dancing with unseen companions of her youth. Or who that was present could forget "Finlandia," as it was then heard? It fairly exploded. After the growling introduction, the music of the awakening revolt, the motive of the movement proper was hurled from the orchestra like a ball from a cannon, and at the end a very polite and highly cultured audience rose as one man, or woman, and shouted. Sibelius, himself, was tremendous—not tall, in fact, a little below average height, but so broad at the shoulders that he seemed as big as three. But his face, at the same time with the force, almost animal, of the lower jaw, is gentle. It is the face of a strong man, a man who would be easily led by his illusions or those in whom he had faith, and a dreamer. For once, the man looked like his music, and for once, meeting a great composer, one was not disappointed in his personal character.

Sibelius has been conducting in London. He should come over on a tour and make his compositions known and understood here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it will curtail its concerts in other big cities than Boston, principally owing to a growing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony from cities near Boston, and also because of the very great expense of travel in these days. Baltimore and Philadelphia are cities affected.

It is noticeable that in spite of the belief which seemed to exist in many quarters, even in this city, that only German conductors could conduct symphony orchestras, Mr. Monteux's labors are at least reaching their reward—even in the city of New York, where for some reason not easily to be explained by the impressions of a dweller in Boston, the critics have been most adversely critical of his efforts. New York reviewers observe the increasing excellence of the orchestra. They are still reluctant to admit Mr. Monteux's exceptional qualifications as a conductor, which are so apparent here that one is forced to conclude that either Mr. Monteux conducts entirely differently in New York than he conducts here, or that all music reviewers in Boston are foolish and ignorant, or else that all reviewers in New York deserve some such proud designation. In Philadelphia, farewelling the departing Boston orchestra, they even take pains to dwell on the great past of the orchestra up to and including the Muck regime, and to ignore completely the things the orchestra has done since. Well, these things break no bones. No one is hurt, unless owing to the future absence of the Boston players—Philadelphia!

Young People's Concerts

Two concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock; for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in Greater Boston.

The tickets for these concerts are being distributed through the schools and settlements of Boston. A few seats for the Tuesday concert may be left over after this distribution. If such is the case, these will be placed on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall, beginning tomorrow (Monday) at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no tax.

Tschaikowsky Programme

A splendid programme, consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky, has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for performances by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor by the great Russian master. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the first movement of the Violin Concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first 'cellist, who will be head in the Rococo Variations. The remaining orchestral numbers will be the Italian Caprice and the "Marche Slave."

POST MAR. 27

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor. Richard Burgin, concertmaster, will play the first movement of the violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti 'cellist, will be heard in the "Rococo Variations." The other numbers will be the "Italian Caprice" and the "Marche Slave."

ADVERTISER. MA[illegible]

A Neglected Symphony of Sibelius from Mr. Monteux—Two Afternoons for Young People and the Symphony Orchestra—Miss Novaes Anew—Miss Ponselle for the First Time—Impending Recitals

TWO Symphonies by Sibelius have not yet been heard in Boston—the new fifth, lately played in London, which the composer will probably bring over-seas next year; the older third to which conductors have usually preferred the first, the second or even the baffling fourth. These three are relatively familiar to the public of the Symphony Concerts. To them next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will add the third, of which more will be written within a few days in this place. The middle piece for the two concerts is Beethoven's Fourth Concerto (in G major) for piano and orchestra with Arthur Rubinstein to play the solo part. The Concerto rivals, if it does not excel, the more celebrated Fifth; while Mr. Rubinstein needs no heralding as expert and eloquent pianist. Mr. Chadwick's long overlooked overture, "Melpomene"—the muse of tragedy—rounds out the programme.

Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will return to their concerts for young people on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons next, at four o'clock in Symphony Hall. The same short and vivid pieces will be heard at both concerts—the March from Saint-Säens's "Algerian Suite;" the slow movement from Haydn's "Surprise Symphony;" three Norwegian Dances by Grieg; a German Dance with sleigh-bells from Mozart; the long-drawn song from Chaikovsky's string quartet (Op. 11) as arranged for full string orchestra; and the overture to Rossini's opera, "William Tell." All the tickets for Thursday and nearly all for Tuesday have been distributed through the schools. If any remain untaken, they will be on sale at the box office of Symphony Hall, next Monday.

TRANS. MAR 26.

Rubenstein Next Soloist

Arthur Rubinstein, after his long absence abroad, has returned to this country and will be heard as soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 1 and 2, in Symphony Hall.

TRAV. MAR. 26.

HARVARD GLEE CLUB ASSISTS SYMPHONY

Students from Radcliff Also Join in Chorus Music From "Parsifal"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, deviated from its custom, observed for many years past, of holding the afternoon concert of Holy Week on Thursday instead of on Good Friday. As in previous years, however, the program included an excerpt from Wagner's "Parsifal," with the added feature this year of the assistance of the Harvard Glee and Radcliffe Choral Clubs.

The program in full was as follows: Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and the Holy Grail music from "Parsifal," in which the student clubs sang the vocal passages.

A beautiful and stately program, the solemnity of which was relieved by the unique beauty of Mr. Loeffler's piece. The "Chanson" was a joy to hear, both for its inherent and haunting appeal and for the masterly performance given by the players under Mr. Monteux. It was also a pleasure to hear the well-trained student choir in the Wagner number, still popularly regarded as the ne plus ultra in music of "sacred" character, and wonderfully thrilling to those who find in it other and more poignant qualities.

The performance of both orchestra and singers was admirable, and was appreciated in full measure by the audience. Few concerts of this season have made so deep an impression.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Two concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in Greater Boston.

The tickets for these concerts are being distributed through the schools and settlements of Boson. A few seats for the Tuesday concert may be left over after this distribution. If such is the case, these will be placed on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall, beginning Monday morning, March 28, at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no tax.

The program for both concerts follows:

Saint-Saens. March from the "Alegrian Suite"
Haydn—Andante from the Symphony in G major, "Surprise."
Grieg............Three Norwegian Dances
Tschaikowsky.—Adante Cantabile from the String Quartet, Op. 11.
Mozart.......German Dance, "The Sleigh Ri
Rossini.........Overture to "William Tell

AMER. MAR. 26

COLLEGE SINGERS ASSIST ORCHESTRA

Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses in "Parsifal"

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Loeffler's Poem Given

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisted at yesterday's Symphony concert in the performance of a condensed version of the closing scene of act 1 of Wagner's "Parsifal," in commemoration of Good Friday. Dr Davison led the girls, whose voices replaced the boys Wagner wrote for, off stage. Mr Monteux conducted the Harvard men, who were placed just behind the orchestra, on the stage.

The choruses sang with accuracy and imagination. They had been more rigidly drilled than the orchestra, which did its part in rather perfunctory fashion. The music demands a more sensuous tone than that of the girls' voice yesterday, despite Wagner's directions to the contrary. It is intrinsically more passionate than celestial. The men made their attacks a bit too crisp and sharp and chopped off their phrases without rounding the edges of them.

Mr Monteux deserves hearty congratulations on the excellent performance of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which he has never conducted here before. The surprising improvement made by the orchestra during the present season in precision and tone quality is largely due to his patient effort in the face of many serious difficulties.

For once a familiar classic called forth no regretful comparisons with performances before the war in the listener's mind. The "Scene by the Brookside" in particular has never seemed more imaginatively poetic than it did yesterday. Much of this symphony is of the Beethoven that no other composer has yet been able to imitate. There is in all music nothing more perfect than the theme of the "Shepherd's song" as it first enters.

Mr Loeffler was obliged to rise in his place in the balcony and bow repeatedly after the eloquent performance of his "La Bonne Chanson." This piece, suggested by the fifth poem in Verlaine's little volume and not by the whole cycle, as the title would lead one to suppose, was first heard here in 1902, then more accurately called "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles." The present revised version was played in 1918. The music is overcarefully written, often turgid and labored, but with moments of rare beauty. As a whole it fails to reproduce the morbid delicacy of Verlaine's poem.

Next week Arthur Rubinstein will play Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. The other numbers are Sibelius' Third Symphony, and Mr Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture.

GLOBE MAR 26

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Loeffler's Poem Given Between Beethoven and Wagner Yesterday

COLLEGE CHORUS AID IN "PARSIFAL"

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Loeffler, Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Transformation Music and Closing Scene from Act I of "Parsifal." The orchestra was assisted in the performance of Wagner's music by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, which had been well trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison.

There was a remarkably fine performance of the Symphony; the most beautiful, the most appealing we have ever heard. As a rule, this symphony is anticipated with dread: Many conductors take it too seriously, laboriously, lead it with a heavy hand; they are often unfortunate in the choice of tempi, and so the hearer is bored, not yawning visibly out of respect to Beethoven or fearing lest a neighbor may frown on him, regarding him coldly, counting him disrespectful, irreverent, no doubt a dissolute person. But yesterday the Symphony was indeed pastoral, light hearted, something more than a fearsome length relieved only by the little ornithological passage in which nightingale, quail, and cuckoo are neatly imitated; at least, it is fair to suppose this: we have never heard the nightingale sing. Jean Cocteau, in his amusing little book, full of aphroisms, designed to make the bourgeois sit up, says that the nightingale sings badly. So we must not be unduly prejudiced by praise of the bird coming from Milton, Matthew Arnold and other poetical enthusiasts. Yesterday there was a thunderstorm, a tempest to use the good country term that has come down from Shakespeare and before him. How admirably Mr. Monteux interpreted this section of the Symphony, which is often a laughable little shower, hardly warranting a spread umbrella or a flight to shelter. How charming the first two movements as played yesterday by the superb orchestra! To borrow the Host's characterization of Master Fenton, the Symphony yesterday smelt April and May.

Singularly euphonious and also eloquent was the performance of Mr. Loeffler's poem, which is truly a poem, whereas certain musical compositions so entitled might be described as vers libre—too free—or as pedestrian prose. It is based, as all know, on a charming little lyric of Varlaines. There is genuine lyrical spirit in Mr. Loeffler's work, there is warmth, there is passion, an abiding sense of beauty; needless to say, mastery of technic is displayed throughout. While the music is generally lyrical there are moments when the composer in his rhapsodic plight leads one to forget the simplicity, the naivete of Varlaine's verse. If there is any adverse criticism to be made, one might say that there is at times over-elaboration; over-conscientiousness in the treatment of details. The audience was fully appreciative of the music and the performance. Mr. Loeffler acknowledged the long-continued applause.

The performance of Wagner's music impressed the audience. To some "Parsifal" is a "sacred" work, on account of the communion scene and the Good Friday Spell. As a matter of fact, the communion scene depends largely for its effect on the stage setting, the stage management and theatrical devices, such as putting the choir of boys aloft, so that their voices come as from high above—celestial voices. In the year of the production at Bayreuth, 1882, this scene was memorable, and so for some years afterward until the Widow Cosima and the ambitious young Siegfried made up their minds that they knew how "Parsifal" should be performed better than the spouse and father. The music itself suffers necessarily when it is taken from Bayreuth and performed in an ordinary opera house. It suffers still more when it is performed in a concert hall. As a concert performance that of yesterday was creditable. At Bayreuth in 1882 we heard bells out-of-tune, if not jangled, nor was the intonation of the boys in the dome invariably pure.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Chadwick, "Melpomene" overture; Sibelius, Symphony No. 3 (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Piano Concerto in G major, No. 4 (Arthur Rubinstein, pianist).

HERALD MAR 26

RUBINSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Arthur Rubinstein, who has returned to this country in the full maturity of his powers will be heard as soloist at the next Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. He will play with the orchestra Beethoven's piano concerto in G. major, No. 4. Mr. Monteux will conduct at the same concerto the Third Symphony of Sibelius in C major. This will be the first performance of this work in Boston, although the First, Second and Fourth Symphonies by the Finnish composer have often been played and applauded at these concerts. The remaining number will be Chadwick's Dramatic Overture "Melmomene."

TSCHAIKOWSKY

A program, consisting entirely of music of Tschaikowsky, has been arranged by Mr. Monteux for performance by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the first movement of the Violin Concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the first violoncellist, who will be heard in the Rococo Variations. The remaining orchestral numbers will be the Italian Caprice and the "Marche Slave."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Two concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Mr. Monteux, will be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in greater Boston.

The tickets for these concerts are being distributed through the schools a settlements of Boston. A few seat the Tuesday concert may be l after this distribution. If such case, these will be placed on the box office, Symphony Hall, ning tomorrow (Monday), at the inal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no t. The program for both concerts is follows:

Saint-Saens—March from the "Algerian Suite."
Haydn—Andante from the Symphony in G major, "Surprise."
Grieg—Three Norwegian Dances
Tschaikowsky — Andante Cantabile from the String Quartet, Op. 11.
Mozart—German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride"
Rossini—Overture to "William Tell."

HERALD MAR. 27

Rubinstein Symphony Soloist

Some years ago Arthur Rubinstein, then a mere boy, played with notable skill at a concert in Boston. After a long absence abroad he has returned to this country in the full maturity of his powers and will be heard as soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 1 and 2, in Symphony Hall. He will play with the Orchestra Beethoven's great pianoforte concerto in G major, No. 4.

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same pair of concerts the Third Symphony of Sibelius in C major. This will be the first performance of this work in Boston, although the first, second and fourth symphonies by this noted Finnish composer have often been played and applauded at these concerts.

The remaining number will be George W. Chadwick's dramatic overture, "Melmomene."

POST MAR. 27

Sibelius' Third Symphony

Mr. Monteux Offers an Unheard Symphony of an Extremely Unusual and Forceful Composer

Mr. Monteux plays Sibelius' third symphony this week, a symphony which has not yet been heard in Boston. It is in three movements. It gives, from a superficial perusal of the score, a curious sense of incompleteness. Perhaps it is wrong to warn the reader that both by the opinion of reviewers of other cities who have heard the work, and also by one's own impressions of the printed page, this is the weakest of the four symphonies in which Sibelius has struck a completely new note in modern music, a note of well-nigh fabulous force, imagination and elemental color.

Sibelius has not had since the days of Fiedler and Muck the representation that such a composer should have had in Boston. Mr. Monteux has played the first symphony. The second is greater, romantic and fascinating in its Nordic spirit as the first symphony is. He now plays the third, which should be heard, for it is not known here, and every note by this Finnish master should be carefully scrutinized. The fourth, which we have not heard since the days of Muck, is the most original of all the Sibelius symphonies known in Boston. It is a new school of composition in itself, or would be a new school were not Sibelius a man of all men to abhor schools and abhor the slavish set of followers and imitators which even great modern composers have in some instances been willing to have about them. As it is the most original of these symphonies, it is also, perhaps, the most difficult to fully understand and it should be heard at least every other season. Eventually it will be, for in spite of the fact that the grimness, the power, the savage splendor of Sibelius shock and make uneasy many respectable citizens of this thrice respectable community, he will come into his own, as must every composer who produces living art.

Mr. Monteux should play not only the third symphony of Sibelius. He should again play the second, a work which in its long lines and its sinewy form represents the apex of Sibelius' earliest period. He should play, in addition to the ultra-modern fourth symphony, the early symphonic poem, "En Saga"; the symphonic poem, "Pohjola's Daughter," one of the most beautiful pieces of northern impressionism we know; the singular "Nightrise and Sunrise" the "Oceanidee." And there are smaller works of Sibelius not known here, some of them in the Boston Symphony library.

He is the most incredible of modern composers. Yes, more incredible even than Richard Strauss in his "Thus Spake Zarathustra," or the still more incredible "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" of Debussy. Let us not be misunderstood. We don't mean that Sibelius is necessarily the greatest of these three composers. He is most incredible. He is incredible because of the manner in which he emerges from the north, a giant of a far gone, heroic, antique past. No one living in America can possibly understand how such a composer can exist today. His music is a saga. It is a tale of great deeds of yore, of things supernatural which confronted the fathers of men, of a pagan past which—thank the Christian God—still smoulders under northern snows. Other composers are of today. Debussy's fantasy of the faun is pagan, antique if you like, but it is the antiquity of a very high civilization, a thousand years more modern, two thousand years ago, than that of the north, which snows and fastnesses have apparently, in the person of Sibelius, preserved.

Sibelius is no intellectual like Strauss, and still less is he the representative of centuries of a marvellous culture, like Debussy. He has no sophistication, as have both the other men. He is primeval. He has the magnificent, lowering gloom of the north, and a heroic stride which had long disappeared from any art. Looking back, he was the only man whose music, before 1914, rumbled and reverberated war-red war. This note, so stern, so terrible, in the music of perhaps the one man we know whose expression is supremely touching and yet utterly devoid of the note of sex, appears in a retrospect so prophetic that one wonders, after all, if any composers, simple or sophisticated, know what they are writing about. One wonders if the spirit of the old heroic north did not elevate itself to some height from which it could view the acts, the thoughts and the soul of the whole world, and then, descending again to earth, send out its message in the person of this Sibelius, whose name, anyhow, is a symphony of sweet sounds.

We know, in the modern musical art, of no sterner rebuke to prevalent superficiality and foolishness than this legendary music of a Finn.

Why has no manager toured Sibelius in America? He can conduct. We have heard him. Carl Stoeckel, who directs and maintains the festivals of music, unique in the whole world, given each June on his own estate at Norfolk, Conn., invited Sibelius to compose an orchestral work and conduct this work, with other of his own compositions, at the Norfolk festival of 1913. The invitation resulted in the composition of the "Oceanidee," previously mentioned in this article, a fantasy of the ocean, with three successive and stupendous climaxes, each one greater than the other, like the crash of so many waves, and in the appearance of Sibelius himself as conductor. Never shall we forget that occasion. It was necessary to perform some short things, and so there were heard two or three comparatively trivial compositions of Sibelius—the pieces with which he is principally associated in the popular mind, the "Valse triste," and "Finlandia." Also the early symphonic poem, "The Swan of Tuonela," also "Pohjola's Daughter." Sibelius, by no means a virtuoso conductor, but on the contrary a composer with something to say, took up the baton and simply wove a spell. The "Valse triste" was positively sublimated in his hands. Its melancholy was no longer cheap. It searched the very soul, and when the composer turned around to bow it was as if he had still before his eyes the scene in the theatre to which this waltz was conceived as accompaniment—the dying mother, recalling her youthful days, rising slowly and dancing with unseen companions of her youth. Or who that was present could forget "Finlandia," as it was then heard? It fairly exploded. After the growling introduction, the music of awakening revolt, the motive of the movement proper was hurled from the orchestra like a ball from a cannon, and at the end a very polite and highly cultured audience rose as one man, or woman, and shouted. Sibelius, himself, was tremendous—not tall, in fact, a little below average height, but so broad at the shoulders that he seemed as big as three. But his face, at the same time with the force, almost animal, of the lower jaw, is gentle. It is the face of a strong man, a man who would be easily led by his illusions or those in whom he had faith, and a dreamer. For once, the man looked like his music, and for once, meeting a great composer, one was not disappointed in his personal character.

Sibelius has been conducting in London. He should come over on a tour and make his compositions known and understood here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it will curtail its concerts in other big cities than Boston, principally owing to a growing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony from cities near Boston, and also because of the very great expense of travel in these days. Baltimore and Philadelphia are cities affected.

It is noticeable that in spite of the belief which seemed to exist in many quarters, even in this city, that only German conductors could conduct symphony orchestras, Mr. Monteux's labors are at least reaching their reward—even in the city of New York, where for some reason not easily to be explained by the impressions of a dweller in Boston, the critics have been most adversely critical of his efforts. New York reviewers observe the increasing excellence of the orchestra. They are still reluctant to admit Mr. Monteux's exceptional qualifications as a conductor, which are so apparent here that one is forced to conclude that either Mr. Monteux conducts entirely differently in New York than he conducts here, or that all music reviewers in Boston are foolish and ignorant, or else that all reviewers in New York deserve some such proud designation. In Philadelphia, farewelling the departing Boston orchestra, they even take pains to dwell on the great past of the orchestra up to and including the Muck regime, and to ignore completely the things the orchestra has done since. Well, these things break no bones. No one is hurt, unless owing to the future absence of the Boston players—Philadelphia!

Young People's Concerts

Two concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and Thursday afternoon, March 31, at 4 o'clock, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation in Greater Boston.

The tickets for these concerts are being distributed through the schools and settlements of Boston. A few seats for the Tuesday concert may be left over after this distribution. If such is the case, these will be placed on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall, beginning tomorrow (Monday) at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no tax.

Tschaikowsky Programme

splendid programme, consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky, has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for performances by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor by the great Russian master. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the first movement of the Violin Concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first 'cellist, who will be head in the Rococo Variations. The remaining orchestral numbers will be the Italian Caprice and the "Marche Slave."

MAR. 27

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor. Richard Burgin, concertmaster, will play the first movement of the violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, will be heard in the "Rococo Variations." The other numbers will be the "Italian Caprice" and the "Marche Slave."

ADVERTISER MAR

Symphony

ard Symphony of an orceful Composer

or, but on the contrary a composer something to say, took up the n and simply wove a spell. The ise triste" was positively sublimated is hands. Its melancholy was no er cheap. It searched the very soul, when the composer turned around ow it was as if he had still before eyes the scene in the theatre to h this waltz was conceived as acpaniment—the dying mother, recall-ier youthful days, rising slowly and ing with unseen companions of her
h. Or who that was present could et "Finlandia," as it was then l? It fairly exploded. After the ling introduction, the music of kening revolt, the motive of the ement proper was hurled from the estra like a ball from a cannon, at the end a very polite and highly red audience rose as one man, or an, and shouted. Sibelius, him-was tremendous—not tall, in fact, tle below average height, but so d at the shoulders that he seemed ig as three. But his face, at the time with the force, almost aniof the lower jaw, is gentle. It is face of a strong man, a man who d be easily led by his illusions or in whom he had faith, and a mer. For once, the man looked like music, and for once, meeting a great poser, one was not disappointed in personal character.

elius has been conducting in Lon-
He should come over on a tour make his compositions known and rstood here.

Boston Symphony Orchestra ances that it will curtail its concerts ther big cities than Boston, prin-y owing to a growing demand for rts by the Boston Symphony from near Boston, and also because of very great expense of travel in days. Baltimore and Philadelare cities affected.

s noticeable that in spite of the which seemed to exist in many ers, even in this city, that only an conductors could conduct symorchestras, Mr. Monteux's labors at least reaching their reward—in the city of New York, where ome reason not easily to be exed by the impressions of a dweller ston, the critics have been most ad-y critical of his efforts. New reviewers observe the increasing ence of the orchestra. They are reluctant to admit Mr. Monteux's ptional qualifications as a conduc-which are so apparent here that is forced to conclude that either Monteux conducts entirely differ-in New York than he conducts or that all music reviewers in on are foolish and ignorant, or else all reviewers in New York deserve such proud designation. In Phil-phia, farewelling the departing on orchestra, they even take pains well on the great past of the or-tra up to and including the Muck ne, and to ignore completely the s the orchestra has done since.
, these things break no bones. No is hurt, unless owing to the future nce of the Boston players—Phila-hia!

Young People's Concerts

o concerts by the full Boston Sym-y Orchestra under its regular con-r, Pierre Monteux, will be given Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and sday afternoon, March 31, at 4 k, for the pleasure and edifica-of the younger generation in ter Boston.

tickets for these concerts are beistributed through the schools and ments of Boston. A few seats for Tuesday concert may be left over this distribution. If such is the these will be placed on sale at ox office, Symphony Hall, begin-tomorrow (Monday) at the nominal of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no tax.

Tschaikowsky Programme

plendid programme, consisting en-of the music of Tschaikowsky, been arranged by Pierre Monteux performances by the full Boston
phony Orchestra at the last Pen-Fund concert of the season, to be in Symphony Hall on Sunday noon, April 10, at 3:30. The sym-y will be the Fifth in E minor by great Russian master. There will wo soloists at this concert—Rich-Burgin, the concertmaster of the estra, who will play the first ment of the Violin Concerto, and Bedetti, the illustrious first st, who will be head in the Rococo ations. The remaining orchestral bers will be the Italian Caprice and Marche Slave."

OST MAR. 27

SION FUND CONCERT

program consisting entirely of usic of Tschaikowsky has been ged by Pierre Monteux for the n Symphony Orchestra's pension concert in Symphony Hall on y afternoon, April 10. The phony will be the Fifth in E
r. Richard Burgin, concertmaswill play the first movement of iolin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, t, will be heard in the "Rococo ations." The other numbers will he "Italian Caprice" and the che Slave."

VERTISER MAR

97

Boston Needs a Chorus Boston ought to have a chorus which could set and maintain as high an artistic standard as that of the Symphony Orchestra in choice of program and in performance. No one of the existing choral societies can do this without radical changes in its whole method of organization. No one claims that any one of them is doing it at present.

Our choruses are each and all composed of amateurs who like to sing and who enjoy the ~~social~~ benefits that come from singing in a chorus. They fill a permanent want, and will always deserve to occupy a prominent place in the musical life of the community. They are each and all, however capable they may be of improvement in details, on the whole doing fairly satisfactory work.

It is possible that changes of leadership and drastic additions to the lists of retired members might work improvements in most of them. They seem all in a rut at present, but the purpose of the present article is not to find fault with the choruses we have, but to suggest a sort of chorus we have never yet had in this city.

The new chorus which should supplement but not supersede the Handel and Haydn, Cecilia Society, People's Choral Union, Apollo Club and People's Philharmonic Choir would admit only professional singers or exceptionally gifted amateurs. They should be liberally paid for their services, and expected to devote the major portion of their time during the concert season to the work of the chorus. They should be carefully selected, and subject to dismissal or retirement at any time the conductor should see fit. A pension fund should be provided to take care of retired members.

The Inevitable Deficit

It would be necessary to employ from 60 to 150 singers, and to weed out relentlessly those who proved unwilling or unable to fit into a fine ensemble. It would also be necessary to find and engage a conductor of the first rank. Last, but not least, a guarantee of $200,000 per season for the first few years would have to be arranged. There would always be a deficit, though with good fortune and good management the deficit could be much less than the sum named above.

The conductor should be given absolute charge of the musical part of the enterprise, subject to no dictation from any source. He should be a beneficent despot, not influenced by trustees or unions. He would earn a very large salary.

The concerts should not be allowed to become evening dress social functions. There should always be many seats on sale at nominal prices, without the obligation of subscribing to a series of concerts, as well as a number of costly season tickets.

Distinguished solo singers should be engaged when necessary, but young singers in the chorus should also have opportunity to take solo parts on occasion.

The cooperation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be almost indispensable to such a chorus. Without it a new and possibly somewhat smaller orchestra of equal merit would have to be organized, at great expense and to no real purpose.

If the Boston Orchestra abandoned its concerts outside New England completely it would have time enough to share in a series of 25 choral concerts at home. Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have already been dropped from next season's plans for the Symphony.

Furthermore, with a professional chorus and a professional orchestra of high rank both existing in this city it would be possible to find time for a six to 10-weeks' season of opera by stretching the musical season from Sept 1 to June 1, and running "Pops" from June 1 to Aug 15. This would mean a full year's employment for the musicians, with two weeks' vacation.

Opera on the Side

It is the chorus and the orchestra that make a resident opera company of high rank excessively costly in a city unlikely to support well more than 10 weeks of opera in a year. The leading singers could be found, especially if the opera season here came in September and October, before the Metropolitan and Chicago companies begin, with proper cooperation between those enterprises and the new one in Boston. "Society" could motor to and from the North Shore, if not yet back in town, and the masses of the people who go away for Summer vacations are home by the second week in September.

The choral repertory is larger than those who frequent our present amateur choral concerts have any notion of. The Vatican Choirs last season and the Harvard Glee Club for some years past have given us glimpses of the wealth of old ecclesiastical music awaiting a Boston chorus. Handel, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Brahms and many others have written choral music seldom or never heard here which ranks with the music of theirs played by the Symphony Orchestra.

Much predominantly orchestral music has a part for chorus, like the Liszt "Faust" and "Dante" symphonies, several of the Mahler symphonies, Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and many others. Operatic excerpts could be found in vast numbers which would be satisfactory in the concert hall if orchestra and chorus were both available. Last week's performance of a scene from "Parsifal" by the Symphony is an example of what might be done in this respect.

All that is needed is some one with brains and enthusiasm, like the late Maj Higginson, to put up the money and the rest could follow in good time. Where is the Maecenas to be found? Or could a committee take his place?

Tuesday at 4 and Thursday at 4 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for young people. March from the Algerian Suite, Saint-Saens; Andante from the "Surprise" Symphony, Haydn; three Norwegian dances, Grieg; Andante Cantabile, Tschaikowsky; German dance, Mozart; overture to "William Tell," Rossini. A few tickets for Tuesday will probably be on sale Monday at Symphony Hall. All Thursday and most of Tuesday tickets are being distributed through schools and settlement houses.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 20th program. Third Symphony, Sibelius; pianoforte concerto in G major, No. 4, Beethoven; overture, "Melpomene," Chadwick. Soloist, Arthur Rubinstein.

GLOBE M

KNOWS EVERYBODY WHO GOES TO THE SYMPHONIES

Doorkeeper Schad Has Taken Tickets at Almost Every Concert Since the First One in 1881—Now Sick at Home, Concert Goers Miss Him

Year in and year out for almost half a century he has greeted with unfailing courtesy the thousands and thousands of persons who have filed past him. Never a sour look, even when rudeness was returned for his unobtrusive attempts at affability, or when personal ills seemed to warrant a grouch. And never any feelings but those of warmest respect and admiration from patrons fellow employes and those in positions above his.

No wonder that this man, George Schad, who has been ticket taker at nearly all the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the first one on Oct 22, 1881, has been missed during the last six weeks, when a slight attack of paralysis has confined him to his home in Somerville.

No wonder that inquiries have flowed into the box office of Symphony Hall and that he has received flowers, fruit and numerous notes from concert goers who find it unnatural to attend concerts and not have their hearts warmed by his kindly smile and simple "How d'ye do" as they pass into the hall.

Anxious to Get Busy

But he's confident that he'll be back at his old stand soon. "Let the patrons know I'm anxious to get back and greet them," he asks.

"Yes," he continues in answer to a doubtful shake of the head as to his health, "I want to get back by April. I have the courage to, at least Friday and Saturday afternoons. I want to shake the hands of my friends."

"Oh, he's been so lonesome!" interrupts his wife, who is almost as proud of her husband's record as he is himself," and he's been so pleased to hear from his friends. I really think that is what has helped him to get better."

To many of the frequenters of Symphony Hall the name of the tall, genial ticket taker has never been known, his smile and pleasantness alone identifying him, while to others he has for years been known as "George." There are few probably who know his history.

He was born in Boston in 1856, and after graduation from a Boston public school he went into the crockery and glassware business. That soon failed, and in 1876 he secured a position as ticket taker at the old Music Hall, where the Orpheum Theatre is now.

Remembers the First Concert

For the five years previous to the crystallization of Henry Lee Higginson's idea into the Boston Symphony Orchestra, George Schad took the tickets of those attending the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and later of the Philharmonic Society, although, he says, "the concerts were not as frequent as they are now, and we used to have in the hall anything from a walking match to a dog show."

Then the Symphony was formed, and Schad continued in his position, and saw a great many of the music lovers who had been constant attendants at the Harvard Musical Association concerts give their support to the new organization. In this way he kept up his acquantanceship and broadened it, now he is probably as well known by sight as any man in Boston, and surely better known by the older generation than most.

He remembers the first concert of the Symphony, made up of 70 musicians, and led by Georg Henschel, who continued in the position till 1884. The price then, he recalls, was only 50 cents for the best seats at the regular concerts, and only 25 cents at the rehearsals. The audiences were not as large as they are now, he says, and the growth into the present legion of music lovers was gradual.

Mighty Queer Characters

He recollects the conduct of the orchestra under the successive leaders after Henschel—Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur and Wilhelm Gericke—and when asked about some of the old-time concert soloists mentions the names of Anna Louise Carey and Clara Louise Kellog and remarks, "Some of the old-time soloists seem better than the present singers."

He admits, however, that his greatest interest has been the people with whom he has come into contact week after week, rather than the music itself. "Of course I slip into the hall to hear at least one piece during each concert," he explains, "just so that I may say I've heard so and so.

"Yes," he resumed, "some mighty queer characters come past me there at the door. I can't help but study character as I stand there, and as the people come again and again I get to understand them pretty well, and to know just what kind of greeting they want.

"Why, do you know, there are some folks come by me up there in Symphony who used to come by me back in the days of the Harvard Musical Association in the Music Hall—come every Saturday or some other day every week.

Some People Foolish

"Yes, some of the people that come in do appear sort of foolish," he confided. "Why, there are any number of folks come into the hall looking for Jordan Hall or the Opera House, and all the time it tells them right on their tickets where they should go.

"And sometimes people come in thinking that it's some other night, and are surprised to learn that they're wrong, and that the performance they want will not come off for a day or so."

With almost childish pride the kindly ticket-taker describes his duties as cashier at the refreshment counter during the "Pops." He enjoys that job greatly.

With his wife and son, a letter carrier, Mr Schad lives in Somerville. Another son is married and lives in Arlington. The family has lived in Somerville for the past 20 years, and previous to that lived in Boston. Mr Schad has been a member of Monte Zuma Lodge, I. O. O. F., for 35 years.

GEORGE SCHAD

He's particularly happy when he tells of those persons who get tickets "seating them on the right side of the hall, but who come over to the left entrance—my side—just to go by me. That makes a body know that kindness and courtesy are worth while."

GLOBE MAR. 27-?

After Many Days

One, Pierre Monteux, Is Discovered in New York as Able Conductor

THE personality of a conductor is not the foundation of an orchester. The "prima-donna of the baton" is, in plain English, an enemy of orchestral permanence. It is impossible for any one man to keep a public in a state of excitement year after year. Yet the moment the "prima-donna conductor" ceases to excite audiences his occupation is gone. The best conductor for a term of years, as we have already intimated, is the solid and sound technician, equipped with sufficient sensitiveness and insight to give him catholicity of taste and universal sympathy. The ecstatic adorers will not become tired of his stock of revelations. . . .

Meanwhile, the writer of these lines would like to invite the attention of all concerned to the accomplishments of Pierre Monteux. No one has said sharper things about his conducting than the present writer. But only a deaf man could fail to perceive that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played very much better at its last two concerts than at its first two. Was that because Mr. . onteux has suddenly discovered the secret of conducting and become a dangerous rival of the magician from Holland?

Hardly. It meant simply that the prosaic but experienced Frenchman had enjoyed the advantage of a season's work with his orchestra, which had been reorganized in the fall. The men had shaken down into their new relations, the balance had been restored, and the conductor could get what he desired. There has, so far as this writer knows, been no celebration of the triumph of Mr. Monteux, though several old lovers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have expressed their delight. There are many differences betwixt tweedledum and tweedledee and one of them is in the power of réclame.

[W. J. Henderson in The New York Herald

TRANS. MAR 29

[100]

GIVES CONCERT FOR THE YOUNG

Symphony Orchestra Aids Development of Musical Taste in Children

PROGRAM RECEIVES CLOSE ATTENTION

By PHILIP HALE

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Monteux, gave a concert for young people of Boston's schools and settlements; for the pleasure of the young and as an aid in the development of musical taste. The older generations of Bostonians have apparently lost interest in a large measure in choral music, except when noteworthy soloists assist; they have little curiosity to become acquainted with visiting pianists, singers and violinists who give recitals. The older generations are still faithful to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but for the general interest in music for the future dependence must be put upon the young. And from the young, of course, irrespective of the ward in which they happen to live, will come the future musicians of this city.

Last season, and in December of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave concerts of this nature to the great joy of the young who packed Symphony Hall. The programs were well selected. Compositions were chosen of a melodious or strongly rhythmed nature that at once attracted and held the attention. They were by composers of high rank. It is a good thing to disabuse the young of the idea that because a composer has a great name, his music is therefore beyond their comprehension. Nor should music that is popularly classed as "light" be avoided in the arrangement of programs for these concerts. When Theodore Thomas began his work of developing a taste for orchestral music in the United States, he gave the audience a waltz by Johann Strauss, or a stirring march, in addition to symphonic movements and symphonic poems.

At the concerts of last December pieces were chosen to show in a practical manner the character of various instruments; oboe, flute, English horn, etc. Yesterday the program had no specific purpose, but it was attractive, pleasing to children, young and old. The concert began with the stirring French Military March from Saint-Saens's "Algerian" Suite. Then came the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, followed by Grieg's Three Norwegian Dances. Tschaikowsky was represented by the Andante, which first made his name known in Boston, the Andante from his first String Quartet, written in 1871. The Andante is still beautiful and haunting. When Tolstoi visited Moscow late in 1876 Nicholas Rubinstein arranged a concert in his honor. This Andante was then played. Tolstoi during the performance burst into tears. "Never in the whole course of my life," wrote Tschaikowsky in his diary, "did I feel so flattered, never so proud of my creative power, as when Leo Tolstoi, sitting by my side, listened to my Andante while the tears streamed down his face." This Andante is based on a Russian folk song, which was sung by a workman at Kamenka in the summer of 1869.

The program also included one of Mozart's Germany dances, popularly known as "The Sleighride," on account of its Trio. In Mozart's time a procession of richly ornamental sleighs was seen winter nights by torchlight in Vienna. The women, men and horses were sumptuously dressed, there were running footmen, and a Hungarian Prince led the procession. The concert ended with Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which is heard gladly at any concert.

The hall was completely filled with a most interested and appreciative audience. The concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

HERALD MAR 30

Caught Young

Is it not possible that Mr. Monteux and the men of the Symphony Orchestra take a keener pleasure in the fresh, unspoiled and generally eager and responsive audiences of the Young People's Concerts, than they do in the more staid, more sophisticated—though more outwardly demonstrative—companies of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings? It seemed, for example, at the concert yesterday that all concerned, went about their work with an unusual zest and a corresponding brilliance and effectiveness in their performance. Comparisons are reputedly objectionable, but how easy is it to think of Dr. Muck on his mettle before an audience of school children? By token of the attentiveness with which the concert was heard Mr. Monteux's latest programme is the most successful of the four that he has set before his youthful listeners. There was nothing in it so exacting as the dances by Bach, the movement from "Scheherazade" or the Largo from the "New World" Symphony, of the preceding series. The most serious number was the popular Andante Cantabile from Chaikovsky's first string quartet, and the only symphonic piece, the Andante—of the explosive chord—from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. For the rest there was the tuneful, deftly orchestrated March from Saint-Saëns's "Algerian Suite," three Norwegian Dances by Grieg, Mozart's German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride," and the Overture to "William Tell."

As might have been expected, Haydn's little joke "brought down the house." Though the delightfully written programme-notes had warned them, the youngsters were perceptibly startled and vastly amused. Mr. Monteux has at times seemed unduly rigid with Haydn's music, he was far from it in the fragment of yesterday. And how fortunate was his choice of Mozart's dance with its compelling rhythm and its charming accompaniment of tuned and jingling sleighbells! Such a piece as this or the dances of Grieg have little place in a symphony concert, which must concern itself with weightier things. Yet they were good to hear. Only at a "Pop" concert are we likely to encounter such music—or Saint-Saëns's march or Rossini's overture—but there it would be played with less care, with accompanying distractions, and by a smaller orchestra. By so much the young people have an advantage over their elders. The performance of the "Tell" overture was unusually brilliant, and, needless to say, the children took great delight in the "clap-trap" thunderstorm and the excitements of the end.

W. S. S.

---

the world and is doing

As gossip goes, when Mr. Monteux put Sibelius's unheard Third Symphony in rehearsal, he found the music as uninteresting as had conductors before him. While he was studying the score, he naturally tried to persuade himself to the contrary, but there was no escaping the actual evidence to his ears. Therefore he put by the piece.

TRANS. MAR 30

CHILDREN ENJOY SYMPHONY CONCERT

See Joke in Haydn's Music Where Elders Do Not

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert yesterday afternoon to an attentive and enthusiastic audience of children which filled Symphony Hall. The program was made up of short pieces by Saint-Saens, Haydn, Grieg, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, and Rossini, all light and agreeable music, easy for youthful listeners to enjoy at a first hearing. The audience, perhaps because little tots of primary school age were not numerous this time, kept quieter and seemed more thoroughly interested in the music than previous audiences at these young people's concerts.

Only one thing happened which would not have occurred at a regular Symphony concert, a ripple of genuinely amused laughter at the "surprise" in the slow movement from Haydn's "Surprise Symphony". The sudden loud chord interrupting a gentle slow passage was intended by Haydn as a musical joke, but grown-ups in this country take classical music far too solemnly to laugh at it under any circumstances. The children were better musicians than their elders in laughing as they did.

The performance was spirited and accurate, a marked improvement over the work of the orchestra at earlier young people's concerts. It began a little after 4 and was over by 5. The same program will be repeated Thursday afternoon at 4. Tickets at nominal prices have been sold through Boston schools and settlement houses. It is possible that a few may remain on public sale at the box office. A strict rule prevents the admission of adults unaccompanied by children.

GLOBE

A Russian Symphony, as Yet Unheard in Boston and by No Means Taxing, on Mr. Monteux's Programme for Tomorrow—Other Impending Joys

APPARENTLY the Third Symphony of Sibelius is to get no farther in Boston than the rehearsal of last Monday which finally convinced Mr. Monteux of the justice of his predecessors' objections to it. The First Symphony of Vasili Kalinnikov, which has taken its place on the programme of this week's concerts, is a piece of a different order. Kalinnikov has not tried to say something in his own way, and failed, instead, he has written very much in the manner of others, and succeeded. A glance through the score bears out in a general way both the things that have been said in praise of it and the criticisms that have been urged against it—a curious paradox in the face of seemingly opposite opinions. Writing of the first performance of the piece in Munich in 1906, the correspondent of The Musical Courier described it as "fresh, vital, radiant with melody, originality and genius." Yet to Mr. Aldrich of the New York Times, who heard it played the preceding year by the Russian Symphony Society, it was merely "an agreeable work, showing skill and taste but hardly the uncommon gifts that his compatriots seem to attribute to him." The fact is that Kalinnikov has written here with a refreshing sureness and certainty, with a ready command of fluent and even striking melody, with a fine feeling for orchestral effect and with an abundant display of scholarship, and yet one searches the score quite vainly for musical procedures that might be described as distinctly Kalinnikovian—or, for that matter, for any novel or "modernistic" touches. But after all, the symphony is not exactly new; the date of its composition is not at hand, but it was heard in Vienna as long ago as 1898—the composer was then thirty-two—and it may easily have been written some time before.

According to Rosa Newmarch's account of him in Grove's Dictionary, Kalinnikov was born in the Government of Orlov, his father was a police official, and the boy was educated in the Orlovsky Seminary, where for a time he directed the choir. To quote Mrs. Newmarch: "In 1884 he came to Moscow in great poverty, but succeeded in entering the Music School of the Philharmonic Society. He studied the bassoon, and also composition, under Ilyinsky and Blaramberg. Having completed a brilliant course at this school, Kalinnikov was appointed assistant conductor for the Italian Opera, Moscow, for the season 1893-94. Unhappily, the privations he had

Symphony

ard Symphony of an Forceful Composer or, but on the contrary a composer something to say, took up the n and simply wove a spell. The se triste" was positively sublimated is hands. Its melancholy was no er cheap. It searched the very soul, when the composer turned around w it was as if he had still before eyes the scene in the theatre to h this waltz was conceived as ac- paniment—the dying mother, recalling her youthful days, rising slowly and ing with unseen companions of her h. Or who that was present could t "Finlandia," as it was then d? It fairly exploded. After the ling introduction, the music of kening revolt, the motive of the ement proper was hurled from the estra like a ball from a cannon, at the end a very polite and highly red audience rose as one man, or an, and shouted. Sibelius, him- was tremendous—not tall, in fact, ttle below average height, but so d at the shoulders that he seemed ig as three. But his face, at the time with the force, almost ani- of the lower jaw, is gentle. It is face of a strong man, a man who d be easily led by his illusions or in whom he had faith, and a mer. For once, the man looked like usic, and for once, meeting a great oser, one was not disappointed in personal character.

elius has been conducting in London. He should come over on a tour make his compositions known and rstood here.

e Boston Symphony Orchestra an- ces that it will curtail its concerts her big cities than Boston, prin- ly owing to a growing demand for erts by the Boston Symphony from near Boston, and also because of very great expense of travel in days. Baltimore and Philadel- are cities affected.

is noticeable that in spite of the which seemed to exist in many ers, even in this city, that only an conductors could conduct sym- orchestras, Mr. Monteux's labors t least reaching their reward—in the city of New York, where ome reason not easily to be ex- d by the impressions of a dweller ston, the critics have been most ad- ly critical of his efforts. New reviewers observe the increasing ence of the orchestra. They are reluctant to admit Mr. Monteux's ptional qualifications as a conduc- which are so apparent here that is forced to conclude that either Monteux conducts entirely differ- in New York than he conducts or that all music reviewers in on are foolish and ignorant, or else all reviewers in New York deserve such proud designation. In Phil- phia, farewelling the departing on orchestra, they even take pains well on the great past of the or- ra up to and including the Muck me, and to ignore completely the s the orchestra has done since. these things break no bones. No is hurt, unless owing to the future nce of the Boston players—Phila- hia!

Young People's Concerts

o concerts by the full Boston Sym- v Orchestra under its regular con- r, Pierre Monteux, will be given Tuesday afternoon, March 29, and sday afternoon, March 31, at 4 k, for the pleasure and edifica- of the younger generation in ter Boston.

tickets for these concerts are be- istributed through the schools and ments of Boston. A few seats for Tuesday concert may be left over this distribution. If such is the these will be placed on sale at ox office, Symphony Hall, begin- tomorrow (Monday) at the nominal of 25, 35 and 50 cents, no tax.

Tschaikowsky Programme

plendid programme, consisting en- of the music of Tschaikowsky, been arranged by Pierre Monteux performances by the full Boston phony Orchestra at the last Pen- Fund concert of the season, to be in Symphony Hall on Sunday noon, April 10, at 3:30. The sym- y will be the Fifth in E minor by great Russian master. There will wo soloists at this concert—Rich- Burgin, the concertmaster of the stra, who will play the first ment of the Violin Concerto, and Bedetti, the illustrious first st, who will be head in the Rococo tions. The remaining orchestral bers will be the Italian Caprice and Marche Slave."

OST MAR.27

NSION FUND' CONCERT

program consisting entirely of music of Tschaikowsky has been ged by Pierre Monteux for the n Symphony Orchestra's pension concert in Symphony Hall on y afternoon, April 10. The phony will be the Fifth in E r. Richard Burgin, concertmas- will play the first movement of violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, st, will be heard in the "Rococo ations." The other numbers will he "Italian Caprice" and the che Slave."

VERTISER.MAR.

9]

Boston Needs a Chorus Boston ought to have a chorus which could set and maintain as high an artistic standard as that of the Symphony Orchestra in choice of program and in performance. No one of the existing choral societies can do this without radical changes in its whole method of organization. No one claims that any one of them is doing it at present.

Our choruses are each and all composed of amateurs who like to sing and who enjoy the social benefits that come from singing in a chorus. They fill a permanent want, and will always deserve to occupy a prominent place in the musical life of the community. They are each and all, however capable they may be of improvement in details, on the whole doing fairly satisfactory work.

It is possible that changes of leadership and drastic additions to the lists of retired members might work improvements in most of them. They seem all in a rut at present, but the purpose of the present article is not to find fault with the choruses we have, but to suggest a sort of chorus we have never yet had in this city.

The new chorus which should supplement but not supersede the Handel and Haydn, Cecilia Society, People's Choral Union, Apollo Club and People's Philharmonic Choir would admit only professional singers or exceptionally gifted amateurs. They should be liberally paid for their services, and expected to devote the major portion of their time during the concert season to the work of the chorus. They should be carefully selected, and subject to dismissal or retirement at any time the conductor should see fit. A pension fund should be provided to take care of retired members.

The Inevitable Deficit

It would be necessary to employ from 60 to 150 singers, and to weed out relentlessly those who proved unwilling or unable to fit into a fine ensemble. It would also be necessary to find and engage a conductor of the first rank. Last, but not least, a guarantee of $200,000 per season for the first few years would have to be arranged. There would always be a deficit though with good fortune and good management the deficit could be much less than the sum named above.

The conductor should be given absolute charge of the musical part of the enterprise, subject to no dictation from any source. He should be a beneficent despot, not influenced by trustees or unions. He would earn a very large salary.

The concerts should not be allowed to become evening dress social functions. There should always be many seats on sale at nominal prices, without the obligation of subscribing to a series of concerts, as well as a number of costly season tickets.

Distinguished solo singers should be engaged when necessary, but young singers in the chorus should also have opportunity to take solo parts on occasion.

The cooperation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be almost indispensable to such a chorus. Without it a new and possibly somewhat smaller orchestra of equal merit would have to be organized, at great expense and to no real purpose.

If the Boston Orchestra abandoned its concerts outside New England completely it would have time enough to share in a series of 25 choral concerts at home. Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have already been dropped from next season's plans for the Symphony.

Furthermore, with a professional chorus and a professional orchestra of high rank both existing in this city it would be possible to find time for a six to 10-weeks' season of opera by stretching the musical season from Sept 1 to June 1, and running "Pops" from June 1 to Aug 15. This would mean a full year's employment for the musicians, with two weeks' vacation.

Opera on the Side

It is the chorus and the orchestra that make a resident opera company of high rank successful, costly in a city unlikely to support well more than 10 weeks of opera in a year. The leading singers could be found, especially if the opera season here came in September and October, before the Metropolitan and Chicago companies begin, with proper cooperation between those enterprises and the new one in Boston. "Society" could motor to and from the North Shore, if not yet back in town, and the masses of the people who go away for Summer vacations are home by the second week in September.

The choral repertory is larger than those who frequent our present amateur choral concerts have any notion of. The Vatican Choirs last season and the Harvard Glee Club for some years past have given us glimpses of the wealth of old ecclesiastical music awaiting a Boston chorus. Handel, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Brahms and many others have written choral music seldom or never heard here which ranks with the music of theirs played by the Symphony Orchestra.

Much predominantly orchestral music has a part for chorus, like the Liszt "Faust" and "Dante" symphonies, several of the Mahler symphonies, Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and many others. Operatic excerpts could be found in vast numbers which would be satisfactory in the concert hall if orchestra and chorus were both available. Last week's performance of a scene from "Parsifal" by the Symphony is an example of what might be done in this respect.

All that is needed is some one with brains and enthusiasm, like the late Maj Higginson, to put up the money and the rest could follow in good time. Where is the Maecenas to be found? Or could a committee take his place?

Tuesday at 4 and Thursday at 4 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for young people. March from the Algerian Suite, Saint-Saens; Andante from the "Surprise" Symphony, Haydn; three Norwegian dances, Grieg; Andante Cantabile, Tschaikowsky; German dance, Mozart; overture to "William Tell," Rossini. A few tickets for Tuesday will probably be on sale Monday at Symphony Hall. All Thursday and most of Tuesday tickets are being distributed through schools and settlement houses.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 20th program. Third Symphony, Sibelius; pianoforte concerto in G major, No. 4, Beethoven; overture, "Melpomene," Chadwick. Soloist, Arthur Rubinstein.

GLOBE MA

KNOWS EVERYBODY WHO GOES TO THE SYMPHONIES

Doorkeeper Schad Has Taken Tickets at Almost Every Concert Since the First One in 1881—Now Sick at Home, Concert Goers Miss Him

Year in and year out for almost half a century he has greeted with unfailing courtesy the thousands and thousands of persons who have filed past him. Never a sour look, even when rudeness was returned for his unobtrusive attempts at affability, or when personal ills seemed to warrant a grouch. And never any feelings but those of warmest respect and admiration from patrons fellow employes and those in positions above his.

No wonder that this man, George Schad, who has been ticket taker at nearly all the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the first one on Oct 22, 1881, has been missed during the last six weeks, when a slight attack of paralysis has confined him to his home in Somerville.

No wonder that inquiries have flowed into the box office of Symphony Hall and that he has received flowers, fruit and numerous notes from concert goers who find it unnatural to attend concerts and not have their hearts warmed by his kindly smile and simple "How d'ye do" as they pass into the hall.

GEORGE SCHAD

Anxious to Get Busy

But he's confident that he'll be back at his old stand soon. "Let the patrons know I'm anxious to get back and greet them," he asks.

"Yes," he continues in answer to a doubtful shake of the head as to his health, "I want to get back by April. I have the courage to, at least Friday and Saturday afternoons. I want to shake the hands of my friends."

"Oh, he's been so lonesome!" interrupts his wife, who is almost as proud of her husband's record as he is himself," and he's been so pleased to hear from his friends. I really think that is what has helped him to get better."

To many of the frequenters of Symphony Hall the name of the tall, genial ticket taker has never been known, his smile and pleasantness alone identifying him, while to others he has for years been known as "George." There are few probably who know his history.

He was born in Boston in 1856, and after graduation from a Boston public school he went into the crockery and glassware business. That soon failed, and in 1876 he secured a position as ticket taker at the old Music Hall, where the Orpheum Theatre is now.

Remembers the First Concert

For the five years previous to the crystallization of Henry Lee Higginson's idea into the Boston Symphony Orchestra, George Schad took the tickets of those attending the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and later of the Philharmonic Society, at how, he says, "the concerts were not as frequent as they are now, and we used to have in the hall anything from a walking match to a dog show."

Then the Symphony was formed, and Schad continued in his position, and saw a great many of the music lovers who had been constant attendants at the Harvard Musical Association concerts give their support to the new organization. In this way he kept up his acquantanceship and broadened it, now he is probably as well known by sight as any man in Boston, and surely better known by the older generation than most.

He remembers the first concert of the Symphony, made up of 70 musicians, and led by Georg Henschel, who continued in the position till 1884. The price then, he recalls, was only 50 cents for the best seats at the regular concerts, and only 25 cents at the rehearsals. The audiences were not as large as they are now, he says, and the growth into the present legion of music lovers was gradual.

Mighty Queer Characters

He recollects the conduct of the orchestra under the successive leaders after Henschel—Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur and Wilhelm Gericke—and when asked about some of the old-time concert soloists mentions the names of Anna Louise Carey and Clara Louise Kellog and remarks, "Some of the old-time soloists seem better than the present singers."

He admits, however, that his greatest interest has been the people with whom he has come into contact week after week, rather than the music itself. "Of course I slip into the hall to hear at least one piece during each concert," he explains, "just so that I may say I've heard so and so.

"Yes," he resumed, "some mighty queer characters come past me there at the door. I can't help but study character as I stand there, and as the people come again and again I get to understand them pretty well, and to know just what kind of greeting they want.

"Why, do you know, there are some folks come by me up there in Symphony who used to come by me back in the days of the Harvard Musical Association in the Music Hall—come every Saturday or some other day every week.

Some People Foolish

"Yes, some of the people that come in do appear sort of foolish," he confided. "Why, there are any number of folks come into the hall looking for Jordan Hall or the Opera House, and all the time it tells them right on their tickets where they should go.

"And sometimes people come in thinking that it's some other night, and are surprised to learn that they're wrong, and that the performance they want will not come off for a day or so."

With almost childish pride the kindly ticket-taker describes his duties as cashier at the refreshment counter during the "Pops." He enjoys that job greatly.

With his wife and son, a letter carrier, Mr Schad lives in Somerville. Another son is married and lives in Arlington. The family has lived in Somerville for the past 20 years, and previous to that lived in Boston. Mr Schad has been a member of Monte Zuma Lodge, I. O. O. F., for 35 years.

He's particularly happy when he tells of those persons who get tickets "seating them on the right side of the hall, but who come over to the left entrance—my side—just to go by me. That makes a body know that kindness and courtesy are worth while."

GLOBE MAR.27-?

After Many Days

One, Pierre Monteux, Is Discovered in New York as Able Conductor

THE personality of a conductor is not the foundation of an orchester. The "prima-donna of the baton" is, in plain English, an enemy of orchestral permanence. It is impossible for any one man to keep a public in a state of excitement year after year. Yet the moment the "prima-donna conductor" ceases to excite audiences his occupation is gone. The best conductor for a term of years, as we have already intimated, is the solid and sound technician, equipped with sufficient sensitiveness and insight to give him catholicity of taste and universal sympathy. The ecstatic adorers will not become tired of his stock of revelations. . . .

Meanwhile, the writer of these lines would like to invite the attention of all concerned to the accomplishments of Pierre Monteux. No one has said sharper things about his conducting than the present writer. But only a deaf man could fail to perceive that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played very much better at its last two concerts than at its first two. Was that because Mr. . onteux has suddenly discovered the secret of conducting and become a dangerous rival of the magician from Holland?

Hardly. It meant simply that the prosaic but experienced Frenchman had enjoyed the advantage of a season's work with his orchestra, which had been reorganized in the fall. The men had shaken down into their new relations, the balance had been restored, and the conductor could get what he desired. There has, so far as this writer knows, been no celebration of the triumph of Mr. Monteux, though several old lovers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have expressed their delight. There are many differences betwixt tweedledum and tweedledee and one of them is in the power of réclame. [W. J. Henderson in The New York Herald

TRANS. MAR.29

[100]

GIVES CONCERT FOR THE YOUNG

Symphony Orchestra Aids Development of Musical Taste in Children

PROGRAM RECEIVES CLOSE ATTENTION

By PHILIP HALE

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Monteux, gave a concert for young people of Boston's schools and settlements; for the pleasure of the young and as an aid in the development of musical taste. The older generations of Bostonians have apparently lost interest in a large measure in choral music, except when noteworthy soloists assist; they have little curiosity to become acquainted with visiting pianists, singers and violinists who give recitals. The older generations are still faithful to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but for the general interest in music for the future dependence must be put upon the young. And from the young, of course, irrespective of the ward in which they happen to live, will come the future musicians of this city.

Last season, and in December of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave concerts of this nature to the great joy of the young who packed Symphony Hall. The programs were well selected. Compositions were chosen of a melodious or strongly rhythmed nature that at once attracted and held the attention. They were by composers of high rank. It is a good thing to disabuse the young of the idea that because a composer has a great name, his music is therefore beyond their comprehension. Nor should music that is popularly classed as "light" be avoided in the arrangement of programs for these concerts. When Theodore Thomas began his work of developing a taste for orchestral music in the United States, he gave the audience a waltz by Johann Strauss, or a stirring march, in addition to symphonic movements and symphonic poems.

At the concerts of last December pieces were chosen to show in a practical manner the character of various instruments; oboe, flute, English horn, etc. Yesterday the program had no specific purpose, but it was attractive, pleasing to children, young and old. The concert began with the stirring French Military March from Saint-Saens's "Algerian" Suite. Then came the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, followed by Grieg's Three Norwegian Dances. Tschaikowsky was represented by the Andante, which first made his name known in Boston, the Andante from his first String Quartet, written in 1871. The Andante is still beautiful and haunting. When Tolstoi visited Moscow late in 1876 Nicholas Rubinstein arranged a concert in his honor. This Andante was then played. Tolstoi during the performance burst into tears. "Never in the whole course of my life," wrote Tschaikowsky in his diary, "did I feel so flattered, never so proud of my creative power, as when Leo Tolstoi, sitting by my side, listened to my Andante while the tears streamed down his face." This Andante is based on a Russian folk song, which was sung by a workman at Kamenka in the summer of 1869.

The program also included one of Mozart's Germany dances, popularly known as "The Sleighride," on account of its Trio. In Mozart's time a procession of richly ornamental sleighs was seen winter nights by torchlight in Vienna. The women, men and horses were sumptuously dressed, there were running footmen, and a Hungarian Prince led the procession. The concert ended with Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which is heard gladly at any concert.

The hall was completely filled with a most interested and appreciative audience. The concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Caught Young

Is it not possible that Mr. Monteux and the men of the Symphony Orchestra take a keener pleasure in the fresh, unspoiled and generally eager and responsive audiences of the Young People's Concerts, than they do in the more staid, more sophisticated—though more outwardly demonstrative—companies of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings? It seemed, for example, at the concert yesterday that all concerned, went about their work with an unusual zest and a corresponding brilliance and effectiveness in their performance. Comparisons are reputedly objectionable, but how easy is it to think of Dr. Muck on his mettle before an audience of school children? By token of the attentiveness with which the concert was heard Mr. Monteux's latest programme is the most successful of the four that he has set before his youthful listeners. There was nothing in it so exacting as the dances by Bach, the movement from "Scheherazade" or the Largo from the "New World" Symphony, of the preceding series. The most serious number was the popular Andante Cantabile from Chaikovsky's first string quartet, and the only symphonic piece, the Andante—of the explosive chord—from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. For the rest there was the tuneful, deftly orchestrated March from Saint-Saëns's "Algerian Suite," three Norwegian Dances by Grieg, Mozart's German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride," and the Overture to "William Tell."

As might have been expected, Haydn's little joke "brought down the house." Though the delightfully written programme-notes had warned them, the youngsters were perceptibly startled and vastly amused. Mr. Monteux has at times seemed unduly rigid with Haydn's music, he was far from it in the fragment of yesterday. And how fortunate was his choice of Mozart's dance with its compelling rhythm and its charming accompaniment of tuned and jingling sleighbells! Such a piece as this or the dances of Grieg have little place in a symphony concert, which must concern itself with weightier things. Yet they were good to hear. Only at a "Pop" concert are we likely to encounter such music—or Saint-Saëns's march or Rossini's overture—but there it would be played with less care, with accompanying distractions, and by a smaller orchestra. By so much the young people have an advantage over their elders. The performance of the "Tell" overture was unusually brilliant, and, needless to say, the children took great delight in the "clap-trap" thunderstorm and the excitements of the end.

W. S. S.

the world and is doing it well.

As gossip goes, when Mr. Monteux put Sibelius's unheard Third Symphony in rehearsal, he found the music as uninteresting as had conductors before him. While he was studying the score, he naturally tried to persuade himself to the contrary; but there was no escaping the actual evidence to his ears. Therefore he put by the piece.

TRANS. MAR.30

CHILDREN ENJOY SYMPHONY CONCERT

See Joke in Haydn's Music Where Elders Do Not

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert yesterday afternoon to an attentive and enthusiastic audience of children which filled Symphony Hall. The program was made up of short pieces by Saint-Saens, Haydn, Grieg, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, and Rossini, all light and agreeable music, easy for youthful listeners to enjoy at a first hearing. The audience, perhaps because little tots of primary school age were not numerous this time, kept quieter and seemed more thoroughly interested in the music than previous audiences at these young people's concerts.

Only one thing happened which would not have occurred at a regular Symphony concert, a ripple of genuinely amused laughter at the "surprise" in the slow movement from Haydn's "Surprise Symphony". The sudden loud chord interrupting a gentle slow passage was intended by Haydn as a musical joke, but grown-ups in this country take classical music far too solemnly to laugh at it under any circumstances. The children were better musicians than their elders in laughing as they did.

The performance was spirited and accurate, a marked improvement over the work of the orchestra at earlier young people's concerts. It began a little after 4 and was over by 5. The same program will be repeated Thursday afternoon at 4. Tickets at nominal prices have been sold through Boston schools and settlement houses. It is possible that a few may remain on public sale at the box office. A strict rule prevents the admission of adults unaccompanied by children.

GL

A Russian Symphony, as Yet Unheard in Boston and by No Means Taxing, on Mr. Monteux's Programme for Tomorrow—Other Impending Joys

APPARENTLY the Third Symphony of Sibelius is to get no farther in Boston than the rehearsal of last Monday which finally convinced Mr. Monteux of the justice of his predecessors' objections to it. The First Symphony of Vasili Kalinnikov, which has taken its place on the programme of this week's concerts, is a piece of a different order. Kalinnikov has not tried to say something in his own way, and failed, instead, he has written very much in the manner of others, and succeeded. A glance through the score bears out in a general way both the things that have been said in praise of it and the criticisms that have been urged against it—a curious paradox in the face of seemingly opposite opinions. Writing of the first performance of the piece in Munich in 1906, the correspondent of The Musical Courier described it as "fresh, vital, radiant with melody, originality and genius." Yet to Mr. Aldrich of the New York Times, who heard it played the preceding year by the Russian Symphony Society, it was merely "an agreeable work, showing skill and taste but hardly the uncommon gifts that his compatriots seem to attribute to him." The fact is that Kalinnikov has written here with a refreshing sureness and certainty, with a ready command of fluent and even striking melody, with a fine feeling for orchestral effect and with an abundant display of scholarship, and yet one searches the score quite vainly for musical procedures that might be described as distinctly Kalinnikovian—or, for that matter, for any novel or "modernistic" touches. But after all, the symphony is not exactly new; the date of its composition is not at hand, but it was heard in Vienna as long ago as 1898—the composer was then thirty-two—and it may easily have been written some time before.

According to Rosa Newmarch's account of him in Grove's Dictionary, Kalinnikov was born in the Government of Orlov, his father was a police official, and the boy was educated in the Orlovsky Seminary, where for a time he directed the choir. To quote Mrs. Newmarch: "In 1884 he came to Moscow in great poverty, but succeeded in entering the Music School of the Philharmonic Society. He studied the bassoon, and also composition, under Ilyinsky and Blaramberg. Having completed a brilliant course at this school, Kalinnikov was appointed assistant conductor for the Italian Opera, Moscow, for the season 1893-94. Unhappily, the privations he had undergone had told on his health. Symptoms of consumption now began to show themselves, and he was ordered to relinguish work and winter in the Crimea. The remaining years of his life were devoted entirely to composition. There seems no doubt that, but for his premature death, Kalinnikov would have won high place among Russian musicians." Only thirty-five when he died, Kalinnikov left behind him a considerable quantity of music including two symphonies and various smaller orchestral pieces, incidential music to Tolstoi's play "Tsar Boris," a cantata, a string quartet and the usual array of songs and pieces for the pianoforte.

This first symphony runs in four movements. The opening Allegro moderato is orthodox in form even to a repetition of the "exposition," and the two main themes are clear and straightforward—the first with strong suggestion of Russian folk-music. The second movement, an "Andante commodamente," begins placidly with a theme that is afterwards to receive a very different treatment in the Finale, while open fifths in the accompaniment impart to it an Oriental flavor, enhanced in an ensuing "Un poco piu mosso." Both themes are then developed and combined with much contrapuntal ingenuity, there is exciting progress to a "climax" and a return to the opening calm. In the Trio of the Scherzo, itself vigorous and straightforward, the music is frankly Eastern—another instance of "scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar." But in the last movement Kalinnikov is again the academic musician, showing his allegiance to the "cyclic form" of César Franck; by way of introduction he repeats in part the initial theme of the first Allegro; and the second theme of the Finale, though not a literal repetition of the songful melody of the first movement, resembles it very closely. At the end, the melody of the Andante is proclaimed majestically by the brass against a figuration derived from the main theme of the Finale itself. In summary, then, it may be said that no one who reads or hear the piece critically could reasonably doub that Kalinnikov had either the proper up bringing or the proper instincts for a symphonist.

W. S. S.

TRANS

Boston Symphony Concert.

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Carnegie Hall last evening. The second will take place to-morrow afternoon. The thermometer fell considerably yesterday and not even the second stimulant in the shape of Byronic music administered in the evening (there had been one in the afternoon) served to keep some people from feeling the chill. M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the wise men of the East, began his entertainment with the "Manfred" symphony of Tschaikowsky. The work was vigorously played and there were some moments of finish in the performance. Also there were some of false intonation. But the audience seemed to like it.

Tschaikowsky was a great master, but if his fame had to rest on the "Manfred" symphony no one would ever cry "Beware the Muscovite." It is an exceedingly ponderous, dull and empty work, in which the only good ideas are those which sound like echoes of Rimsky-Korsakov. However, it seemed last evening to be a fitting prelude to the descriptive symphony from Vincent d'Indy's opera, "Le Legende de St. Christophe," called "La Queste de Dieu."

This music probably would be much more interesting in its place in the opera. Only such tid-bits as the intermezzo of "Cavalleria Rusticana" or the "Thaïs" meditation, which, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, have nothing to do with the case, can be transferred successfully to the concert room. D'Indy's intermezzo should be heard between the acts by those who do not feel obliged to go out.

It sounded last evening as if it meant something, but there was no key to the composer's purpose, and as sheer music it presented too many changes of front to be clear and satisfying. The orchestra played it very well. There was also a work of Arnold Bax, "In the Fairy Hills," a symphonic poem which will have to be heard earlier in the evening in order to receive proper consideration. The long concert came to an end with Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture.

N.Y. HERALD JAN 7.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

It is not often that New York enjoys the chance to hear in one day two such orchestras as the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony. They represent the very apex of our musical culture—for symphony is a superior art form and opera seldom is—no matter what one thinks of their conductors. The band from Boston last night at Carnegie Hall discoursed most eloquently Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony. Toujours Byron. Earlier in the day we had listened to the "Harold" of Berlioz-Byron, but not altogether convinced that the monster machine [illegible] been worth the trouble of fabrication. The Russian's version of Byron did convince; in that vast land Byron has always been understood; there are Poushekine and Lermontov as witnesses. Berlioz's method of composition was the juxtaposition of huge blocks of tone; nothing melts or merges, while continual flux and flow are the life of the Tschaikowsky music, banal as some of it now sounds. But the chief weakness of Berlioz is his contrapuntal handling. Therein he is the eternal amateur. As Harold Bauer sensibly puts it: You can't make bricks without straw, and you can't make good music without counterpoint.

Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony vigorously and drew from his instrument a rich volume of tone. "The Search for God," by Vincent D'Indy is no longer a novelty, thanks to Mr. Damrosch. It is the most viable quotation from his opera, "The [illegible] of St. Christopher," produced [illegible] with success. Still, we [illegible] recalling unhappy and [illegible] August Strindberg, crucified [illegible] morose genius. He said: "I searched for God and found the Devil." D'Indy searched too, but only found the devil of cacophony. The music is brilliantly dull.

The novelty of this curiously arranged programme was an ambitious symphonic poem, "In the Faery Hills," which contained one jolly, jigging Celtic, or Gaelic, tune served with modern harmonic sauce. Clever and well scored. It is by Arnold Bax, an English composer. The evening was announced to end with Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

N.Y. WORLD. JAN. 7.

VOL. LXX
NO. 4
COSMOPOLITAN APRIL, 1921

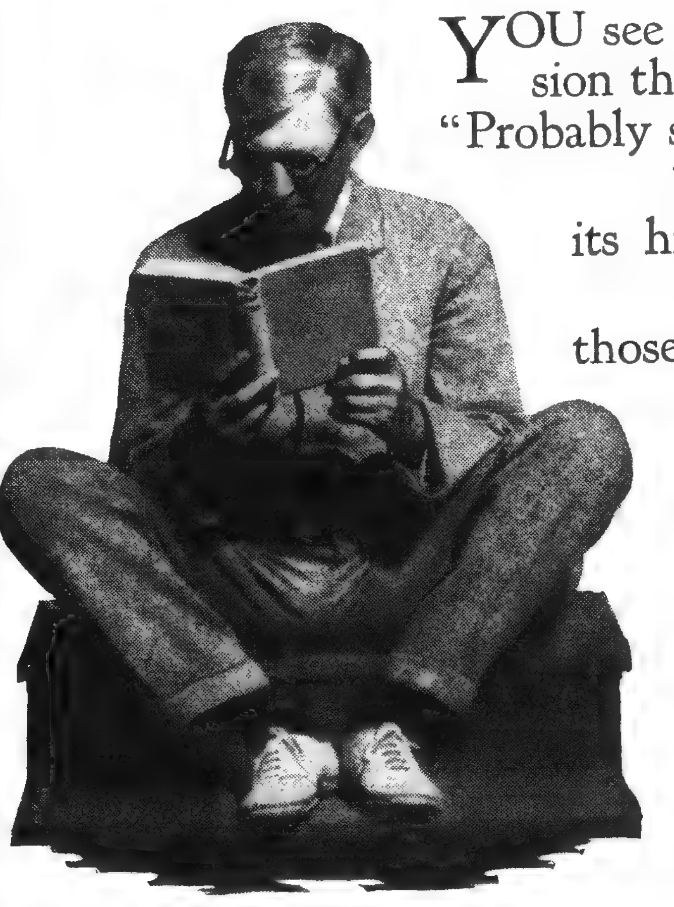
A humorous editorial by America's greatest humorist

George Ade on Music and Music-Lovers



George Ade

YOU see her for the first time, and somehow she gives you the impression that she has just bitten into a lemon; so you say to yourself, "Probably she plays the piano very well."

Why does perfectly good music have a curdling effect upon its high priests?

It is made for soothing purposes, so Shakespeare says, yet those who dope themselves too heavily with the richer varieties become temperamental dyspeptics.

Probably it would be awful hard to room with one who knew too much about music.

The cruel pity lavished by the bridge expert upon the mental defective who fails to comprehend signals is as naught compared with the devastating scorn which the Grieg fanatic visits upon the loyal followers of Irving Berlin.

Men who are not afraid to walk up to a machine gun will run a mile when they see a young woman who has been thoroughly conservatoried.

The light-headed layman whose cerebral corridors are constructed upon the general plan of a cantaloup always begins to look about and select the nearest exit when the conversation shifts to Grand Opera.

Music is the universal heritage. Somewhere in the flower-dotted fields between Brahms and "The Maiden's Prayer" there is room for all of us to ramble.

The hairy denizens of the studios probably would favor the electric chair for anyone who spoke out in defense of any tune that has committed the unpardonable offense of transmitting ecstasy to about ninety per cent. of the population.

Popularity need not be a synonym for cheapness and unworthiness. Prunes and sunsets and georgettes and kodaks are popular, but what would our vaunted civilization do without them?

A song which will caress the emotions of several millions of people is of more practical value than the average Congressional enactment. During the period which follows an orgy, what could be more beneficial than a restful diet of mush?

And yet who has the courage to look a tea-drinker straight in the eye and say that he prefers "Mother Machree" by John McCormack to "Tristan and Isolde"?

Speaking as one who has advanced from "Molly Darling" to "La Bohème," it is not to be denied that even the lowly born may learn to handle, and almost assimilate, music which appeals to the head as well as to the heels.

Only a few of us can establish altitude records in the higher realms of music. Be fair in your judgment of those who go up so high that they are no longer visible to the naked eye.

Be comforted by the reflection that all music is good.

Because you seek the drugging effects of ragtime, do not contradict those who claim to get an actual kick from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Be not ashamed of a sneaking fondness for minstrel songs and the solemn cadences of the old-time hymns. Make no apology for sentimental ballads. Maple-sirup, it is true; but what in the name of Vermont is wrong with maple-sirup?

The monthly issue of "records," the mechanical players, and the invading hosts of Chautauqua have carried a lot of real music into the most distant townships. The neighbors are becoming "educated." But they are still deathly afraid of the morbid genius who regards music as a secret cult instead of a general dispensation.

AS the novelty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Thursday evening concert of the season Monsieur Monteux presented last night a symphonic poem entitled "An Sluagh Sidhe," or "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold Box, an English composer, who has always taken a lively interest in things Irish.

Regarding this work, which seems to be part of a larger composition, entitled "Eire," Phillip Hale presents much interesting material in his programme notes. But the music itself proved to be far less absorbing than the comments in the little booklet, and was the more tiring, because it had been preceded by Tschaikowsky's interminably long "Manfred" Symphony and D'Indy's labored and uninspired Descriptive Symphony, "La Queste de Dieu," from the opera, "La Legende de Saint Christophe."

What a relief after almost two hours of tediousness to hear the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys."

AMER. JAN. 7. N.Y.

"In the Faery Hills"

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is industrious in bringing musical novelties to New York, and at the Bostonians' third concert of the season, in Carnegie Hall last night, he scored again over his local competitors by giving the first performance here of an exquisitely beautiful and masterfully orchestrated symphonic poem, a novel Gaelic fantasy, entitled "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold E. Trevor Bax. Arnold Bax is an English composer (at least he was born in London, in 1883), and at an early age he came under the influence of the Neo-Celtic movement in literature and art and took an absorbing interest in everything touched by the glamour of Ireland in ancient days. This symphonic poem was written when he was twenty-six years old, in 1909, and had its first performance in London in 1910. It is a work of such instant appeal to lovers of orchestral music and of such unmistakable poetry and power that the wonder is that it took ten years to reach New York, and then had to be brought by a visiting conductor.

Mr. Bax has vouchsafed so much of a programme as to say that his music attempts to suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight. "The composer has endeavored also to shadow forth the atmosphere of mystery and almost of terror with which the Irish people regard their faery compatriots. The middle section was to some extent suggested by a passage in Mr Yeats's 'Wanderings of Oisin,' in which a human bard having strayed among the host of the Sidhe (wind) is asked by them to sing a song for their pleasure. But when he sings a song of human joy the faeries declare it the saddest song that was ever sung and throw the harp away in sorrow and anger while the harper is swept away into their revel."

The music—mystic, wistful, ghostly, weird, yet at the same time eminently sane, vigorous, strong and coherent, with now and then a snatch of typical Irish melody boldly sung above its rushing winds of ethereal sound—has the impress of new and individual beauty, of sincerity and of power; and is of a curiously paradoxical character, in that it is equally wistful and robust, a rare combination of qualities. It was superbly played by the Boston men and was received with prolonged plaudits of favor and delight by the large audience.

G. W. H.

N.Y. POST. JAN. 7.

By KATHARINE SPAETH.

WHERE so lately the tempestuous toes of Albert Coates pirouetted, the majestic arms of the volatile Toscanini waved, and the blond head of Leopold Stokowski nodded, last night le petit Pierre Monteux led the Boston Orchestra.

And that means the platform of Carnegie Hall, but no invidious comparisons are intended. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony flowed along, with a great deal of sweetness and light tempering the despair of that Italian Peer-Gynt-Faust, Don Juan.

More interesting was D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," which Walter Damrosch explained so delightfully three Sundays ago. You could hear the wistful questioning of the giant Auferus, "Are you the King of Heaven?" and the vigorous denials.

A new work by Arnold Bax, "In the Faery Hills," was not too important. Its suggestion of Irish folk tunes was confined largely to vague bits of conventional jig-rhythms and the fluent use of harps.

That sprightly overture to the Lalo opera "Le Roi d'Ys" concluded the programme.

N.Y. MAIL. JAN 8

[101]

Music.

Symphony Concerts by a [illegible] ing and Local Orchestra.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Carnegie Hall last evening performed in the presence of a considerable audience a programme consisting of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony, "The Search for God" from Vincent d'Indy's "Legend of St. Christopher," a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax entitled "In the Faery Hills" and the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys."

The feature of this long and [illegible] concert was the performance of the overture that ended it. This overture is beautiful music by a man who had something to say and who knew how to say it. Played with spirit and tonal richness, this music came as a belated relief where relief was welcome. The "Manfred" symphony used to be performed here a good deal in the Safonoff period. Of late years it has mainly rested. An occasional performance is worth while for historical reasons, but really the symphony is very much of a bore. Monteux conducted a good performance of it.

It is impossible to write of the symphonic interlude from d'Indy's legend without touching on the controversy that continues about its composer. One thing is certain; it comprises the most successful pages of the score of which it makes a part. And, of course, the science of its composer never fails to command admiration. The Bax piece, which was done for the first time in New York, is, like so much other music that sets out to be supernaturally agreeable, distinctly tiresome in the hearing.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Society resumed its historical cycle under the direction of Walter Damrosch. Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony with piano and organ, and César Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra made the programme. Harold Bauer played the piano, Pietro Yon the organ, and René Pollain the viola obligato in Berlioz's symphony. The programme was performed well, and the audience seemed pleased with the instruction vouchsafed.

GLOBE - JAN 7

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony was the feature of the third Thursday night programme played here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. It is a work rarely enough heard here now. Byron, who once inspired more musicians than probably any other English poet, and perhaps more than any other poet in the world outside of Goethe—and possibly Dante—is almost as distant from modern audiences as are most of the composers he inspired.

Byron himself called "Manfred" his witch drama. That is almost all he gave by way of clue to it too. But the busy biographers have been finding all sorts of secret allusions to his own life in its lines. Every imaginable horror has been thrust up as its motif. Goethe himself wrote, with more directness than generosity:

"This singularly intellectual poet has extracted from my Faust the strongest nourishment for his hypochondria; but he has made use of the impelling principles for his own purpose . . . When a bold and enterprising young man he won the affections of a Florentine lady. Her husband discovered the amour and murdered his wife; but the murderer was the same night found dead in the street, and there was no one to whom any suspicion could be attached. Lord Byron removed from Florence, but these spirits have haunted him all his life. This romantic incident explains innumerable allusions. . . ."

Which is all plausible enough, considering that the allusions all do have to do with a murdered lady, were it not for the fact that Byron never saw Florence until after "Manfred" was completed. He was at the time of writing "Manfred" living mostly in Venice, jilting a cloth merchant's wife for a baker's wife—hence La Fornarina, he called her, after Raphael—and then jilting the baker's wife because she pulled the hats from the heads of any other dames who looked at her poet. Such was the background for a plot which Galt thought turned on a "tradition of unhallowed necromancy—a human sacrifice . . ."

But Byron himself says that "Manfred" owns no plot and hints away with dramatic delight: "It was the Staubbach and the Jungfrau, and something else more than Faustus, which made me write 'Manfred.'" And he says to Murray of one of his critics: "It had a better origin than he can devise or divine, for the soul of him!"

Tschaikowsky, with his hypochondriachal self-searchments, was the one to do most with such a theme, no matter how many might try it. The movements of "Manfred's wandering and despair" and the "invocation to Astarte" are acute in their suffering, great in their gloominess. The "Pastorale" throws a glacier glow over Byron's monarch of mountains, and Manfred's death sums up the whole of it in a terror pierced by a peal of beautiful hope. There is more of Byron in it all, surely, than in Schumann's pagodalike overture of angular solemnities.

After "Manfred" came "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from D'Indy's new opera, "The Legend of St Christopher," played here only a few weeks ago by the New York Symphony. And for another and more absolute novelty there followed a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject, "An Slaugh Sidhe" (In the Faery Hills). It is the work of the English composer Arnold Bax and this was its first performance in New York.

Mr. Bax, whose name is still in the ascendant abroad, scarcely on the horizon here, has been greeted by English critics as a very brilliant composer. Mr. Ernest Newman [illegible] that of the younger generation [illegible] ish musicians [illegible] undergone had told on his health. Symptoms of consumption now began to show themselves, and he was ordered to relinquish work and winter in the Crimea. The remaining years of his life were devoted entirely to composition. There seems no doubt that, but for his premature death, Kalinnikov would have won high place among Russian musicians." Only thirty-five when he died, Kalinnikov left behind him a considerable quantity of music including two symphonies and various smaller orchestral pieces, incidential music to Tolstoi's play "Tsar Boris," a cantata, a string quartet and the usual array of songs and pieces for the pianoforte.

This first symphony runs in four movements. The opening Allegro moderato is orthodox in form even to a repetition of the "exposition," and the two main themes are clear and straightforward—the first with strong suggestion of Russian folk-music. The second movement, an "Andante commodamente," begins placidly with a theme that is afterwards to receive a very different treatment in the Finale, while open fifths in the accompaniment impart to it an Oriental flavor, enhanced in an ensuing "Un poco piu mosso." Both themes are then developed and combined with much contrapuntal ingenuity, there is exciting progress to a "climax" and a return to the opening calm. In the Trio of the Scherzo, itself vigorous and straightforward, the music is frankly Eastern—another instance of "scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar." But in the last movement Kalinnikov is again the academic musician, showing his allegiance to the "cyclic form" of César Franck; by way of introduction he repeats in part the initial theme of the first Allegro; and the second theme of the Finale, though not a literal repetition of the songful melody of the first movement, resembles it very closely. At the end, the melody of the Andante is proclaimed majestically by the brass against a figuration derived from the main theme of the Finale itself. In summary, then, it may be said that no one who reads or hears the piece critically could reasonably doubt that Kalinnikov had either the proper upbringing or the proper instincts for a symphonist.

W. S. S.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Carnegie Hall last evening. The second will take place to-morrow afternoon. The thermometer fell considerably yesterday and not even the second stimulant in the shape of Byronic music administered in the evening (there had been one in the afternoon) served to keep some people from feeling the chill. M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the wise men of the East, began his entertainment with the "Manfred" symphony of Tschaikowsky. The work was vigorously played and there were some moments of finish in the performance. Also there were some of false intonation. But the audience seemed to like it.

Tschaikowsky was a great master, but if his fame had to rest on the "Manfred" symphony no one would ever cry "Beware the Muscovite." It is an exceedingly ponderous, dull and empty work, in which the only good ideas are those which sound like echoes of Rimsky-Korsakov. However, it seemed last evening to be a fitting prelude to the descriptive symphony from Vincent d'Indy's opera, "Le Legende de St. Christophe," called "La Queste de Dieu."

This music probably would be much more interesting in its place in the opera. Only such tid-bits as the intermezzo of "Cavalleria Rusticana" or the "Thais" meditation, which, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, have nothing to do with the case, can be transferred successfully to the concert room. D'Indy's intermezzo should be heard between the acts by those who do not feel obliged to go out.

It sounded last evening as if it meant something, but there was no key to the composer's purpose, and as sheer music it presented too many changes of front to be clear and satisfying. The orchestra played it very well. There was also a work of Arnold Bax, "In the Fairy Hills," a symphonic poem which will have to be heard earlier in the evening in order to receive proper consideration. The long concert came to an end with Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture.

N.Y. HERALD JAN. 7.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

It is not often that New York enjoys the chance to hear in one day two such orchestras as the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony. They represent the very apex of our musical culture—for symphony is a superior art form and opera seldom is—no matter what one thinks of their conductors. The band from Boston last night at Carnegie Hall discoursed most eloquently Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony. Toujours Byron. Earlier in the day we had listened to the "Harold" of Berlioz-Byron, but not altogether convinced that the monster machine had been worth the trouble of fabrication. The Russian's version of Byron did convince; in that vast land Byron has always been understood; there are Poushekine and Lermontov as witnesses. Berlioz's method of composition was the juxtaposition of huge blocks of tone; nothing melts or merges, while continual flux and flow are the life of the Tschaikowsky music, banal as some of it now sounds. But the chief weakness of Berlioz is his contrapuntal handling. Therein he is the eternal amateur. As Harold Bauer sensibly puts it: You can't make bricks without straw, and you can't make good music without counterpoint.

Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony vigorously and drew from his instrument a rich volume of tone. "The Search for God," by Vincent D'Indy is no longer a novelty, thanks to Mr. Damrosch. It is the most viable quotation from his opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher," produced at Paris with success. Still, we couldn't help recalling unhappy and tortured August Strindberg, crucified on the cross of his own morose genius. He said: "I searched for God and found the Devil." D'Indy searched too, but only found the devil of cacophony. The music is brilliantly dull.

The novelty of this curiously arranged programme was an ambitious symphonic poem, "In the Faery Hills," which contained one jolly, jigging Celtic, or Gaelic, tune served with modern harmonic sauce. Clever and well scored. It is by Arnold Bax, an English composer. The evening was announced to end with Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

N.Y. WORLD. JAN. 7.

AS the novelty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Thursday evening concert of the season Monsieur Monteux presented last night a symphonic poem entitled "An Sluagh Sidhe," or "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold Box, an English composer, who has always taken a lively interest in things Irish.

Regarding this work, which seems to be part of a larger composition, entitled "Eire," Phillip Hale presents much interesting material in his programme notes. But the music itself proved to be far less absorbing than the comments in the little booklet, and was the more tiring, because it had been preceded by Tschaikowsky's interminably long "Manfred" Symphony and D'Indy's labored and uninspired Descriptive Symphony, "La Queste de Dieu," from the opera, "La Legende de Saint Christophe."

What a relief after almost two hours of tediousness to hear the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys."

AMER. JAN. 7. N.Y.

VOL. LXX
NO. 4

COSMOPOLITAN

APRIL, 1921

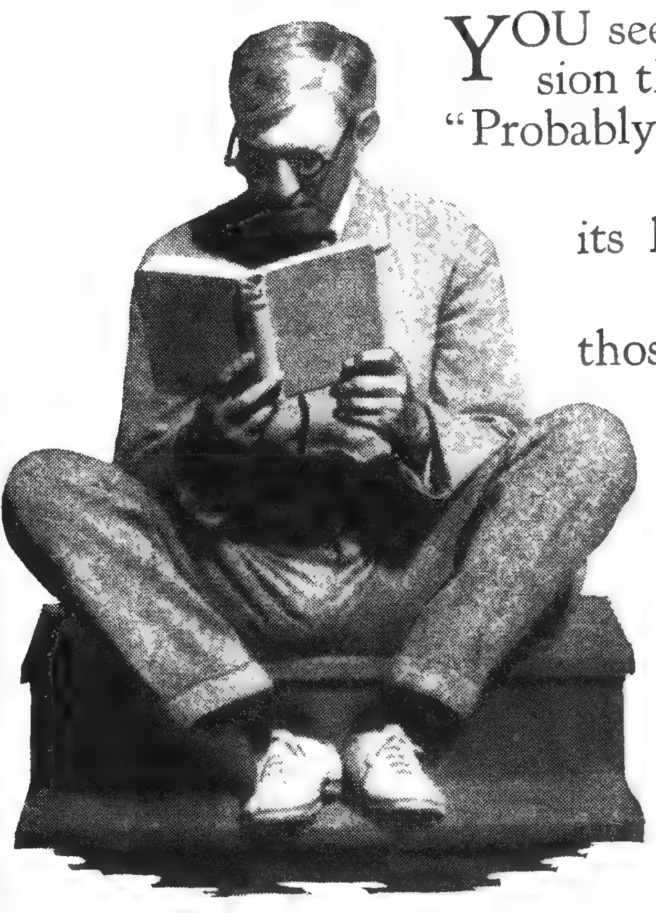
A humorous editorial by America's greatest humorist

George Ade on Music and Music-Lovers



George Ade

YOU see her for the first time, and somehow she gives you the impression that she has just bitten into a lemon; so you say to yourself, "Probably she plays the piano very well."

Why does perfectly good music have a curdling effect upon its high priests?

It is made for soothing purposes, so Shakespeare says, yet those who dope themselves too heavily with the richer varieties become temperamental dyspeptics.

Probably it would be awful hard to room with one who knew too much about music.

The cruel pity lavished by the bridge expert upon the mental defective who fails to comprehend signals is as naught compared with the devastating scorn which the Grieg fanatic visits upon the loyal followers of Irving Berlin.

Men who are not afraid to walk up to a machine gun will run a mile when they see a young woman who has been thoroughly conservatoried.

The light-headed layman whose cerebral corridors are constructed upon the general plan of a cantaloup always begins to look about and select the nearest exit when the conversation shifts to Grand Opera.

Music is the universal heritage. Somewhere in the flower-dotted fields between Brahms and "The Maiden's Prayer" there is room for all of us to ramble.

The hairy denizens of the studios probably would favor the electric chair for anyone who spoke out in defense of any tune that has committed the unpardonable offense of transmitting ecstasy to about ninety per cent. of the population.

Popularity need not be a synonym for cheapness and unworthiness. Prunes and sunsets and georgettes and kodaks are popular, but what would our vaunted civilization do without them?

A song which will caress the emotions of several millions of people is of more practical value than the average Congressional enactment. During the period which follows an orgy, what could be more beneficial than a restful diet of mush?

And yet who has the courage to look a tea-drinker straight in the eye and say that he prefers "Mother Machree" by John McCormack to "Tristan and Isolde"?

Speaking as one who has advanced from "Molly Darling" to "La Bohème," it is not to be denied that even the lowly born may learn to handle, and almost assimilate, music which appeals to the head as well as to the heels.

Only a few of us can establish altitude records in the higher realms of music. Be fair in your judgment of those who go up so high that they are no longer visible to the naked eye.

Be comforted by the reflection that all music is good.

Because you seek the drugging effects of ragtime, do not contradict those who claim to get an actual kick from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Be not ashamed of a sneaking fondness for minstrel songs and the solemn cadences of the old-time hymns. Make no apology for sentimental ballads. Maple-sirup, it is true; but what in the name of Vermont is wrong with maple-sirup?

The monthly issue of "records," the mechanical players, and the invading hosts of Chautauqua have carried a lot of real music into the most distant townships. The neighbors are becoming "educated." But they are still deathly afraid of the morbid genius who regards music as a secret cult instead of a general dispensation.

"In the Faery Hills"

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is industrious in bringing musical novelties to New York, and at the Bostonians' third concert of the season, in Carnegie Hall last night, he scored again over his local competitors by giving the first performance here of an exquisitely beautiful and masterfully orchestrated symphonic poem, a novel Gaelic fantasy, entitled "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold E. Trevor Bax. Arnold Bax is an English composer (at least he was born in London, in 1883), and at an early age he came under the influence of the Neo-Celtic movement in literature and art and took an absorbing interest in everything touched by the glamour of Ireland in ancient days. This symphonic poem was written when he was twenty-six years old, in 1909, and had its first performance in London in 1910. It is a work of such instant appeal to lovers of orchestral music and of such unmistakable poetry and power that the wonder is that it took ten years to reach New York, and then had to be brought by a visiting conductor.

Mr. Bax has vouchsafed so much of a programme as to say that his music attempts to suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight. "The composer has endeavored also to shadow forth the atmosphere of mystery and almost of terror with which the Irish people regard their faery compatriots. The middle section was to some extent suggested by a passage in Mr Yeats's 'Wanderings of Oisin,' in which a human bard having strayed among the host of the Sidhe (wind) is asked by them to sing a song for their pleasure. But when he sings a song of human joy the faeries declare it the saddest song that was ever sung and throw the harp away in sorrow and anger while the harper is swept away into their revel."

The music—mystic, wistful, ghostly, weird, yet at the same time eminently sane, vigorous, strong and coherent, with now and then a snatch of typical Irish melody boldly sung above its rushing winds of ethereal sound—has the impress of new and individual beauty, of sincerity and of power; and is of a curiously paradoxical character in that it is equally wistful and robust, a rare combination of qualities. It was superbly played by the Boston men and was received with prolonged plaudits of favor and delight by the large audience.

G. W. H.

N.Y. POST. JAN. 7.

By KATHARINE SPAETH.

WHERE so lately the tempestuous toes of Albert Coates pirouetted, the majestic arms of the volatile Toscanini waved, and the blond head of Leopold Stokowski nodded, last night le petit Pierre Monteux led the Boston Orchestra.

And that means the platform of Carnegie Hall, but no invidious comparisons are intended. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony flowed along, with a great deal of sweetness and light tempering the despair of that Italian Peer-Gynt-Faust, Don Juan.

More interesting was D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," which Walter Damrosch explained so delightfully three Sundays ago. You could hear the wistful questioning of the giant Auferus, "Are you the King of Heaven?" and the vigorous denials.

A new work by Arnold Bax, "In the Faery Hills," was not too important. Its suggestion of Irish folk tunes was confined largely to vague bits of conventional jig-rhythms and the fluent use of harps.

That sprightly overture to the Lalo opera "Le Roi d'Ys" concluded the programme.

N.Y. MAIL. JAN. 7.

[101]

Music.

Symphony Concerts by a Vi ing and Local Orchestra.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Carnegie Hall last evening performed in the presence of a siderable audience a programme sisting of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony, "The Search for God" Vincent d'Indy's "Legend of St. Chr topher," a symphonic poem by Arn Bax entitled "In the Faery Hills" the overture to Lalo's opera, Roi d'Ys."

The feature of this long and concert was the performance of overture that ended it. This overture is beautiful music by a man who something to say and who knew how to say it. Played with spirit tonal richness, this music came as belated relief where relief was come. The "Manfred" symphony used to be performed here a good in the Safonoff period. Of late years it has mainly rested. An occasional performance is worth while for torical reasons, but really the phony is very much of a bore. Monteux conducted a good performance of it.

It is impossible to write of symphonic interlude from d'Indy legend without touching on the troversy that continues about its poser. One thing is certain; it prises the most successful pages the score of which it makes a part. And, of course, the science of its poser never fails to command ration. The Bax piece, which done for the first time in New York, is, like so much other music that out to be supernaturally agreeable, distinctly tiresome in the hearing.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Society resumed its historical cycle under the direction of Walter Damrosch. Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony with piano and organ, and César Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra made the programme. Harold Bauer played the piano, Pietro Yon the organ, and René Pollain the viola obbligato in Berlioz's symphony. The programme was performed well, and the audience seemed pleased with the instruction vouchsafed.

BE-JAN

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony was the feature of the third Thursday night programme played here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. It is a work rarely enough heard here now. Byron, who once inspired more musicians than probably any other English poet, and perhaps more than any other poet in the world outside of Goethe—and possibly Dante—is almost as distant from modern audiences as are most of the composers he inspired.

Byron himself called "Manfred" his witch drama. That is almost all he gave by way of clue to it too. But the [illegible] biographers have been finding all sorts of secret allusions to his own life in its lines. Every imaginable horror has been thrust up as its motif. Goethe himself wrote, with more directness than generosity:

"This singularly intellectual poet has extracted from my Faust the strongest nourishment for his hypochondria; but he has made use of the impelling principles for his own purpose . . . When a bold and enterprising young man he won the affections of a Florentine lady. Her husband discovered the amour and murdered his wife; but the murderer was the same night found dead in the street, and there was no one to whom any suspicion could be attached. Lord Byron removed from Florence, but these spirits have haunted him all his life. This romantic incident explains innumerable allusions. . . ."

Which is all plausible enough, considering that the allusions all do have to do with a murdered lady, were it not for the fact that Byron never saw Florence until after "Manfred" was completed. He was at the time of writing "Manfred" living mostly in Venice, jilting a cloth merchant's wife for a baker's wife—hence La Fornarina, he called her, after Raphael—and then jilting the baker's wife because she pulled the hats from the heads of any other dames who looked at her poet. Such was the background for a plot which Galt thought turned on a "tradition of unhallowed necromancy—a human sacrifice . . ."

But Byron himself says that "Manfred" owns no plot and hints away with dramatic delight: "It was the Staubbach and the Jungfrau, and something else more than Faustus, which made me write 'Manfred.'" And he says to Murray of one of his critics: "It had a better origin than he can devise or divine, for the soul of him!"

Tschaikowsky, with his hypochondriachal self-searchments, was the one to do most with such a theme, no matter how many might try it. The movements of "Manfred's wandering and despair" and the "Invocation to Astarte" are acute in their suffering, great in their gloominess. The "Pastorale" throws a glacier glow over Byron's monarch of mountains, and Manfred's death sums up the whole of it in a terror pierced by a peal of beautiful hope. There is more of Byron in it all, surely, than in Schumann's pagodalike overture of angular solemnities.

After "Manfred" came "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from D'Indy's new opera, "The Legend of St Christopher," played here only a few weeks ago by the New York Symphony. And for another and more absolute novelty there followed a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject, "An Slaugh Sidhe" (In the Faery Hills). It is the work of the English composer Arnold Bax, and this was its first performance in New York.

Mr. Bax, whose name is still in the ascendant abroad, scarcely on the horizon here, has been greeted by the English critics as a very brilliant, gifted composer. Mr. Ernest Newman hopes that of the younger generation of English musicians America will take

SIC.

ncerts by a Visit-
ocal Orchestra.
CE SANBORN.
Symphony Orchestra renegie Hall last evening and in the presence of a con-audience a programme con-
Tchaikovsky's "Manfred"
"The Search for God" from d'Indy's "Legend of St. Chris-symphonic poem by Arnold ed "In the Faery Hills," and ture to Lalo's opera, "Le ture of this long and curious was the performance of the

that ended it. This overture ful music by a man who had g to say and who knew how
it. Played with spirit and ehness, this music came as a relief where relief was wel-
The "Manfred" symphony
e performed here a good deal afonoff period. Of late years mainly rested. An occasional ance is worth while for his reasons, but really the sym-
s very much of a bore. Mr.
conducted a good perform-
it.
impossible to write of the nio interlude from d'Indy's without touching on the conthat continues about its com-
One thing is certain; it con-
the most successful pages of
re of which it makes a part.
course, the science of its com-
never fails to command admi-
The Bax piece, which was
r the first time in New York,
so much other music that sets
be supernaturally agreeable,
ly tiresome in the hearing.
arnegie Hall yesterday after-
he Symphony Society resumed
orical cycle under the direction
ter Damrosch. Berlioz's "Ha-Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's or symphony with piano and
and César Franck's symphonic
ons for piano and orchestra
the programme. Harold Bauer
the piano, Pietro Yon the or-
nd René Pollain the viola obbli-Berlioz's symphony. The pro-
e was performed well, and the ce seemed pleased with the in-
on vouchsafed.

GLOBE JAN 7

owsky's "Manfred" Symphony
eature of the third Thursday
gramme played here this sea-
e Boston Symphony Orchestra
ie Hall last night. It is a work ough heard here now. Byron, inspired more musicians than any other English poet, and ore than any other poet in the tside of Goethe—and possibly
s almost as distant from modences as are most of the com-inspired.
himself called "Manfred" his
ama. That is almost all he way of clue to it too. But the graphers have been finding all secret allusions to his own life
nes. Every imaginable horror thrust up as its motif. Goethe wrote, with more directness
nerosity:
singularly intellectual poet has
d from my Faust the strongest nent for his hypochondria; but made use of the impelling prin-
for his own purpose . . .
bold and enterprising young
won the affections of a Floren-dy. Her husband discovered the and murdered his wife; but the er was the same night found the street, and there was no one
m any suspicion could be at-
Lord Byron removed from
e, but these spirits have haunted
his life. This romantic incident
s innumerable allusions. . . ."
h is all plausible enough, cong that the allusions all do have to h a murdered lady, were it not fact that Byron never saw Florntil after "Manfred" was com-
He was at the time of writing
red" living mostly in Venice, jiltcloth merchant's wife for a baker's
hence La Fornarina, he called her,
Raphael—and then jilting the
s wife because she pulled the hats
the heads of any other dames who
at her poet. Such was the back-
d for a plot which Galt thought
l on a "tradition of unhallowed mancy—a human sacrifice . . ."
Byron himself says that "Man-
owns no plot and hints away
dramatic delight: "It was the bach and the Jungfrau, and some-else more than Faustus, which me write 'Manfred.'" And he
to Murray of one of his critics;
ad a better origin than he can de-
or divine, for the soul of him!"
haikowsky, with his hypochondri-self-searchments, was the one to most with such a theme, no matter many might try it. The moves of "Manfred's wandering and tis" and the "invocation to As-
" are acute in their suffering,
t in their gloominess. The "Pastor-throws a glacier glow over Byron's rch of mountains, and Manfred's h sums up the whole of it in a ter-pierced by a peal of beautiful hope.
e is more of Byron in it all, surely,
in Schumann's pagodalike over-
of angular solemnities.
er "Manfred" came "La Queste de a symphonic excerpt from D'Innew opera, "The Legend of St.
opher," played here only a few ago by the New York Symphony.
r another and more absolute novere followed a symphonic poem sic subject, "An Slaugh Sidhe"
e Faery Hills). It is the work English composer Arnold Bax.
his was its first performance in York.
Bax, whose name is still in the ent abroad, scarcely on the ho-here, has been greeted by the

Bax as the most truly representative
But this fairy piece is representative of no English characteristic as that of the English eclecticism—and Rimsky-Korsakov stalks through County Clare in ways that are long and circuitous.
There was much reliance upon the harp, accounting for the Irish element.

SUN JAN. 7.

Boston Symphony Plays Novelty Picturing Birds

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Repeated in Interesting Program at Carnegie Hall

There was a novelty on the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions from Nature") Suite No. 1. It comprises three little sketches suggested by three birds, the Blackcap, the Woodpecker and the Owl. The first pictures the song of the bird in autumn woods. In the second the woodpecker is at work on the mildewed trunks o the oaks at high noon. The forest is en fête, teeming with life under the warming rays of the sun. In the third the mournful note of the owl is heard through the stillness of night. All three show imagination and exquisite fancy, and Malipiero has not found it necessary to wallow in dissonance. Each of the pieces has character and distinction, each is skilfully orchestrated.

Another feature of a delightful program was a repetition of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by the late Charles Griffes, a symphonic poem first played here last season by Mr. Monteux. A second hearing renews the excellent impression made by the music at its first performance, and deepens the realization of the tragic loss to American music caused by the composer's early death. This music is a fitting musical embodiment of Coleridge's superb poem. The poetry is Coleridge at his best and one is almost tempted to say that the music is greater than the poem. Griffes is magnificently Oriental, but his Orientalism is no mere borrowing or imitation. It is his own.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4, Op. 120 in D minor, one of his lesser works chiefly notable for its Romanza, which has a distinctly Celtic flavoring. Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni" and Casella's ingenious orchestration of Balakireff's "Islamey" were the other pieces. An interesting program delightfully played.

TRIBUNE. JAN. 7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its New York visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The fourth symphony of Schumann was the chief number of the program, which included also the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" and Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakireff's brilliant piano piece, "Islamey."

In Schumann's symphony neither orchestra nor conductor was very satisfactory. The performance was distinctly a commonplace one; it seemed perfunctory. Now this symphony, however much its orchestration may be criticised, is not commonplace music, nor is it perfunctory in spirit; and it is indispensable that it should not be played so. The romantic glow in it is still warm and there is a fault somewhere when a performance so signally fails to recapture that spirit as did the performance yesterday afternoon. It centred, no doubt, in a lack of sympathy or a lack of comprehension. Nor could it be said that the performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture was a brilliant one.

There was far more of the spirit of the music in Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." This piece was first played here last season, while the composer was still alive, and he had the pleasure of knowing of its very favorable reception in New York and in other cities. Mr. Monteux did an excellent thing in repeating the composition in his concerts this year. One of the grievances of the American composer—though Mr. Griffes is not known to have audibly voiced grievances—is that his music is played once and then shelved, even when it is found deserving.

This symphonic poem is well worth keeping in the orchestral repertory. It is filled with imagination, with picturesque and poetical imagery, and these are expressed in a manner essentially musical in ideas and development, so that the interest and value of the piece are musical beyond and outside of the picturesque and graphic suggestion that is set in motion by Coleridge's verses. Once again Mr. Griffes's composition gave a deep pleasure.

There was a new piece on the program. Francesco Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero"—the title is paraphrased as "Impressions from Nature"—was played for the first time in New York. It consists of three sections called, respectively, "The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," "The Owl." It is not to be supposed that the composer was greatly preoccupied with the calls or notes of these three birds. He has endeavored to recall "the musical impression that he himself one day felt in listening to the confidences of the woods peopled with birds." The music is evocative of woods. There are native wood notes, more or less wild. The first is a "Waldweben" of a sort; the peck of the woodpecker is indeed heard in the rapid movement of the second; and the suggestion of the owl in the third, in which the music is carried through in the mood of the nocturne, is that of a gentle bird. The composer is less concerned with giving form and shape to his music, which has charm and a varied harmonic beauty, than in developing atmosphere and effect. These were pleasingly in evidence, but the composition did not assert itself as of great importance.

TIMES-JAN. 9

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Charms Anew at Concert

Fantastic Oriental Music Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alph, the sacred river, will flow down to the sunless sea through many a winter day and summer night. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a fantastic Oriental symphonic poem in which Charles T. Griffes, an American composer, sings of it should be here to stay. The Boston Symphony Orchestra produced the work here on December 4, 1919, and repeated it yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. And again it was good to hear. The untimely death of Mr. Griffes robbed us of other well written music. Let us enjoy this while we can.

Few composers handle the Oriental idioms with the mastery of Mr. Griffes. Few use an orchestra with more certainty or greater variety of color. And still fewer of this barren period possess the American's picturesque conceptions. The symphonic poem was well performed yesterday afternoon and it received more applause than anything else on the list. And this, too, was an event. An American composition warmly approved by Americans! That is something to remember.

For some reason the same Americans were less enthusiastic about the "Impressioni del Vero" of Malipiero. Perhaps it was because the music was slighter of texture and less direct in its methods of expression except in the matter of the owl. It was no tragic owl "that shrieked, the fatal bellman, which gives the stern'st goodnight," but a gentle solitary that chanted its last "to whoo" through the whispering pianissimo of a mellow clarinet. One loved that owl. For the blackcap and the woodpecker there is less to say. And all three sounded somewhat thin after the luscious utterances of Mr. Griffes's score.

The concert began with the overture to "Don Giovanni," apparently given to play the people in. Then followed Schumann's D minor symphony, which was performed in a manner indicating that Mr. Monteux regarded it as a necessary evil to be endured and got rid of as soon as possible. The programme ended with Alfred Casella's orchestration of Balakirev's "Islamey." The thing ought to be orchestrated into the fourth dimension, like Mr. Hunker's enchanted symphony. It was not an afternoon of unmixed joy and not the least unpleasant part of it was the downright heavy and mechanical playing of the orchestra in the Schumann work. But as that is the sort of playing now pronounced good in Boston we need hope for nothing better.

N.Y. HERALD JAN. 9.

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

AN INTERESTING CONCERT.

The programme at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was interesting: Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, the fourth symphony of Schumann, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by the late Charles T. Griffes; a novelty by the sprightly young Italian composer, Malipiero, "Impressions From Nature," Suite No. 1, all ending with Balakireff's "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

The bird music of Malipiero might have extorted a smile from the sardonic Aristophanes; fellow feeling makes us wondrous sour. There are plenty of sour notes in this charming music, for charming it is as a whole. The owl was in it, but not the pussycat; the woodpecker pecked and the blackcap warbled. We liked the little two-note call of Minerva's pet fowl, best of all we admired the rustic piping of Mr. Longy's oboe. He evoked true woodland air. The Malipiero dissonances no longer disturb; they derive from the genial Mr. Stravinski, who must keep a harmonious vinegar factory somewhere down the River Don. Strictly speaking, we preferred the "Islamey" Oriental fantasy when it was so astonishingly played years ago by the Russian virtuoso and famous Liszt pupil, Arthur Friedheim. Notwithstanding the kaleidoscopic orchestration of the clever Casella, we missed the incisive "martellato" of the pianoforte. However, it was a brilliant experiment in color and rhythm and gorgeously played under Pierre Monteaux's energetic baton. Rimsky-Korsakoff evidently remembered one of its themes when he wrote "The Golden Cock."

It is always with a feeling of hesitation that a critic hears for the second time a composition that made an appeal to him when a novelty. Will the magic operate again? We are glad to record the fact that in the case of the Griffes setting of Coleridge's magnificent poem, "Kubla Khan," the magic still lurked in its mysterious and opulent measures, and always will be there because a poet-composer has stamped his music with the seal of a vivid imagination, a planturous imagination, one that revels in the fantastic dreams of far-away, mystic Asia. Slavic influences are easy to trace in this score, Rimsky-Korsakoff and some traits of Tchaikovsky, in the manipulation of [illegible] choir. The narrative tone

after the dusky atmosphere of the opening, is often broken into episodes—the line of force and continuity escapes us, but the ensemble effect of the picture is impressive in its evocation of a light that never was on sea or land. The loss to American art through the death of Griffes is twofold; he was a musician doubled by a poet. He would have outlived the sultry and opiate spirit of Coleridge, but he would have always remained the imaginative thinker in tone.

The Boston organization made a better showing at this matinee than it did last Thursday evening. The Schumann symphony, redolent with melody, is a favorite of Pere Monteux. There was a crowded house and much genuine enthusiasm after the Griffes music.

N.Y. WORLD JAN. 9.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon was a reminder of the loss to American music in the untimely death of Charles T. Griffes, a victim in this rich country to underpay and overwork. The orchestra played his "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Kahn," which Mr. Monteux introduced here last season, and once more the imaginative splendor of the music and its promise of still better things to come were most impressive. The programme included also some bird studies by Malipiero ("Impressions from Nature," suite No. 1), a novelty in New York; the overture to "Don Giovanni," Schumann's fourth symphony, and an orchestral version by Alfredo Casella of Balakireff's oriental fantasy for piano, "Islamey."

The Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon offered its patrons Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, two movements from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Victor de Sabatas symphonic poem "Juventus" (introduced here the other day by Mr. Toscanini), and Albert Spalding in the Beethoven violin concerto.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Reinald Werrenrath gave another of his delightful song recitals.

NY GLOBE JAN 9

rom JAN 10 1921 K
VENING POST,
New York City

Day and Night Concerts

The time is evidently coming when day and night will not suffice for all the orchestral concerts in New York. Something—though it is hard to think just what—will have to be sandwiched in between day and night to make room for all the conductors and players. Saturday was a day as full as a Fifth Avenue uptown stage at 6 P. M. Damrosch gave one of his morning concerts for children in Aeolian Hall at 11 o'clock. At 2:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra began, and at 8:30 the Philharmonic had one of its series of popular Saturday evening performances.

The Boston Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, did not give as inspired a performance of Schumann's fourth symphony as Nikisch did when he made his memorable début in Boston. It was heard to better advantage in a repetition of Griffes's interesting symphonic poem "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" and still more in a novelty by Francesco Malipiero, the Italian futurist—"Impressioni dal Vero." It is a series of impressions of nature entitled "The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," and "The Owl," realistic in mood and characteristically orchestrated with less deliberate intention to bruise the ears with dissonances than appears in other works by this peculiar Italian.

---

rom
TIMES
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEW ORGANIZATION

Comparisons Dim Performance of Orchestra and Soloist, Piastro.

BY JULIUS HARTT.

Many seasons have come and gone since the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first concert in Hartford. Men and women of middle age who were present on that occasion are now in the sere and yellow leaf or have passed on with their elders to join the choir invisible. The boys and girls of that long gone day are now responsible members of the community. Both classes were represented in the large audience that enthusiastically greeted the Boston orchestra at Parsons's theater on Monday evening. The memories of both classe must have been busy. For, the passing of the years has wrought changes with the Boston Symphony orchestra as with all things human. Most of the fodre players in the band are to be seen there no longer. Some few, like Mr. Schroeder, remain, their presence accentuating the absence of these who were once their colleagues.

The Boston Symphony orchestra that appeared in Parsons's theater last evening is not, in fact, the old Boston Symphony orchestra. The heyday of that once incomparable organization is passed and gone. The Boston Symphony orchestra of to-day is an entirely different institution. And this fact is not altered by the remaining presence of here and there an instrumentalist, more particularly in the brass and wood-wind choirs, who contributed to the glory of the old organization. Nor can Mr. Monteux as a conductor be justly said to [illegible] the royal succession of those [illegible] orchestral leadership that brought the Boston band to a place of undisputed supremacy among the orchestras of the world.

There is no patriotism in pretending what is not true. And no good end can be served by any such pretension. It may be said, and said justly, that the Boston Symphony orchestra is much improved since last year. But it is mere ignorance and foolishness to assert that the present performances of this orchestra, including last evening's concert, are in any way comparable to the achievements that have made the annals of this organization the chief musical glory of the United States. The program presented by Mr. Monteux at this concert included the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"; the Tschaikowsky violin concerto with Mishel Piastro as soloist, and the Liszt "Tasso," symphonic poem. The performance of most of this music was almost as conspicuous for what it did not as for what it did attain. And here again, a god many memories must have been busy. For it is not so long since all this music was played here by the old Boston Symphony orchestra that forgetfulness can have wiped out the records.

Both the Rimsky-Korsakoff Suite, which is said to be a sort of specialty with Mr. Monteux, and the Liszt Symphonic Poem were given renditions interesting enough perhaps, but rigid, unplastic and colorless as compared with the potentialities of either or both compositions and especially, again be it remarked, as compared with memory's promptings of what the Boston orchestra has done in times past with these works. Mr. Piastre played the Tschaikowsky concerto with brilliant, even remarkable technical prowess but seldom with much warmth of tone or emotional potency. He may have felt himself somewhat severely in leash to Mr. Monteux's baton. At any rate, there were invisible laurels won by Kathleen Parlow and Mischa Elman in the same concerto that seemed to remain before the footlights undimmed in the presence of Mr Piastro's performance.

Conductor, soloist and orchestra were enthusiastically acclaimed last evening. The concert was in truth a good concert, disclosing many and engrossing excellences. It is only at the inevitable question of comparisons that hesitation raises an imperious finger.

From JAN 29
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening in the Academy of Music at 8:15 Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony (D minor), Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Djinns." In this piece the solo will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist. As soloist, Madame Hulda Lashanska will sing Juliet's "Romanza," from Bellini's opera, "The Capulets and the Montagues," and an air from Faccio's opera "Hamlet."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From EveningMail
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE last pair of Boston Symphony concerts, but one, this season will be given at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux has arranged for the Thursday evening concert the following programme:—Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano solo will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer ("The Sea") and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the Second of Dvorak in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse.

POST
Washington, D. C.
JAN 30 1921 L

Coming Concerts

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the lyric soprano, will appear as soloist at the next to the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, at the New National Theater, Tuesday at 4:30 p. m. Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's overture in the Italian style in C major, Haydn's so-called "military" symphony in G major, and the spirited and piquant suite Francaise by Roger Ducasse. Mme. Lashanska will sing with the orchestra Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so," from the "Magic Flute," and Carpentier's famous "Depuis le jour" from his opera "Louise." Tickets may be obtained from Mrs [illegible] in Droop's.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
30 1921 L

Lashanska as Soloist.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season, but one, will be given at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, with Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the celebrated American soprano, appearing as soloist. She will sing with the orchestra Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so" from Mozart's "Magic Flute," and the famous aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's opera "Louise." Pierre Monteux will conduct the following purely symphonic works upon his program: Schubert's overture in the Italian Style in C major, Haydn's "Military" Symphony, and Roger-Ducasse's Suite Francaise, in D major.

From 30 1921 L
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

CONCERTS

LASHANSKA—BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the noted lyric soprano, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last concert but one, to be given next Tuesday afternoon in the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert: Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," in C major; Haydn's so-called "Military Symphony," in G major, one of this master's last works, which was written for the series of concerts he gave in London; and the spirited and piquant "Suite Francaise," by the living French composer, Roger Ducasse.

Mme. Lashanska will sing with the orchestra Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so," from "The Magic Flute," and Charpentier's famous "Depuis le jour," from his opera "Louise." There is considerable interest in the pending appearance of Mme. Lashanska with the orchestra. Her debut several seasons ago in New York caused quite a stir of enthusiastic praise in that city. Since then her intelligence as an interpreter and the fresh beauty of her voice have brought her a foremost place among the lyric sopranos of the rising generation.

The Boston Symphony concerts are under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in Droop's, at Thirteenth and G streets.

---

ddress New York City
te TIMES JAN 30 192

The Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee in Carnegie Hall comprises Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, two "Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott,

a "Suite Française" by Roger-Ducasse and Wagner's "Faust" overture.
Josef Lhevinne assists the Philhar-

Address New York City
Date TIMES JAN 30 192

A last pair but one of the Boston Symphony concerts marks the advancing season this week at Carnegie Hall, where Pierre Monteux on Thursday night conducts Beethoven's First Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," and Franck's "Les Djinus," with solo piano part by E. Robert Schmitz. There is also Liszt's "Tasso."

LISHED 1881
EGRAM
w York City

raised for Smith College.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts, but one, of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux has arranged the following programes:—

For the Thursday concert—Beethaven's First Symphony in C major, two Passacaglias, by Cyril Scott; Debussy's symphonic suite, "La Mer," with the following movements:—I. "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean." II. "Frolic of the Waves." III. "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday concert—Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor; Suite Francaise, by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" Overture.

---

m HERALD
ress New York City
te JAN 1921

The programme for the Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall is: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Franck, poem, "Les Djinus," with piano solo played by E. Robert Schmitz; Debussy, Suite "Le Mer"; Liszt, poem, "Tasso." The programme for the orchestra's Saturday afternoon concert is: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2; Scott, two Passacaglias; Roger-Ducasse, Suite "Francaise"; Wagner, "A Faust Overture."

---

ew York City
JAN 31 1921 D
JAN 31 1921 D

The Invaders.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, February 3, and Saturday afternoon, February 5, Pierre Monteux has arranged the following programme:

For the Thursday concert—Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," with the following movements: I. From Dawn to Noon on the Ocean. II. Frolic of the Waves. III. Dialogue of Wind and Sea, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday concert—Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor; suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" overture.

USIC.

Concerts by a Visi-and Local Orchestra.

By PITTS SANBORN.

ston Symphony Orchestra rernegie Hall last evening and
in the presence of a con-
audience a programme con-
Tchaikovsky's "Manfred"
"The Search for God" from d'Indy's "Legend of St. Chrisa symphonic poem by Arnold tled "In the Faery Hills," and rture to Lalo's opera, "Le ature of this long and curious

was the performance of the
that ended it. This overture iful music by a man who had ng to say and who knew how
it. Played with spirit and chness, this music came as a relief where relief was wel-
The "Manfred" symphony be performed here a good deal afonoff period. Of late years mainly rested. An occasional ance is worth while for his reasons, but really the symis very much of a bore. Mr.
x conducted a good perform-
it.

impossible to write of the nic interlude from d'Indy's
without touching on the con-
y that continues about its com-
One thing is certain; it com-
the most successful pages of
re of which it makes a part.
course, the science of its com-
never fails to command admi-
The Bax piece, which was
r the first time in New York,
so much other music that sets
be supernaturally agreeable,
ly tiresome in the hearing.
arnegie Hall yesterday after-
he Symphony Society resumed
orical cycle under the direction
lter Damrosch. Berlioz's "Ha-Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's
or symphony with piano and
and César Franck's symphonic
ons for piano and orchestra
the programme. Harold Bauer
the piano, Pietro Yon the or-
nd René Pollain the viola obbli-Berlioz's symphony. The pro-
e was performed well, and the ce seemed pleased with the in-
on vouchsafed.

GLOBE-JAN 7

owsky's "Manfred" Symphony feature of the third Thursday
gramme played here this sea-
e Boston Symphony Orchestra
ie Hall last night. It is a work ugh heard here now. Byron,
inspired more musicians than
any other English poet, and
ore than any other poet in the tside of Goethe—and possibly
s almost as distant from mod-nces as are most of the com-
inspired.

himself called "Manfred" his rama. That is almost all he way of clue to it too. But the graphers have been finding all secret allusions to his own life
nes. Every imaginable horror
thrust up as its motif. Goethe wrote, with more directness
erosity:

singularly intellectual poet has
d from my Faust the strongest ment for his hypochondria; but made use of the impelling prin-
for his own purpose . . .
bold and enterprising young
won the affections of a Floren-
y. Her husband discovered the nd murdered his wife; but the r was the same night found
the street, and there was no one
m any suspicion could be at-
Lord Byron removed from
e, but these spirits have haunted
his life. This romantic incident
s innumerable allusions. . . ."

h is all plausible enough, con-
g that the allusions all do have to
h a murdered lady, were it not
fact that Byron never saw Floruntil after "Manfred" was com-
He was at the time of writing
red" living mostly in Venice, jilt-
cloth merchant's wife for a baker's
hence La Fornarina, he called her,
Raphael—and then jilting the
s wife because she pulled the hats
the heads of any other dames who
at her poet. Such was the back-
d for a plot which Galt thought
d on a "tradition of unhallowed
mancy—a human sacrifice . . ."
Byron himself says that "Man-
owns no plot and hints away
dramatic delight: "It was the bach and the Jungfrau, and some-
else more than Faustus, which
me write 'Manfred.'" And he
to Murray of one of his critics;
ad a better origin than he can de-
or divine, for the soul of him!"
chaikovsky, with his hypochondri-self-searchments, was the one to ost with such a theme, no matter
many might try it. The move-
s of "Manfred's wandering and
" and the "invocation to Ase" are acute in their suffering,
t in their gloominess. The "Pastor-
throws a glacier glow over Byron's arch of mountains, and Manfred's sums up the whole of it in a ter-pierced by a peal of beautiful hope.
re is more of Byron in it all, surely,
in Schumann's pagodalike over-
e of angular solemnities.
fter "Manfred" came "La Queste de u," a symphonic excerpt from D'In-s new opera, "The Legend of St.
istopher," played here only a few ks ago by the New York Symphony.
d for another and more absolute nov-there followed a symphonic poem
"An Slaugh Sidhe"
Gaelic subject, [illegible] It is the work the Faery Hills). [illegible] composer Arnold Bax, the English [illegible]
this was its first performance in York.
Bax, whose name is still in the dant abroad, scarcely on the ho-
here, has been greeted by the sh critics as a very brilliant gifted er. Mr. Ernest Newman [illegible]

Bax as the most truly representative But this fairy piece is representative of no English characteristic as that of the English eclecticism—and Rimsky-Korsakov stalks through County Clare in ways that are long and circuitous. There was much reliance upon the harp, accounting for the Irish element.

SUN JAN. 7.

Boston Symphony Plays Novelty Picturing Birds

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Repeated in Interesting Program at Carnegie Hall

There was a novelty on the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions from Nature") Suite No. 1. It comprises three little sketches suggested by three birds; the Blackcap, the Woodpecker and the Owl. The first pictures the song of the bird in autumn woods. In the second the woodpecker is at work on the mildewed trunks of the oaks at high noon. The forest is en fête, teeming with life under the warming rays of the sun. In the third the mournful note of the owl is heard through the stillness of night. All three show imagination and exquisite fancy, and Malipiero has not found it necessary to wallow in dissonance. Each of the pieces has character and distinction, each is skilfully orchestrated.

Another feature of a delightful program was a repetition of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by the late Charles Griffes, a symphonic poem first played here last season by Mr. Monteux. A second hearing renews the excellent impression made by the music at its first performance, and deepens the realization of the tragic loss to American music caused by the composer's early death. This music is a fitting musical embodiment of Coleridge's superb poem. The poetry is Coleridge at his best and one is almost tempted to say that the music is greater than the poem. Griffes is magnificently Oriental, but his Orientalism is no mere borrowing or imitation. It is his own.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4, Op. 120 in D minor, one of his lesser works chiefly notable for its Romanza, which has a distinctly Celtic flavoring. Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni" and Casella's ingenious orchestration of Balakireff's "Islamey" were the other pieces. An interesting program delightfully played.

TRIBUNE.JAN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its New York visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The fourth symphony of Schumann was the chief number of the program, which included also the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" and Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakireff's brilliant piano piece, "Islamey."

In Schumann's symphony neither orchestra nor conductor was very satisfactory. The performance was distinctly a commonplace one; it seemed perfunctory. Now this symphony, however much its orchestration may be criticised, is not commonplace music, nor is it perfunctory in spirit; and it is indispensable that it should not be played so. The romantic glow in it is still warm and there is a fault somewhere when a performance so signally fails to recapture that spirit as did the performance yesterday afternoon. It centred, no doubt, in a lack of sympathy or a lack of comprehension. Nor could it be said that the performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture was a brilliant one.

There was far more of the spirit of the music in Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." This piece was first played here last season, while the composer was still alive; and he had the pleasure of knowing of its very favorable reception in New York and in other cities. Mr. Monteux did an excellent thing in repeating the composition in his concerts this year. One of the grievances of the American composer—though Mr. Griffes is not known to have audibly voiced grievances—is that his music is played once and then shelved, even when it is found deserving.

This symphonic poem is well worth keeping in the orchestral repertory. It is filled with imagination, with picturesque and poetical imagery, and these are expressed in a manner essentially musical in ideas and development, so that the interest and value of the piece are musical beyond and outside of the picturesque and graphic suggestion that is set in motion by Coleridge's verses. Once again Mr. Griffes's composition gave a deep pleasure.

There was a new piece on the program. Francesco Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero"—the title is paraphrased as "Impressions from Nature"—was played for the first time in New York. It consists of three sections called, respectively, "The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," "The Owl." It is not to be supposed that the composer was greatly preoccupied with the calls or notes of these three birds. He has endeavored to recall "the musical impression that he himself one day felt in listening to the confidences of the woods peopled with birds." The music is evocative of woods. There are native wood notes, more or less wild. The first is a "Waldweben" of a sort; the peck of the woodpecker is indeed heard in the rapid movement of the second; and the suggestion of the owl in the third, in which the music is carried through in the mood of the nocturne, is that of a gentle bird. The composer is less concerned with giving form and shape to his music, which has charm and a varied harmonic beauty, than in developing atmosphere and effect. These were pleasingly in evidence, but the composition did not assert itself as of great importance.

TIMES - JAN 9

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Charms Anew at Concert

Fantastic Oriental Music Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alph, the sacred river, will flow down to the sunless sea through many a winter day and summer night. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a fantastic Oriental symphonic poem in which Charles T. Griffes, an American composer, sings of it should be here to stay. The Boston Symphony Orchestra produced the work here on December 4, 1919, and repeated it yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. And again it was good to hear. The untimely death of Mr. Griffes robbed us of other well written music. Let us enjoy this while we can.

Few composers handle the Oriental idioms with the mastery of Mr. Griffes. Few use an orchestra with more certainty or greater variety of color. And still fewer of this barren period possess the American's picturesque conceptions The symphonic poem was well performed yesterday afternoon and it received more applause than anything else on the list. And this, too, was an event. An American composition warmly approved by Americans! That is something to remember.

For some reason the same Americans were less enthusiastic about the "Impressioni del Vero" of Malipiero. Perhaps it was because the music was slighter of texture and less direct in its methods of expression except in the matter of the owl. It was no tragic owl "that shrieked, the fatal bellman, which gives the stern'st goodnight," but a gentle solitary that chanted its last "to whoo" through the whispering pianissimo of a mellow clarinet. One loved that owl. For the blackcap and the woodpecker there is less to say. And all three sounded somewhat thin after the luscious utterances of Mr. Griffes's score.

The concert began with the overture to "Don Giovanni," apparently given to play the people in. Then followed Schumann's D minor symphony, which was performed in a manner indicating that Mr. Monteux regarded it as a necessary evil to be endured and got rid of as soon as possible. The programme ended with Alfred Casella's orchestration of Balakirev's "Islamey." The thing ought to be orchestrated into the fourth dimension, like Mr. Hunker's enchanted symphony. It was not an afternoon of unmixed joy and not the least unpleasant part of it was the downright heavy and mechanical playing of the orchestra in the Schumann work. But as that is the sort of playing now pronounced good in Boston we need hope for nothing better.

N.Y. HERALD JAN.9.

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

AN INTERESTING CONCERT.

The programme at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was interesting: Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, the fourth symphony of Schumann, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by the late Charles T. Griffes; a novelty by the sprightly young Italian composer, Malipiero, "Impressions From Nature," Suite No. 1, all ending with Balakireff's "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

The bird music of Malipiero might have extorted a smile from the sardonic Aristophanes; fellow feeling makes us wondrous sour. There are plenty of sour notes in this charming music, for charming it is as a whole. The owl was in it, but not the pussycat; the woodpecker pecked and the blackcap warbled. We liked the little two-note call of Minerva's pet fowl. best of all we admired the rustic piping of Mr. Longy's oboe. He evoked true woodland air. The Malipiero dissonances no longer disturb; they derive from the genial Mr. Stravinski, who must keep a harmonious vinegar factory somewhere down the River Don. Strictly speaking, we preferred the "Islamey" Oriental fantasy when it was so astonishingly played years ago by the Russian virtuoso and famous Liszt pupil, Arthur Friedheim. Notwithstanding the kaleidoscopic orchestration of the clever Casella, we missed the incisive "martellato" of the pianoforte. However, it was a brilliant experiment in color and rhythm and gorgeously played under Pierre Monteaux's energetic baton. Rimsky-Korsakoff evidently remembered one of its themes when he wrote "The Golden Cook."

It is always with a feeling of hesitation that a critic hears for the second time a composition that made an appeal to him when a novelty. Will the magic operate again? We are glad to record the fact that in the case of the Griffes setting of Coleridge's magnificent poem, "Kubla Khan," the magic still lurked in its mysterious and opulent measures, and always will be there because a poet-composer has stamped his music with the seal of a vivid imagination, a planturous imagination, one that revels in the fantastic dreams of far-away, mystic Asia. Slavic influences are easy to trace in this score, Rimsky-Korsakoff and some traits of Tchaikovsky, in the manipulation of the brass choir. The narrative tone, after the dusky atmosphere of the opening, is often broken into episodes—the line of force and continuity escapes us, but the ensemble effect of the picture is impressive in its evocation of a light that never was on sea or land. The loss to American art through the death of Griffes is twofold; he was a musician doubled by a poet. He would have outlived the sultry and opiate spirit of Coleridge, but he would have always remained the imaginative thinker in tone.

The Boston organization made a better showing at this matinee than it did last Thursday evening. The Schumann symphony, redolent with melody, is a favorite of Pere Monteux. There was a crowded house and much genuine enthusiasm after the Griffes music.

N.Y. WORLD JAN.9.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon was a reminder of the loss to American music in the untimely death of Charles T. Griffes, a victim in this rich country to underpay and overwork. The orchestra played his "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Kahn," which Mr. Monteux introduced here last season, and once more the imaginative splendor of the music and its promise of still better things to come were most impressive. The programme included also some bird studies by Malipiero ("Impressions from Nature," suite No. 1), a novelty in New York; the overture to "Don Giovanni," Schumann's fourth symphony, and an orchestral version by Alfredo Casella of Balakireff's oriental fantasy for piano, "Islamey."

The Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon offered its patrons Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, two movements from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Victor de Sabatas symphonic poem "Juventus" (introduced here the other day by Mr. Toscanini), and Albert Spalding in the Beethoven violin concerto.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Reinald Werrenrath gave another of his delightful song recitals.

N.Y. GLOBE JAN 9

From JAN 10 1921 K
VENING POST,
New York City

Day and Night Concerts

The time is evidently coming when day and night will not suffice for all the orchestral concerts in New York. Something—though it is hard to think just what—will have to be sandwiched in between day and night to make room for all the conductors and players. Saturday was a day as full as a Fifth Avenue uptown stage at 6 P. M. Damrosch gave one of his morning concerts for children in Aeolian Hall at 11 o'clock. At 2:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra began, and at 8:30 the Philharmonic had one of its series of popular Saturday evening performances.

The Boston Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, did not give as inspired a performance of Schumann's fourth symphony as Nikisch did when he made his memorable début in Boston. It was heard to better advantage in a repetition of Griffes's interesting symphonic poem "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" and still more in a novelty by Francesco Malipiero, the Italian futurist—"Impressioni dal Yero." It is a series of impressions of nature entitled "The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," and "The Owl," realistic in mood and characteristically orchestrated with less deliberate intention to bruise the ears with dissonances than appears in other works by this peculiar Italian.

TIMES
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEW ORGANIZATION

Comparisons Dim Performance of Orchestra and Soloist, Piastro.

BY JULIUS HARTT.

Many seasons have come and gone since the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first concert in Hartford. Men and women of middle age who were present on that occasion are now in the sere and yellow leaf or have passed on with their elders to join the choir invisible. The boys and girls of that long gone day are now responsible members of the community. Both classes were represented in the large audience that enthusiastically greeted the Boston orchestra at Parsons's theater on Monday evening. The memories of both classes must have been busy. For, the passing of the years has wrought changes with the Boston Symphony orchestra as with all things human Most of the lodre players in the band are to be seen there no longer. Some few, like Mr. Schroeder, remain, their presence accentuating the absence of these who were once their colleagues.

The Boston Symphony orchestra that appeared in Parsons's theater last evening is not, in fact, the old Boston Symphony orchestra. The heyday of that once incomparable organization is passed and gone. The Boston Symphony orchestra of to-day is an entirely different institution. And this fact is not altered by the remaining presence of here and there an instrumentalist, more particularly in the brass and wood-wind choirs, who contributed to the glory of the old organization. Nor can Mr. Monteux as a conductor be justly said to belong to the royal succession of those kings of orchestral leadership that brought the Boston band to a place of undisputed supremacy among the orchestras of the world.

There is no patriotism in pretending what is not true. And no good end can be served by any such pretension. It may be said, and said justly, that the Boston Symphony orchestra is much improved since last year. But it is mere ignorance and foolishness to assert that the present performances of this orchestra, including last evening's concert, are in any way comparable to the achievements that have made the annals of this organization the chief musical glory of the United States. The program presented by Mr. Monteux at this concert included the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"; the Tschaikowsky violin concerto with Mishel Piastro as soloist, and the Liszt "Tasso," symphonic poem. The performance of most of this music was almost as conspicuous for what it did not as for what it did attain. And here again, a god many memories must have been busy. For it is not so long since all this music was played here by the old Boston Symphony orchestra that forgetfulness can have wiped out the records.

Both the Rimsky-Korsakoff Suite, which is said to be a sort of specialty with Mr. Monteux, and the Liszt Symphonic Poem were given renditions interesting enough perhaps, but rigid, unplastic and colorless as compared with the potentialities of either or both compositions and especially, again be it remarked, as compared with memory's promptings of what the Boston orchestra has done in times past with these works. Mr. Piastre played the Tschaikowsky concerto with brilliant, even remarkable technical prowess but seldom with much warmth of tone or emotional potency. He may have felt himself somewhat severely in leash to Mr. Monteux's baton. At any rate, there were invisible laurels won by Kathleen Parlow and Mischa Elman in the same concerto that seemed to remain before the footlights undimmed in the presence of Mr. Piastro's performance.

Conductor, soloist and orchestra were enthusiastically acclaimed last evening. The concert was in truth a good concert disclosing many and engrossing excellences. It is only at the inevitable question of comparisons that hesitation raises an imperious finger.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening in the Academy of Music at 8:15 Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony (D minor), Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Djinns." In this piece the solo will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist. As soloist, Madame Hulda Lashanska will sing Juliet's "Romanza," from Bellini's opera, "The Capulets and the Montagues," and an air from Faccio's opera "Hamlet."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From EveningMail
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE last pair of Boston Symphony concerts, but one, this season will be given at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux has arranged for the Thursday evening concert the following programme: Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano solo will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer ("The Sea") and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the Second of Dvorak in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse.

POST
Washington, D. C.
JAN 30 1921 L

Coming Concerts

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the lyric soprano, will appear as soloist at the next to the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, at the New National Theater, Tuesday at 4:30 p.m. Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's overture in the Italian style in C major, Haydn's so-called "military" symphony in G major, and the spirited and piquant suite Francaise by Roger Ducasse. Mme. Lashanska will sing with the orchestra Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so," from the "Magic Flute," and Carpentier's famous "Depuis le jour" from his opera "Louise." Tickets may be obtained from Mrs. [illegible] in Droop's.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
JAN 30 1921 L

Lashanska as Soloist.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season, but one, will be given at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, with Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the celebrated American soprano, appearing as soloist. She will sing with the orchestra, Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so," from Mozart's "Magic Flute," and the famous aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's opera "Louise." Pierre Monteux will conduct the following purely symphonic works upon his program: Schubert's overture in the Italian Style in C major, Haydn's "Military" Symphony, and Roger-Ducasse's Suite Française, in D major.

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.
30 1921 L

CONCERTS

LASHANSKA—BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, the noted lyric soprano, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last concert but one, to be given next Tuesday afternoon in the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert: Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," in C major; Haydn's so-called "Military Symphony," in G major, one of this master's last works, which was written for the series of concerts he gave in London; and the spirited and piquant "Suite Francaise," by the living French composer, Roger Ducasse.

Mme. Lashanska will sing with the orchestra Pamina's aria, "Ah, lo so," from "The Magic Flute," and Charpentier's famous "Depuis le jour," from his opera "Louise." There is considerable interest in the pending appearance of Mme. Lashanska with the orchestra. Her debut several seasons ago in New York caused quite a stir of enthusiastic praise in that city. Since then her intelligence as an interpreter and the fresh beautty of her voice have brought her a foremost place among the lyric sopranos of the rising generation.

The Boston Symphony concerts are under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in Droop's, at Thirteenth and G streets.

ldress New York City

te

The Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee in Carnegie Hall comprises Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, two "Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott,

a "Suite Française" by Roger-Ducasse and Wagner's "Faust" overture.

Josef Lhevinne assists the Philhar-

Address New York City

Date

A last pair but one of the Boston Symphony concerts marks the advancing season this week at Carnegie Hall, where Pierre Monteux on Thursday night conducts Beethoven's First Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," and Franck's "Les Djinus," with solo piano part by E. Robert Schmitz. There is also Liszt's "Tasso."

ISHED 1881

EGRAM
w York City

raised for Smith College.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts, but one, of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux has arranged the following programes:—

For the Thursday concert—Beethaven's First Symphony in C major, two Passacaglias, by Cyril Scott; Debussy's symphonic suite, "La Mer," with the following movements:—I. "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean." II. "Frolic of the Waves." III. "Dialogue of Wind and Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday concert—Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor; Suite Française, by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" Overture.

m HERALD

ress New York City

te JAN

The programme for the Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall is: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Franck, poem, "Les Djinus," with piano solo played by E. Robert Schmitz; Debussy, Suite "Le Mer"; Liszt, poem, "Tasso." The programme for the orchestra's Saturday afternoon concert is: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2; Scott, two Passacaglias; Roger-Ducasse, Suite "Francaise"; Wagner, "A Faust Overture."

New York City

JAN 31 1921 D

The Invaders.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, February 3, and Saturday afternoon, February 5, Pierre Monteux has arranged the following programme:

For the Thursday concert—Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," with the following movements: I. From Dawn to Noon on the Ocean. II. Frolic of the Waves. III. Dialogue of Wind and Sea, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz.

For the Saturday concert—Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor; suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, and Wagner's "Faust" overture.

From JAN 30 192
WORLD,
New York City

Boston Symphony

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one this season will be given at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux has arranged for the Thursday evening concert the following programme: Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano solo will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, French pianist; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer" ("The Sea"), which describes: 1, From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean; 2, Frolic of Waves; 3, Dialogue of Wind and Sea, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the second of Dvorak in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse, in which the movements are: Overture, Bourree; Recitatif et air, Menuet, and Wagner's Faust overture.

ESTABLISHED JAN 30 1921
From American
New York Cit

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY announces its last two concerts for the season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert the orchestra plays Symphony No. 1 by Beethoven; two Passacaglias by Scott; "The Sea," by Debussy; "Les Djinns," by Franck, for piano and orchestra, E. Robert Schmitz, soloist. At the matinee the list includes Symphony No. 2 by Dvorak; Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse; "Faust" overture, by Wagner.

EAGLE
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 4 19

Two symphonic concerts in Carnegie Hall added to the joys of the day. In the afternoon Walter Damrosch conducted the chronological addition to the Symphony Society's Historical Series—an all-Italian program; in the evening the Boston Symphony played under Pierre Monteux a varied program that included Beethoven's First Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer," Franck's "Les Djinns" (with Mr. Schmitz furnishing the piano solo) and the "Tasso" of Liszt.

---

m SUN
ress New York City
1921

Symphonies of the Day.

Two symphony concerts marked the day. The Boston orchestra came to give its last concert but one of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The New York orchestra played there under Mr. Damrosch in the afternoon, inaugurating its eighth pair of concerts in the historical cycle.

This was the programme which M. Monteux chose for the playing of his Boston men: Beethoven's First Symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns." It was a programme balanced, therefore, between the standard and the unusual. Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, was the soloist in the Franck; he is a facile and clever musician whose day is swiftly looming here.

Though this list may have made more of an appeal to the curiosity than to the soul, M. Monteux so conducted his orchestra as to bring out in high colors much of the beauty possible. Delicacy was sacrificed sometimes in the Beethoven for force and vitality; but it was always interesting, much alive and productive of a tonal glow from the band.

FEB 4
w York City

It is a bit difficult quite to come at Mr. Monteux's notions concerning the make-up of most of his programmes arranged for the local visits of the Boston Orchestra this season. That of last evening was typical of the curious assortment of music he has been flinging at the ears of his New York audiences. One expects a certain unity of purpose, a general coherence, at least some semblance of plan in such things, but one failed to discern what may have been in Mr. Monteux's mind in the matter last evening. His programmes have, and this one also held, music that is of great intrinsic interest and that is either seldom played or is outright novelty. But sheer miscellany does not constitute a symphonic evening.

Thus last night Mr. Monteux performed Beethoven's First Symphony, thence made a brobdignagian hop to Cesar Franck's "Les djinns" (not one of the most successful of the Belgian's pieces), followed this with the Gallic but wholly unrelated suite of Debussy, "La mer," and wound up down another alley with Liszt's "Tasso."

This early Beethoven symphony was very good to hear once more. It shows more than the claws of the lion; it [illegible] voice to some of his roar, particularly that striking foretaste of the [illegible]ymphony in the menuetto. [illegible] played the work with

---

n EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening in the Academy of Music the fourth of its concerts of the current Brooklyn season. Brooklyn has stood back of the Boston organization through all its vicissitudes of the past few years; there has been no marked falling off in the attendance as there has been in Manhattan. In fact, it would be difficult to discover any important difference in the personnel of last night's audience, and one, say, of three years ago.

Mr. Monteux placed Dvorak's Symphony in D minor at the beginning of his program. A composition of what was practically the formative period of the Bohemian, this symphony is light-hearted and simple. It draws its thematic material from the composer's native soil; either in actual folk themes or in the form of themes which are folk-like in character. The orchestration is without modern complications. In short, this is music that runs a pleasant course, that appeals to the lightest of fancies and at no time threatens the listener with those emotional crises which are the be-all and end-all of so much contemporary music.

The work received an admirable performance at the hands of Mr. Monteux and his excellent band. As much should also be said for the performances of Roger-Ducasse's "French Suite" and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" which stood later in the list.

Hulda Lashanska was the soloist. The young soprano sang arias from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Louise." Her singing is in no way impaired by the attraction of her rare personality; nor, conversely, does she suffer the charm which she must realize is hers to intrude itself within the circle which belongs to art alone. A sincere and able young singer, who gave much pleasure last evening.—W. B. M.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From CIT ZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

OVATION FOR LASHANSKA.

Talented Singer Appears With Boston Orchestra.

The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for its fourth concert of the season's series was appreciated by a crowded auditorium. Mr. Monteux led his forces with musicianly discrimination, opening his programme with the Dvorak Symphony No. 2. Roger-Ducasse's Suite Francaise in D major, Bellini's "Romanza of Juliet," Faccio's aria from "Hamlet," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" followed. The music was vivid, picturesque, rich in suggestiveness and was charmingly played, crispy and with fine tone. Mr. Monteux evoked hearty response from the audience.

Hulda Lashanska was the soloist, being enthusiastically received. The soprano was heard in "Ah! Lo So me suis donnee, from "Louise" (Charpentier), and she proved herself mistress of the exacting art of singing. She shows style, taste and musicianship throughout and her diction is admirable. In appreciation the audience compelled her to respond five times before the applause subsided.

ESTABLISHED 1881 5 1921
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth of the five Philharmonic concerts scheduled for the Brooklyn season under Institute auspices. Pierre Monteux conducted.

The symphony was Dvorak's No. 2, in D minor. Of lovely outline this earlier of the illustrious Bohemian's fire works in symphonic form, though its depth may be less, its beauties are akin to those of the later period culminating in the "New World." Mr. Monteux's reading was satisfactory, also as in the following essentially differing and more monotonizing French suite in D major by Roger-Ducasse, music eminently respectable and well made but devoid of much serious significance.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, was heard in the "Ah! Lo So" aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and "Depuis le jour ou je me suis dounee" aria from Charpentier's "Louise." Of the many singers now before the public Mme. Lashanska is one of a very few who are satisfactorily heard against symphony orchestra background. Not only the beauties of her voice but likewise a natural stage bearing combine in making her appearances a decidedly worthwhile artistic and musical event.

Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, substituted for the earlier and less important "Faust" overture by the same composer, was played as final number. The change of choice was wisely followed, for the "Tannhauser" redeemed in certain measure a programme none too interesting and even light-weightd as symphonic offering go heerabouts nowadays.

From TELEGRAM
New York City

Two Orchestras.

Dvorak's seldom heard Second symphony was played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next to last matinee concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Pierre Monteux. There has been a gradual improvement in the orchestra this season. The tone of the woodwinds was particularly brilliant in the symphony. The strings were excellent, and there was a fine, homogenious ensemble. It was an admirable performance. Other numbers on the programme were Scott's Two Passacaglias, Roger-Ducasse's French suite and the "Tannhauser" overture.

With Josef Lhevinne, Russian pianist, as solois the Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Josef Stransky, gave a concert of music by Dvorak, Kalinnikoff, Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff last night in Carnegie Hall.

---

ess New York City
6 192

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The excellent idea occurred to Mr. Monteux to play at the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts given yesterday afternoon Dvorak's symphony in D minor. It has been known in New York for some thirty-five years; but has not been played here for a good while. Yet it is more worth searching the librarian's shelves for than the symphony of Dvorak that was resuscitated here last year; a more important and significant work.

To be sure, voices of Mendelssohn, Schumann or Brahms sound transparently through it; yet the music is in Dvorak's characteristic style, when he had most to say; and there are many beauties in it of thought and of instrumental sound. It sounded fresh yesterday after its long rest and was a welcome relief after the "New World" symphony, too much played. The tone of the orchestra was fine and aided Dvorak the colorist in giving beautiful sound to the symphony; yet the performance was not one of the most finished that the organization has given here this season.

The program also included the two "passacaglias" by Cyril Scott that Mr. Stokowsky made the Philadelphia Orchestra play a few weeks ago. It can hardly be said that they improved on another hearing. The Irish tunes that are the basis of the two pieces are good tunes; the second being especially characteristic; but the ingenuity devoted to swathing and wrapping them in strange and uncomfortable harmonies and the most fantastic and formidable of instrumental garbs seems not to have accomplished any advance in their musical development or added intrinsically to their interest, and it gives rise to no stronger emotion than that of curiosity.

Roger Ducasse's "Suite Française," which is not familiar, though not new, for it was first played in this country ten years ago, gave pleasure. It is not pretentious music, and its dance movements, with overture and a "recitative and air," are clear and vigorous, not commonplace in their expression and well written for the orchestra. The concert closed with Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser," though his "Eine Faust Overture" had first been announced.

---

m FEB 6 19
WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

A BOSTON MATINEE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played with beautiful tonal quality at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It wasn't what they said but the fascinating way they said it! This particularly applies to Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, which is a conventional composition, chiefly interesting because of its reminiscences. But it is richly scored and it sounds better than it is—like the political speeches of "statesmen." At least it wasn't the "New World" Symphony; anything but that stale mosaic. There is genuine fire in the first allegro, but the Brahms-like adagio and the phrase-spinning of the finale are monotonous. Do, Brother Monteux, let us hear once more the Husitzka overture and the scherzo a cappriccioso; they were favorites at the Theodore Thomas concerts in the old days.

The two passacaglias by Cyril Scott, a young English composer and pianist, were first heard here under the baton of Mr. Stokowski. They did not impress us either then or now. The first is like a Cyclops practising five-finger exercises on his anvils; the second, a gay old tune, hides its honest face behind rouge and powder [illegible] beauty doll as of Paris and Petrograd. There are some novel tonal timbres; nevertheless, the hearer remains hungry for an idea, even the ghostly adumbration of an idea. Cyril Scott knows a lot, yet his is music for the Martians of the fantastic H. G. Wells.

After this cock-eyed music the graceful French suite by Roger Ducasse fell pleasantly upon our weary ears. The programme ended with genuine music, the Tannhaeuser overture. Conductor Pierre Monteux fairly overflowed with the oil of human kindness, although he was evidently not in the most amiable of moods. There was too much talking in the hall, also interruptions by late-comers. The oil we refer to was in the euphonious flow of the music. After all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD
New York City
FEB 6 1921 M

TWO ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Two orchestral concerts were given in Carnegie Hall yesterday and at each a symphony by Dvorak served for the backbone of the programme. Mr. Monteux at the Boston Orchestra's matinee concert got the start of Mr. Stransky at the Philharmonic's entertainment in the evening by playing the Bohemian master's seldom heard but fine and joyous Second Symphony, while Mr. Stransky, having first announced Borodin's second, had later changed this work for the "New World." Mr. Monteux's other numbers were Scott's two passacaglias, admirably built on two Irish melodies—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy"; Roger-Ducasse's effectively orchestrated "Suite Francaise," which is not to be confounded with his "Petite Suite,' 'and enclosing Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Mr. Monteux is usually a good programme maker and the one he gave yesterday was of his best. There were no dull moments. The orchestra played well throughout, but strangely enough it eclipsed all its previous work in the Wagner music. The brilliancy, balance, beautiful nuance and finish here displayed brought vivid memories of the orchestra's famous days.

Mr. Stransky's evening list further contained Kalinnikov's tone poem, "The Fir Tree and the Palm," Tschaikovsky's B flat minor piano concerto and the "Capriccio Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsakov. Josef Lhevinne, a familiar pianist here in the concerto, was the solo player.

Frequently Heard Numbers Offered To Concertgoers

Orchestral Performances of Same Compositions Possibly Due to So Many Organizations Visiting Here

In view of the multiplicity of orchestral concerts, and possibly the paucity of material for them (though that point is open to argument), it is no wonder that there is much repetition of pieces on the programs of the local and visiting organizations. Much ingenuity would have to be exercised to prevent this, and, also possibly, some pressure to bring the minds of conductors into agreement. Mr. Monteux proclaims in large type upon his billboards that the programs of his Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts differ from each other. So they do. They also differ from the programs put forward a few days before the concerts. Sometimes the reasons for a change are obvious—a work has but recently been performed by another organization and it is desirable to avoid repetition or invite comparison.

But since so many orchestras are asking for patronage, it might be well to let the public choose what it wants to hear and hear that, and not something else when the concert comes. A case in point: there may have been some people in last Thursday night's audience who were curious to hear Cyril Scott's "Two Passacaglias"; they were denied the privilege. There may have been some in yesterday afternoon's audience who, having heard the pieces when they were played here recently by the Philadelphia Orchestra, did not want to hear them again; they were compelled to hear them or walk out of the hall after Dvorak's second symphony had opened the concert. There was also a substitution of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture for his "Faust" (if the house bill was followed), and the middle number of the scheme was Roger Ducasse's "Suite Francaise."

H. E. K.

TRIBUNE FEB 6.

TWO ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Two orchestral concerts were given in Carnegie Hall yesterday and at each a symphony by Dvorak served for the backbone of the programme. Mr. Monteux at the Boston Orchestra's matinee concert got the start of Mr. Stransky at the Philharmonic's entertainment in the evening by playing the Bohemian master's seldom heard but fine and joyous Second Symphony, while Mr. Stransky, having first announced Borodin's second, had later changed this work for the "New World." Mr. Monteux's other numbers were Scott's two passacaglias, admirably built on two Irish melodies—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy"; Roger-Ducasse's effectively orchestrated "Suite Francaise," which is not to be confounded with his "Petite Suite,' 'and enclosing Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Mr. Monteux is usually a good programme maker and the one he gave yesterday was of his best. There were no dull moments. The orchestra played well throughout, but strangely enough it eclipsed all its previous work in the Wagner music. The brilliancy, balance, beautiful nuance and finish here displayed brought vivid memories of the orchestra's famous days.

Mr. Stransky's evening list further contained Kalinnikov's tone poem, "The Fir Tree and the Palm," Tschaikovsky's B flat minor piano concerto and the "Capriccio Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsakov. Josef Lhevinne, a familiar pianist here in the concerto, was the solo player.

HERALD FEB 6

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The excellent idea occurred to Mr. Monteux to play at the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts given yesterday afternoon Dvorak's symphony in D minor. It has been known in New York for some thirty-five years; but has not been played here for a good while. Yet it is more worth searching the librarian's shelves for than the symphony of Dvorak that was resuscitated here last year; a more important and significant work.

To be sure, voices of Mendelssohn, Schumann or Brahms sound transparently through it; yet the music is in Dvorak's characteristic style, when he had most to say; and there are many beauties in it of thought and of instrumental sound. It sounded fresh yesterday after its long rest and was a welcome relief after the "New World" symphony, too much played. The tone of the orchestra was fine and aided Dvorak the colorist in giving beautiful sound to the symphony; yet the performance was not one of the most finished that the organization has given here this season.

The program also included the two "passacaglias" by Cyril Scott that Mr. Stokowsky made the Philadelphia Orchestra play a few weeks ago. It can hardly be said that they improved on another hearing. The Irish tunes that are the basis of the two pieces are good tunes; the second being especially characteristic; but the ingenuity devoted to swathing and wrapping them in strange and uncomfortable harmonies and the most fantastic and formidable of instrumental garbs seems not to have accomplished any advance in their musical development or added intrinsically to their interest, and it gives rise to no stronger emotion than that of curiosity.

Roger Ducasse's "Suite Française," which is not familiar, though not new, for it was first played in this country ten years ago, gave pleasure. It is not pretentious music, and its dance movements, with overture and a "recitative and air," are clear and vigorous, not commonplace in their expression and well written for the orchestra. The concert closed with Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser," though his "Eine Faust Overture" had first been announced.

N.Y. HERALD TIMES FEB 6

Mr. Monteux had no soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Dvorak's seldom heard second symphony, Cyril Scott's two passacaglias, recently played here; Roger Ducasse's "Suite Francais" and overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" made the programme. It was well played.

WORLD FEB 7

The concert tide of Saturday and Sunday brought on Saturday the season's last matinée but one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, and yesterday afternoon a concert of unusual choice by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall. In the latter Pietro Yon, organist, played his new "Concerto Gregoriano" for organ and orchestra, which was given on this occasion for the first time in New York. Mr. Yon also played the organ part in Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony, whose piano part Miss Ruth Clug played. Excerpts from Casella's "Venetian Convent" suite and the overture to "Tannhäuser" completed the programme.

[illegible] FEB 7

Chicago, Ill.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra took up last week the performance of Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony." The work is not known in these parts, but has what looks to be a rather ambitious programme. It begins with the Thames river and the Strand in early morning; goes continues to Bloomsbury at dusk; goes back to the Thames embankment on a Saturday night; and concludes with the London of the unemployed and unfortunate, with an epilogue that seeks to depict the soul of the city and comes back to the river, from whence it started.

For this week's concerts, John Alden Carpenter has gone to the town of pork and beans to assist in the performance of his suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta."

From WORLD,
New York City

JAN 30 192

Boston Symphony

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one this season will be given at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux has arranged for the Thursday evening concert the following programme: Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Djinns," based on the poem of Victor Hugo, in which the piano solo will be taken by E. Robert Schmitz, French pianist; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer" ("The Sea"), which describes: 1, From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean; 2, Frolic of Waves; 3, Dialogue of Wind and Sea, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the second of Dvorak in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the suite Francaise by Rogér-Ducasse, in which the movements are: Overture, Bourree; Recitatif et air, Menuet, and Wagner's Faust overture.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 30 192

From American
New York Cit

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY announces its last two concerts for the season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert the orchestra plays Symphony No. 1 by Beethoven; two Passacaglias by Scott; "The Sea," by Debussy; "Les Djinns," by Franck, for piano and orchestra, E. Robert Schmitz, soloist. At the matinee the list includes Symphony No. 2 by Dvorak; Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse; "Faust" overture, by Wagner.

EAGLE
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Two symphonic concerts in Carnegie Hall added to the joys of the day. In the afternoon Walter Damrosch conducted the chronological addition to the Symphony Society's Historical Series—an all-Italian program; in the evening the Boston Symphony played under Pierre Monteux a varied program that included Beethoven's First Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer," Franck's "Les Djinns" (with Mr. Schmitz furnishing the piano solo) and the "Tasso" of Liszt.

---

m SUN
ress New York City

Symphonies of the Day.

Two symphony concerts marked the day. The Boston orchestra came to give its last concert but one of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The New York orchestra played there under Mr. Damrosch in the afternoon, inaugurating its eighth pair of concerts in the historical cycle.

This was the programme which M. Monteux chose for the playing of his Boston men: Beethoven's First Symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns." It was a programme balanced, therefore, between the standard and the unusual. Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, was the soloist in the Franck; he is a facile and clever musician whose day is swiftly looming here.

Though this list may have made more of an appeal to the curiosity than to the soul, M. Monteux so conducted his orchestra as to bring out in high colors much of the beauty possible. Delicacy was sacrificed sometimes in the Beethoven for force and vitality; but it was always interesting, much alive and productive of a tonal glow from the band.

FEB

w York City

It is a bit difficult quite to come at Mr. Monteux's notions concerning the make-up of most of his programmes arranged for the local visits of the Boston Orchestra this season. That of last evening was typical of the curious assortment of music he has been flinging at the ears of his New York audiences. One expects a certain unity of purpose, a general coherence, at least some semblance of plan in such things, but one failed to discern what may have been in Mr. Monteux's mind in the matter last evening. His programmes have, and this one also held, music that is of great intrinsic interest and that is either seldom played or is outright novelty. But sheer miscellany does not constitute a symphonic evening.

Thus last night Mr. Monteux performed Beethoven's First Symphony, thence made a brobdignagian hop to Cesar Franck's "Les djinns" (not one of the most successful of the Belgian's pieces), followed this with the Gallic but wholly unrelated suite of Debussy, "La mer," and wound up down another alley with Liszt's "Tasso."

This early Beethoven symphony was very good to hear once more. It shows more than the claws of the lion; it gives voice to some of his roar, particularly that striking foretaste of the [illegible] symphony in the menuetto. [illegible] played the work with

---

n EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening in the Academy of Music the fourth of its concerts of the current Brooklyn season. Brooklyn has stood back of the Boston organization through all its vicissitudes of the past few years; there has been no marked falling off in the attendance as there has been in Manhattan. In fact, it would be difficult to discover any important difference in the personnel of last night's audience, and one, say, of three years ago.

Mr. Monteux placed Dvorak's Symphony in D minor at the beginning of his program. A composition of what was practically the formative period of the Bohemian, this symphony is light-hearted and simple. It draws its thematic material from the composer's native soil; either in actual folk themes or in the form of themes which are folk-like in character. The orchestration is without modern complications. In short, this is music that runs a pleasant course, that appeals to the lightest of fancies and at no time threatens the listener with those emotional crises which are the be-all and end-all of so much contemporary music.

The work received an admirable performance at the hands of Mr. Monteux and his excellent band. As much should also be said for the performances of Roger-Ducasse's "French Suite" and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" which stood later in the list.

Hulda Lashanska was the soloist. The young soprano sang arias from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Louise." Her singing is in no way impaired by the attraction of her rare personality; nor, conversely, does she suffer the charm which she must realize is hers to intrude itself within the circle which belongs to art alone. A sincere and able young singer, who gave much pleasure last evening.—W. B. M.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From CIT ZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

OVATION FOR LASHANSKA.

Talented Singer Appears With Boston Orchestra.

The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for its fourth concert of the season's series was appreciated by a crowded auditorium. Mr. Monteux led his forces with musicianly discrimination, opening his programme with the Dvorak Symphony No. 2. Roger-Ducasse's Suite Francaise in D major, Bellini's "Romanza of Juliet," Faccio's aria from "Hamlet," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" followed. The music was vivid, picturesque, rich in suggestiveness and was charmingly played, crispy and with fine tone. Mr. Monteux evoked hearty response from the audience.

Hulda Lashanska was the soloist, being enthusiastically received. The soprano was heard in "Ah! Lo So me suis donnee, from "Louise" (Charpentier), and she proved herself mistress of the exacting art of singing. She shows style, taste and musicianship throughout and her diction is admirable. In appreciation the audience compelled her to respond five times before the applause subsided.

ESTABLISHED 1881 5 192
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth of the five Philharmonic concerts scheduled for the Brooklyn season under Institute auspices. Pierre Monteux conducted.

The symphony was Dvorak's No. 2, in D minor. Of lovely outline this earlier of the illustrious Bohemian's fire works in symphonic form, though its depth may be less, its beauties are akin to those of the later period culminating in the "New World." Mr. Monteux's reading was satisfactory, also as in the following essentially differing and more monotonizing French suite in D major by Roger-Ducasse, music eminently respectable and well made but devoid of much serious significance.

Hulda Lashanska, soprano, was heard in the "Ah! Lo So" aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and "Depuis le jour ou je me suis dounee" aria from Charpentier's "Louise." Of the many singers now before the public Mme. Lashanska is one of a very few who are satisfactorily heard against symphony orchestra background. Not only the beauties of her voice but likewise a natural stage bearing combine in making her appearances a decidedly worthwhile artistic and musical event.

Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, substituted for the earlier and less important "Faust" overture by the same composer, was played as final number. The change of choice was wisely followed, for the "Tannhauser" redeemed in certain measure a programme none too interesting and even light-weightd as symphonic offering go heerabouts nowadays.

From TELEGRAM
New York City

Two Orchestras.

Dvorak's seldom heard Second symphony was played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next to last matinee concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Pierre Monteux. There has been a gradual improvement in the orchestra this season. The tone of the woodwinds was particularly brilliant in the symphony. The strings were excellent, and there was a fine, homogenious ensemble. It was an admirable performance. Other numbers on the programme were Scott's Two Passacaglias, Roger-Ducasse's French suite and the "Tannhauser" overture.

With Josef Lhevinne, Russian pianist, as solois the Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Josef Stransky, gave a concert of music by Dvorak, Kalinnikoff, Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff last night in Carnegie Hall.

---

ress New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The excellent idea occurred to Mr. Monteux to play at the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts given yesterday afternoon Dvorak's symphony in D minor. It has been known in New York for some thirty-five years; but has not been played here for a good while. Yet it is more worth searching the librarian's shelves for than the symphony of Dvorak that was resuscitated here last year; a more important and significant work.

To be sure, voices of Mendelssohn, Schumann or Brahms sound transparently through it; yet the music is in Dvorak's characteristic style, when he had most to say; and there are many beauties in it of thought and of instrumental sound. It sounded fresh yesterday after its long rest and was a welcome relief after the "New World" symphony, too much played. The tone of the orchestra was fine and aided Dvorak the colorist in giving beautiful sound to the symphony; yet the performance was not one of the most finished that the organization has given here this season.

The program also included the two "passacaglias" by Cyril Scott that Mr. Stokowsky made the Philadelphia Orchestra play a few weeks ago. It can hardly be said that they improved on another hearing. The Irish tunes that are the basis of the two pieces are good tunes; the second being especially characteristic; but the ingenuity devoted to swathing and wrapping them in strange and uncomfortable harmonies and the most fantastic and formidable of instrumental garbs seems not to have accomplished any advance in their musical development or added intrinsically to their interest, and it gives rise to no stronger emotion than that of curiosity.

Roger Ducasse's "Suite Française," which is not familiar, though not new, for it was first played in this country ten years ago, gave pleasure. It is not pretentious music, and its dance movements, with overture and a "recitative and air," are clear and vigorous, not commonplace in their expression and well written for the orchestra. The concert closed with Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser," though his "Eine Faust Overture" had first been announced.

---

m
WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

A BOSTON MATINEE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played with beautiful tonal quality at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It wasn't what they said but the fascinating way they said it! This particularly applies to Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, which is a conventional composition, chiefly interesting because of its reminiscences. But it is richly scored and it sounds better than it is—like the political speeches of "statesmen." At least it wasn't the "New World" Symphony; anything but that stale mosaic. There is genuine fire in the first allegro, but the Brahms-like adagio and the phrase-spinning of the finale are monotonous. Do, Brother Monteux, let us hear once more the Husitzka overture and the scherzo a capriccioso; they were favorites at the Theodore Thomas concerts in the old days.

The two passacaglias by Cyril Scott, a young English composer and pianist, were first heard here under the baton of Mr. Stokowski. They did not impress us either then or now. The first is like a Cyclops practising five-finger exercises on his anvils; the second, a gay old tune, hides its honest face behind rouge and powder from the "modernistic" beauty doctors of Paris and Petrograd. There are some novel tonal timbres; nevertheless, the hearer remains hungry for an idea, even the ghostly adumbration of an idea. Cyril Scott knows a lot, yet his is music for the Martians of the fantastic H. G. Wells.

After this cock-eyed music the graceful French suite by Roger Ducasse fell pleasantly upon our weary ears. The programme ended with genuine music, the Tannhaeuser overture. Conductor Pierre Monteux fairly overflowed with the oil of human kindness, although he was evidently not in the most amiable of moods. There was too much talking in the hall, also interruptions by late-comers. The oil we refer to was in the euphonious flow of the music. After all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD
New York City

FEB 6 192

TWO ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Two orchestral concerts were given in Carnegie Hall yesterday and at each a symphony by Dvorak served for the backbone of the programme. Mr. Monteux at the Boston Orchestra's matinee concert got the start of Mr. Stransky at the Philharmonic's entertainment in the evening by playing the Bohemian master's seldom heard but fine and joyous Second Symphony, while Mr. Stransky, having first announced Borodin's second, had later changed this work for the "New World." Mr. Monteux's other numbers were Scott's two passacaglias, admirably built on two Irish melodies—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy"; Roger-Ducasse's effectively orchestrated "Suite Francaise," which is not to be confounded with his "Petite Suite,' 'and enclosing Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Mr. Monteux is usually a good programme maker and the one he gave yesterday was of his best. There were no dull moments. The orchestra played well throughout, but strangely enough it eclipsed all its previous work in the Wagner music. The brilliancy, balance, beautiful nuance and finish here displayed brought vivid memories of the orchestra's famous days.

Mr. Stransky's evening list further contained Kalinnikov's tone poem, "The Fir Tree and the Palm," Tschaikovsky's B flat minor piano concerto and the "Capriccio Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsakov. Josef Lhevinne, a familiar pianist here in the concerto, was the solo player.

Frequently Heard Numbers Offered To Concertgoers

Orchestral Performances of Same Compositions Possibly Due to So Many Organizations Visiting Here

In view of the multiplicity of orchestral concerts, and possibly the paucity of material for them (though that point is open to argument), it is no wonder that there is much repetition of pieces on the programs of the local and visiting organizations. Much ingenuity would have to be exercised to prevent this, and, also possibly, some pressure to bring the minds of conductors into agreement. Mr. Monteux proclaims in large type upon his billboards that the programs of his Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts differ from each other. So they do. They also differ from the programs put forward a few days before the concerts. Sometimes the reasons for a change are obvious—a work has but recently been performed by another organization and it is desirable to avoid repetition or invite comparison.

But since so many orchestras are asking for patronage, it might be well to let the public choose what it wants to hear and hear that, and not something else when the concert comes. A case in point: there may have been some people in last Thursday night's audience who were curious to hear Cyril Scott's "Two Passacaglias"; they were denied the privilege. There may have been some in yesterday afternoon's audience who, having heard the pieces when they were played here recently by the Philadelphia Orchestra, did not want to hear them again; they were compelled to hear them or walk out of the hall after Dvorak's second symphony had opened the concert. There was also a substitution of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture for his "Faust" (if the house bill was followed), and the middle number of the scheme was Roger Ducasse's "Suite Francaise."

H. E. K.

TRIBUNE FEB. 6.

TWO ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Two orchestral concerts were given in Carnegie Hall yesterday and at each a symphony by Dvorak served for the backbone of the programme. Mr. Monteux at the Boston Orchestra's matinee concert got the start of Mr. Stransky at the Philharmonic's entertainment in the evening by playing the Bohemian master's seldom heard but fine and joyous Second Symphony, while Mr. Stransky, having first announced Borodin's second, had later changed this work for the "New World." Mr. Monteux's other numbers were Scott's two passacaglias, admirably built on two Irish melodies—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy"; Roger-Ducasse's effectively orchestrated "Suite Francaise," which is not to be confounded with his "Petite Suite,' 'and enclosing Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Mr. Monteux is usually a good programme maker and the one he gave yesterday was of his best. There were no dull moments. The orchestra played well throughout, but strangely enough it eclipsed all its previous work in the Wagner music. The brilliancy, balance, beautiful nuance and finish here displayed brought vivid memories of the orchestra's famous days.

Mr. Stransky's evening list further contained Kalinnikov's tone poem, "The Fir Tree and the Palm," Tschaikovsky's B flat minor piano concerto and the "Capriccio Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsakov. Josef Lhevinne, a familiar pianist here in the concerto, was the solo player.

H FEB. 6.

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The excellent idea occurred to Mr. Monteux to play at the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts given yesterday afternoon Dvorak's symphony in D minor. It has been known in New York for some thirty-five years; but has not been played here for a good while. Yet it is more worth searching the librarian's shelves for than the symphony of Dvorak that was resuscitated here last year; a more important and significant work.

To be sure, voices of Mendelssohn, Schumann or Brahms sound transparently through it; yet the music is in Dvorak's characteristic style, when he had most to say; and there are many beauties in it of thought and of instrumental sound. It sounded fresh yesterday after its long rest and was a welcome relief after the "New World" symphony, too much played. The tone of the orchestra was fine and aided Dvorak the colorist in giving beautiful sound to the symphony; yet the performance was not one of the most finished that the organization has given here this season.

The program also included the two "passacaglias" by Cyril Scott that Mr. Stokowsky made the Philadelphia Orchestra play a few weeks ago. It can hardly be said that they improved on another hearing. The Irish tunes that are the basis of the two pieces are good tunes; the second being especially characteristic; but the ingenuity devoted to swathing and wrapping them in strange and uncomfortable harmonies and the most fantastic and formidable of instrumental garbs seems not to have accomplished any advance in their musical development or added intrinsically to their interest, and it gives rise to no stronger emotion than that of curiosity.

Roger Ducasse's "Suite Française," which is not familiar, though not new, for it was first played in this country ten years ago, gave pleasure. It is not pretentious music, and its dance movements, with overture and a "recitative and air," are clear and vigorous, not commonplace in their expression and well written for the orchestra. The concert closed with Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser," though his "Eine Faust Overture" had first been announced.

[illegible] FEB. 6

Mr. Monteux had no soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Dvorak's seldom heard second symphony, Cyril Scott's two passacaglias, recently played here; Roger Ducasse's "Suite Francais" and overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" made the programme. It was well played.

[illegible] FEB. 7

The concert tide of Saturday and Sunday brought on Saturday the season's last matinée but one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, and yesterday afternoon a concert of unusual choice by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall. In the latter Pietro Yon, organist, played his new "Concerto Gregoriano" for organ and orchestra, which was given on this occasion for the first time in New York. Mr. Yon also played the organ part in Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony, whose piano part Miss Ruth Clug played. Excerpts from Casella's "Venetian Convent" suite and the overture to "Tannhäuser" completed the programme.

FEB 7

The Boston Symphony orchestra took up last week the performance of Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony." The work is not known in these parts, but has what looks to be a rather ambitious programme. It begins with the Thames river and the Strand in early morning; goes continues to Bloomsbury at dusk; goes back to the Thames embankment on a Saturday night; and concludes with the London of the unemployed and unfortunate, with an epilogue that seeks to depict the soul of the city and comes back to the river, from whence it started.

For this week's concerts, John Alden Carpenter has gone to the town of pork and beans to assist in the performance of his suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta."

...terday was of his be... There were
...dull moments. The orchestra played
...throughout, but strangely enough it ...passed all its previous work in the
...gner music. The brilliancy, balance,
...utiful nuance and finish here dis-
...yed brought vivid memories of the
...hestra's famous days.
...Mr. Stransky's evening list further
...tained Kalinnikov's tone poem, "The ...Tree and the Palm," Tschaikovsky's
...flat minor piano concerto and the ...apriccio Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsa-
...y. Josef Lhevinne, a familiar pianist
...e in the concerto, was the solo player.

HERALD FEB. 6

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...he excellent idea occurred to Mr.
...onteux to play at the second of the
...ston Symphony Orchestra's concerts
...en yesterday afternoon Dvorak's sym-
...ony in D minor. It has been known
...New York for some thirty-five years;
...has not been played here for a good
...ile. Yet it is more worth searching
...librarian's shelves for than the sym-
...ony of Dvorak that was resuscitated
...e last year; a more important and
...nificant work.
...o be sure, voices of Mendelssohn,
...umann or Brahms sound transpar-
...tly through it; yet the music is in
...orak's characteristic style, when he
...most to say; and there are many
...uties in it of thought and of instru-
...ntal sound. It sounded fresh yes-
...day after its long rest and was a
...lcome relief after the "New World"
...nphony, too much played. The tone
...the orchestra was fine and aided
...orak the colorist in giving beautiful
...nd to the symphony; yet the per-
...mance was not one of the most fin...ed that the organization has given
...e this season.
...he program also included the two
...assacaglias" by Cyril Scott that
... Stokowsky made the Philadelphia
...chestra play a few weeks ago. It can
...rdly be said that they improved on
...ther hearing. The Irish tunes that ...the basis of the two pieces are good
...es; the second being especially char-
...eristic; but the ingenuity devoted to
...athing and wrapping them in strange
...uncomfortable harmonies and the ...st fantastic and formidable of in-
...umental garbs seems not to have ac-
...nplished any advance in their musical
...elopment or added intrinsically to
...ir interest, and it gives rise to no
...nger emotion than that of curiosity.
...oger Ducasse's "Suite Française,"
...ich is not familiar, though not new,
...it was first played in this country
...years ago, gave pleasure. It is not ...tentious music, and its dance move-
...nts, with overture and a "recitative
...d air," are clear and vigorous, not
...mmonplace in their expression and
...l written for the orchestra. The con-
...t closed with Wagner's overture to
..."Tannhauser," though his "Eine Faust
...erture" had first been announced.

~~HERALD~~
...Y. TIMES. FEB 6

...Monteux had no soloist at the
...rt of the Boston Symphony Or-
...ra in Carnegie Hall on Satur-
...fternoon. Dvorak's seldom heard
...d symphony, Cyril Scott's two
...caglias, recently played here;
...r Ducasse's "Suite Francais"
...overture to Wagner's "Tann-
...r" made the programme. It
...well played.

WORLD. FEB. 7

...he concert tide of Saturday and
...day brought on Saturday the sea-
...'s last matinee but one by the
...ton Symphony Orchestra in Car-
...ie Hall, and yesterday afternoon
...oncert of unusual choice by the
...phony Society in Aeolian Hall.
...the latter Pietro Yon, organist,
...ed his new "Concerto Gregori-
...," for organ and orchestra, which
...given on this occasion for the ...time in New York. Mr. Yon also
...ed the organ part in Saint-
...s's C minor symphony, whose
...o part Miss Ruth Clug played.
...erpts from Casella's "Venetian
...vent" suite and the overture to
...nnhäuser" completed the pro-
...mme.

GLOBE FEB 7

FEB 12 1921

...al
...go, Ill.

...he Boston Symphony orchestra took
...ast week the performance of Vaughan
...lliams' "London Symphony." The
...is not known in these parts, but has
...at looks to be a rather ambitious pro-
...mme. It begins with the Thames
...er and the Strand in early morning;
...tinues to Bloomsbury at dusk; goes
...k to the Thames embankment on a
...urday night; and concludes with the
...ndon of the unemployed and unfor-
...ate, with an epilogue that seeks to
...ict the soul of the city and comes
...k to the river, from whence it started.
...For this week's concerts, John Alden
...penter has gone to the town of pork
...beans to assist in the performance
...his suite from "The Birthday of the
...anta."

NEW YORK
...ABLISHED 1881
...om

Boston Symphony Soloist

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one will be given in Infantry Hall, Providence, on Tuesday evening, March 8, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, No. 3 in A minor, and two of the most famous numbers by Richard Wagner, the "Prelude to Lohengrin," and the "Overture to Tannhauser."

Miss Alice Nielsen, the celebrated lyric soprano, will sing as soloist at this concert two of the immortal arias of Mozart: "Deh vienni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti batti" from "Don Giovanni."

Miss Nielsen has long been famous for the miraculous beauty and felicity of her interpretations of Mozart's music. Starting as a young girl, singing the principal roles in light opera in America and London, she made her debut in grand opera in Italy with such pronounced success that she was immediately applauded in the great opera houses of Italy and engaged for a busy season at the Covent Garden Opera in London. Thence she came to America with the San Carlo Opera Co., later becoming the prima donna of the Boston Opera Co., and joining the Metropolitan Opera Co. in 1912. She now confining her activities to the concert stage.

PRESS
MAR 1 1921

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS CITY HALL TONIGHT

The grand Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in Portland this afternoon and will present its wonderful program announced a few days ago. The coming of the orchestra under the personal direction of Pierre Monteaux ~~is an event of great im~~portance to Portland as few cities outside the great metropolitan centers are so favored. That there is much interest in the visit of the orchestra is noted by the wonderful daily and continued demand for tickets. Even from distant points the number of calls for reservations has been increasing showing that not only Portland but distant sections of the State will be represented at the special concert which is one of the regular series of the winter under the auspices of the Portland Organ commission.

The orchestra was never in better form, the New York critics declaring only a short time ago, following the appearance of the orchestra in that city—there is but one Boston Symphony. The number of musicians to be presented will be about 100, every one an artist. All of the numbers selected have met with hearty approval by the patrons and of particular interest was the announcement that the great Tannhauser Overture will be included in the list of offerings. The concert will begin at 8.15.

...rom
...ublic Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NO 1922 SEASON HERE OF BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN

Orchestra Has Given Concerts in This City Since 1883

Word was received here last night that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not play in Philadelphia next season. The orchestra will give a concert at the Academy of Music on March 14. That will be its last appearance here, no arrangements having been made for a Philadelphia engagement in the 1921-22 season.

The Boston Symphony came here first in 1883 and had in this city its first great success outside of the orchestra's home city. It did not play in New York till 1887. In the season of 1892-93, under N. Kisch's baton the Boston musicians gave a memorable program at the Academy to an audience so large that 700 persons were compelled to stand.

The death in November, 1919, of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and principal patron of the Boston orchestra, was one of several happenings that have greatly affected the musical organization in the last few years.

Much unpleasant publicity was visited upon the Boston Symphony in the war because of the actions of Dr. Karl Muck, then its leader. A few months after this country declared war on Germany Dr. Muck brought a storm of protest down upon himself for refusing to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert. At another concert some months later, at Mr. Higginson's request, led the orchestra in the playing of the anthem, then resigned. Subsequently he was arrested as a dangerous alien enemy, interned and finally deported.

After Dr. Muck's resignation eighteen other Germans were dropped from the orchestra.

Henri Rabaud, of Paris, succeeded Dr. Muck as leader. He remained one season. Pierre Monteux, the present leader, followed Mr. Rabaud in 1919. Mr. Monteux also came from Paris.

...rom
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CUTS CAPITAL OFF ITINERARY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to forsake Washington in its future concert itineraries, is the rumor that has been set afoot. Baltimore, too, loses this famous orchestra from the Hub that has been a part of the music life of these cities for many years.

The reasons assigned are lack of patronage in the Southern cities. The report comes from Frederick R. Huber, of Baltimore, who was in conference with W. A. Brennan, manager of the Boston Orchestra. Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia have been taken from the visiting list of the orchestra, it is said.

"It is a calamity for Baltimore lovers of music to lose this orchestra," said Huber. "Before the war it was rated as the greatest orchestra in the world, and recently it has been regaining its former leadership. For 30 years it has been coming to Baltimore. Because of the poor attendance here and the fact that it has had so many requests to play in the vicinity of Boston, the organization has decided to give up its Southern trip."

ESTABLISHED 1881
MAR 4 - 1921 A
From JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

ALICE NEILSEN TO SING FAMOUS MELODIES HERE

Will be Soloist with Boston Symphony Next Tuesday.

Miss Alice Neilsen, who will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will sing two of the immortal melodies of Mozart—"Deh Vieni non Tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni." As a star in opera, Miss Neilsen has been perhaps more talked about in these two roles than in any others.

The symphony to be conducted by Pierre Monteux at this concert will be the third by Mendelssohn in A-minor, entitled "Scotch." It was inspired by an episode in the life of Mary Stuart and maintains its popularity as one of the most melodious works that has come down from the Victorian period. Two notable numbers by Richard Wagner will also be played—the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

A BOSTON MATINEE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played with beautiful tonal quality at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It wasn't what they said but the fascinating way they said it! This particularly applies to Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, which is a conventional composition, chiefly interesting because of its reminiscences. But it is richly scored and it sounds better than it is—like the political speeches of "statesmen." At least it wasn't the "New World" Symphony; anything but that stale mosaic. There is genuine fire in the first allegro, but the Brahms-like adagio and the phrase-spinning of the finale are monotonous. Do, Brother Monteux, let us hear once more the Husitzka overture and the scherzo a cappriccioso; they were favorites at the Theodore Thomas concerts in the old days.

The two passacaglias by Cyril Scott, a young English composer and pianist, were first heard here under the baton of Mr. Stokowski. They did not impress us either then or now. The first is like a Cyclops practising five-finger exercises on his anvils; the second, a gay old tune hides its honest face behind rouge and powder from the "modernistic" beauty doctors of Paris and Petrograd. There are some novel tone timbres; nevertheless, the hearer remains hungry for an idea, even the ghostly adumbration of an idea. Cyril Scott knows a lot, yet his is music for the Martians of the fantastic H. G. Wells.

After this cock-eyed music the graceful French suite by Roger Ducasse fell pleasantly upon our weary ears. The programme ended with genuine music, the Tannhaeuser overture. Conductor Pierre Monteux fairly overflowed with the oil of human kindness, although he was evidently not in the most amiable of moods. There was too much talking in the hall, also interruptions by late-comers. The oil we refer to was in the euphonious flow of the music. After all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WORLD FEB. 6.

Boston Symphony Plays.

The last except one this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thursday evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. There was no novelty in the programme, but all the works given were enjoyed. They were Beethoven's first symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," after Hugo's poem, with the piano solo played by Robert Schmitz; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer," and for the final number Liszt's "Tasso." The orchestra gave a generally good performance of the Beethoven symphony. It might have had more tonal smoothness, but the balance and precision were good and the spirit excellent.

N.Y. HERALD, FEB 6.

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to New York yesterday and gave its first concert in the evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Monteux's program included Beethoven's first symphony, César Franck's symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, "Les Djinns," Debussy's three symphonic sketches "La Mer" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso."

The symphony was charmingly played, crispy and with fine tone and shading. So played it still gives pleasure in the hearing, without the necessity of deciding whether it is "true Beethoven"; whether it is original; how far it is derived from Haydn and Mozart; whether liking it necessarily goes beyond the music itself and involves, in the phase of Mr. Hale's program note, belief in "the plenary inspiration of a great composer."

César Franck's symphonic poem is not among the most frequently played of his works. For one thing, it requires some self-abnegation on the part of the pianist, who has a short but difficult piece to play and but little opportunity to shine as a soloist; for the piano, while more than an orchestral instrument, has hardly an independent part. For another, the work seems somewhat tentative—more an experiment in color, instrumental and harmonic, than the development of strongly individual musical ideas. As such it has a rich and delicate beauty, and its performance gave enjoyment. Mr. Schmitz's playing of the piano part was brilliant and graceful.

There never was so deep an impression made by Debussy's sketches of the sea as by some of his other compositions for orchestra. Now that the method of expression is no longer new, the music seems to have shrunk in significance. How far inferior it is, for instance, in value to the prelude of "The Afternoon of a Faun!" This music summons up little of the sea. Its substance seems to lay thin, its orchestral color patchy. A few passages delight with their tonalities still fresh, but the composer's success seems to have been intermittent.

TIMES FEB 6

Boston Orchestra Here

In the barcarolle the composer utilizes a soprano voice which sings a melody of a type which, we fancy, must sound strangely in a Venetian car, on the vocable "Ah." Nothing more. Perhaps the voice should have sounded like one in the orchestral company—lifted into the prominence of a solo song, as it was by Miss Henrietta Conrad, it evoked wonder that it should have been left wordless. Several composers, as far back as Berlioz in his "Trojans in Carthage," have used inarticulate song for musical effects, chiefly for color, and something like this may have been Casella's purpose in this piece. If so we thought that purpose frustrated by the heavy-footed manner in which it was sung by Miss Conrad.

The other pieces on the program were the overture to "William Tell," by Rossini' Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and Sinigaglia's overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozzotti."

In the evening the walls of Carnegie Hall echoed to music made by the Boston Orchestra and E. Robert Schmitz, pianist. There was nothing new on the program but the excellent playing of Mr. Monteux's men, who are steadily growing toward the perfection for which the old Boston organization stood, and Mr. Schmitz gave great pleasure and received cordial recognition. The pragram was composed of Beethoven's first symphony, César Franck's "Les Djinns" for pianoforte and orchestra, Debussy's "Le Mer" and Liszt's "Tasso."

TRIBUNE-FEB. 4

In the evening the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux's baton, offered Beethoven's First Symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," for piano and orchestra, E. Robert Schmitz officiating as soloist, Debussy's "La Mer" and Liszt's poem "Tasso." The unusual thing about the concert was the vacant seats, a novel experience here for the Boston men. The virtuosity of the band was finely displayed in the Debussy number.

WORLD FEB. 4.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

VISITING us for the fourth time this season, Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall last night, With E. Robert Schmitz at the piano he played Cesar Franck's "Les Djinns," symphonic poem. Mr. Schmitz played with that rare delicacy that makes him unique among pianists, but he seemed to lack the brazen force demanded by this Oriental work. There was the First Beethoven Symphony, which Monteux played admirably, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Liszt "Tasso."

Fountains and convents and the dances of children had their musical pictures drawn by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the historical cycle representing Italian composers from the sixteenth to the twentieth century.

Rossini's "William Tell" overture, Respighi's "Fontane di Roma," Casella's "The Venetian Convent" and De Sabata's "Juventus" were eloquently described. Henrietta Conrad sang the soprano obbligato in the Barcarolle of the Casella suite.

MAIL FEB. 4.

Symphonies of the Day.

Two symphony concerts marked the day. The Boston orchestra came to give its last concert but one of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The New York orchestra played there under Mr. Damrosch in the afternoon, inaugurating its eighth pair of concerts in the historical cycle.

This was the programme which M. Monteux chose for the playing of his Boston men: Beethoven's First Symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns." It was a programme balanced, therefore, between the standard and the unusual. Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, was the soloist in the Franck; he is a facile and clever musician whose day is swiftly looming here.

Though this list may have made more of an appeal to the curiosity than to the soul, M. Monteux so conducted his orchestra as to bring out in high colors much of the beauty possible. Delicacy was sacrificed sometimes in the Beethoven for force and vitality; but it was always interesting, much alive and productive of a tonal glow from the band.

The New York Symphony, in earlier turn, filled the afternoon with examples of the Italian composers from the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries. This small span brought out, thanks to Mr. Damrosch's baton, two ancient dances, a balleto by Molinaro and a gagliarda by Galilei, father of the astronomer. The latter composition had been deftly done over for orchestra by the modern Respighi. Among other examples there were Respighi's own "Fountains of Rome" and the "William Tell" overture.

SUN-FEB. 4

...n SUN
...ress: Baltimore, Md.

ASKS PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY TO PLAY HERE

Huber Wires New York Orchestra To Take Place Of Boston Symphony.

HAS DOUBTS OF ANY CHANGE

Says Not Only Baltimore, But Philadelphia And Washington Would Have To Take Guarantee.

The New York Philharmonic Society will be asked to take the place of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore.

Believing that the Boston Symphony has determined finally on a policy of devoting itself chiefly to the New England States, and that it would be useless to try to persuade the orchestra to reconsider its determination to abandon its concerts in Baltimore, Frederick R. Huber, manager of the Lyric, has wired the Philharmonic Society asking them to come here.

"The New York Philharmonic Society, since its combination with the National Orchestra, has been described as the greatest orchestra in the world," said Mr. Huber. "Mr. Stransky's work is well known. Henry Hadley, the American composer, is associated with it, and it was this body which brought to America Carl Mengelberg, the great Dutch conductor.

Mengelberg May Conduct.

"Mengelberg has been associated with the New York Philharmonic, and it is expected that he will conduct several concerts this season. I have asked the New York Philharmonic to give five concerts here next season. I expect to get an answer to my telegram soon, and I think we shall be extremely fortunate if we succeed in getting them.

"If there were any reason to hope that we could persuade the Boston Symphony to come here, I should be in favor of such efforts. But to persuade them to reconsider their course would involve not only a guarantee from Baltimore, but persuading both Philadelphia and Washington to make a like guarantee, and I do not believe that that is possible, especially since Philadelphia has its own orchestra to support. If the people of that city wanted to spend more money, they would naturally spend it on their own organization.

"It is a matter of very great regret that this organization, which has been coming here for 25 or 30 years, should abandon its visits. But I see no help for it. The increased cost of travel and of hotel accommodations seems to have led the organization to reach its decision. You see the orchestra plays twice a week in Boston and the musicinas are paid by the week. If it can make trips out of New England profitable, it will make them, but if such trpis do not pay, it must abondon them.

"I do not think the public has realized the excellence of the orchestra during the last year. It did go to pieces during the war, but certainly no orchestra ever came back so quickly. However, the patronage of its concerts during the last year has not been equal to that of the other orchestras. There was a time when attending its concerts was the thing to do, not only because those attending were fond of music, but because socially it was the proper thing. That is no longer true.

When the Boston began to come here the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Symphony Orchestras had not been organized.

Brennan Sends Notice.

W. H. Brennan has sent the following announcement to subscribers:

"Owing to the increased demands for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual concerts in Baltimore.

"In consideration of their loyalty, this notice is sent to the subscribers so that they may have this information at first hand."

"This seems to mark the final determination of the Boston Symphony," said Mr. Huber. "They will probably continue their Western trip, made once a year, and we may look forward to one concert a year from them, but it does not seem likely that we will be able to get more."

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

N. Y. PHILHARMONIC SERIES SUGGESTED

Huber Would Thus Fill In For Boston Concerts.

In view of the decision of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to discontinue that portion of its annual Southern tour which includes Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia, after this season, Frederick R. Huber, manager of the Lyric Theater, has suggested to the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Josef Stransky, conductor, that it give a series of concerts in Baltimore.

This action was taken yesterday, and, as yet, there has been no reply.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra visited Baltimore on tour for an annual series of concerts under Mr. Stransky some years ago, but discontinued visits because it did not receive the amount of patronage it considered necessary. This was regretted by many, as its work under Mr. Stransky was exceedingly good. The New York Philharmonic Society is one of the oldest in the world.

Additional interest in its coming work is created by the coming consolidation with it of the National Symphony Orchestra of New York city, which has been doing fine work.

SUN
...ss: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON AND BALTIMORE ARE no longer linked by the bonds of music. It is far from pleasant to learn that the cause of the break is that the attendance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been small, for this orchestra occupies a unique position in the musical world in spite of its wartime troubles. Its period of temporary adversity is past and it has come back to its former excellence. Is Baltimore, then, to fail in appreciation of it? Apparently the answer to this question has already been given, and the only consolation to be had is that Washington and Philadelphia are also dropped from the itinerary of the Boston musicians. One wishes that it were possible to lay the blame for the poor support on the shoulders of our neighbors, but it is a fact that Baltimore has also fallen down. Perhaps some good may result if other organizations attempt to fill the dates left vacant by the absence of the "Boston Symphony," but none of them will take its place. Here's hoping for its return!

Mr. Monteux is [illegible] a good pro- mme maker and the one he gave terday was of his best. There were dull moments. The orchestra played l throughout, but strangely enough it psed all its previous work in the gner music. The brilliancy, balance, utiful nuance and finish here disyed brought vivid memories of the hestra's famous days.

Mr: Stransky's evening list further tained Kalinnikov's tone poem, "The Tree and the Palm," Tschaikovsky's flat minor piano concerto and the apriccio Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsay. Josef Lhevinne, a familiar pianist e in the concerto, was the solo player.

HERALD FEB 6

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

he excellent idea occurred to Mr. onteux to play at the second of the ston Symphony Orchestra's concerts en yesterday afternoon Dvorak's symony in D minor. It has been known New York for some thirty-five years; t has not been played here for a good ile. Yet it is more worth searching e librarian's shelves for than the symony of Dvorak that was resuscitated e last year; a more important and nificant work.

To be sure, voices of Mendelssohn, humann or Brahms sound transpar- tly through it; yet the music is in orak's characteristic style, when he l most to say; and there are many uties in it of thought and of instruntal sound. It sounded fresh yesday after its long rest and was a lcome relief after the "New World" nphony, too much played. The tone the orchestra was fine and aided orak the colorist in giving beautiful und to the symphony; yet the permance was not one of the most fined that the organization has given e this season.

The program also included the two passacaglias" by Cyril Scott that . Stokowsky made the Philadelphia rchestra play a few weeks ago. It can rdly be said that they improved on other hearing. The Irish tunes that the basis of the two pieces are good es; the second being especially chareristic; but the ingenuity devoted to athing and wrapping them in strange uncomfortable harmonies and the st fantastic and formidable of inumental garbs seems not to have acmplished any advance in their musical elopment or added intrinsically to ir interest, and it gives rise to no nger emotion than that of curiosity. Roger Ducasse's "Suite Française," ich is not familiar, though not new, it was first played in this country years ago, gave pleasure. It is not tentious music, and its dance movents, with overture and a "recitative d air," are clear and vigorous, not mmonplace in their expression and ll written for the orchestra. The cont closed with Wagner's overture to Tannhauser," though his "Eine Faust erture" had first been announced.

~~HERALD~~ Y. TIMES FEB 6

. Monteux had no soloist at the rt of the Boston Symphony Orra in Carnegie Hall on Saturafternoon. Dvorak's seldom heard d symphony, Cyril Scott's two acaglias, recently played here; r Ducasse's "Suite Francais" overture to Wagner's "Tannr" made the programme. It well played.

WORLD FEB. 6

he concert tide of Saturday and nday brought on Saturday the sea's last matinée but one by the ton Symphony Orchestra in Carie Hall, and yesterday afternoon oncert of unusual choice by the nphony Society in Aeolian Hall. the latter Pietro Yon, organist, yed his new "Concerto Gregori" for organ and orchestra, which given on this occasion for the time in New York. Mr. Yon also yed the organ part in Saintns's C minor symphony, whose o part Miss Ruth Clug played. erpts from Casella's "Venetian vent" suite and the overture to nnhäuser" completed the promme.

GLOBE FEB. [illegible]

al
go, Ill.

he Boston Symphony orchestra took last week the performance of Vaughan lliams' "London Symphony." The rk is not known in these parts, but has at looks to be a rather ambitious promme. It begins with the Thames er and the Strand in early morning; ntinues to Bloomsbury at dusk; goes k to the Thames embankment on a urday night; and concludes with the ndon of the unemployed and unforate, with an epilogue that seeks to pict the soul of the city and comes k to the river, from whence it started. For this week's concerts, John Alden penter has gone to the town of pork l beans to assist in the performance his suite from "The Birthday of the anta."

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881
om

Boston Symphony Soloist

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one will be given in Infantry Hall, Providence, on Tuesday evening, March 5, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, No. 3 in A minor, and two of the most famous numbers by Richard Wagner, the "Prelude to Lohengrin," and the "Overture to Tannhauser."

Miss Alice Nielsen, the celebrated lyric soprano, will sing as soloist at this concert two of the immortal arias of Mozart: "Deh vienni non tardar" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti batti" from "Don Giovanni."

Miss Nielsen has long been famous for the miraculous beauty and felicity of her interpretations of Mozart's music. Starting as a young girl, singing the principal roles in light opera in America and London, she made her debut in grand opera in Italy with such pronounced success that she was immediately applauded in the great opera houses of Italy and engaged for a busy season at the Covent Garden Opera in London. Thence she came to America with the San Carlo Opera Co., later becoming the prima donna of the Boston Opera Co., and joining the Metropolitan Opera Co. in 1912. She now confining her activities to the concert stage.

PR

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS CITY HALL TONIGHT

The grand Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in Portland this afternoon and will present its wonderful program announced a few days ago. The coming of the orchestra under the personal direction of Pierre Monteaux ~~is an event of~~ great importance to Portland as few cities outside the great metropolitan centers are so favored. That there is much interest in the visit of the orchestra is noted by the wonderful daily and continued demand for tickets. Even from distant points the number of calls for reservations has been increasing showing that not only Portland but distant sections of the State will be represented at the special concert which is one of the regular series of the winter under the auspices of the Portland Organ commission.

The orchestra was never in better form, the New York critics declaring only a short time ago, following the appearance of the orchestra in that city—there is but one Boston Symphony. The number of musicians to be presented will be about 100, every one an artist. All of the numbers selected have met with hearty approval by the patrons and of particular interest was the announcement that the great Tannhauser Overture will be included in the list of offerings. The concert will begin at 8.15.

rom
ublic Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NO 1922 SEASON HERE OF BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN

Orchestra Has Given Concerts in This City Since 1883

Word was received here last night that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not play in Philadelphia next season. The orchestra will give a concert at the Academy of Music on March 14. That will be its last appearance here, no arrangements having been made for a Philadelphia engagement in the 1921-22 season.

The Boston Symphony came here first in 1883 and had in this city its first great success outside of the orchestra's home city. It did not play in New York till 1887. In the season of 1892-93, under N. Kisch's baton the Boston musicians gave a memorable program at the Academy to an audience so large that 700 persons were compelled to stand.

The death in November, 1919, of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and principal patron of the Boston orchestra, was one of several happenings that have greatly affected the musical organization in the last few years.

Much unpleasant publicity was visited upon the Boston Symphony in the war because of the actions of Dr. Karl Muck, then its leader. A few months after this country declared war on Germany Dr. Muck brought a storm of protest down upon himself for refusing to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert. At another concert some months later Dr. Muck, upon Mr. Higginson's request, led the orchestra in the playing of the anthem, then resigned. Subsequently he was arrested as a dangerous alien enemy, interned and finally deported.

After Dr. Muck's resignation eighteen other Germans were dropped from the orchestra.

Henri Rabaud, of Paris, succeeded Dr. Muck as leader. He remained one season. Pierre Monteux, the present leader, followed Mr. Rabaud in 1919. Mr. Monteux also came from Paris.

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CUTS CAPITAL OFF ITINERARY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to forsake Washington in its future concert itineraries, is the rumor that has been set afoot. Baltimore, too, loses this famous orchestra from the Hub that has been a part of the music life of these cities for many years.

The reasons assigned are lack of patronage in the Southern cities. The report comes from Frederick R. Huber, of Baltimore, who was in conference with W. A. Brennan, manager of the Boston Orchestra. Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia have been taken from the visiting list of the orchestra, it is said.

"It is a calamity for Baltimore lovers of music to lose this orchestra," said Huber. "Before the war it was rated as the greatest orchestra in the world, and recently it has been regaining its former leadership. For 30 years it has been coming to Baltimore. Because of the poor attendance here and the fact that it has had so many requests to play in the vicinity of Boston, the organization has decided to give up its Southern trip."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

ALICE NEILSEN TO SING FAMOUS MELODIES HERE

Will be Soloist with Boston Symphony Next Tuesday.

Miss Alice Neilsen, who will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will sing two of the immortal melodies of Mozart—"Deh Vieni non Tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni." As a star in opera, Miss Neilsen has been perhaps more talked about in these two roles than in any others.

The symphony to be conducted by Pierre Monteux at this concert will be the third by Mendelssohn in A-minor, entitled "Scotch." It was inspired by an episode in the life of Mary Stuart and maintains its popularity as one of the most melodious works that has come down from the Victorian period. Two notable numbers by Richard Wagner will also be played—the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

A BOSTON MATINEE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played with beautiful tonal quality at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It wasn't what they said but the fascinating way they said it! This particularly applies to Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, which is a conventional composition, chiefly interesting because of its reminiscences. But it is richly scored and it sounds better than it is—like the political speeches of "statesmen." At least it wasn't the "New World" Symphony; anything but that stale mosaic. There is genuine fire in the first allegro, but the Brahms-like adagio and the phrase-spinning of the finale are monotonous. Do, Brother Monteux, let us hear once more the Husitzka overture and the scherzo a cappriccioso; they were favorites at the Theodore Thomas concerts in the old days.

The two passacaglias by Cyril Scott, a young English composer and pianist, were first heard here under the baton of Mr. Stokowski. They did not impress us either then or now. The first is like a Cyclops practising five-finger exercises on his anvils; the second, a gay old tune hides its honest face behind rouge and powder from the "modernistic" beauty doctors of Paris and Petrograd. There are some novel tonal timbres; nevertheless, the hearer remains hungry for an idea, even the ghostly adumbration of an idea. Cyril Scott knows a lot, yet his is music for the Martians of the fantastic H. G. Wells.

After this cock-eyed music the graceful French suite by Roger Ducasse fell pleasantly upon our weary ears. The programme ended with genuine music, the Tannhaeuser overture. Conductor Pierre Monteux fairly overflowed with the oil of human kindness, although he was evidently not in the most amiable of moods. There was too much talking in the hall, also interruptions by late-comers. The oil we refer to was in the euphonious flow of the music. After all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WORLD FEB. 6.

Boston Symphony Plays.

The last except one this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thursday evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. There was no novelty in the programme, but all the works given were enjoyed. They were Beethoven's first symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," after Hugo's poem, with the piano solo played by Robert Schmitz; Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer," and for the final number Liszt's "Tasso." The orchestra gave a generally good performance of the Beethoven symphony. It might have had more tonal smoothness, but the balance and precision were good and the spirit excellent.

N.Y. HERALD, FEB 6.

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to New York yesterday and gave its first concert in the evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Monteux's program included Beethoven's first symphony, César Franck's symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, "Les Djinns," Debussy's three symphonic sketches "La Mer" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso."

The symphony was charmingly played, crispy and with fine tone and shading. So played it still gives pleasure in the hearing, without the necessity of deciding whether it is "true Beethoven"; whether it is original; how far it is derived from Haydn and Mozart; whether liking it necessarily goes beyond the music itself and involves, in the phase of Mr. Hale's program note, belief in "the plenary inspiration of a great composer."

César Franck's symphonic poem is not among the most frequently played of his works. For one thing, it requires some self-abnegation on the part of the pianist, who has a short but difficult piece to play and but little opportunity to shine as a soloist; for the piano, while more than an orchestral instrument, has hardly an independent part. For another, the work seems somewhat tentative—more an experiment in color, instrumental and harmonic, than the development of strongly individual musical ideas. As such it has a rich and delicate beauty, and its performance gave enjoyment. Mr. Schmitz's playing of the piano part was brilliant and graceful.

There never was so deep an impression made by Debussy's sketches of the sea as by some of his other compositions for orchestra. Now that the method of expression is no longer new, the music seems to have shrunk in significance. How far inferior it is, for instance, in value to the prelude of "The Afternoon of a Faun!" This music summons up little of the sea. Its substance seems to lay thin, its orchestral color patchy. A few passages delight with their tonalities still fresh, but the composer's success seems to have been intermittent.

TIMES FEB 6.

Boston Orchestra Here

In the barcarolle the composer utilizes a soprano voice which sings a melody of a type which, we fancy, must sound strangely in a Venetian car, on the vocable "Ah." Nothing more. Perhaps the voice should have sounded like one in the orchestral company—lifted into the prominence of a solo song, as it was by Miss Henrietta Conrad, it evoked wonder that it should have been left wordless. Several composers, as far back as Berlioz in his "Trojans in Carthage," have used inarticulate song for musical effects, chiefly for color, and something like this may have been Casella's purpose in this piece. If so we thought that purpose frustrated by the heavy-footed manner in which it was sung by Miss Conrad.

The other pieces on the program were the overture to "William Tell," by Rossini; Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and Sinigaglia's overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozzotti."

In the evening the walls of Carnegie Hall echoed to music made by the Boston Orchestra and E. Robert Schmitz, pianist. There was nothing new on the program but the excellent playing of Mr. Monteux's men, who are steadily growing toward the perfection for which the old Boston organization stood, and Mr. Schmitz gave great pleasure and received cordial recognition. The pragram was composed of Beethoven's first symphony, César Franck's "Les Djinns" for pianoforte and orchestra, Debussy's "Le Mer" and Liszt's "Tasso."

TRIBUNE-FEB 4

In the evening the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux's baton, offered Beethoven's First Symphony, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," for piano and orchestra, E. Robert Schmitz officiating as soloist; Debussy's "La Mer" and Liszt's poem "Tasso." The unusual thing about the concert was the vacant seats, a novel experience here for the Boston men. The virtuosity of the band was finely displayed in the Debussy number.

WORLD FEB. 4.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

Visiting us for the fourth time this season, Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall last night. With E. Robert Schmitz at the piano he played Cesar Franck's "Les Djinns," symphonic poem. Mr. Schmitz played with that rare delicacy that makes him unique among pianists, but he seemed to lack the brazen force demanded by this Oriental work. There was the First Beethoven Symphony, which Monteux played admirably, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Liszt "Tasso."

Fountains and convents and the dances of children had their musical pictures drawn by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the historical cycle representing Italian composers from the sixteenth to the twentieth century.

Rossini's "William Tell" overture, Respighi's "Fontane di Roma," Casella's "The Venetian Convent" and De Sabata's "Juventus" were eloquently described. Henrietta Conrad sang the soprano obbligato in the Barcarolle of the Casella suite.

MAIL FEB. 4.

Symphonies of the Day.

Two symphony concerts marked the day. The Boston orchestra came to give its last concert but one of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The New York orchestra played there under Mr. Damrosch in the afternoon, inaugurating its eighth pair of concerts in the historical cycle.

This was the programme which M. Monteux chose for the playing of his Boston men: Beethoven's First Symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," Debussy's symphonic suite, "The Sea," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns." It was a programme balanced, therefore, between the standard and the unusual. Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, was the soloist in the Franck; he is a facile and clever musician whose day is swiftly looming here.

Though this list may have made more of an appeal to the curiosity than to the soul, M. Monteux so conducted his orchestra as to bring out in high colors much of the beauty possible. Delicacy was sacrificed sometimes in the Beethoven for force and vitality; but it was always interesting, much alive and productive of a tonal glow from the band.

The New York Symphony, in earlier turn, filled the afternoon with examples of the Italian composers from the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries. This small span brought out, thanks to Mr. Damrosch's baton, two ancient dances, a balleto by Molinaro and a gagliarda by Galilei, father of the astronomer. The latter composition had been deftly done over for orchestra by the modern Respighi. Among other examples there were Respighi's own "Fountains of Rome" and the "William Tell" overture.

SUN-FEB. 4

n SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.

ASKS PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY TO PLAY HERE

Huber Wires New York Orchestra To Take Place Of Boston Symphony.

HAS DOUBTS OF ANY CHANGE

Says Not Only Baltimore, But Philadelphia And Washington Would Have To Take Guarantee.

The New York Philharmonic Society will be asked to take the place of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore.

Believing that the Boston Symphony has determined finally on a policy of devoting itself chiefly to the New England States, and that it would be useless to try to persuade the orchestra to reconsider its determination to abandon its concerts in Baltimore, Frederick R. Huber, manager of the Lyric, has wired the Philharmonic Society asking them to come here.

"The New York Philharmonic Society, since its combination with the National Orchestra, has been described as the greatest orchestra in the world," said Mr. Huber. "Mr. Stransky's work is well known. Henry Hadley, the American composer, is associated with it, and it was this body which brought to America Carl Mengelberg, the great Dutch conductor.

Mengelberg May Conduct.

"Mengelberg has been associated with the New York Philharmonic, and it is expected that he will conduct several concerts this season. I have asked the New York Philharmonic to give five concerts here next season. I expect to get an answer to my telegram soon, and I think we shall be extremely fortunate if we succeed in getting them.

"If there were any reason to hope that we could persuade the Boston Symphony to come here, I should be in favor of such efforts. But to persuade them to reconsider their course would involve not only a guarantee from Baltimore, but persuading both Philadelphia and Washington to make a like guarantee, and I do not believe that that is possible, especially since Philadelphia has its own orchestra to support. If the people of that city wanted to spend more money, they would naturally spend it on their own organization.

[illegible]

"It is a matter of very great regret that this organization, which has been coming here for 25 or 30 years, should abandon its visits. But I see no help for it. The increased cost of travel and of hotel accommodations seems to have led the organization to reach its decision. You see the orchestra plays twice a week in Boston and the musicinas are paid by the week. If it can make trips out of New England profitable, it will make them, but if such trpis do not pay, it must abondon them.

"I do not think the public has realized the excellence of the orchestra during the last year. It did go to pieces during the war, but certainly no orchestra ever came back so quickly. However, the patronage of its concerts during the last year has not been equal to that of the other orchestras. There was a time when attending its concerts was the thing to do, not only because those attending were fond of music, but because socially it was the proper thing. That is no longer true.

When the Boston began to come here the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Symphony Orchestras had not been organized.

Brennan Sends Notice.

W. H. Brennan has sent the following announcement to subscribers:

"Owing to the increased demands for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual concerts in Baltimore.

"In consideration of their loyalty, this notice is sent to the subscribers so that they may have this information at first hand."

"This seems to mark the final determination of the Boston Symphony," said Mr. Huber. "They will probably continue their Western trip, made once a year, and we may look forward to one concert a year from them, but it does not seem likely that we will be able to get more."

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

N. Y. PHILHARMONIC SERIES SUGGESTED

Huber Would Thus Fill In For Boston Concerts.

In view of the decision of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to discontinue that portion of its annual Southern tour which includes Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia, after this season, Frederick R. Huber, manager of the Lyric Theater, has suggested to the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Josef Stransky, conductor, that it give a series of concerts in Baltimore.

This action was taken yesterday, and, as yet, there has been no reply.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra visited Baltimore on tour for an annual series of concerts under Mr. Stransky some years ago, but discontinued visits because it did not receive the amount of patronage it considered necessary. This was regretted by many, as its work under Mr. Stransky was exceedingly good. The New York Philharmonic Society is one of the oldest in the world.

Additional interest in its coming work is created by the coming consolidation with it of the National Symphony Orchestra of New York city, which has been doing fine work.

SUN
ss: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON AND BALTIMORE ARE no longer linked by the bonds of music. It is far from pleasant to learn that the cause of the break is that the attendance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been small, for this orchestra occupies a unique position in the musical world in spite of its wartime troubles. Its period of temporary adversity is past and it has come back to its former excellence. Is Baltimore, then, to fail in appreciation of it? Apparently the answer to this question has already been given, and the only consolation to be had is that Washington and Philadelphia are also dropped from the itinerary of the Boston musicians. One wishes that it were possible to lay the blame for the poor support on the shoulders of our neighbors, but it is a fact that Baltimore has also fallen down. Perhaps some good may result if other organizations attempt to fill the dates left vacant by the absence of the "Boston Symphony," but none of them will take its place. Here's hoping for its return!

INQUIRER MAR 6 1921 K
Philadelphia, Pa.

No More Boston Symphony Concer

6

THE announcement that the visits to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be discontinued will not be the occasion for much surprise or for any very deep regret among those who are acquainted with the situation, and this for various reasons. There was a time when its disappearance would have left a serious hiatus in our musical life, for until about fifteen years ago its annual concerts were rightly regarded as among the most important and significant events of our musical season. It was in the spring of 1884 that the Boston organization came to this city for the first time. At the single concert which it then gave it achieved an instantaneous and sensational success which decided the management to include Philadelphia in its itinerary and it has been coming here regularly without interruption ever since.

During much or most of that time it furnished the only entertainment of the kind which this community had an opportunity of enjoying. Theodore Thomas before he migrated to Chicago used to bring his orchestra here once in a while, but he received no encouragement to multiply or even continue his visits, so that until the formation of our own orchestra, under the late Fritz Scheel, the Boston people had the local field to themselves. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that their audiences steadily increased in number and finally outgrew the seating capacity of the house, but when the management undertook to accommodate the overflow by giving concerts on Wednesdays as well as Mondays the results were disappointing and the Wednesday concerts were presently abandoned.

For most of the period over which its visitations extended the artistic position of the Boston orchestra was one of universally recognized superiority. Thanks to its patron's liberality it was composed of the best material the world afforded. Its members were all the pick of their profession, and its several choirs were headed by players who were entitled to rank as virtuosos. Under the training of Wilhelm Gericke and of his successors, notably of Arthur Nikisch, it was brought to a pitch of technical perfection without a parallel, and the only complaint of the most captious critic related to what was described as an excessive refinement at some sacrifice of power. But when at its best it was a wonderful orchestra and its performances were an unalloyed delight.

It is unnecessary to recall the circumstances which led to its disintegration and to the melancholy impairment of its prestige. They are fresh in the public mind and it is only fair to record that under its most recent direction important progress toward its rehabilitation has been made. But it is still not what is used to be, and it will be missed the less because in our own orchestra we have one, thanks to Doctor Stokowski's genius and devotion, which today is playing as well as the one from Boston ever did.

From
STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Last Boston Symphony Concert.

At the last Boston Symphony concert for the present season, in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, March 15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's "Second Symphony in D Minor" and Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe."

The soloist of the afternoon will be Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, who will play Mozart's "Concerto in G Major."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From HERALD

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the present season will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 15, at 4:30 o'clock. Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, and Weber's "Overture to Eurylanthe." The soloist of the afternoon will be Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, who has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses.

---

rom SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
te

Dohnanyi With Boston Orchestra

The final Boston Symphony concert to be given here will take place in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, March 16, at 8.15. The symphony on this occasion will be the nobly exalted masterpiece of Cesar Franck in D minor, which is also considered the finest achievement in all French music. Pierre Monteux will conduct Weber's Over-close the program with an excerpt from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet"—"The Grand Fete at the Capulets." Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, will play with the orchestra as the soloist of the evening, Mozart's gracefully and delicately conceived pianoforte concerto in G major.

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

FINAL BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the present season, to be given at the National Theater Tuesday, March 15, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's second symphony, in D minor, and Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe."

Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, will be the soloist. Mr. Dohnanyi has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses.

The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a performer are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899 and 1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dohnanyi is idolized by his countrymen, who crowd his concerts whenever he appears, and he comes to us as the exponent of the finest artistic achievements of hungary and as one of her greatest sons. In his numerous tours of Europe he has been received in Berlin, Paris, London, and other capitals with an enthusiasm accorded to scarcely any other musician living. He will play with the orchestra Mozart's piano concerto in G major.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

—At the closing Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening March 14, Pierre Monteux will conduct the melodious and always popular Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and will close the program with Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. In Europe, however, whence he has recently come, his renown both as a creative and as an executive artist has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses. Dohnanyi is idolized by his countrymen, who crowd his concerts whenever he appears, and he comes here as exponent of the finest artistic achievement of Hungary and as one of her greatest sons.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony's Last Program Here

At the last concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will give in Baltimore, in the Lyric Theater on March 16, at 8.15 P. M., thereafter discontinuing that part of its annual southern tour which has included Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia, Erno Dohnanyi, noted Hungarian pianist and composer, will be the special soloist. He will play with orchestra a Mozart Concerto in G major. Performance of this week will be something of a departure among orchestra concerts in Baltimore. The concert will be the fifth of a series of five.

Coming to Baltimore again of Mr. Dohnanyi is being regard with much anticipation. He visited the United States in 1899-1900, during which season he played in Baltimore with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The other pieces upon the program announced are Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, the overture to Weber's opera "Euryanthe," and "The Grand Fete at the Capulet's" from Berlioz's "dramatic symphony" entitled "Romeo and Juliet."

It is said that a new national hymn composed by Dohnanyi and adopted by the present Hungarian Government has replaced the anthem sung in a war days.

---

rom POST
ddress: Washington, D. C.
te

At the last Boston Symphony concert for the present season, to be given in the New National theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 15, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's second symphony in D minor and Weber's "Overture to Eurylanthe." The soloist will be Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist, who has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a performer are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899 and 1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will play with the orchestra Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major.

From Public Ledger MAR 6 1921 K
Philadelphia, Pa.

AT THE closing Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 14, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct the melodious and always popular Second Symphony of Brahms in D major and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and will close the program with Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia. In Europe, however, whence he has just come, his renown both as a creative and as an executive artist has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses. Dohnanyi is idolized by his countrymen, who crowd the concert room whenever he appears and he comes to us as the exponent of the finest artistic achievement of Hungary.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the closing of the Boston Symphony concert, in the Academy on Monday evening, March 14, Pierre Manteux will present the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orphent," and will close the program with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia. In connection with this final concert of the Boston Symphony's here, announcement is made that "owing to the increasing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual series of concerts in Philadelphia." The announcement is signed by W. H. Brennan, manager.

INQUIRER MAR 6
Philadelphia, Pa.

Final Boston Symphony Concert

At the closing Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 14, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux will conduct the melodious and always popular Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Liszt's Symphoni Poem, "Orpheus," Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia. In Europe, however, whence he has just come, his renown both as a creative and as an executive artist has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses.

TRIBUNE
ess: Providence, R. I.
MAR -7 1921 A

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brockton on Feb. 20, in spite of the storm. The Brockton Times of the 21st voiced the delight of the audience. "The last number was Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, in A major, Op. 1, No. 1, and its last melodious chords mingled softly with sighs of regret from the listeners, who for more than two hours had drifted happily on the sea of soul-stirring music." Mr. Richard Burgin was the soloist. Hhe "exhibited rare skill as the sweet voice of his violin rose and fell in charming interpretations of dreamy, passionate and vivacious phases" (sic). The symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World." "All who understood the technique and sympathetic understanding necessary for successful intonations were impressed with the faultless blending of the violins, violas, flutes, trumpets and other instruments which make up the ensemble of the perfect melody producers."

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

THE THREE ARTS
Music, Drama, Painting

THE matinee musical to be given by Manuscript Music Society at the Lyric will take place on Tuesday mor March 23, and not a week from next day, as announced in this column on day last.

—o—

Concertgoers who really sensed, du the past few months, the strength of Boston Orchestra organization and who how very rapidly the orchestra itself was gaining its old prowess—the men pla magnificently at the last two concerts— regret the passing of this historic band f the Baltimore consciousness.

An unfortunate chain of circumstan led to the musical disruption of the Bos Orchestra and for a time its concerts w only mildly interesting; the performa ragged, the tone thin. There had been earthquake, figuratively speaking, and orchestra had to find itself again.

Recently it has been in the finest fo but its old friends, having deserted it for pastures when the crash came, failed to g it, redivivus, the support it deserved.

For while the later concerts did attract tention they did not arouse the interest t hould. And so the Boston Orchestra is visit us no more.

To those of us who love fine music were sympathetically watching the Bos Orchestra "come back," this will always matter of deep regret. For the presen as been decided not to bring the Bos Orchestra "South" at all.

One day, however, it must play here again or it is really an integral part of our musical life, and we must not permit it to bsent itself from us for all time. One ould like to think that this is only a temporary arrangement.

---

n SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: For the past few days the press has been ably voicing the deep regret of the music-loving people of Baltimore over the loss of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual visits, but only those who are actively interested in the development of music in our midst can fully estimate what its withdrawal might mean to our city.

To those who of late have patronized our symphony concerts in unprecedented numbers it is but fair that they should be informed that the blame does not rest wholly upon the shoulders of the public.

In the high tide of the Boston Orchestra's favor in Baltimore, when it had no other orchestras with which to compete, there were never more than 12 of the 20 boxes at the Lyric sold for the season, the remaining chairs in the boxes being sold as single seats, and until the Permanent Committee for the Promotion of Music in Baltimore assumed the sale of boxes for the Philadelphia Orchestra's series of concerts two years ago there had never been a sale of all the boxes for the entire season. Last fall, after complete disruption and reorganization confronting serious problems, the managers of the Boston Orchestra saw fit to increase the price of its tickets—the boxes in Washington selling for $150 as against $100 for the New York and Philadelphia series—and they also declined the proffered aid of the Permanent Committee in disposing of the Lyric boxes, on the ground that "they preferred to win out on their own merit"—a commendable position for them to take, most assuredly, but the result of their attitude speaks for itself.

When pride and sentiment are weighed in the balance with expediency and sound business policies the apt to tip heavily in favor of the So, while we must sadly deplore passing of the Boston Orchestra the musical life of Baltimore, we comfort ourselves with the thought its departure has not been hastened apathy or lack of appreciation of gratitude for all that it has meant to in the past.

ELIZABETH ELLEN STARR,
Chairman of Permanent Committee the Promotion of Music in Baltimo Roland Park, March 5.

---

rom
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

Was Boston Orchestra Shut Out?

To the Editor of The Bulletin.

Sir: Many music lovers have asked the question why the Boston Orchestra, after years, is to abandon its Philadelphia concerts. These queries have doubtless been actuated by the discovery that the press announcements a few weeks ago that the Boston Orchestra was curtailing its trips all around are now proved to be false. Announcement is made from Boston that all the usual tours are to be made next year, with the exception of Philadelphia. This city is to be omitted for the simple, but all-sufficient, reason that the Academy of Music could not be secured for any dates. It seems to me that the attempt to create an impression that the Boston management is responsible for this unfortunate hiatus in Philadelphia's next musical season should be discountenanced by the publication of the truth. The Boston management is understood to be unwilling to take chances in any other hall in Philadelphia, but it should be made known to the public that they would undoubtedly be here again next winter had they been able to get the Academy. This confirms points again to Philadelphia's need of one large, central auditoriums. It also points to some other things.

E. M. T.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From EWS
9 1921 A

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES CONCERT SERIES

Devoid of novelties, but interesting and well-rendered, was the programme presented last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth appearance of the season at Infantry Hall. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the feature.

Miss Alice Neilsen, remembered for her many pleasing concerts here, was flatteringly received after her two offerings last night. Both were Mozart arias.

The programme: Symphony No. 3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Mendelssohn; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

From MAR 9 1921 A
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

'SCOTCH' SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE

Boston Orchestra Plays Works of Old Composers.

ALICE NEILSEN SINGS

Mendelssohn, Mozart and Wagner Represented on Programme Infantry Hall.—Magnificent Rendition of "Tannhauser" Concludes Orchestral Offerings.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the feature number at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall last evening. It was a good substantial programme, devoid of novelties, but interesting and exceedingly well played, that Mr. Monteux presented. Alice Neilsen was the soloist, two Mozart arias serving to reveal her vocal ability. A big audience enjoyed the concert, in which the numbers were given in the following order:

Mendelssohn......Symphony No. 3 in A-minor "Scotch," Op. 56.
Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato
Vivace non troppo.
Adagio.
Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso
Wagner..............Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Mozart.........Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro"
Mozart..............Aria, "Batti, batti," "Don Giovanni"
Wagner..............Overture to "Tannhauser"

In these days when feverish desire for something new and strange in orchestral music afflicts conductors and the modernist is placed upon a pedestal, the average concertgoer sits through a symphony like the Mendelssohn No. 3 in A-minor with a feeling of calm contentment. This is not a profound work, neither is it one that quickens the pulse or deeply stirs the listener. It is a beautiful musical picture born in the mind of a great tone poet and [105]

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

6

No More Boston Symphony Concer

THE announcement that the visits to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be discontinued will not be the occasion for much surprise or for any very deep regret among those who are acquainted with the situation, and this for various reasons. There was a time when its disappearance would have left a serious hiatus in our musical life, for until about fifteen years ago its annual concerts were rightly regarded as among the most important and significant events of our musical season. It was in the spring of 1884 that the Boston organization came to this city for the first time. At the single concert which it then gave it achieved an instantaneous and sensational success which decided the management to include Philadelphia in its itinerary and it has been coming here regularly without interruption ever since.

During much or most of that time it furnished the only entertainment of the kind which this community had an opportunity of enjoying. Theodore Thomas before he migrated to Chicago used to bring his orchestra here once in a while, but he received no encouragement to multiply or even continue his visits, so that until the formation of our own orchestra, under the late Fritz Scheel, the Boston people had the local field to themselves. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that their audiences steadily increased in number and finally outgrew the seating capacity of the house, but when the management undertook to accommodate the overflow by giving concerts on Wednesdays as well as Mondays the results were disappointing and the Wednesday concerts were presently abandoned.

For most of the period over which its visitations extended the artistic position of the Boston orchestra was one of universally recognized superiority. Thanks to its patron's liberality it was composed of the best material the world afforded. Its members were all the pick of their profession, and its several choirs were headed by players who were entitled to rank as virtuosos. Under the training of Wilhelm Gericke and of his successors, notably of Arthur Nikisch, it was brought to a pitch of technical perfection without a parallel, and the only complaint of the most captious critic related to what was described as an excessive refinement at some sacrifice of power. But when at its best it was a wonderful orchestra and its performances were an unalloyed delight.

It is unnecessary to recall the circumstances which led to its disintegration and to the melancholy impairment of its prestige. They are fresh in the public mind and it is only fair to record that under its most recent direction important progress toward its rehabilitation has been made. But it is still not what is used to be, and it will be missed the less because in our own orchestra we have one, thanks to Doctor Stokowski's genius and devotion, which today is playing as well as the one from Boston ever did.

From
STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Last Boston Symphony Concert.

At the last Boston Symphony concert for the present season, in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, March 15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's "Second Symphony in D Minor" and Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe."

The soloist of the afternoon will be Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, who will play Mozart's "Concerto in G Major."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From HERALD

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the present season will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 15, at 4:30 o'clock. Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, and Weber's "Overture to Eurylanthe." The soloist of the afternoon will be Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, who has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses.

---

om SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
te

Dohnanyi With Boston Orchestra

The final Boston Symphony concert to be given here will take place in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, March 16, at 8.15. The symphony on this occasion will be the nobly exalted masterpiece of Cesar Franck in D minor, which is also considered the finest achievement in all French music. Pierre Monteaux will conduct Weber's Over-close the program with an excerpt from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet"—"The Grand Fete at the Capulet's." Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, will play with the orchestra as the soloist of the evening. Mozart's gracefully and delicately conceived pianoforte concerto in G major.

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

FINAL BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the present season, to be given at the National Theater Tuesday, March 15, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's second symphony, in D minor, and Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe."

Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, will be the soloist. Mr. Dohnanyi has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses.

The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a performer are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899 and 1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dohnanyi is idolized by his countrymen, who crowd his concerts whenever he appears, and he comes to us as the exponent of the finest artistic achievements of hungary and as one of her greatest sons. In his numerous tours of Europe he has been received in Berlin, Paris, London, and other capitals with an enthusiasm accorded to scarcely any other musician living. He will play with the orchestra Mozart's piano concerto in G major.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

—At the closing Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening March 14, Pierre Monteux will conduct the melodious and always popular Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and will close the program with Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. In Europe, however, whence he has recently come, his renown both as a creative and as an executive artist has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses. Dohnanyi is idolized by his countrymen, who crowd his concerts whenever he appears, and he comes here as exponent of the finest artistic achievement of Hungary and as one of her greatest sons.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony's Last Program Here

At the last concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will give in Baltimore, in the Lyric Theater on March 16, at 8.15 P. M., thereafter discontinuing that part of its annual southern tour which has included Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia, Erno Dohnanyi, noted Hungarian pianist and composer, will be the special soloist. He will play with orchestra a Mozart Concerto in G major. Performance of this week will be something of a departure among orchestra concerts in Baltimore. The concert will be the fifth of a series of five.

Coming to Baltimore again of Mr. Dohnanyi is being regard with much anticipation. He visited the United States in 1899-1900, during which season he played in Baltimore with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The other pieces upon the program announced are Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, the overture to Weber's opera "Euryanthe," and "The Grand Fete at the Capulet's" from Berlioz's "dramatic symphony" entitled "Romeo and Juliet."

It is said that a new national hymn composed by Dohnanyi and adopted by the present Hungarian Government has replaced the anthem sung in [illegible]-war days.

---

rom POST
ddress: Washington, D. C.
te

At the last Boston Symphony concert for the present season, to be given in the New National theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 15, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's second symphony in D minor and Weber's "Overture to Eurylanthe." The soloist will be Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist, who has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a performer are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899 and 1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will play with the orchestra Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major.

From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

AT THE closing Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 14, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct the melodious and always popular Second Symphony of Brahms in D major and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and will close the program with Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia. In Europe, however, whence he has just come, his renown both as a creative and as an executive artist has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses. Dohnanyi is idolized by his countrymen, who crowd the concert room whenever he appears; and he comes to us as the exponent of the finest artistic achievement of Hungary.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the closing of the Boston Symphony concert, in the Academy on Monday evening, March 14, Pierre Manteux will present the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orphent," and will close the program with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia. In connection with this final concert of the Boston Symphony's here, announcement is made that "owing to the increasing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual series of concerts in Philadelphia." The announcement is signed by W. H. Brennan, manager.

From
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Final Boston Symphony Concert

At the closing Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 14, at 8.15, Pierre Monteux will conduct the melodious and always popular Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Liszt's Symphoni Poem, "Orpheus," Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser." The concerto of the evening will be that of Mozart in G major, and the soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, famous Hungarian composer and pianist. The compositions of Dohnanyi are known here, but his abilities as a pianist are scarcely remembered, since he made his former visit to the United States as a young man in 1899-1900, on which occasion he played as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia. In Europe, however, whence he has just come, his renown both as a creative and as an executive artist has placed him in the forefront of living musical geniuses.

TRIBUNE
ess: Providence, R. I.

MAR -7 1921 A

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brockton on Feb. 20, in spite of the storm. The Brockton Times of the 21st voiced the delight of the audience. "The last number was Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, in A major, Op. 1, No. 1, and its last melodious chords mingled softly with sighs of regret from the listeners, who for more than two hours had drifted happily on the sea of soul-stirring music." Mr. Richard Burgin was the soloist. Hhe "exhibited rare skill as the sweet voice of his violin rose and fell in charming interpretations of dreamy, passionate and vivacious phases" (sic). The symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World." "All who understood the technique and sympathetic understanding necessary for successful intonations were impressed with the faultless blending of the violins, violas, flutes, trumpets and other instruments which make up the ensemble of the perfect melody producers."

---

rom EVENING SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
ate

THE THREE ARTS
Music, Drama, Painting

THE matinee musical to be given b Manuscript Music Society at the Lyric will take place on Tuesday mor
March 23, and not a week from next day, as announced in this column on day last.

—o—

Concertgoers who really sensed, du the past few months, the strength of Boston Orchestra organization and who how very rapidly the orchestra itself was gaining its old prowess—the men pla magnificently at the last two concerts—regret the passing of this historic band f
the Baltimore consciousness.

An unfortunate chain of circumsta led to the musical disruption of the Bos Orchestra and for a time its concerts w only mildly interesting, the performa ragged, the tone thin. There had been earthquake, figuratively speaking, and orchestra had to find itself again.

Recently it has been in the finest fo but its old friends, having deserted it for pastures when the crash came, failed to it, redivivus, the support it deserved.

For while the later concerts did attract tention they did not arouse the interest t should. And so the Boston Orchestra is visit us no more.

To those of us who love fine music were sympathetically watching the Bos Orchestra "come back," this will always a matter of deep regret. For the presen has been decided not to bring the Bos Orchestra "South" at all.

One day, however, it must play here again for it is really an integral part of ou musical life, and we must not permit it to absent itself from us for all time. One would like to think that this is only a temporary arrangement.

---

n SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: For the past few days the press has been ably voicing the deep regret of the music-loving people of Baltimore over the loss of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual visits, but only those who are actively interested in the development of music in our midst can fully estimate what its withdrawal might mean to our city.

To those who of late have patronized our symphony concerts in unprecedented numbers it is but fair that they should be informed that the blame does not rest wholly upon the shoulders of the public.

In the high tide of the Boston Orchestra's favor in Baltimore, when it had no other orchestras with which to compete, there were never more than 12 of the 20 boxes at the Lyric sold for the season, the remaining chairs in the boxes being sold as single seats, and until the Permanent Committee for the Promotion of Music in Baltimore assumed the sale of boxes for the Philadelphia Orchestra's series of concerts two years ago there had never been a sale of all the boxes for the entire season. Last fall, after complete disruption and reorganization confronting serious problems, the managers of the Boston Orchestra saw fit to increase the price of its tickets—the boxes in Washington selling for $150 as against $100 for the New York and Philadelphia series—and they also declined the proffered aid of the Permanent Committee in disposing of the Lyric boxes, on the ground that "they preferred to win out on their own merit"—a commendable position for them to take, most assuredly, but the result of their attitude speaks for itself.

When pride and sentiment are weighed in the balance with expediency and sound business policies the sc
apt to tip heavily in favor of the la
So, while we must sadly deplore passing of the Boston Orchestra fro the musical life of Baltimore, we ca comfort ourselves with the thought tha its departure has not been hastened b apathy or lack of appreciation of gratitude for all that it has meant to in the past.

ELIZABETH ELLEN STARR,
Chairman of Permanent Committee f
the Promotion of Music in Baltimo Roland Park, March 5.

---

rom
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

Was Boston Orchestra Shut Out?

To the Editor of The Bulletin.

Sir: Many music lovers have asked t question why the Boston Orchestra, after for years, is to abandon its Philadelphia concerts.
These queries have doubtless been actuated by the discovery that the press announcements a few weeks ago that the Boston Orchestra was curtailing its trips all around are now proved to be false. Announcemen is made from Boston that all the usual tour are to be made next year, with the exceptio of Philadelphia. This city is to be omitte for the simple, but all-sufficient, reason tha the Academy of Music could not be secure for any dates. It seems to me that the a tempt to create an impression that the Bosto management is responsible for this unfortuna hiatus in Philadelphia's next musical seaso should be discountenanced by the publicatio of the truth. The Boston management is u derstood to be unwilling to take chances any other hall in Philadelphia, but it shou be made known to the public that they wo undoubtedly be here again next winter had been able to get the Academy. This conf points again to Philadelphia's need of on large, central auditoriums. It also poi to some other things.

E. M. F.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

A OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES
CONCERT SERIE

Devoid of novelties, but inter
ing and well-rendered, was t programme presented last night b
the Boston Symphony Orchestra
its fourth appearance of the sea son at Infantry Hall. Mendelssohn's
"Scotch" Symphony was the feature

Miss Alice Neilsen, remembered for her many pleasing concerts her was flatteringly received after he two offerings last night. Bot were Mozart arias.

The programme: Symphony N
3 in A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56
Mendelssohn; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; aria, "Deh vieni no tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; aria, "Batti, bat-ti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagne

From JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

'SCOTCH' SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATUR

Boston Orchestra Plays Wor of Old Composers.

ALICE NEILSEN SINGS

Mendelssohn, Mozart and Wagn
Represented on Programme
Infantry Hall.—Magnificent Re
dition of "Tannhauser" Conclude Orchestral Offerings.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony wa
the feature number at the Boston Sym phony Orchestra's fourth concert in In fantry Hall last evening. It was a go substantial programme, devoid of novel ties, but interesting and exceedingly we played, that Mr. Monteux presented. Ali Neilsen was the soloist, two Mozar arias serving to reveal her vocal abilitie
A big audience enjoyed the concert, i which the numbers were given in the fo
lowing order:

Mendelssohn..........Symphony No. 3 in A
"Scotch," Op. 56.
Andante con moto; Allegro un poco
Vivace non troppo.
Adagio.
Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maes
Wagner..........Prelude to "Lohe Mozart..........Aria, "Deh vieni no from "The Marriage Mozart..........Aria, "Batti, b
from "Don Giova Wagner..........Overture to "Tannh

In these days when feverish something new and strange in tral music afflicts composers modernist is placed upon a p average concertgoer sits thr phony like the Mendelssohn
A-minor with a feeling of c ment. T neither is or deeply a beautif mind of a

[105]

Boston Orchestra of Baltimore, we with the thought that has not been hastened by of appreciation of all that it has meant to

ELIZABETH ELLEN STARR,
of Permanent Committee f motion of Music in Baltimore.
Park, March 5.

13 1921 M
phia, Pa.

Orchestra Shut Out of The Bulletin.

lovers have asked Boston Orchestra, after forty is to abandon its Philadelphia concerts. queries have doubtless been actuated discovery that the press announce- a few weeks ago that the Boston Or- was curtailing its trips all around, proved to be false. Announcement from Boston that all the usual tours be made next year, with the exception Philadelphia. This city is to be omitted simple, but all-sufficient, reason that Academy of Music could not be secured dates. It seems to me that the at- to create an impression that the Boston management is responsible for this unfortunate in Philadelphia's next musical season be discountenanced by the publication truth. The Boston management is un- stood to be unwilling to take chances in other hall in Philadelphia, but it should made known to the public that they would btedly be here again next winter had they able to get the Academy. This condition again to Philadelphia's need of other central auditoriums. It also points other things. E. M. W.

ESTABLISHED 1881 EWS
Providence, R. I.
MAR 9 1921 A

STON SYMPHONY RCHESTRA CLOSES CONCERT SERIES

void of novelties, but interes and well-rendered, was t programme presented last night Boston Symphony Orchestra fourth appearance of the sea at Infantry Hall. Mendelssohn's tch" Symphony was the feature. ss Alice Neilsen, remembered er many pleasing concerts here, flatteringly received after he offerings last night. Both Mozart arias.

e programme: Symphony No. A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, delssohn; prelude to "Lohen- ," Wagner; aria, "Deh vieni non ar," from "The Marriage of ro," Mozart; aria, "Batti, bat- from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; ure to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

m MAR 9 1921 A URNAL
Providence, R. I.

COTCH' SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE

ton Orchestra Plays Works of Old Composers.

ICE NEILSEN SINGS

delssohn, Mozart and Wagne epresented on Programme nfantry Hall,—Magnificent Ren tion of "Tannhauser" Conclude rchestral Offerings.

ndelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony w feature number at the Boston Sym y Orchestra's fourth concert in In y Hall last evening. It was a good tantial programme, devoid of nove but interesting and exceedingly we , that Mr. Monteux presented. Alic en was the soloist, two Mozar serving to reveal her vocal ability audience enjoyed the concert, the numbers were given in the fo g order:

ssohn......Symphony No. 3 in A-min
"Scotch," Op. 56.
dante con moto; Allegro un poco agitat ace non troppo.
dagio.
legro vivacissimo; Allegro maestro ass
......Prelude to "Lohengri
......Aria, "Deh vieni non tarda
from "The Marriage of Figaro,"
......Aria, "Batti, batti,"
"Don Giovanni."
......Overture to "Tannhause

ose days when feverish desire new and strange in orch afflicts conductors and placed upon a pedestal, goer sits through a Mendelssohn No. 3 [illegible]

---

spirit of a master musician. It fully reflects the composer's impres- s of the land of mists, mountains valleys. Mendelssohn's artistic na- e led him to create the spirit of Scot- scenes by delicate rather than by ect method. He hints at big pipes by use of characteristic rythmn pro- les delightfully the appropriate "at- sphere." In the first movement one y easily imagine him musing over e tragic incident in Scotland's his- y. It is pure music throughout. Mr. nteux gave the work a sympathetic ding, in which he was joined by his yers.

he Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" the overture to "Tannhauser," also favorites, were played with expression technical unity. The opening meas- es for strings and the repetition at the se have been heard here with purer e and more finish. Nevertheless, as a hole, it was exceptionally well played, gradual increase in number of orches- al voices reaching a fine climax with ll-throated brass and percussion instru- ents, which soon faded into the final hereal tones of the violins.

A magnificent rendition of the "Tann- user" was the orchestra's last offering. he brass in the "Pilgrim's Chorus" was plendid in sonorous volume. The violins their restless accompanying figure ork were accurate and effective. The udience seemed particularly pleased with is number.

Miss Neilsen, remembered by many in e audience for her artistic singing at any former appearances here, received flattering tribute of applause after her wo arias. The melodious and singable xcerpts suited her voice and she gave hem with the intelligence and good style hich have long been associated with her inging. Her voice retains much of the uality of her earlier operatic days and t is flexible and well managed. She re- turned several times to acknowledge ap- plause after her last air, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." A. F. P.

IBUNE
Providence, R. I.

Symphony Concert

The fourth concert of the season of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place in Infantry Hall last evening.

Miss Alice Neilson was the soloist and a very large audience listened with delight to the following unusually fine program; Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Mendelssohn, Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato, Vivace non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo, Allegro maestoso assai, Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner, Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, Aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart, overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra gave a truly magnificent performance of the symphony, the deep tenderness of the introductory Andante holding the audience tense until the end of the movement, when a volume of applause spoke eloquently of the effect upon the hearers, who did not fail to note the sound of bagpipes in the distance, suggesting the atmosphere of the Scottish hills.

The Scotch symphony in A Minor is acknowledged to be one of the most beautiful ever written and indeed after the immortal Ninth by Beethoven, no symphony is more perfect in form than this or of charm more enduring. As is well known it is supposed to owe its inspiration to Mendelssohn's recollections of Scotland. It is full of wild, tender, melancholy melody and coloring, notably in the first two movements, while the scherzo is full of sunny playfulness.

The prelude to Lohengrin received a perfect rendering with its sweeping movements, beautiful phrasing and precision of attack.

A superb performance of the Tannhauser brought the concert to a close, the "Pilgrim's Chorus" in this number proving a telling feature of the program, the brassos rising above the orchestra in a splendid volume of sound and the whole merging into wonderfully rich and beautiful harmony.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Neilson proved an outstanding feature of the concert, for Miss Neilson has been widely heralded as a successful vocal exponent of Mozart's music.

She sang the two difficult songs with simplicity and smoothness. Her voice is large and of a very agreeable quality but lacking in emotionalism. She was several times recalled at the end of her last number, "Batt, Batt," from "Don Giovanni."

N. B. P.

---

m TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I.
1921 A

The symphony to be conducted Pierre Monteux at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, but one, to be given at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be the third by Felix Mendelssohn in A minor, entitled "Scotch." It was inspired by an episode in the life of Mary Stuart and still maintains its popularity as one of the most melodious works which has come down to us from the Victorian period.

Two notable numbers by Richard Wagner will also be played—the Prelude to Lohengrin and the Overture to Tannhauser. Miss Alice Nielsen, the lyric soprano, long famous as an operatic prima donna and particularly skilled in singing the music of Mozart, will be heard in two of the immortal melodies of that great master—the aria "Deh Vieni non tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." Miss Nielsen sang these same arias at the regular pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, with emphatic success.

Miss Nielsen is an American singer and a native of Nashville, Tennessee. First discovered in San Francisco, where she sang in light opera at the Tivoli Theatre, on the stage where Tetrazzini also first appeared before the public, she quickly rose to stardom in opera in New York, Boston, and other cities of the East, and thence to London, where her success was even more emphatic. She already entertained secret aspirations for grand opera, however, and at a period of study was followed by her debut in Gounod's [illegible] Bellini Theatre in Na-

les. Later she sang at the San Carlo, Naples, and at Covent arden, London, in "Don Giovanni," The Marriage of Figaro," "La oheme," "Rigoletta," and other operas. s prima donna of the San Carlo Opera ompany, of the Boston Opera Company nd of the Metropolitan Opera Company, ccessively, she established her reputa- on in this country as one of the most alented operatic singers of our day. Re- ently, however, she has been singing ex- lusively in concert.

Bulletin 10 1921
Philadelphia, Pa.

An Orchestral Finale

Boston Organization's Forthcoming Farewell to Philadelphia.

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the conclusion of its present season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, will make no further appearances in Philadelphia will be received with sincere regret by the large number of music lovers who for many years have enjoyed the playing of this famous organization. The concert on Monday evening will close the orchestra's thirty-seventh season in Philadelphia, its first appearance here having occurred in 1883.

There have been many changes in the musical life of Philadelphia since the Boston Orchestra's first season, and where for many years that organization practically had the local field to itself, so far as symphony concerts of the highest class were concerned, in recent years it has had more than one rival, among which Philadelphia's own band of musicians justly may claim first place.

During the present season, in addition to the regular series of twenty-five afternoon and the same number of Saturday evening concerts, with the addition of three concerts outside of the subscription list, by the Philadelphia Orchestra, this city, after next week, will have been five times visited by the Boston musicians, four times by the New York Symphony Society, once by the Chicago Orchestra and three times by La Scala Orchestra, of Milan.

But while this is a large advance over the number of concerts given here in the season a few years ago, it need not be accepted as proof that the local field is overflooded with good music, nor that the Boston organization retires solely because of lack of proper support. Its management asserts that the abandonment of the Philadelphia series is due to a demand for a larger number of concerts in and near Boston. Nevertheless, an evident influence in the decision is the fact that, whereas the musicians from New England for many years were accustomed to appear here before capacity audiences, and that it was no uncommon occurrence for many persons to be turned away from their concerts, in recent seasons the patronage has fallen off and vacant seats have been no unusual sight.

Also should be taken into consideration the fact that the Boston Orchestra has had its own troubles, starting, it may be said, with the action of its conductor, Karl Muck, when that German sympathizer, during the war, refused to open the orchestra's concerts with "The Star-Spangled Banner". Being afterwards compelled to comply with the demands that the American anthem be played, Muck resigned, later being interned and deported. Eighteen German members of the orchestra also were dropped, the rule being enforced that only citizens of the United States and subjects of the Allied nations should be employed. The death of Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the orchestra in 1881, and who was its patron and chief supporter, also was a catastrophe to the organization, though its existence is financially firmly secured.

A list of the conductors of the Boston Orchestra since its first season presents an array of names illustrious in the musical world. Beginning with Georg Henschel, who was its leader from 1881 to 1884, they were: 1884-1889, William Gericke; 1889-1893, Arthur Nikisch; 1893-1898, Emil Paur; 1898-1906, William Gericke; 1906-1908, Karl Muck; 1908-1912, Max Fiedler; 1912-1918, Karl Muck. Henri Rabaud succeeded Dr. Muck, for one season; and in 1919 the present permanent conductor, Pierre Monteux, was installed.

The absence of the Boston Symphony undoubtedly will be felt in Philadelphia. For many years justly considered incomparable among organizations of its kind in this country, if not in the world, the orchestra has had a long exerted and undoubtedly potent influence in the development of musical taste and appreciation in this city.

But Philadelphia now has its own symphonic organization, capable of sustaining its firmly established reputation as one of the greatest, and which has first claim upon local appreciation and support. To be sure, the Philadelphia Orchestra does not as yet reach "the people" in the sense that the orchestras in many other cities do. The "drive" a year or so ago, which was so successful that the desired million-dollar endowment fund not only was reached, but far exceeded, does not appear to have fulfilled the expectation that "the people" would be able to hear the orchestra. Such extra concerts as have been given have been at the regular schedule of rates, and as yet there is no evidence of the sort of "popular" prices that will place the orchestra within reach of the public at large, which was earnestly importuned to "Save the Orchestra" for Philadelphia.

But it is to be hoped that eventually the "popular" concerts which at present seem to be regarded as impossible, or impracticable, will bring the orchestra within reach of "the people" who now, even though they did their bit to help save it, are debarred from its benefits. Appreciation of the best in music is a joy that will be denied a vast number of persons, unless an opportunity is offered by means of educational concerts which at present are beyond their reach.

ESTABLISHED
From MAR 11 1921 K
EVENING POST
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For the Thursday evening concert, the second symphony of Brahms, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Sentimentales et Nobles," and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." For the Saturday matinée Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto in which Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Philharmonic Plays

The Philharmonic Society has done much to popularize the works of Rubin Goldmark, the American nephew of the Austrian composer, Karl Goldmark, but it remained for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to present the first-mentioned composer's symphonic poem, "Samson," seven years ago, not only in Boston but in his native city of New York. Since these first hearings the work has undergone some revision, and in the new form was heard at the Philharmonic Society's concert last evening. There are still some unnecessary details that might be excised to the work's advantage, but as a whole it retains the hearer's interest, and as played last evening sounds very well. The composer himsel beamed his approval upon Stransky and his players, and was given a hearty ovation by the audience. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony followed Goldmark's music. Its valleys have been filled with blacker night and its heights have been flooded with more intense sunlight on some other occasions. Nevertheless, the listeners found much to enjoy and even compelled a rising acknowledgment from the orchestra at the conclusion of the third movement. The finest playing of the whole evening was exhibited in the opening number, Weber's "Oberon" overture, during which the peerless Xavier Reiter's French horn rang with its wonted mellowness. The concert was given at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 11 1921 M
Evening Sun

Erno Dohnanyi, the famous composer-pianist, who has not visited America for many years, will be the soloist next Wednesday evening at the last concert the Boston Orchestra is to give here, when he will play the Mozart Concerto in G major.

M. Monteaux's program on this occasion will include no novelties, the symphony being the one of Mendelssohn known as the "Scotch." Other numbers will be the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" and the "Grand Ball at the Capulets" episode, from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

SUN N.Y.
MAR 12 1921 D

Symphonies of Next Week.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 17 and 19, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes:

For the Thursday evening concert the second symphony of Brahms in D major, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and the ball scene from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

For the Saturday matinee Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, the third in A minor; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

The Russian barytone, Joseph Schwarz, is the assisting artist at tomorrow afternoon's Philharmonic concert at Carnegie Hall under Stransky's direction. He will sing "Wotan's Farewell," given with the magic fire scene, from the Valkyrie;" also the barytone aria for Verdi's "Masked Ball." The Philharmonic conductor will offer Rachmaninoff's second symphony in E minor and the Two Elegiac Melodies of Grieg for the other numbers in the afternoon's programme.

Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the National Symphony concerts tomorrow evening and next Tuesday afternoon, March 15. He will play his own third concerto in D minor. A most interesting item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's orchestral suite drawn from the music written for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," which Mr. Mengelberg is playing for the first time in New York.

SUN
s New York City
MAR 12 1921 J

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, aft., Symphony Society, New York; Aeolian Hall, aft., piano recital, Olga Samaroff; Carnegie Hall, eve., Boston Symphony Orchestra; Aeolian Hall, eve., piano recital, Daniel Wolf; Metropolitan, eve., "Andrea Chenier;" Manhattan, eve., Pavlowa and Ballet Russe.

---

rom SUN
ddress New York City MAR 12 1921
ate

SATURDAY.

Carnegie Hall, aft., Boston Symphony Orchestra; Metropolitan, aft., "Lohengrin;" Aeolian Hall, aft., piano recital, Oliver Denton; Manhattan, aft. and eve., Pavlowa and Ballet Russe; Aeolian Hall, eve., piano recital, Max Kotlarsky.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 12 1921 H
EVENING WORLD
New York City

There will be four orchestras in the field next week. The Philharmonic is busy to-morrow afternoon playing Rachmaninoff and Grieg, with Joseph Schwarz, baritone, doing some Wagner. The band then goes on tour.

The New York Symphony plays the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony to-morrow in Aeolian Hall, while Ignaz Friedman, pianist, offers the Chopin E minor concerto. Glinka and Ducasse are also represented on the programme. At the regular historical cycle concerts on Thursday and Friday an all-Wagner programme is the bill.

The National Symphony's concerts take place to-morrow evening and next Tuesday afternoon, the last but three that Willem Mengelberg will conduct. Rachmaninoff is the soloist to-morrow, presenting his own third concerto. A new Strauss number, a suite written for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," will have its first hearing in New York. Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade and the "Tannhauser" overture are also on the programme.

The Boston Symphony comes to town for its final pair of concerts Thursday and Saturday. Mr. Monteux, conductor, has a varied programme for each performance.

Another farewell is that of Mr. Toscanini and his La Scala Orchestra next Friday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. All-Italian offerings comprise the selection represented by such composers as Sinigaglia, Pizzetti, Martucci, Respighi, Lauldi, Tommasini, Pick-Mangiagalli and de Sabata.

From MAR 12 1921 K
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

A Busy Orchestral Week.

The farewell concert of Arturo Toscanini and his La Scala Orchestra preceding their return to Italy will take place in Carnegie Hall next Friday afternoon. The programme will be devoted wholly to music by Italian composers—Sinigaglio, Pizzetti, Martucci, Respighi, Lualdi, Tommasini, Pick-Mangiagalli and di Sabato.

Willem Mengleberg, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has chosen for its concerts in Carnegie Hall to-morrow evening and Tuesday afternoon the suite made by Richard Strauss from his music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," which, with a performance of the comedy itself, originally preceded in the same bill Strauss's own opera of "Ariadne auf Naxos." The music has never been played here, although Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, recently gave it in that body's home town. The rest of this programme will consist of part of Mozart's "Haffner" serenade and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," whilst Serge Rachmaninoff will be the soloist, playing his own D minor concerto for piano and orchestra.

The final concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra for the season are approaching. The last but one of the Sunday afternoon series, taking place to-morrow in Aeolian Hall, will have Ignaz Friedman, pianist, as soloist in the Chopin E minor concerto. The programme otherwise consists of Glinka's overture, "Russlan and Ludmilla; Schumann's First Symphony, and Jean Roger-Ducasse's "Noctrune de Printemps." The last of the series of "historical" concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon and Friday evening will be devoted to Wagner, with Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, as soloist in Senta's ballad from "Der Fligende Hollaender" and the immolation scene from "Die Goetterdaemmerring."

The final pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux having chosen the Brahms Second Symphony and Maurice Ravel's "Valses nobles et sentimentales" as the chief numbers for the first and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony and Liszt's "Orpheus" for the second. Joseph Schwarz, baritone, is to be the soloist at tomorrow afternoon's concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

From MAR 12 1921 M
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Last Boston Symphony Next Friday

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the present season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March eighteenth, Pierre Monteux will open the program with César Franck's Symphony in D minor, considered the greatest music of its kind that the French School of music has produced. This will be followed by Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus." He will conduct, as the closing number, Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline." The soloist of the evening will be Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, who has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of the living masters of his instrument.

From MAR 12 1921 M
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert of the season, and announced as the last appearance of this famous organization in Philadelphia, no concerts having been planned for next season, will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, Pierre Monteux conducting. The soloist will be the celebrated Hungarian pianist and composer, Erno Dohnanyi, who will be heard in Mozart's Concerto in G major (Kochel No. 453). The orchestra's numbers will be the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Liszt's fourth symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and Wagner's overture "Tannhauser."

MAR 12 1921 M
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the closing Boston Symphony concert, which will be given next Monday evening at the Academy of Music, the soloist will be Erno Dohnanyi, who will be heard in Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major. The symphony will be the Second of Brahms in D major, and the other numbers will be Liszt's Fourth Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From ?
AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

Last Boston Symphony.

THE symphony which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at its concert in the Lyric Theatre, on Wednesday of this week at 8.15 P. M., it is announced now will be Mendelssohn's third symphony (in A minor)—known as the "Scotch Symphony, instead of Franck's in D minor, as anounced previously. The Mendelssohn work has not been played in Baltimore in a long time; the one by Franck has been played at least twice here in recent years by different orchestras.

Erno Dohnanyi, Hungarian pianist and composer, will be the special soloist. He will play in Mozart's concerto in G major (Koechel No. 453) for piano and orchestra.

The other items of the program will be Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the "festive ball music" from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Among Mr. Dohanyi's best compositions are a pantomime entitled "Pierette's Veil," an opera "Tanta Simona," two symphonies, string quartets and a quintet and music for piano. He also has conducted philharmonic concerts in his own country with great success. His visit to the United States this season after an interval of about 20 years has been anticipated as an event of particular interest.

This concert not only will be the fifth and last of the orchestra's present season in Baltimore, but also will be the last the organization plans to give here, as thereafter it will discontinue that part of its annual southern tour which has included Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia.

ESTABLISHED 1881
MAR 13 1921 L
From Post
Washington, D. C.

At the closing Boston Symphony concert in the New National theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, Erno Dohnanyi, the celebrated Hungarian composer and pianist, will play as soloist with the orchestra Mozart's pianoforte concert in G major (Koechel No. 453). Pierre Monteaux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, which, although less familiar than the "New World" Symphony of the noted Bohemian composer, is nevertheless accounted more beautiful in many ways and has also been popular wherever heard by the direct appeal of its melodies. The concert will close with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

s policies the s avily in favor of the latter we must sadly deplore the the Boston Orchestra from al life of Baltimore, we can ourselves with the thought that ecture has not been hastened by or lack of appreciation of de for all that it has meant to past.

ELIZABETH ELLEN STARR,
man of Permanent Committee for Promotion of Music in Baltimore nd Park, March 5.

---

letin adelphia, Pa.

Boston Orchestra Shut Out

Editor of The Bulletin.

Many music lovers have asked th n why the Boston Orchestra, after for is to abandon its Philadelphia concerts. queries have doubtless been actuated e discovery that the press announce- a few weeks ago that the Boston Or- a was curtailing its trips all around ow proved to be false. Announcement de from Boston that all the usual tours o be made next year, with the exception hiladelphia. This city is to be omitted he simple, but all-sufficient, reason that Academy of Music could not be secured any dates. It seems to me that the at- pt to create an impression that the Boston agement is responsible for this unfortunate us in Philadelphia's next musical season ld be discountenanced by the publication the truth. The Boston management is un- stood to be unwilling to take chances in other hall in Philadelphia, but it should made known to the public that they would doubtedly be here again next winter had they n able to get the Academy. This condition nts again to Philadelphia's need of other ge, central auditoriums. It also points some other things. E. M. W.

BLISHED 1881
m
MAR 9

STON SYMPHONY RCHESTRA CLOSES CONCERT SERIES

evoid of novelties, but interes and well-rendered, was th ramme presented last night b Boston Symphony Orchestra i fourth appearance of the sea at Infantry Hall. Mendelssohn's tch'' Symphony was the feature. ss Alice Neilsen, remembered er many pleasing concerts here, flatteringly received after he offerings last night. Both Mozart arias.

e programme: Symphony No. A-minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, delssohn; prelude to "Lohen- " Wagner; aria, "Deh vieni non ar," from "The Marriage of ro," Mozart; aria, "Batti, bat- from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; ture to "Tannhauser." Wagner.

---

om MAR 9
URNAL
Providence, R. I.

COTCH' SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE

ton Orchestra Plays Works of Old Composers.

ICE NEILSEN SINGS

delssohn, Mozart and Wagne epresented on Programme nfantry Hall,—Magnificent Ren ition of "Tannhauser" Conclude rchestral Offerings.

ndelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony wa feature number at the Boston Sym y Orchestra's fourth concert in In ry Hall last evening. It was a good tantial programme, devoid of nove but interesting and exceedingly w d, that Mr. Monteux presented. Alic en was the soloist, two Mozar serving to reveal her vocal ability g audience enjoyed the concert, h the numbers were given in the fo ng order:

elssohn......Symphony No. 3 in A-mi
"Scotch," Op. 56.
Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agita
Vivace non troppo.
Adagio.
Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestro ass er..........Prelude to "Lohengrin"
t.......Aria, "Deh vieni non tarda
from "The Marriage of Figaro," t..........Aria, "Batti, batti," fro
"Don Giovanni."
er..........Overture to "Tannhauser"

these days when feverish desire fo thing new and strange in orches music afflicts conductors and th rnist is placed upon a pedestal, th ge concertgoer sits through a sym y like the Mendelssohn No. 3 nor with a feeling of calm content This is not a profound work is it one that quickens the pu y stirs the listener. It is rath tiful musical picture born in great tone poet and fash

f the skill of a master musician. It thfully reflects the composer's impres- s of the land of mists, mountains valleys. Mendelssohn's artistic na- led him to create the spirit of Scot- scenes by delicate rather than by ect method. He hints at big pipes d by use of characteristic rythmn pro- es delightfully the appropriate "at- sphere." In the first movement one y easily imagine him musing over me tragic incident in Scotland's his- y. It is pure music throughout. Mr. nteux gave the work a sympathetic ding, in which he was joined by his yers.

he Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" d the overture to "Tannhauser," also favorites, were played with expression d technical unity. The opening meas- res for strings and the repetition at the lose have been heard here with purer ne and more finish. Nevertheless, as a hole, it was exceptionally well played, e gradual increase in number of orches- ral voices reaching a fine climax with ll-throated brass and percussion instru- ents, which soon faded into the final hereal tones of the violins.

A magnificent rendition of the "Tann- auser" was the orchestra's last offering. he brass in the "Pilgrim's Chorus" was plendid in sonorous volume. The violins their restless accompanying figure ork were accurate and effective. The udience seemed particularly pleased with his number.

Miss Neilsen, remembered by many in e audience for her artistic singing at any former appearances here, received flattering tribute of applause after her two arias. The melodious and singable xcerpts suited her voice and she gave hem with the intelligence and good style which have long been associated with her inging. Her voice retains much of the uality of her earlier operatic days and t is flexible and well managed. She re- turned several times to acknowledge ap- plause after her last air, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." A. F. P.

IBUNE
Providence, R. I.

Symphony Concert

The fourth concert of the season of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place in Infantry Hall last evening.

Miss Alice Neilson was the soloist and a very large audience listened with delight to the following unusually fine program; Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, Mendelssohn, Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato, Vivace non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai, Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner, Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, Aria, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni," Mozart, overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra gave a truly magnificent performance of the symphony, the deep tenderness of the introductory Andante holding the audience tense until the end of the movement, when a volume of applause spoke eloquently of the effect upon the hearers, who did not fail to note the sound of bagpipes in the distance, suggesting the atmosphere of the Scottish hills.

The Scotch symphony in A Minor is acknowledged to be one of the most beautiful ever written and indeed after the immortal Ninth by Beethoven, no symphony is more perfect in form than this or of charm more enduring. As is well known it is supposed to owe its inspiration to Mendelsohn's recollections of Scotland. It is full of wild, tender, melancholy melody and coloring, notably in the first two movements, while the scherzo is full of sunny playfulness.

The prelude to Lohengrin received a perfect rendering with its sweeping movements, beautiful phrasing and precision of attack.

A superb performance of the Tannhauser brought the concert to a close, the "Pilgrim's Chorus" in this number proving a telling feature of the program, the brasses rising above the orchestra in a splendid volume of sound and the whole merging into wonderfully rich and beautiful harmony.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Neilson proved an outstanding feature of the concert, for Miss Neilson has been widely heralded as a successful vocal exponent of Mozart's music.

She sang the two difficult songs with simplicity and smoothness. Her voice is large and of a very agreeable quality but lacking in emotionalism. She was several times recalled at the end of her last number, "Batt, Batt," from "Don Giovanni.

N. B. P.

---

m TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I.

The symphony to be conducted by Pierre Monteux at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, but one, to be given at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be the third by Felix Mendelssohn in A minor, entitled "Scotch." It was inspired by an episode in the life of Mary Stuart and still maintains its popularity as one of the most melodious works which has come down to us from the Victorian period.

Two notable numbers by Richard Wagner will also be played—the Prelude to Lohengrin and the overture to Tannhauser. Miss Alice Nielsen, the lyric soprano, long famous as an operatic prima donna and particularly skilled in singing the music of Mozart, will be heard in two of the immortal melodies of that great master—the aria "Deh Vieni non tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." Miss Nielsen sang these same arias at the regular pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, with emphatic success.

Miss Nielsen is an American singer and a native of Nashville, Tennessee. First discovered in San Francisco, where she sang in light opera at the Tivoli Theatre, on the stage where Tetrazzini also first appeared before the public, she quickly rose to stardom in opera in New York, Boston, and other cities of the East, and thence to London, where her success was even more emphatic. She already entertained secret aspirations for grand opera, however, and at a period of study was followed by her debut in Gounod's "Faust" at the Bellini Theatre in Na- les. Later she sang the leading roles t the San Carlo, Naples, and at Covent arden, London, in "Don Giovanni," The Marriage of Figaro," "La oheme," "Rigoletta," and other operas. s prima donna of the San Carlo Opera ompany, of the Boston Opera Company nd of the Metropolitan Opera Company, uccessively, she established her reputa- on in this country as one of the most alented operatic singers of our day. Re- ently, however, she has been singing ex- lusively in concert.

Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

An Orchestral Finale

Boston Organization's Forthcoming Farewell to Philadelphia.

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the conclusion of its present season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, will make no further appearances in Philadelphia will be received with sincere regret by the large number of music lovers who for many years have enjoyed the playing of this famous organization. The concert on Monday evening will close the orchestra's thirty-seventh season in Philadelphia, its first appearance here having occurred in 1883.

There have been many changes in the musical life of Philadelphia since the Boston Orchestra's first season, and where for many years that organization practically had the local field to itself, so far as symphony concerts of the highest class were concerned, in recent years it has had more than one rival, among which Philadelphia's own band of musicians justly may claim first place.

During the present season, in addition to the regular series of twenty-five afternoon and the same number of Saturday evening concerts, with the addition of three concerts outside of the subscription list, by the Philadelphia Orchestra, this city, after next week, will have been five times visited by the Boston musicians, four times by the New York Symphony Society, once by the Chicago Orchestra and three times by La Scala Orchestra, of Milan.

But while this is a large advance over the number of concerts given here in the season a few years ago, it need not be accepted as proof that the local field is overflooded with good music, nor that the Boston organization retires solely because of lack of proper support. Its management asserts that the abandonment of the Philadelphia series is due to a demand for a larger number of concerts in and near Boston. Nevertheless, an evident influence in the decision is the fact that, whereas the musicians from New England for many years were accustomed to appear here before capacity audiences, and that it was no uncommon occurrence for many persons to be turned away from their concerts, in recent seasons the patronage has fallen off and vacant seats have been no unusual sight.

Also should be taken into consideration the fact that the Boston Orchestra has had its own troubles, starting, it may be said, with the action of its conductor, Karl Muck, when that German sympathizer, during the war, refused to open the orchestra's concerts with "The Star-Spangled Banner". Being afterwards compelled to comply with the demands that the American anthem be played, Muck resigned, later being interned and deported. Eighteen German members of the orchestra also were dropped, the rule being enforced that only citizens of the United States and subjects of the Allied nations should be employed. The death of Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the orchestra in 1881, and who was its patron and chief supporter, also was a catastrophe to the organization, though its existence is financially firmly secured.

A list of the conductors of the Boston Orchestra since its first season presents an array of names illustrious in the musical world. Beginning with Georg Henschel, who was its leader from 1881 to 1884, they were: 1884-1889, William Gericke; 1889-1893, Arthur Nikisch; 1893-1898, Emil Paur; 1898-1906, William Gericke; 1906-1908, Karl Muck; 1908-1912, Max Fiedler; 1912-1918, Karl Muck. Henri Rabaud succeeded Dr. Muck, for one season, and in 1919 the present permanent conductor, Pierre Monteux, was installed.

The absence of the Boston Symphony undoubtedly will be felt in Philadelphia. For many years justly considered incomparable among organizations of its kind in this country, if not in the world, the orchestra has had a long exerted and undoubtedly potent influence in the development of musical taste and appreciation in this city.

But Philadelphia now has its own symphonic organization, capable of sustaining its firmly established reputation as one of the greatest, and which has first claim upon local appreciation and support. To be sure, the Philadelphia Orchestra does not as yet reach "the people" in the sense that the orchestras in many other cities do. The "drive" a year or so ago, which was so successful that the desired million-dollar endowment fund not only was reached, but far exceeded, does not appear to have fulfilled the expectation that "the people" would be able to hear the orchestra. Such extra concerts as have been given have been at the regular schedule of rates, and as yet there is no evidence of the sort of "popular" prices that will place the orchestra within reach of the public at large, which was earnestly importuned to "Save the Orchestra" for Philadelphia.

But it is to be hoped that eventually the "popular" concerts which at present seem to be regarded as impossible, or impracticable, will bring the orchestra within reach of "the people" who now, even though they did their bit to help save it, are debarred from its benefits. Appreciation of the best in music is a joy that will be denied a vast number of persons, unless an opportunity is offered by means of educational concerts which at present are beyond their reach.

From
EVENING POST
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For the Thursday evening concert, the second symphony of Brahms, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Sentimentales et Nobles," and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." For the Saturday matinée Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto in which Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Philharmonic Plays

The Philharmonic Society has done much to popularize the works of Rubin Goldmark, the American nephew of the Austrian composer, Karl Goldmark, but it remained for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to present the first-mentioned composer's symphonic poem, "Samson," seven years ago, not only in Boston but in his native city of New York Since these first hearings the worl has undergone some revision, and i the new form was heard at the Philharmonic Society's concert last evening. There are still some unnecessary details that might be excised to the work's advantage, but as a whole it retains the hearer's interest, and as played last evening sound very well. The composer himsel beamed his approval upon Stransky and his players, and was given a hearty ovation by the audience Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony followed Goldmark's music Its valleys have been filled with blacker night and its heights hav been flooded with more intense sunlight on some other occasions. Nevertheless, the listeners found much to enjoy and even compelled a rising acknowledgment from the orchestra at the conclusion of the third movement. The finest playing of the whole evening was exhibited in the opening number, Weber's "Oberon" overture, during which the peerless Xavier Reiter's French horn rang with its wonted mellowness. The concert was given at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun

Erno Dohnanyi, the famous composer-pianist, who has not visited America for many years, will be the soloist next Wednesday evening at the last concert the Boston Orchestra is to give here, when he will play the Mozart Concerto in G major.

M. Monteaux's program on this occasion will include no novelties, the symphony being the one of Mendelssohn known as the "Scotch." Other numbers will be the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" and the "Grand Ball at the Capulets" episode, from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

SUN N.Y.

Symphonies of Next Week.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 17 and 19, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes:

For the Thursday evening concert the second symphony of Brahms in D major, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and the ball scene from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

For the Saturday matinee Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, the third in A minor; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

The Russian barytone, Joseph Schwarz, is the assisting artist at tomorrow afternoon's Philharmonic concert at Carnegie Hall under Stransky's direction. He will sing "Wotan's Farewell," given with the magic fire scene, from the Valkyrie;" also the barytone aria for Verdi's "Masked Ball." The Philharmonic conductor will offer Rachmaninoff's second symphony in E minor and the Two Elegiac Melodies of Grieg for the other numbers in the afternoon's programme.

Rachmaninoff will be the soloist at the National Symphony concerts tomorrow evening and next Tuesday afternoon, March 15. He will play his own third concerto in D minor. A most interesting item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's orchestral suite drawn from the music written for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," which Mr. Mengelberg is playing for the first time in New York.

SUN
s New York City

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, aft., Symphony Soc ety, New York; Aeolian Hall, aft piano recital, Olga Samaroff; Ca negie Hall, eve., Boston Symphon Orchestra; Aeolian Hall, eve., pian recital, Daniel Wolf; Metropolita eve., "Andrea Chenier;" Manha tan, eve., Pavlowa and Ballet Russ

---

rom SUN
ddress New York City
ate

SATURDAY.

Carnegie Hall, aft., Boston Symphony Orchestra; Metropolitan, aft., "Lohengrin;" Aeolian Hall, aft., piano recital, Oliver Denton; Manhattan, aft. and eve., Pavlowa and Ballet Russe; Aeolian Hall, eve., piano recital, Max Kotlarsky.

ESTABLISHED 1881
MAR 12 1921 H
From
EVENING WORLD
New York City

There will be four orchestras in the field next week. The Philharomnic is busy to-morrow afternoon playing Rachmaninoff and Grieg, with Joseph Schwarz, baritone, doing some Wagner. The band then goes on tour.

The New York Symphony plays the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony to-morrow in Aeolian Hall, while Ignaz Friedman, pianist, offers the Chopin E minor concerto. Glinka and Ducasse are also represented on the programme. At the regular historical cycle concerts on Thursday and Friday an all-Wagner programme is the bill.

The National Symphony's concerts take place to-morrow evening and next Tuesday afternoon, the last but three that Willem Mengelberg will conduct. Rachmeninoff is the soloist to-morrow, presenting his own third concerto. A new Strauss number, a suite written for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," will have its first hearing in New York. Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade and the "Tannhauser" overture are also on the programme.

The Boston Symphony comes to town for its final pair of concerts Thursday and Saturday. Mr. Monteux, conductor, has a varied programme for each performance.

Another farewell is that of Mr. Toscanini and his La Scala Orchestra next Friday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. All-Italian offerings comprise the selection represented by such composers as Sinigaglia, Pizzetti, Martucci, Respighi, Lauldi, Tommasini, Pick-Mangiagalli and de Sabata.

From
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

A Busy Orchestral Week.

The farewell concert of Arturo Toscanini and his La Scala Orchestra preceding their return to Italy will take place in Carnegie Hall next Friday afternoon. The programme will be devoted wholly to music by Italian composers—Sinigaglio, Pizzetti, Martucci, Respighi, Lualdi, Tominasini, Pick-Mangiagali and di Sabato.

Willem Mengleberg, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, has chosen for its concerts in Carnegie Hall to-morrow evening and Tuesday afternoon the suite made by Richard Strauss from his music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," which, with a performance of the comedy itself, originally preceded in the same bill Strauss's own opera of "Ariadne auf Naxos." The music has never been played here, although Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, recently gave it in that body's home town. The rest of this programme will consist of part of Mozart's "Haffner" serenade and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," whilst Serge Rachmaninoff will be the solist, playing his own D minor concerto for piano and orchestra.

The final concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra for the season are approaching. The last but one of the Sunday afternoon series, taking place to-morrow in Aeolian Hall, will have Ignaz Friedman, pianist, as soloist in the Chopin E minor concerto. The programme otherwise consists of Glinka's overture, "Russlan and Ludmilla; Schumann's First Symphony, and Jean Roger-Ducasse's "Noctrune de Printemps." The last of the series of "historical" concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon and Friday evening will be devoted to Wagner, with Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, as soloist in Senta's ballad from "Der Fligende Hollaender" and the immolation scene from "Die Goetterdaemmerring."

The final pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux having chosen the Brahms Second Symphony and Maurice Ravel's "Valses nobles et sentimentales" as the chief numbers for the first and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony and Liszt's "Orpheus" for the second. Joseph Schwarz, baritone, is to be the soloist at tomorrow afternoon's concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

From MAR 12 1921 K
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Last Boston Symphony Next Friday

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the present season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March eighteenth, Pierre Monteux will open the program with César Franck's Symphony in D minor, considered the greatest music of its kind that the French School of music has produced. This will be followed by Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus." He will conduct, as the closing number, Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline." The soloist of the evening will be Erno Dohnanyi, the famous Hungarian composer and pianist, who has just come from Europe, where his renown in both capacities has placed him in the forefront of the living masters of his instrument.

From
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert of the season, announced as the last appearance of this famous organization in Philadelphia, no concerts having been planned for next season, will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, Pierre Monteux conducting. The soloist will be the celebrated Hungarian pianist and composer, Erno Dohnanyi, who will be heard in Mozart's Concerto in G major (Kochel No. 453). The orchestra's numbers will be the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Liszt's fourth symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and Wagner's overture "Tannhauser."

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the closing Boston Symphony concert, which will be given next Monday evening at the Academy of Music, the soloist will be Erno Dohnanyi, who will be heard in Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major. The symphony will be the Second of Brahms in D major, and the other numbers will be Liszt's Fourth Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From ?
AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

Last Boston Symphony.

THE symphony which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at its concert in the Lyric Theatre, on Wednesday of this week ,at 8.15 P. M., it is announced now will be Mendelssohn's third symphony (in A minor)—known as the "Scotch Symphony, instead of Franck's in D minor, as anounced previously. The Mendelssohn work has not been played in Baltimore in a long time; the one by Franck has been played at least twice here in recent years by different orchestras.

Erno Dohnanyi, Hungarian pianist and composer, will be the special soloist. He will play in Mozart's concerto in G major (Koechel No. 453) for piano and orchestra.

The other items of the program will be Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and the "festive ball music" from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Among Mr. Dohanyi's best compositions are a pantomime entitled "Pierette's Veil," an opera , "Tanta Simona," two symphonies, string quartets and a quintet and music for piano. He also has conducted philharmonic concerts in his own country with great success. His visit to the United States this season after an interval of about 20 years has been anticipated as an event of particular interest.

This concert not only will be the fifth and last of the orchestra's present season in Baltimore, but also will be the last the organization plans to give here, as thereafter it will discontinue that part of its annual southern tour, which has included Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Post
Washington D.C

At the closing Boston Symphony concert in the New National theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, Erno Dohnanyi, the celebrated Hungarian composer and pianist, will play as soloist with the orchestra Mozart's pianoforte concert in G major (Koechel No. 453). Pierre Monteaux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, which, although less familiar than the "New World" Symphony of the noted Bohemian composer, is nevertheless accounted more beautiful in many ways and has also been popular wherever heard by the direct appeal of its melodies. The concert will close with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR 13 1921 M

—Erno Dohanyi, Hungarian composer and pianist, will be the soloist at the closing Boston Symphony concert, at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. He will play with the orchestra Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major (Koechel No. 453).

Musical life in Buda Pesth, the historically musical capital of Hungary, has long centred around the illustrious name of Dohnanyi. He made his debut at the age of 20 years and toured Germany, Austria and England. In 1899 he came to the United States. where the fine quality of his playing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and in other cities occasioned much favorable comment. The creative side of his art has added as much to his fame as the executive, and such compositions as his pantomime, "Pierrette's Veil," his opera, "Tanta Simona," his pianoforte music, two symphonies, string quartets and quintet (the latter of which have often been played here) are considered in Europe, where they have all been heard, as among the finest achievements in modern music. In another field—that of conducting—Dohnanyi has also been conspicuously successful, and presiding over the Philharmonic concerts in his own country, he has been praised as the prophet of new works and as the masterly interpreter of the old. His recent return to this country is considered an event in the present musical season.

RENO DOHNAANYI

Pierre Monteux will conduct at tomorrow night's concert Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser."

* * *

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

D

Boston Symphony.

Erno Dohnanyi will be heard as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening. In Europe, Dohnanyi has long been considered one of the first of living artists, by virtue both of his creative and of his executive achievement, but in this country he is scarcely remembered, since his short visit took place when he was a young man in 1899-1900, at which time he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and in other cities. Gaining early prominence by his splendid talents in his own country, Hungary, his fame has spread all over Europe by his numerous tours of Germany, Austria, Russia, and Great Britain. His finely conceived original compositions for orchestra, for the stage and for ensembles in smaller forms, as well as his piano pieces, have all been praised and acclaimed in his own and other countries of Europe; whereas in the United States his piano works and his string quartet, in particular, are well known. His achievements, not only as pianist but as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in Budapest have made him the idol of the day in that capital so long famous for its musical activities.

Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mendelssohn's Third Symphony in A minor, entitled "Scotch," and will close the concert with Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," The other orchestral number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus."

EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MA D

Boston Symphony.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programs:

For the Thursday evening concert, the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Weber's Overture to "Euranthe," Maurice Ravel's "Vales Nobles at Sentimentales," and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony "Romeo and Juliet."

For the Saturday matinee, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the Third in A minor, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus," Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto in which Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Erno Dohnanyi, whose recent return to this country is the musical topic of the day, will be heard as soloist at the last Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening at 8:15. In Europe, Dohnanyi has long been considered one of the first of living artists. His finely conceived original compositions for orchestra, for the stage and for ensembles in smaller forms, as well as his piano pieces, have all been praised and acclaimed in his own and other countries of Europe; whereas in the United States, his piano works and his string quartet, in particular, are well known. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert.

---

rom HERALD
ddress New York City
MAR 13 19
Date

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For Thursday, Symphony No. 2, by Brahms; Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Ravel's "Valses Sentimentales et Nobles" and the ball scene from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." For Saturday, Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Liszt's "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounov's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as the soloist.

From
TIMES MAR 13 192 Y
Brooklyn, N. Y.

DOHNANYI TO BE SOLOIST.

The closing Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy next Friday evening, on which occasion Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's Third Symphony in A minor, entitled "Scotch," and considered one o fthe Victorian composer's most beautiful works. The orchestra will also be heard in Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline," and in Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus."

Erno Dohnanyi, the celebrated Hungarian composer-pianist, will play Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major (Koechel 453), as the soloist with the orchestra.

From WORLD,
New York City

The farewell Boston Symphony concert will be given March 18 in the Academy of Music. Erno Dohnanyi is to be soloist. He is known by the beauty of his compositions, although as a pianist he is scarcely remembered, since his former visit to the United States was made as a young man in 1900, when he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this borough.

From
HERALD
MAR 13 19 L

Boston Symphony Concert.

Erno Dohnanyi, whose recent return to this country is a musical topic of the day, will be heard as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, and will close the concert with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

AMERICAN
New York City
MAR 13 19

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its final pair of concerts for the current season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Mr. Monteux presents Symphony No. 2, by Brahms; Overture "Euryanthe," by Weber; Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, by Ravel; "The Ball at the Capulets" from Berlioz's symphony "Romeo et Juliet." The matinee list includes Symphony D minor, by Franck; Concerto for violin and orchestra, by Glazounoff, Richard Burgin, soloist; Overture to "Gwendoline," by Chabrier.

TIMES MAR 13 1921
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will complete its Brooklyn season on Friday evening at the Academy, assisted by the pianist, Erno Dohnanyi.

"L'Amore dei Tre Re," with Bori,

Morning Telegraph
New York
MARCH. 13.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programs: For the Thursday evening concert the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." For the Saturday matinee Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the Third in A minor, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus," Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

From MAR 13 1921 L
WORLD,
New York City

Boston Symphony.

At the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, March 17, and Saturday afternoon, March 19, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For the evening concert, Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," and an excerpt from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—"The Ball at the Capulet's." For the matinee Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Liszt's Symphonie Poem "Orpheus," Glazounoff's Violin Concerto, in which the soloist will be Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline."

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.
MAR 13 1921 L

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Erno Dohnanyi, whose recent return to this country is the musical topic of the day, will be heard as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30.

In Europe, Dohnanyi has long been considered one of the first of living artists, by virtue both of his creative and of his executive achievements, but in this country he is scarcely remembered, since his short visit took place when he was a young man in 1899 and 1900, at which time he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in several cities. Gaining early prominence by his splendid talents in his own country, Hungary, his fame has spread all over Europe by his numerous tours of Germany, Austria, Russia, and Great Britain. His finely conceived original compositions for orchestra, for the stage and for ensembles in smaller forms, as well as his piano pieces, have all been praised and acclaimed.

From Star
Wash - D.C.
Mar 13-'21

Dohnanyi-Boston Symphony.

At the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, which will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist, will play, as soloist, with the orchestra, Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G Major (Koechel, No. 453). Pierre Monteux will conduct in Dvorak's "Second Symphony in D Minor," which, although less familiar perhaps than the "new world" symphony of the Bohemian composer, is accounted more beautiful in many ways. The concert will close with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

Erno Dohnanyi made his debut at the age of twenty, touring Germany, Austria and England. In 1899 he came to the United States. The creative side of his art has added as much to his fame as the executive. His compositions include his pantomime, "Pierette's Veil"; the opera "Tanta Simona," pianoforte music, two symphonies, string quartet and quintet, the latter of which have often been played here.

From MAR 14 1921 X
Evening Globe
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY CUTS TOUR FOR NEXT YEAR

BOSTON, March 14.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now making in accordance with a custom started twenty-five years ago the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, is making the visit for the last time. It was announced to-day that these series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

[107]

MAR 13 1921 M
re, Md. NEWS.

Last Boston Symphony Concert

Orchestra At Lyric Wednesday Night—Recitals By Grasse And Hofmann This Week

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

In the aftermath of the opera "season" will come a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—not only the final event of its series of five, but, alas, the last it will probably ever give in Baltimore, if its present plan be maintained. Other affairs of the week are a concert by the Peabody Conservatory Chorus Tuesday night, a recital by Edwin Grasse, the brilliantly versatile blind musician, at Old St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church Thursday night and a recital by Joseph Hofmann, pianist, at the Peabody, Friday afternoon.

The sands of the musical hour glass are now thin and are running rapidly through. Only two orchestral concerts remain after the Boston Symphony's (those by the Baltimore Symphony on March 27 and by the Philadelphia Orchestra on March 30) and but few recitals out of the multitude of bookings are yet to come.

Erno Dohnanyi, who will make his first appearance in recent years as soloist at the Boston Symphony's concert at the Lyric next Wednesday night, is classified in Europe as one of the master pianists of the day. His American reputation is chiefly based upon his piano compositions which are frequently heard in recital halls. He made his first American tour in 1899-1900 with the Boston Symphony.

He will play Mozart's G major Concerto on Wednesday night, and the program will further include Mendelssohn's Third Symphony (A minor,) familiarly known as the "Scotch" Symphony (for reasons that have no alcoholic significance whatsoever); Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, and the "Ballroom Scene" from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." Pierre Monteux will conduct.

---

rom EVENING SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
MAR

THE THREE ARTS
Music, Drama, Painting

THERE is something a little grave about the thought that we are to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time next Wednesday evening. It has meant much in Baltimore's musical development and it has been with us a welcome stranger within the gates for a great many years.

The decision of its managers to limit the orchestra's appearance outside of Boston to the "neighboring towns" is probably an important one, as, theoretically at least, the greater orchestras should "feed" the nearby cities and the "immediate" districts instead of wasting their energies traveling to distant States and metropolises, where musical organizations of a like calibre and class obtain.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, being the nearest one to Baltimore, is the logical band to provide us our music, while the Boston players remain in the New England States. This in theory.

In practice it is rather different, a more difficult nut to crack, because, with the public's increasing interest in the relative values of the traveling organizations, the demand for very frequent concerts will no longer be denied.

So with the passing of the Boston Orchestra the idea naturally presents itself that the time is ripe for the corralling of the New York Philharmonic, which, under Mr. Stansky's direction, has become one of the most important orchestras of the first class now in the public eye, but one which has not been heard here for several seasons.

It cannot truthfully be said that the program announced for the final Boston concert is particularly exciting. A Mozart concerto, even if played by so distinguished an artist as Erno Dohnanyi, the interesting D'Albert pupil, has little more than a purely academic value nowadays, and certainly the "Scotch" Symphony of Mendelssohn is sure to be lacking in stimulating qualities.

It is a curious program of an inherent "popular" nature that M. Monteux is offering us. When so much music remains unplayed why bother to revive the "Euryanthe" Overture?

The static quality of musical art is alway a thing that gives the contemplative pause This is particularly true of the things offered at piano recitals, which almost invariably begin with a Bach fugue and end with Liszt cheval de bataille!

The beginning of things musical, so far concerts go, seems to be set at Bach. Ho delightful it would be if the beginning things musical were placed at Wagner an programs made up of Wagnerian excerpt to warm us up and post-Wagnerians (an others), whether early or late, if unfamilia to go on with, as, for instance, Richar Strauss, Moussorgsky, Cesar Franck, Debussy, Ravel, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Rachmaninoff, Scriabine, Stravinsky, Mahle Reger, Schoenberg, Sibelius, Loeffler, Ornstein, Ernest Bloch, Grainger, Delius, Casella, Herman Goetz, Bruchner, Alexande Ritter, Felix Draesecke, Sinding and D'Albert.

From Republican MAR 15 1921 E
Springfield, Mass.

ABANDONS CONCERT TOUR

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Up Trip It Has Been Making for Twenty-Five Years

Boston, March 14 — The Boston symphony orchestra, now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for 25 years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that these series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 15 1921
EVENING POST
New York City

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for twenty-five years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that this series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

---

rom HERALD
ddress New York City
MAR 15 19
ate

Orchestra to Curtail Tour.

BOSTON, March 14.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for twenty-five years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that these concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

TRIBUNE,
New York City
D

Boston Symphany Cuts Tours

BOSTON, March 14.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for twenty-five years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that these series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From 1921
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS IN PHILADELPHIA

Closing Program One of the Best Performed in Several Years. Dohnanyi the Soloist

THE PROGRAM

Symphony No. 2, D major .... Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus" .... Liszt
Concerto in G major for piano and orchestra .... Mozart
Erno Dohnanyi.
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last evening at the Academy of Music what will probably be its last concert in Philadelphia, for some years at least, closing a period of thirty-six years of consecutive concerts here. Mr. Monteux paid homage to the occasion by giving the best program he has offered Philadelphians since becoming the regular conductor of the orchestra. being a real symphony on it. standing these facts, the audience small, especially in view of the state of the Academy at Boston phony concerts a few years ago.

The concert opened with the

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM

MAR 13 19 M

—Erno Dohanyi, Hungarian composer and pianist, will be the soloist at the closing Boston Symphony concert, at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. He will play with the orchestra Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major (Koechel No. 453).

Musical life in Buda Pesth, the historically musical capital of Hungary, has long centred around the illustrious name of Dohnanyi. He made his debut at the age of 20 years and toured Germany, Austria and England. In 1899 he came to the United States, where the fine quality of his playing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and in other cities occasioned much favorable comment. The creative side of his art has added as much to his fame as the executive, and such compositions as his pantomime, "Pierrette's Veil," his opera, "Tanta Simona," his pianoforte music, two symphonies, string quartets and quintet (the latter of which have often been played here) are considered in Europe, where they have all been heard, as among the finest achievements in modern music. In another field—that of conducting—Dohnanyi has also been conspicuously successful, and presiding over the Philharmonic concerts in his own country, he has been praised as the prophet of new works and as the masterly interpreter of the old. His recent return to this country is considered an event in the present musical season.

RENO DOHNAANYI

Pierre Monteux will conduct at tomorrow night's concert Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser."

* * *

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

Erno Dohnanyi will be heard as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening. In Europe, Dohnanyi has long been considered one of the first of living artists, by virtue both of his creative and of his executive achievement, but in this country he is scarcely remembered, since his short visit took place when he was a young man in 1899-1900, at which time he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and in other cities. Gaining early prominence by his splendid talents in his own country, Hungary, his fame has spread all over Europe by his numerous tours of Germany, Austria, Russia, and Great Britain. His finely conceived original compositions for orchestra, for the stage and for ensembles in smaller forms, as well as his piano pieces, have all been praised and acclaimed in his own and other countries of Europe; whereas in the United States his piano works and his string quartet, in particular, are well known. His achievements, not only as pianist but as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in Budapest have made him the idol of the day in that capital so long famous for its musical activities.

Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mendelssohn's Third Symphony in A minor, entitled "Scotch," and will close the concert with Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline." The other orchestral number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus."

---

n EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programs:

For the Thursday evening concert, the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Weber's Overture to "Euranthe," Maurice Ravel's "Vales Nobles at Sentimentales," and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony "Romeo and Juliet."

For the Saturday matinee, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the Third in A minor, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus," Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto in which Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Erno Dohnanyi, whose recent return to this country is the musical topic of the day, will be heard as soloist at the last Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening at 8:15. In Europe, Dohnanyi has long been considered one of the first of living artists. His finely conceived original compositions for orchestra, for the stage and for ensembles in smaller forms, as well as his piano pieces, have all been praised and acclaimed in his own and other countries of Europe; whereas in the United States, his piano works and his string quartet, in particular, are well known. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert.

---

rom HERALD
ddress New York City
Date

* * *

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For Thursday, Symphony No. 2, by Brahms; Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Ravel's "Valses Sentimentales et Nobles" and the ball scene from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." For Saturday, Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Liszt's "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounov's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as the soloist.

From
TIMES MAR 13 192 Y
Brooklyn, N. Y.

DOHNANYI TO BE SOLOIST.

The closing Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy next Friday evening, on which occasion Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's Third Symphony in A minor, entitled "Scotch," and considered one o fthe Victorian composer's most beautiful works. The orchestra will also be heard in Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline," and in Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus."

Erno Dohnanyi, the celebrated Hungarian composer-pianist, will play Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G major (Koechel 453), as the soloist with the orchestra.

From WORLD,
New York City

The farewell Boston Symphony concert will be given March 18 in the Academy of Music. Erno Dohnanyi is to be soloist. He is known by the beauty of his compositions, although as a pianist he is scarcely remembered, since his former visit to the United States was made as a young man in 1900, when he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this borough.

From
HERALD

Boston Symphony Concert.

Erno Dohnanyi, whose recent return to this country is a musical topic of the day, will be heard as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, and will close the concert with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

AMERICAN
New York City

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its final pair of concerts for the current season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Mr. Monteux presents Symphony No. 2, by Brahms; Overture "Euryanthe," by Weber; Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, by Ravel; "The Ball at the Capulets" from Berlioz's symphony "Romeo et Juliet." The matinee list includes Symphony D minor, by Franck; Concerto for violin and orchestra, by Glazounoff, Richard Burgin, soloist; Overture to "Gwendoline," by Chabrier.

TIMES MAR 13 1921
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will complete its Brooklyn season on Friday evening at the Academy, assisted by the pianist, Erno Dohnanyi.

"L'Amore del Tre Re," with Bori,

Morning Telegraph
New York
MARCH 13

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts this season, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programs: For the Thursday evening concert the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and the Ball Scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." For the Saturday matinee Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the Third in A minor, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus," Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist.

From MAR 13 1921 L
WORLD,
New York City

Boston Symphony.

At the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, March 17, and Saturday afternoon, March 19, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For the evening concert, Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Maurice Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," and an excerpt from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—"The Ball at the Capulet's." For the matinee Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Liszt's Symphonie Poem "Orpheus," Glazounoff's Violin Concerto, in which the soloist will be Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline."

TIMES,
Washington, D. C. MAR 13 1921 L

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Erno Dohnanyi, whose recent return to this country is the musical topic of the day, will be heard as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30.

In Europe, Dohnanyi has long been considered one of the first of living artists, by virtue both of his creative and of his executive achievements, but in this country he is scarcely remembered, since his short visit took place when he was a young man in 1899 and 1900, at which time he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in several cities. Gaining early prominence by his splendid talents in his own country, Hungary, his fame has spread all over Europe by his numerous tours of Germany, Austria, Russia, and Great Britain. His finely conceived original compositions for orchestra, for the stage and for ensembles in smaller forms, as well as his piano pieces, have all been praised and acclaimed.

From Star
Wash. D C
Mar 13-1921

Dohnanyi-Boston Symphony.

At the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, which will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist, will play, as soloist, with the orchestra, Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G Major (Koechel, No. 453). Pierre Monteux will conduct in Dvorak's "Second Symphony in D Minor," which, although less familiar perhaps than the "new world" symphony of the Bohemian composer, is accounted more beautiful in many ways. The concert will close with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

Erno Dohnanyi made his debut at the age of twenty, touring Germany, Austria and England. In 1899 he came to the United States. The creative side of his art has added as much to his fame as the executive. His compositions include his pantomime, "Pierette's Veil"; the opera "Tanta Simona," pianoforte music, two symphonies, string quartet and quintet, the latter of which have often been played here.

From
Evening Globe
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY CUTS TOUR FOR NEXT YEAR

BOSTON, March 14.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now making in accordance with a custom started twenty-five years ago the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, is making the visit for the last time. It was announced to-day that these series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

---

re, Md. NEWS.

Last Boston Symphony Concert

Orchestra At Lyric Wednesday Night—Recitals By Grasse And Hofmann This Week

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

In the aftermath of the opera "season" will come a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—not only the final event of its series of five, but, alas, the last it will probably ever give in Baltimore, if its present plan be maintained. Other affairs of the week are a concert by the Peabody Conservatory Chorus Tuesday night, a recital by Edwin Grasse, the brilliantly versatile blind musician, at Old St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church Thursday night and a recital by Joseph Hofmann, pianist, at the Peabody, Friday afternoon.

The sands of the musical hour glass are now thin and are running rapidly through. Only two orchestral concerts remain after the Boston Symphony's (those by the Baltimore Symphony on March 27 and by the Philadelphia Orchestra on March 30) and but few recitals out of the multitude of bookings are yet to come.

Erno Dohnanyi, who will make his first appearance in recent years as soloist at the Boston Symphony's concert at the Lyric next Wednesday night, is classified in Europe as one of the master pianists of the day. His American reputation is chiefly based upon his piano compositions, which are frequently heard in recital halls. He made his first American tour in 1899-1900 with the Boston Symphony.

He will play Mozart's G major Concerto on Wednesday night, and the program will further include Mendelssohn's Third Symphony (A minor,) familiarly known as the "Scotch" Symphony (for reasons that have no alcoholic significance whatsoever); Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, and the "Ballroom Scene" from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." Pierre Monteux will conduct.

---

rom EVENING SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.

THE THREE ARTS
Music, Drama, Painting

THERE is something a little grave about the thought that we are to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time next Wednesday evening. It has meant much in Baltimore's musical development and it has been with us a welcome stranger within the gates for a great many years.

The decision of its managers to limit the orchestra's appearance outside of Boston to the "neighboring towns" is probably an important one, as, theoretically at least, the greater orchestras should "feed" the nearby cities and the "immediate" districts instead of wasting their energies traveling to distant States and metropolises, where musical organizations of a like calibre and class obtain.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, being the nearest one to Baltimore, is the logical band to provide us our music, while the Boston players remain in the New England States. This in theory.

In practice it is rather different, a more difficult nut to crack, because, with the public's increasing interest in the relative values of the traveling organizations, the demand for very frequent concerts will no longer be denied.

So with the passing of the Boston Orchestra the idea naturally presents itself that the time is ripe for the corralling of the New York Philharmonic, which, under Mr. Stansky's direction, has become one of the most important orchestras of the first class now in the public eye, but one which has not been heard here for several seasons.

It cannot truthfully be said that the program announced for the final Boston concert is particularly exciting. A Mozart concerto, even if played by so distinguished an artist as Erno Dohnanyi, the interesting D'Albert pupil, has little more than a purely academic value nowadays, and certainly the "Scotch" Symphony of Mendelssohn is sure to be lacking in stimulating qualities.

It is a curious program of an inherent "popular" nature that M. Monteux is offering us. When so much music remains unplayed why bother to revive the "Euryanthe" Overture?

The static quality of musical art is always a thing that gives the contemplative pause. This is particularly true of the things offered at piano recitals, which almost invariably begin with a Bach fugue and end with Liszt cheval de bataille!

The beginning of things musical, so far as concerts go, seems to be set at Bach. How delightful it would be if the beginning of things musical were placed at Wagner and programs made up of Wagnerian excerpts to warm us up and post-Wagnerians (and others), whether early or late, if unfamiliar, to go on with, as, for instance, Richard Strauss, Moussorgsky, Cesar Franck, Debussy, Ravel, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Rachmaninoff, Scriabine, Stravinsky, Mahler, Reger, Schoenberg, Sibelius, Loeffler, Ornstein, Ernest Bloch, Grainger, Delius, Casella, Herman Goetz, Bruchner, Alexander Ritter, Felix Draesecke, Sinding and D'Albert.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

ABANDONS CONCERT TOUR

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Up Trip It Has Been Making for Twenty-Five Years

Boston, March 14 — The Boston symphony orchestra, now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for 25 years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that these series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

ESTABLISHED 1881 1921
From
EVENING POST
New York City

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for twenty-five years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that this series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

---

om HERALD
ddress New York City
Date

Orchestra to Curtail Tour.

Boston, March 14.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for twenty-five years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that these concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued. The formal notice said the decision was due to increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston.

TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphany Cuts Tours

BOSTON, March 14.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra now on the tour to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, which it has made frequently for twenty-five years, is making the visits for the last time. It was announced to-day that these series of concerts would be abandoned. Visits to New York will be continued.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS IN PHILADELPHIA

Closing Program One of the Best Performed in Several Years. Dohnanyi the Soloist

THE PROGRAM

Symphony No. 2, D major	Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus"	Liszt
Concerto in G major for piano and orchestra Erno Dohnanyi	Mozart
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last evening at the Academy of Music what will probably be its last concert in Philadelphia, for some years at least, closing a period of thirty-six years of consecutive concerts here. Mr. Monteux paid homage to the occasion by giving the best program he has offered Philadelphians since becoming the regular conductor of the orchestra, there being a real symphony on it. Notwithstanding these facts, the audience was small, especially in view of the crowded state of the Academy at Boston Symphony concerts a few years ago.

The concert opened with the y Concert

y Night—Recitals n This Week

BROWN

will come a concert by the al event of its series of five, in Baltimore, if its present s are a concert by the Pea-

Dohnanyi, who will make his pearance in recent years as at the Boston Symphony's at the Lyric next Wednesday is classified in Europe as one master pianists of the day. merican reputation is chiefly upon his piano compositions, are frequently heard in re- alls. He made his first Ameri- ur in 1899-1900 with the Bos- mphony.

will play Mozart's G major rto on Wednesday night, and rogram will further include elssohn's Third Symphony (A .) familiarly known as the ch" Symphony (for reasons have no alcoholic significance soever); Weber's "Euryanthe" ure, and the "Ballroom Scene" Berlioz's dramatic symphony, neo and Juliet." Pierre Monteux conduct.

LISHED 1851

MAR 15 1921 K

NING POST
ew York City

The Boston Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the tour to Philadelphia, ington, and Baltimore, which it made frequently for twenty-five is making the visits for the time. "It was announced to-day this series of concerts would be ioned. Visits to New York will ntinued. The formal notice sent bscribers in Philadelphia, Wash- n, and Baltimore said the decision ue to increasing demand for con- in the vicinity of Boston.

HERALD
s New York City MAR 15 19

Orchestra to Curtail Tour.

TON, March 14.—The Boston Sym- Orchestra, now on the tour to lelphia, Washington and Baltimore, it has made frequently for twenty- ears, is making the visits for the me. It was announced to-day that concerts would be abandoned. to New York will be continued. ormal notice said the decision was o increasing demand for concerts vicinity of Boston.

TRIBUNE,
New York City

on Symphony Cuts Tours

TON, March 14.—The Boston ony Orchestra now on the tour iladelphia, Washington and Balti- which it has made frequently enty-five years is making the or the last time. It was an- to-day that these series of would be abandoned. Visits ork will be continued.

NEW YORK
MAR 15 1921

ing Public Ledger
iladelphia, Pa.

STON SYMPHONY DS IN PHILADELPHIA

ing Program One of the Best formed in Several Years. Dohnanyi the Soloist

THE PROGRAM

ny No. 2, D major.......... Brahms ic Poem, "Orpheus"........ Liszt in G major for piano and .... Mozart estra Erno Dohnanyi.
"Tannhauser" .... Wagner

Boston Symphony Orchestra gave ening at the Academy of Music ill probably be its last concert adelphia for some years at least. r a period of thirty-six years of tive concerts here. Mr. Mon- paid homage to the occasion by the best program he has offered since becoming the regu- [illegible]

D major symphony of Brahms, one of the greatest works in this form since Beethoven. Mr. Monteux gave the best symphonic reading, especially in the working out of the architectural detail, that he has given since he appeared as Mr. Ribaud's "understudy" almost three years ago, when he directed the Franck symphony, and gave a marvelously minute reading of that great piece of mosaic music. His lack of real feeling for the symphonic form was sh[illegible] in places, but in the architecture in the relation of the various them[illegible]s is doubtful if the great work has ever had a clearer rendition in this city.

This was followed by Liszt's little known (and perhaps deservedly) symphonic poem, "Orpheus," an extremely monotonous work, based upon one theme and in virtually one tempo, depending therefore for its effect upon tone color. The orchestral part of the program closed with a spirited reading of the "Tannhauser" overture, which has been heard at symphonic concerts in Philadelphia before—say three or four hundred times.

The soloist was Erno Dohnanyi, one of the great musical figures of the present day, both as a composer and as an executant. Mr. Dohnanyi chose a strange vehicle for the exploitation of his great talents—simple in one way and enormously difficult in another Technically, the Mozart G major concerto lies well within the reach of the average conservatory graduate, but to play it as Dohnanyi did last evening demands the highest degree of musical conception and finish. The concerto is one of the lesser known of the twenty-five with which Mozart enriched the piano literature of his day, and is charming rather than deep, as Mozart generally is. Here and there are touches which indicate a later hand than that of Mozart, especially in the cadenza of the second movement, although if the cadenza of the first movement be that of Dohnanyi it is written so strictly in the Mozartian style as to defy the suggestion that it is not the composer's own. Mr. Dohnanyi received the reception which his great talent deserved.

The orchestra played with more esprit and feeling that it has shown here for a long time, perhaps due to the fact that this is to be the last of the long Southern trips. Mr. Longy had an unusual opportunity in the program and improved it to the full. His tone is no longer the marvelous one of some years ago, but there is no lack of the artistry that made him for years the first oboist of the world. The whole Boston Orchestra in its farewell to Philadelphia covered itself with glory. At the close of the program Mr. Monteux was repeatedly recalled by the audience, and the whole orchestra was obliged to rise twice before they and Philadelphia parted musical company.

ESTABLISHED 1851

From

ORCHESTRA'S FAREWELL

Boston Organization Gives Final Concert in This City.

The thirty-sixth and last season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city was brought to a close in the Academy of Music last night. Since the loss of Dr. Muck as conductor of the famous orchestra, the death of Colonel Higginson and the consequent disorganization, to some extent, of the personnel of the orchestra, attendance at the Philadelphia concerts has been much reduced. This fact, together with an increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston, has decided the managers to discontinue the series here. It will be a matter of genuine regret to the many stanch supporters of the orchestra, and a real loss to the cultural advantages of Philadelphia. The Boston Orchestra's many splendid seasons here blazed the way for the Philadelphia Orchestra and made possible its rapid growth, since taste in orchestral music was cultivated for years by this organization alone.

Last night's program, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, was enjoyed by a large audience. The program was a beautiful one and was played in a style that elicited the enthusiasm of the audience. The symphony was the D major of Brahms. Included in the list was the Liszt symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The soloist was the distinguished composer-pianist, Erno Dohnanyi, who is well known here through his many fine compositions and also through his brilliant pupil, Mischa Levitzka. Dohnonyi's playing was beautiful, clear, limpid and polished. The choice, for him, of the Mozart G major concerto, was not one to arouse wild enthusiasm. As a medium for fine technique and elegance of style, Mozart serves admirably, but no longer awakens great admiration. Dohnanyi was given a cordial reception.

ESTABLISHED 1851

FROM

MAR 15 1921 Z

FINAL CONCERT BY BOSTONIANS

Philadelphia Abandoned by Boston Symphony Orchestra With Completion of 37th Season Yesterday

Boston Symphony Orchestra seasons in Philadelphia are a thing of the past. The concert at the Academy of Music in that city yesterday closed the Boston Orchestra's thirty-seventh season, its first appearance having been in 1883. The management asserts that the abandonment of the Quaker City series is due to a demand for a larger number of concerts in and near Boston. The slackening of popular interest in the Boston Symphony was due more than to any one other thing [illegible] record that Dr. Muck in- [illegible]

A list [illegible] of the Boston Orchestra since its first season presents an array of names illustrious in the musical world. Beginning with George Henschel who was its leader from 1881 to 1884, they were: 1884-1889, William Gericke; 1889-1893, Arthur Nikisch; 1893-1898, Emil Paur; 1898-1906, William Gericke; 1906-1908, Karl Muck; 1908-1912, Max Fieder; 1912-1918, Karl Muck. Henri Rabaud succeeded Dr. Muck, for one season, and in 1919 the present permanent conductor, Pierre Monteux, was installed.

From MAR 15 1921 M
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Last Concert of Season and Orchestra's Farewell to Philadelphia

WITH the fifth and final concert of the season, at the Academy of Music last evening, and at the end of its thirty-sixth season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made what was announced as its farewell appearance in this city. Owing, it is said, to the demand for a larger number of concerts in and near its own city, the Boston Orchestra has made no future bookings here.

The regret with which local music lovers bid farewell to an organization which for so many years has been a regular and noteworthy attraction of each musical season, was emphasized by the enthusiasm of last evening's large audience, which filled the auditorium with the exception of a number of seats on the lower flo[illegible] The program was well calculated to inspire enthusiasm, both in its make-up and the manner of its delivery. As the symphony Pierre Monteux, the conductor, presented the No. 2, in D major, of Brahms, with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner as the other purely orchestral numbers. The soloist was Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who was heard in Mozart's Concerto in G Major (Koechel No. 453).

The Brahms D major is one of the most beautiful of symphonies, not the composer's most imposing or most profound, perhaps, but certainly unsurpassed as to the beauty of its themes and the loveliness of its melody. It has true values of contrasts as well, and something of the cryptic in the second movement—adagio non troppo—which is less clear in its meaning than the others. The rest is all free, cheerful, ingratiating melodiousness, particularly the frolicsome third movement, with its captivating presto, while the finale adds the last word to the spirit of enchantment. Mr. Monteux read the music with clearness of conception and interpreted it in the right mood, and it was played with great refinement of tonal beauty and in a sympathetic and brilliant manner.

The Liszt work aptly described as a symphonic poem, titled "Orpheus" and classic in its mouldings, came next. This melodious composition was received with evident delight, being splendidly played. After this came the pianist's number introducing Mr. Dohnanyi, a young man of pleasing personality, who makes no effort to appear "artistic," but easily proves himself to be so in the best sense. He makes the piano speak eloquently and sing divinely, his delivery of the characteriztic Mozart concerto being distinguished by rare purity of tone, the clearest of execution, quite ravishing as to runs and trills. While the work is not one requiring stupendous effort or marvels of technique, it needs a real poet-musician to play it worthily, and Dohnanyi lacks neither the poetic nor the musicianly qualities.

At the last, as the Boston Orchestra's "swan song" in Philadelphia, a magnificent interpretation of the "Tannhauser" overture roused the audience to high enthusiasm, conductor and musicians receiving a genuine ovation ere 7they were permitted to depart.

From
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Farewell Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave what was not only the closing concert in its present series but its farewell one to Philadelphia in the presence of a large but not overcrowded audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the programme included Liszt's "Orpheus" and the "Tannhauser" overture, and had for its most important and substantial feature the D major symphony of Brahms.

It will be observed that this list, while it contains nothing new or unfamiliar, is replete with enjoyable interest. Brahms' seccond symphony is a work of serene beauty which, in the tenderness of its sentiment in the poetic charms of its themes and in the artistic skill of its construction, has no superior among modern compositions of its classs, and it was played with much brilliancy and eloquence and with an always intelligent appreciation of its significance. It had been heard here before this season, but its repetition was far from being unwelcome, and Mr. Monteux' interpretation of it, alike from a technical and emotional and intellectual point of view, very well sustained the comparisons which it evoked.

Upon the performance of the other things it is unnecessary to dwell. Although not so well known as "Les Preludes," Liszt's symphonic poem of "Orpheus" is not unworthy of his geniu and the audience was much impressed by the effectiveness of its presentation. As for the "Tannhauser" overture, let it suffice to say that it has seldom been done with a finer spirit or a greater sonority. The soloist of the occasion was that distinguished pianist and composer, Erno Dohnanyi, whose artistic taste and remarkable virtuosity were agreeably displayed in an illuminative reading of the Mozart concerto in G major, (Koechel No. 453). Mr. Dohnanyi was cordially received and heartily applauded.

---

From MAR 15 1921 I
NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Orchestra

Fine Concert Ends Season and All Visits Here

The final concert of the thirty-sixth season of the Boston Orchestra's concerts in Philadelphia was held in the Academy of Music last night, and, unfortunately, it marked the orchestra's final appearance in this city. Contrary to previous concerts, the program was made up of numbers about which there was no appeal of novelty.

Brahm's Second Symphony, played for the third time by a visiting orchestra, opened the program. Mr. Monteux upset no traditions in his reading of the work, but gave a clear, vigorous reading, to which his orchestra responded in better style than had been its wont in earlier concerts. The third movement was played with fine delicacy, and the last was given with real spirit and dramatic feeling.

Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who played here with the Boston Orchestra twenty years ago, and who was heard here earlier this season in recital, was the soloist. He chose the Mozart Concerto in G major for this concert. It requires considerable artistic courage to make virtually a first appearance at an orchestral concert with a work so devoid of pyrotechnics and dramatics. There is nothing in the music to cover a pianist's lack of technic or musicianship. Mr. Donnanyi's gifts made a potent appeal to the audience on their merits alone. As for interpretation, the most rabid classicist would have been been satisfied by the limited dynamic scale which the soloist allowed himself and by his strict adherence to the tempo.

Last night's soloist is not one of those who insist in applying the tempo rubato indiscriminately to the classics. But the delicacy of sentiment which marks his interpretation of such music and the warm tone which he gets from the piano make the music more ingratiating than under the hands of many other pianists.

The other two orchestral numbers were the seldom heard "Orpheus" Symphonic Poem by Liszt and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture. Both received excellent interpretations. After the overture there was a burst of applause that has not been equaled at the Boston Symphony concerts for many seasons. Both the conductor and the men have reason to feel gratified at the cordiality of feeling which marked last night's concert.

Undoubtedly, the fact that the concert closed the orchestra's career in this city, for the present at least, had something to do with the size of the audience and the warmth of the applause. But the playing merited such appreciation and only emphasized the fact that the absence of this organization's concerts from the musical season will be a distinct loss.

Four seasons ago the Boston Symphony was the standard by which the excellence of all orchestras was measured. But time brings changes and that position had to be relinquished. Tho the standard of performance dropped low, yet this organization never has failed to bring programs of unusual interest to the city. Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra music lovers in this city have heard works which are but seldom heard and which have the very definite value of novelty—an essential to any musical season. And Mr. Monteux is a personality of vigor and cosmopolitanism which will be missed in future seasons.

From TIMES, [illegible] 16 1921

Washington, D. C.

ORCHESTRA GIVEN GENEROUS OVATION

The Boston Symphony Orchestr "farewell" concert was a thing fu of beauty, at the final hearing of th famous orchestra yerterday afternoo at the National Theater, and it wa with evident regret that the apprecia tive audience let the players depar knowing that they would not retur to us next season. And with the o chestra, under Pierre Monteux, th French conductor, was a new-come to our concert world, Erno Dohnany pianist, who as soloist violinist pla ing the Mozart Concerto in G majo delighted with the rare loveliness o his exquisite musical interpretatio and received fully half a dozen re calls at the close.

This new player is conspicuously Mozart player, which carries with it certain and essentially fine type o piano playing. He took his tones a a miniaturist does his brush, bringin exquisite small forms of tone an color from his instrument, tone pearly, fresh, alive, and beautiful. Th joy of Mozart was there, with beautiful covered cadenza in whic each slightest value was heard an felt, which is more. And like th loveliness of a Schumann song he made the andante, playing it "con amore," with exquisite delicacy and yet with a sw[illegible] masterful. Blithely he bounded through the allegretto, fine figure rugged spirit, facility that put Mozart's charm into the musical contours.

A slender, modest man, finely chiseled, Dohnanyi gave the delicat life and glow of Mozart, his pure mel odiousness, and a spontaneous ex uberance that was contagious. He a once awakened interest, and make one long to near him in recital. Th orchestra was as finely textured a the soloist, giving a beautiful settin to the music.

The symphony was new to us, th Dvorak No. 2, in D minor. M. Mon teux was particularly happy in hi interpretation. Deep, strongly ac cepted, this music had a gypsy spiri that director and players infused wit episodes of rarest orchestral beauty The rich cellos sounded tne key-note while the wind choirs in rich-harmonied chords gave out liquid notes of sheer loveliness, or spoke like a full-toned organ. Much of the work held the dialogue form and light type of operatic music, the Spanish scherze too, was rather lacking in any notable tone, but the finale was rhapsodic and vital, holding a lovely tuneful miner strain. As a composition it was colorful, though not essentially great.

The joyful "Euryanthe" overture of Weber was a gem in rendition. Nothing has been lovelier this season than the muted episode, that M. Monteaux began like a whisper of all the strings, while the zest and speed of the opening phrases were inspiriting. The cellos, the viols, to the bass viols alone, all have wealth of melody in this overture, and the orchestra made the most of them, closing a season with a memory that will remain. The entire orchestra was brought to its feet in token of appreciation.

JESSIE MacBRIDE.

FROM 6 1921 L

HUB ORCHESTRA GIVES FAREWELL CONCERT HERE

Boston Musicians' Popularity at Home Precludes Future Tours.

Program.

Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Op. 70.. ....Dvorak
I. Allegro maestoso.
II. Poco adagio.
III. Scherzo: Vivace; Poco meno mosso.
IV. Finale; Allegro.

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra in G major (Koechel No. 453)....Mozart
I. Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto.
Overture to "Euryanthe".........Weber

Soloist.
ERNO DOHNANYI.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra began coming to Washington, nearly forty years ago, it had few rivals and was almost unique in America, but in these two decades of its existence Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, Cincinnati and other cities—Detroit is the latest—have developed symphony orchestras of their own and are sending them afield; foreign orchestras, as La Scala of Italy, have begun to come to our shores, and the Boston Symphony does not have the field to itself. Also it is more and more in demand nearer Boston for concerts, and so the management has decided to give up the long concert tours. So yesterday's concert was the last in which Washington will hear the orchestra, for some at least.

This was the orchestra's 133d appearance in this city, and in that time it has played here under eight different conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Muck, Fiedler, Rabaud, and the present conductor, Pierre Monteux. Gericke was conductor from 1889-1893 and from 1898-1906, while Karl Muck served two periods also, from 1906-1908 and from 1912-1918.

A large and friendly audience greeted the musicians at this farewell concert and enjoyed a characteristic program. The Dvorak symphony in D minor was well done, and while the first movement is somewhat monotonous—that is, it lacks a certain spontaneity — it works up through a more interesting adagio to a delightful scherzo, in waltz time, and to a martial and dignified finale. The phrasing of the orchestra was fine at all times, and there were beautiful pianissimos.

With the orchestra was Erno Dohnanyi, Hungarian pianist, who played his share of the Mozart concerto most delightfully. He has a beautiful, ringing tone; a clear, distinct touch, and a poetic interpretation—one of the most delightful players heard here this season. He was recalled five times, and responded by modestly including the orchestra in his success.

The last number was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," and was beautifully played. There was one entry pianissimo that was remarkable. Washington is going to miss the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and we hope the Boston Symphony will miss Washington.

E. H.

GOOD-BYE TO BALTIMORE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Takes Its Departure —Dohnanyi as Soloist—Hofmann's Recital—Lenten Organ Recitals Come to End

Baltimore, Md., March 20, 1921.

It must have been with mingled emotions, gratification merged with sadness, that Mr. Monteux and the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra witnessed the manifestations of regret at their farewell concert of March 16 at the Lyric. For some time after the last note had been played, the audience remained seated vigorously applauding, compelling the leader and men to bow repeated acknowledgement. The soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, in his reading of the Mozart piano concerto in G-major displayed a velvety touch so smooth and clear as to have been acceptable to the old master composer himself. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and the ball music from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" symphony completed the program. Although the orchestra will not again undertake a series of concerts in Baltimore, it is hoped that it has not departed forever.

EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.
MAR 16 1921 L

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon at the National Theater with a delightful program, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and with Erno Dohnanyi, pianist, as soloist.

M. Monteux has greatly improved the playing of the orchestra, and yesterday the interpretation of the symphony, Dvorak's in D minor, opus 70, No. 2, was beautiful, particularly in the second and third movements. The tone of the violins is rounder and warmer than in several seasons, and they played with splendid ensemble, delicate shading and well built crescendos. In the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" M. Monteux and his players made the pianissimo passages scarcely more than whispered tones.

Mr. Dohnanyi played the Mozart "Concerto in G Major" with the brilliant tone and sparkling technic best suited to the music of this old master. To hear a Mozart concerto was delightful, and both the soloist and the orchestra entered into the spirit of the music, playing it with grace and musicianly interpretation. The difficult cadenza in the first movement Mr. Dohnanyi dashed off with perfect ease—clean and crisp staccato and even scales and trills.

The absence from yesterday's program of the usual announcement for the orchestra's plans for next season was significant, and probably indicated that the concert yesterday was the last the Boston Symphony will [illegible] in Washington for some time.

From MAR 16 [illegible] K
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

NO ONE will regret the decision of the Boston Symphony Orchestra not to return next autumn for its usual series of concerts more than those who are close to and are responsible for the development of the Philadelphia Orchestra. As the decisions of musical organizations are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, it is to be hoped that the Boston Orchestra may yet appear here in concerts, contributing its share to the musical culture of the city which it did so much to promote in the thirty-six years of its local appearances. For too much cannot be said as to the value of the "Boston Symphony concerts." Beginning four years after Henry L. Higginson had organized the orchestra in Boston, the visits of this great organization were the great stabilizing and inspiring things in Philadelphia's musical life. And the very early tonal perfection of the interpretations of master works at the hands of the orchestra and the varying conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Muck and Fiedler, were achievements not even possible in Europe during the same period.

Whether all this musical richness was placed at the command of Boston and Philadelphia and other cities through the munificence of one man and not through the collective efforts of the many was a mistake has nothing to do with the fine results obtained through the generosity of the founder. While this is not the time to discuss the false glamour that has given European achievements along these lines such an easy reputation, it is admitted that up to the war the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great virtuoso institution, without an equal here or in Europe. It is to the credit of the appreciative audiences here and in Boston and elsewhere that they knew what they were hearing. Forty years is a long while, despite the motto that "Art is long and time is fleeting"; and thirty-six years represent a signal artistic lustral period that has meant everything for Philadelphia. It was natural and logical, however, that the musical appreciators here should insist on more than five symphony concerts in a season and should arrange to have a season of their own. But there is room for all. The Philadelphia Orchestra has its supreme place; but the visiting orchestras from Boston, Chicago and New York are welcome also. There is no royal road to appreciation in music save the repeated hearing of the great works of art, past and present. Orchestras and conductors have varying individualities; and it is through these different viewpoints [illegible]

ony Concert

ay Night—Recitals
n This Week

BROWN

will come a concert by the nal event of its series of five, e in Baltimore, if its present eek are a concert by the Pea-

Dohnanyi, who will make his ppearance in recent years as at the Boston Symphony's at the Lyric next Wednesday is classified in Europe as one master pianists of the day, merican reputation is chiefly upon his piano compositions, are frequently heard in re-alls. He made his first Ameri-our in 1899-1900 with the Bos-mphony.

will play Mozart's G major rto on Wednesday night, and program will further include elssohn's Third Symphony (A ,) familiarly known as the ch" Symphony (for reasons have no alcoholic significance soever); Weber's "Euryanthe" ture, and the "Ballroom Scene" Berlioz's dramatic symphony, meo and Juliet." Pierre Monteux conduct.

LISHED 1881

NING POST
ew York City

The Boston Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the tour to Philadelphia, ington, and Baltimore, which it made frequently for twenty-five , is making the visits for the time. It was announced to-day this series of concerts would be doned. Visits to New York will ntinued. The formal notice sent bscribers in Philadelphia, Wash-n, and Baltimore said the decision due to increasing demand for con-in the vicinity of Boston.

HERALD
s New York City

Orchestra to Curtail Tour.

STON, March 14.—The Boston Sym-Orchestra, now on the tour to delphia, Washington and Baltimore, it has made frequently for twenty-ears, is making the visits for the ime. It was announced to-day that concerts would be abandoned. to New York will be continued. ormal notice said the decision was o increasing demand for concerts vicinity of Boston.

TRIBUNE,
New York City

on Symphany Cuts Tours

STON, March 14.—The Boston hony Orchestra now on the tour iladelphia, Washington and Balti- which it has made frequently wenty-five years, is making the for the last time. It was an-to-day that these series of would be abandoned. Visits York will be continued.

NEW YORK
LISHED 1881
ing Public Ledger
iladelphia, Pa.

STON SYMPHONY
NDS IN PHILADELPHIA

ing Program One of the Best rformed in Several Years. Dohnanyi the Soloist

THE PROGRAM

hony No. 2, D major……Brahms
phonic Poem, "Orpheus"……Liszt erto in G major for piano and rchestra……Mozart
Erno Dohnanyi.
ure, "Tannhauser"……Wagner

Boston Symphony Orchestra gave evening at the Academy of Music will probably be its last concert hiladelphia for some years at least. a period of thirty-six years of utive concerts here. Mr. Mon-paid homage to the occasion by the best program he has offered elphians since becoming the regu-nductor of the orchestra, there a real symphony on it. Notwith-ng these facts, the audience was especially in view of the crowded of the Academy at Boston Sym-concerts a few years ago. concert opened with the superb D major symphony of Brahms, one of the greatest works in this form since Beethoven. Mr. Monteux gave the best symphonic reading, especially in the working out of the architectural detail, that he has given since he appeared as Mr. Ribaud's "understudy" almost three years ago, when he directed the Franck symphony, and gave a marvelously minute reading of that great piece of mosaic music. His lack of real feeling for the symphonic form was sh in places, but in the architecture in the relation of the various themes is doubtful if the great work has ever had a clearer rendition in this city.

This was followed by Liszt's little known (and perhaps deservedly) symphonic poem, "Orpheus," an extremely monotonous work, based upon one theme and in virtually one tempo, depending therefore for its effect upon tone color. The orchestral part of the program closed with a spirited reading of the "Tannhauser" overture, which has been heard at symphonic concerts in Philadelphia before—say three or four hundred times.

The soloist was Erno Dohnanyi, one of the great musical figures of the present day, both as a composer and as an executant. Mr. Dohnanyi chose a strange vehicle for the exploitation of his great talents—simple in one way and enormously difficult in another. Technically, the Mozart G major concerto lies well within the reach of the average conservatory graduate, but to play it as Dohnanyi did last evening demands the highest degree of musical conception and finish. The concerto is one of the lesser known of the twenty-five with which Mozart enriched the piano literature of his day, and is charming rather than deep, as Mozart generally is. Here and there are touches which indicate a later hand than that of Mozart, especially in the cadenza of the second movement, although if the cadenza of the first movement be that of Dohnanyi it is written so strictly in the Mozartian style as to defy the suggestion that it is not the composer's own. Mr. Dohnanyi received the reception which his great talent deserved.

The orchestra played with more esprit and feeling that it has shown here for a long time, perhaps due to the fact that this is to be the last of the long Southern trips. Mr. Longy had an unusual opportunity in the program and improved it to the full. His tone is no longer the marvelous one of some years ago, but there is no lack of the artistry that made him for years the first oboist of the world. The whole Boston Orchestra in its farewell to Philadelphia covered itself with glory. At the close of the program Mr. Monteux was repeatedly recalled by the audience, and the whole orchestra was obliged to rise twice before they and Philadelphia parted musical company.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

ORCHESTRA'S FAREWELL

Boston Organization Gives Final Concert in This City.

The thirty-sixth and last season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city was brought to a close in the Academy of Music last night. Since the loss of Dr. Muck as conductor of the famous orchestra, the death of Colonel Higginson and the consequent disorganization, to some extent, of the personnel of the orchestra, attendance at the Philadelphia concerts has been much reduced. This fact, together with an increasing demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston, has decided the managers to discontinue the series here. It will be a matter of genuine regret to the many stanch supporters of the orchestra, and a real loss to the cultural advantages of Philadelphia. The Boston Orchestra's many splendid seasons here blazed the way for the Philadelphia Orchestra and made possible its rapid growth, since taste in orchestral music was cultivated for years by this organization alone.

Last night's program, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, was enjoyed by a large audience. The program was a beautiful one and was played in a style that elicited the enthusiasm of the audience. The symphony was the D major of Brahms. Included in the list was the Liszt symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The soloist was the distinguished composer-pianist, Erno Dohnanyi, who is well known here through his many fine compositions and also through his brilliant pupil, Mischa Levitzka. Dohnonyi's playing was beautiful, clear, limpid and polished. The choice, for him, of the Mozart G major concerto, was not one to arouse wild enthusiasm. As a medium for fine technique and elegance of style, Mozart serves admirably, but no longer awakens great admiration. Dohnanyi was given a cordial reception.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM

FINAL CONCERT BY BOSTONIANS

Philadelphia Abandoned by Boston Symphony Orchestra With Completion of 37th Season Yesterday

Boston Symphony Orchestra seasons in Philadelphia are a thing of the past. The concert at the Academy of Music in that city yesterday closed the Boston Orchestra's thirty-seventh season, its first appearance having been in 1883. The management asserts that the abandonment of the Quaker City series is due to a demand for a larger number of concerts in and near Boston. The slackening of popular interest in the Boston Symphony was due more than to any one other thing to the war record that Dr. Muck inflicted on the organization.

A list of the conductors of the Boston Orchestra since its first season presents an array of names illustrious in the musical world. Beginning with George Henschel who was its leader from 1881 to 1884, they were: 1884-1889, William Gericke; 1889-1893, Arthur Nikisch; 1893-1898, Emil Paur; 1898-1906, William Gericke; 1906-1908, Karl Muck; 1908-1912, Max Fieder; 1912-1918, Karl Muck. Henri Rabaud succeeded Dr. Muck, for one season, and in 1919 the present permanent conductor, Pierre Monteux, was installed.

From MAR 15 1921
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Last Concert of Season and Orchestra's Farewell to Philadelphia

WITH the fifth and final concert of the season, at the Academy of Music last evening, and at the end of its thirty-sixth season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made what was announced as its farewell appearance in this city. Owing, it is said, to the demand for a larger number of concerts in and near its own city, the Boston Orchestra has made no future bookings here.

The regret with which local music lovers bid farewell to an organization which for so many years has been a regular and noteworthy attraction of each musical season, was emphasized by the enthusiasm of last evening's large audience, which filled the auditorium with the exception of a number of seats on the lower flo The program was well calculated to inspire enthusiasm, both in its make-up and the manner of its delivery. As the symphony Pierre Monteux, the conductor, presented the No. 2, in D major, of Brahms, with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner as the other purely orchestral numbers. The soloist was Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who was heard in Mozart's Concerto in G Major (Koechel No. 453).

The Brahms D major is one of the most beautiful of symphonies, not the composer's most imposing or most profound, perhaps, but certainly unsurpassed as to the beauty of its themes and the loveliness of its melody. It has true values of contrasts as well, and something of the cryptic in the second movement—adagio non troppo—which is less clear in its meaning than the others. The rest is all free, cheerful, ingratiating melodiousness, particularly the frolicsome third movement, with its captivating presto, while the finale adds the last word to the spirit of enchantment. Mr. Monteux read the music with clearness of conception and interpreted it in the right mood, and it was played with great refinement of tonal beauty and in a sympathetic and brilliant manner.

The Liszt work aptly described as a symphonic poem, titled "Orpheus" and classic in its mouldings, came next. This melodious composition was received with evident delight, being splendidly played. After this came the pianist's number introducing Mr. Dohnanyi, a young man of pleasing personality, who makes no effort to appear "artistic," but easily proves himself to be so in the best sense. He makes the piano speak eloquently and sing divinely, his delivery of the characteriztic Mozart concerto being distinguished by rare purity of tone, the clearest of execution, quite ravishing as to runs and trills. While the work is not one requiring stupendous effort or marvels of technique, it needs a real poet-musician to play it worthily, and Dohnanyi lacks neither the poetic nor the musicianly qualities.

At the last, as the Boston Orchestra's "swan song" in Philadelphia, a magnificent interpretation of the "Tannhauser" overture roused the audience to high enthusiasm, conductor and musicians receiving a genuine ovation ere they were permitted to depart.

From
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Farewell Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave what was not only the closing concert in its present series but its farewell one to Philadelphia in the presence of a large but not overcrowded audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the programme included Liszt's "Orpheus" and the "Tannhauser" overture, and had for its most important and substantial feature the D major symphony of Brahms.

It will be observed that this list, while it contains nothing new or unfamiliar, is replete with enjoyable interest. Brahms' seceond symphony is a work of serene beauty which, in the tenderness of its sentiment in the poetic charms of its themes and in the artistic skill of its construction, has no superior among modern compositions of its classs, and it was played with much brilliancy and eloquence and with an always intelligent appreciation of its significance. It had been heard here before this season, but its repetition was far from being unwelcome, and Mr. Monteux' interpretation of it, alike from a technical and emotional and intellectual point of view, very well sustained the comparisons which it evoked.

Upon the performance of the other things it is unnecessary to dwell. Although not so well known as "Les Preludes," Liszt's symphonic poem of "Orpheus" is not unworthy of his genius and the audience was much impressed by the effectiveness of its presentation. As for the "Tannhauser" overture, let it suffice to say that it has seldom been done with a finer spirit or a greater sonority. The soloist of the occasion was that distinguished pianist and composer, Erno Dohnanyi, whose artistic taste and remarkable virtuosity were agreeably displayed in an illuminative reading of the Mozart concerto in G major, (Koechel No. 453). Mr. Dohnanyi was cordially received and heartily applauded.

From
NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Orchestra

Fine Concert Ends Season and All Visits Here

The final concert of the thirty-sixth season of the Boston Orchestra's concerts in Philadelphia was held in the Academy of Music last night, and, unfortunately, it marked the orchestra's final appearance in this city. Contrary to previous concerts, the program was made up of numbers about which there was no appeal of novelty.

Brahm's Second Symphony, played for the third time by a visiting orchestra, opened the program. Mr. Monteux upset no traditions in his reading of the work, but gave a clear, vigorous reading, to which his orchestra responded in better style than had been its wont in earlier concerts. The third movement was played with fine delicacy, and the last was given with real spirit and dramatic feeling.

Erno Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who played here with the Boston Orchestra twenty years ago, and who was heard here earlier this season in recital, was the soloist. He chose the Mozart Concerto in G major for this concert. It requires considerable artistic courage to make virtually a first appearance at an orchestral concert with a work so devoid of pyrotechnics and dramatics. There is nothing in the music to cover a pianist's lack of technic or musicianship. Mr. Dohnanyi's gifts made a potent appeal to the audience on their merits alone. As for interpretation, the most rabid classicist would have been been satisfied by the limited dynamic scale which the soloist allowed himself and by his strict adherence to the tempo.

Last night's soloist is not one of those who insist in applying the tempo rubato indiscriminately to the classics. But the delicacy of sentiment which marks his interpretation of such music and the warm tone which he gets from the piano make the music more ingratiating than under the hands of many other pianists.

The other two orchestral numbers were the seldom heard "Orpheus" Symphonic Poem by Liszt and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture. Both received excellent interpretations. After the overture there was a burst of applause that has not been equaled at the Boston Symphony concerts for many seasons. Both the conductor and the men have reason to feel gratified at the cordiality of feeling which marked last night's concert.

Undoubtedly, the fact that the concert closed the orchestra's career in this city, for the present at least, had something to do with the size of the audience and the warmth of the applause. But the playing merited such appreciation and only emphasized the fact that the absence of this organization's concerts from the musical season will be a distinct loss.

Four seasons ago the Boston Symphony was the standard by which the excellence of all orchestras was measured. But time brings changes and that position had to be relinquished. Tho the standard of performance dropped low, yet this organization never has failed to bring programs of unusual interest to the city. Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra music lovers in this city have heard works which are but seldom heard and which have the very definite value of novelty—an essential to any musical season. And Mr. Monteux is a personality of vigor and cosmopolitanism which will be missed in future seasons.

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

ORCHESTRA GIVEN GENEROUS OVATION

The Boston Symphony Orchestr "farewell" concert was a thing ful of beauty, at the final hearing of thi famous orchestra yerterday afternoo at the National Theater, and it wa with evident regret that the apprecia tive audience let the players depart knowing that they would not return to us next season. And with the orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, was a new-come to our concert world, Erno Dohnany pianist, who as soloist violinist playing the Mozart Concerto in G major delighted with the rare loveliness o his exquisite musical interpretation and received fully half a dozen re calls at the close.

This new player is conspicuously Mozart player, which carries with it certain and essentially fine type o piano playing. He took his tones a a miniaturist does his brush, bringin exquisite small forms of tone an color from his instrument, tone pearly, fresh, alive, and beautiful. Th joy of Mozart was there, with beautiful covered cadenza in whic each slightest value was heard an felt, which is more. And like the loveliness of a Schumann song he made the andante, playing it "con amore," with exquisite delicacy and yet with a sweep of form that wa masterful. Blithely he bounde through the allegretto, fine figure rugged spirit, facility that put Mozart's charm into the musical contours.

A slender, modest man, finely chiseled, Dohnanyi gave the delicate life and glow of Mozart, his pure melodiousness, and a spontaneous exuberance that was contagious. He a once awakened interest, and make one long to near him in recital. The orchestra was as finely textured a the soloist, giving a beautiful setting to the music.

The symphony was new to us, the Dvorak No. 2, in D minor. M. Monteux was particularly happy in his interpretation. Deep, strongly accepted, this music had a gypsy spirit that director and players infused with episodes of rarest orchestral beauty. The rich cellos sounded tne key-note, while the wind choirs in rich-harmonied chords gave out liquid notes of sheer loveliness, or spoke like a full-toned organ. Much of the work held the dialogue form and light type of operatic music, the Spanisn scherze too, was rather lacking in any notable tone, but the finale was rhapsodic and vital, holding a lovely tuneful miner strain. As a composition it was colorful, though not essentially great.

The joyful "Euryanthe" overture of Weber was a gem in rendition. Nothing has been lovelier this season than the muted episode, that M. Monteaux began like a whisper of all the strings, while the zest and speed of the opening phrases were inspiriting. The cellos, the viols, to the bass viols alone, all have wealth of melody in this overture, and the orchestra made the most of them, closing a season with a memory that will remain. The entire orchestra was brought to its feet in token of appreciation.

JESSIE MacBRIDE.

FROM

HUB ORCHESTRA GIVES FAREWELL CONCERT HERE

Boston Musicians' Popularity at Home Precludes Future Tours.

Program.

Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Op. 70……Dvorak
I. Allegro maestoso.
II. Poco adagio.
III. Scherzo: Vivace; Poco meno mosso.
IV. Finale; Allegro.

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra in G major (Koechel No. 453)…Mozart
I. Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto.
Overture to "Euryanthe"……Weber

Soloist.
ERNO DOHNANYI.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra began coming to Washington, nearly forty years ago, it had few rivals and was almost unique in America, but in these two decades of its existence Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, Cincinnati and other cities—Detroit is the latest—have developed symphony orchestras of their own and are sending them afield; foreign orchestras, as La Scala of Italy, have begun to come to our shores, and the Boston Symphony does not have the field to itself. Also it is more and more in demand nearer Boston for concerts, and so the management has decided to give up the long concert tours. So yesterday's concert was the last in which Washington will hear the orchestra, for some at least.

This was the orchestra's 133d appearance in this city, and in that time it has played here under eight different conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Muck, Fiedler, Rabaud, and the present conductor, Pierre Monteux. Gericke was conductor from 1889-1893 and from 1898-1906, while Karl Muck served two periods also, from 1906-1908 and from 1912-1918.

A large and friendly audience greeted the musicians at this farewell concert and enjoyed a characteristic program. The Dvorak symphony in D minor was well done, and while the first movement is somewhat monotonous—that is, it lacks a certain spontaneity — it works up through a more interesting adagio to a delightful scherzo, in waltz time, and to a martial and dignified finale. The phrasing of the orchestra was fine at all times, and there were beautiful pianissimos.

With the orchestra was Erno Dohnanyi, Hungarian pianist, who played his share of the Mozart concerto most delightfully. He has a beautiful, ringing tone; a clear, distinct touch, and a poetic interpretation—one of the most delightful players heard here this season. He was recalled five times, and responded by modestly including the orchestra in his success.

The last number was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," and was beautifully played. There was one entry pianissimo that was remarkable. Washington is going to miss the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and we hope the Boston Symphony will miss Washington.

F. H.

[108]

GOOD-BYE TO BALTIMORE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Takes Its Departure —Dohnanyi as Soloist—Hofmann's Recital—Lenten Organ Recitals Come to End

Baltimore, Md., March 20, 1921.

It must have been with mingled emotions, gratification merged with sadness, that Mr. Monteux and the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra witnessed the manifestations of regret at their farewell concert of March 16 at the Lyric. For some time after the last note had been played, the audience remained seated vigorously applauding, compelling the leader and men to bow repeated acknowledgement. The soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, in his reading of the Mozart piano concerto in G-major displayed a velvety touch so smooth and clear as to have been acceptable to the old master composer himself. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and the ball music from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" symphony completed the program. Although the orchestra will not again undertake a series of concerts in Baltimore, it is hoped that it has not departed forever.

EVENING STAR
ss Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon at the National Theater with a delightful program, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and with Erno Dohnanyi, pianist, as soloist.

M. Monteux has greatly improved the playing of the orchestra, and yesterday the interpretation of the symphony, Dvorak's in D minor, opus 70, No. 2, was beautiful, particularly in the second and third movements. The tone of the violins is rounder and warmer than in several seasons, and they played with splendid ensemble, delicate shading and well built crescendos. In the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" M. Monteux and his players made the pianissimo passages scarcely more than whispered tones.

Mr. Dohnanyi played the Mozart "Concerto in G Major" with the brilliant tone and sparkling technic best suited to the music of this old master. To hear a Mozart concerto was delightful, and both the soloist and the orchestra entered into the spirit of the music, playing it with grace and musicianly interpretation. The difficult cadenza in the first movement Mr. Dohnanyi dashed off with perfect ease—clean and crisp staccato and even scales and trills.

The absence from yesterday's program of the usual announcement for the orchestra's plans for next season was significant, and probably indicated that the concert yesterday was the last the Boston Symphony will in Washington for some time.

From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

NO ONE will regret the decision of the Boston Symphony Orchestra not to return next autumn for its usual series of concerts more than those who are close to and are responsible for the development of the Philadelphia Orchestra. As the decisions of musical organizations are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, it is to be hoped that the Boston Orchestra may yet appear here in concerts, contributing its share to the musical culture of the city which it did so much to promote in the thirty-six years of its local appearances. For too much cannot be said as to the value of the "Boston Symphony concerts." Beginning four years after Henry L. Higginson had organized the orchestra in Boston, the visits of this great organization were the great stabilizing and inspiring things in Philadelphia's musical life. And the very early tonal perfection of the interpretations of master works at the hands of the orchestra and the varying conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Muck and Fiedler, were achievements not even possible in Europe during the same period.

Whether all this musical richness was placed at the command of Boston and Philadelphia and other cities through the munificence of one man and not through the collective efforts of the many was a mistake has nothing to do with the fine results obtained through the generosity of the founder. While this is not the time to discuss the false glamour that has given European achievements along these lines such an easy reputation, it is admitted that up to the war the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great virtuoso institution, without an equal here or in Europe. It is to the credit of the appreciative audiences here and in Boston and elsewhere that they knew what they were hearing. Forty years is a long while, despite the motto that "Art is long and time is fleeting"; and thirty-six years represent a signal artistic lustral period that has meant everything for Philadelphia. It was natural and logical, however, that the musical appreciators here should insist on more than five symphony concerts in a season and should arrange to have a season of their own. But there is room for all. The Philadelphia Orchestra has its supreme place; but the visiting orchestras from Boston, Chicago and New York are welcome also. There is no royal road to appreciation in music save the repeated hearing of the great works of art, past and present. Orchestras and conductors have varying individualities; and it is through these different viewpoints as to the reading of the most famous compositions, as well as a predilection for special schools of music, that the stimulating kind of musical comparison is made possible and the art life of the city greatly advanced.

The history of the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia is a long and brilliant one, with conductors and soloists forming a bede-roll of achievement unequaled anywhere. This splendid record stands, and that it seemingly has come to an end cannot be viewed except with keen regret.

NEW YORK RECORD
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 16 1921 K

It is with great regret the admirers of the Boston Orchestra witness the definite withdrawal of that organization from the musical life of the city. After 36 years of splendid service it seems deplorable that the patronage of the orchestra should have fallen to the point where it was necessary to discontinue the series. Officially, the explanation was made that increasing demand for the concerts of the orchestra, in the vicinity of Boston, made the change imperative. Those who have watched the career of the famous organization since the removal of Dr. Muck and the disruption following the death of Colonel Higginson, who financed the organization during his lifetime, know that the orchestra itself is a superb instrument, but has had, so far, no leader able enough to overcome the feeling that the orchestra was not playing up to the standard it had maintained for many seasons. After a list of illustrious conductors, men of such note as Georg Henschel, William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Max Fiedler, some of whom were recalled to the position after they had been succeeded by other famous leaders, and in this way served with the orchestra for terms of several years, it was impossible to hold the firmly established clientele with men of the type of Rabaud and Monteux. Rabaud came with a welll-founded reputation as composer and conductor, and with the public mind predisposed in his favor, many of his compositions, notably his fine symphony, having awakened a friendly curiosity among concert audiences. Fine as was his musicianship, he failed utterly to impress our audiences. There was an entire absence of magnetism about the man, and with his advent as conductor it was impossible to hold the patronage that had already begun to decline. There is no doubt at all that a man of attractive personality could have brought back the regular attendance, since the visits of the Boston orchestra have always been of the greatest moment in the musical community of Philadelphia. The engagement of Monteux was a great surprise to everyone, since his principal reputation, in this country, was gained as a conductor of opera. In certain types of music he is very successful and enjoyable, but they are not the types that form steady orchestral diet. Attendance at the concerts offered this season has been erratic. With a popular soloist, the house was filled. The orchestra alone, or with someone not quite so popular, remained unpatronized. The loss of this famous organization to Philadelphia will be keenly felt by the many stanch supporters of the orchestra, people who were willing to look forward to the time when a conductor of commanding power would again take the leadership, and, in the meantime, do their best to hold for the cultural advantage of the city, an institution that has been so potent and successful in advancing musical taste in the community.

* * *

One form of musical enterprise that seems to survive all discouragement is that found in the producers of opera. Despite the many warning experiences of those who have labored to make opera at the Metropolitan a paying adventure, and the series of lamentable failures recorded at that theatre, another company will this week make a bid for public indorsement. Benjamin Primavera, manager of the Verdi Grand Opera Company, may make a success where many fine managers have met defeat, and in the interest of opera in Philadelphia it is hoped he will. The location of the Metropolitan Opera House has always been the stumbling block to entertainment in that edifice, and unless Mr. Primavera can overcome that difficulty he will be more or less apt to meet the lack of public response that has so far been a discouraging factor in the operatic situation in this city. Without audiences it is manifestly impossible to maintain an opera company. The great question is can the Verdi Opera Company attract, to the Metropolitan, sufficient people to enable them to produce opera successfully? One factor in the situation that may, if the Verdi company is as fine an organization as it has been represented to be, help toward establishing a following, is the inability of hundreds to obtain seats at the performances of the Metropolitan in the Academy of Music. The infrequent productions of the New York company, together with the smaller seating capacity of the Academy, has resulted in many of the former regular attendants at the opera being unable to gain admittance. In considering the possibility of engaging the interest of this large class it must be remembered that people accustomed to the best performances of opera will not be satisfied with inferior singers. Only the type of entertainment which they have patronized will appeal to them. During the Hammerstein regime, and later the Chicago company, and with the regular yearly visits of the Metropolitan company, Philadelphians have been treated to the most lavish productions of operatic art. Anything less attractive will not be liable to find a permanent following in this city. Good opera, at prices within the reach of the public, conducted in a part of the city accessible to those interested, would doubtless find a new and growing clientele. It should, however, be started in a smaller and less expensive house than the Metropolitan, and moved to a larger auditorium when attendance warranted that development. The mere feeling of a big empty house has a disastrous effect on both public and singers. If the Verdi company is properly supported we may expect a rapid growth of patronage for that comany and also for the Philadelphia Operatic Company, which has already engaged the favorable interest of a considerable following, and bids fair to become a permanent institution.

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 17 1921 K

LYRIC

The Boston Orchestra And Erno Dohnanyi.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played last evening at the Lyric, the occasion being one of special sentiment and interest, as the famous organization, after appearing here for more than 30 years, is now discontinuing its Baltimore concerts. Yesterday's concert was its last except for such isolated and occasional visits as the orchestra may pay us in the future. There are, at all events, to be no more "seasons" of Boston concerts.

The program last evening was frankly retrospective and Victorian, a harking back to the melodic outpourings of other days. But if we must have, in this twentieth century, such unimportant works played as the saccherine "Scotch" symphony of Mendelssohn, it is as well to have it given a rendition marked by the sheer virtuosity of the one last evening. Except for a certain suggestion of the "national" in the second movement, the piece is not at any time particularly "Scotch"; but it is delicate and tuneful, and, in its lighter moods, full of that fairylike quality that seems to be a frank characteristic of this composer's work. Moreover, it makes great demands upon the skill of the wood choir as well as the strings, demands met by the men last evening with a high assurance and brilliance.

Mr. Monteux gave also the rather infrequently played overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," and then the nowadays rather absurd "Fete of the Capulets" incident from the "Romeo et Juliet" symphony of Berlioz. Even this, though, is interesting as being an early, noisy piece of program music, a work in a particular idiom that was only afterward to be brought to any state of perfection. One realizes how much of a pioneer in the art of instrumentation Berlioz actually was when hearing an excerpt from his "Romeo et Juliet' symphony.

The assisting artist was Erno Dohnanyi, who has not visited this country for many seasons, and who last evening was heard in the jewel-like and very exquisite G major piano Concerto of Mozart. Dohnanyi is an unusually poetic player, an artist of deep introspective moods and fine poetic instincts, and the rare limpidity of his touch, its caressing beauty and the very marked tenderness of his performance were things that combined to make his reading of the effervescent and melodic classic a perfect delight. Such inherently poetic playing as Mr. Dohnanyi's would be heard to better advantage on a richer-voiced instrument than the one at his disposal yesterday, and in that grateful crepuscule which Baltimore audiences, for some unexplained reason, are no longer permitted to enjoy when the "soloist" is on the platform. But in spite of these handicaps, the pianist made a very deep and satisfying impression. He is a fluent and sympathetic artist, one of the most delightful who has appeared here this season, a perfect exponent of the pure music of Mozart.

J. O. L.

VARIE

om.........

dress New York City

MAR 1 8

te.........

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management announces that after this season the annual visits to Washington, Philadelphia and Baltimore will be eliminated. The orchestra has been playing engagements in these cities for 25 years.

From
EVENING MAIL
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A RICHLY woven tapestry was the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, with the deep hues of Brahms' Second Symphony, Ravel's vagrant Valses Nobles et Sentimentales and the vivid orchestration of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

That full-threated tone which Mr. Monteux produces from his band made the Brahms glow with more than its usual cheerful tints, and for the time the symphony actually seemed the most significant of the four masterpieces of its composer.

More and more one realizes that the Boston orchestra is again close to its old level of serene supremacy.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 18 1921 X
Evening Globe
New York

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Boston and New York Symphony Concerts in Carnegie Hall.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall for the present season, occurring yesterday, offered a programme shared by German and French composers. Brahms's D major symphony and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture represented the former; Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—"Romeo alone; Grand Fête at the Capulet's"—represented the latter.

Mr. Monteux seems to have a particular fondness for the symphonies of Brahms, to judge from the frequency with which he puts them on his programmes. One of his chief triumphs here was with the C minor symphony. So much cannot be said for his reading of the D major symphony yesterday. The first three movements were tame and listless, deficient in clarity and perspective in the treatment of the various voices. Only in the finale did the band develop anything like sustained vigor. But this symphony has been overdriven for years. Perhaps it is taking its revenge on pitiless conductors and their bands by going to sleep on them.

"The "Euryanthe" overture? . . . What would conductors do without the three overtures of Weber! And how well audiences could do without them! True, the "Euryanthe" has not of late been played so mercilessly often here as the "Oberon." Nevertheless, along with the "Oberon" and their brother "Freischütz," it has richly earned a good ten years' rest. And the man who writes these words was not, as one Bostonian avowed he was, born hating Weber. Rather the contrary.

Mr. Monteux was the first to conduct Ravel's waltzes, orchestrated as a concert piece, at the Concert Pierre Monteux at the Casino de Paris on Feb. 15, 1914. Opinions differ as to whether these noble and sentimental waltzes are really more effective in the original piano version, or with the stinging modernity of Ravel's orchestration added to the mustard and red pepper of his harmonies. At any rate the orchestral version is fascinating to hear, and the orchestra woke up and did it justice.

The orchestra was also heard to great advantage in the Berlioz excerpt, which Mr. Monteux conducted with sympathy and authority. The audience was probably the smallest that has heard a Boston Symphony concert here since the eariest visits of the orchestra to New York. But it was attentive and cordial.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Society gave in the course of its historical cycle a Wagner programme, with Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist in Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and Brünhilde's immolation scene from "Götterdämmerung."

SUN

ss New York City
MAR 18 1921 D

The Boston Symphony gave its final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme was nicely divided between French and German composers, with the Brahms second symphony as its chief piece and Mr. Monteux conducting the whole.

We have, naturally enough, heard the second Brahms symphony several times during this closing orchestral season. Its lyrical, melodious themes are quite personality proof. Yet the differences were strongly defined last night. Mr. Monteux is in command of a band which under whatever circumstances, has lost none of its magnificence of tone. The brasses breathe a positive glory. The wood winds are a balm of blessedness. But Mr. Monteux lays his emphasis on the breadth, the solidity and mass of the organization. He has to sacrifice gentleness—and does. The exquisiteness of the third movement, despite its joy of tone and good precision, was turned into a parade, which marched steadily toward delicacy, and never quite found it. The first movement, too, struggled for a clarity which it did not always achieve. Yet it was rich, big Brahms in general, more philosophic than poetic, and mixed of such excellent instruments that the brew could not help but warm the heart.

After the intermission the programme held Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Ravel's interesting "Valses Noble et Sentimentales" and the "Fete" excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

EVENING WORLD
New York City
MAR.18

The Boston men are also on their last visit of the season and will say goodby to-morrow afternoon. They gave, under Pierre Monteux's direction, last evening, such a finished interpretation of the Brahms second symphony that the audience got quite stirred up and made the band stand up. With this encouragement, Mr. Monteux attacked the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, an excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales." The Ravel left the audience cold. Perhaps they are too finely chiseled and seemed artificial.

---

om MAR 18 1921 K
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

BOSTON AND N. Y. ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS

Monteux Presents a Miscellaneous Programme and Damrosch Plays Wagner.

The exceedingly multifarious season of orchestral concerts is now rapidly drawing to its close after having pretty thoroughly travelled the so-called "standard" repertoire, duplicating again and again a not inconsiderable portion of this via classica, and, as perhaps was to be expected, leaving the highways and the byways largely unexplored and the new vistas into the modernist country scarcely more than glanced at. But such is the manner of orchestral conductors, and the busier they become, the more they appear to enjoy the game of bolting one another programmatically, like the ostrich, the adder, or chasing their own programmatic tails. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has been rather less to be thus categoried than most of his fellows, but what he chose to offer to his audience yesterday at Carnegie Hall—the last of these Thursday evenings this season—was chiefly an ancient miscellany.

One has gathered the impression this season that Mr. Monteux fancies himself somewhat as an interpreter of Brahms. Not a little Brahminism has figured on his programmes and last evening there was still more—the D-major symphony. But one scarcely fancies Mr. Monteux in this role with the same enthusiasm that he himself appears to.

The Second Symphony, if it be anything, is a cyclic study in serenity—the mellow serenity of well-being, of peace, posited immediately in the first movement in that calmly beautiful, meditatively rhapsodic theme in the [illegible] and further borne upon its bosom [illegible] swaying melody in the violoncellos. The adagio but further deepens the uplifted, somewhat aloof Brahmsian mood, but does not materially alter it. The third movement is an intermezzo; it escapes any jocund quality of a scherzo—is, indeed, something like a tender, ruminative serenade, untroubled, gentle gracious and still serene. Nor is the finale, "con spirito," agitatedly spirited; serenity, now firmly fulfilled still dominates Brahms's thought and feeling.

But Mr. Monteux seemed to become a bit peppery under this large restraint of serenity and would have none of it, or very little of it. He felt the symphony as something of dramatic pulse—music generally appears to bear the aspect of drama in his eyes—and he proceeded to supply it with this sort of superimposed stir and movement, but often limp and halt; dull drama, after all. One holds no brief for any rigid, standardized interpretative rule of thumb for everything in the symphonic gambit; absolute music holds an almost infinite elasticity in the grasp of an elucidator with vision, but it must be an undistorted vision—you may read a thousand varied hues and tints of feeling into Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," but you must conceive it to begin and end an elegy, and not become ballad heroics or pastoral humor. Brahms was not writing drama, not even drama of the emotions, in this D major symphony, and a dramatic conception of it (more especially this sort of dramatic conception) leaves it writhing miserably in its own juice.

By the same token, Mr. Monteux was far more successful with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" and the Ball scene from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." The only partially unusual feature of last evening's programme was a performance of Maurice Ravel's "Valses nobles et sentimentales," orchestrated from his piano pieces of the same title and produced as a ballet in Paris in 1912 under the name of "Adelaide, ou la langage des fleurs." It was played here some years ago by Walter Damrosch and the New York symphony Orchestra and improves re-acquaintance—a clever and most engaging mockery of what we are nowadays pleased to call mid-Victorianism.

The Boston men are also on their last visit of the season and will say goodby to-morrow afternoon. They gave, under Pierre Monteux's direction, last evening, such a finished interpretation of the Brahms second symphony that the audience got quite stirred up and made the band stand up. With this encouragement, Mr. Monteux attacked the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, an excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales." The Ravel left the audience cold. Perhaps they are too finely chiseled and seemed artificial.

WORLD MAR.18

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of the second symphony of Brahms, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette" symphony.

It was an extraordinary programme, put together apparently without the least thought of relationships, of clashing styles or musical symmetry. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, perhaps wished to play Brahms and Ravel and had to add something to make the customary two hours of music. He succeeded in doing just that and nothing else.

Mr. Monteux finds himself entirely in sympathy with the exotic music (exotic to a Frenchman) of Brahms, but it cannot be said that he perfectly assimilates it. He has endeavored to do so, and he conducts it with sincerity, with devotion, but usually from without. He is far happier, of course, in the music of Ravel, which is Gallic, Parisian, urban, palpitating with the vivacity and intelligence of the salon. The waltzes heard last evening have moved numerous Frenchmen to extended comment.

There is room for doubt that they will stir the sluggish imagination of American commentators, who are so frigidly matter of fact that a creative critic like the late James Huneker ruffled the waters of all the great lakes. Of a certainty he could have written much delicate and delicious prose about these airy trifles, which are instinct with grace and captivating in badinage. But they do not seem to be worthy of prolonged lyricism. They are pretty and they are admirably scored.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played better in the latter part of the season than it did in the early days. Possibly it will do still better things next autumn. Meanwhile the note may be made that to-morrow afternoon its final concert will take place.

HERALD. MAR.18

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Boston and New York Symphony Concerts in Carnegie Hall.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall for the present season, occurring yesterday, offered a programme shared by German and French composers. Brahms's D major symphony and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture represented the former; Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—"Romeo alone; Grand Fête at the Capulet's"—represented the latter.

Mr. Monteux seems to have a particular fondness for the symphonies of Brahms, to judge from the frequency with which he puts them on his programmes. One of his chief triumphs here was with the C minor symphony. So much cannot be said for his reading of the D major symphony yesterday. The first three movements were tame and listless, deficient in clarity and perspective in the treatment of the various voices. Only in the finale did the band develop anything like sustained vigor. But this symphony has been overdriven for years. Perhaps it is taking its revenge on pitiless conductors and their bands by going to sleep on them.

"The "Euryanthe" overture? . . . What would conductors do without the three overtures of Weber! And how well audiences could do without them! True, the "Euryanthe" has not of late been played so mercilessly often here as the "Oberon." Nevertheless, along with the "Oberon" and their brother "Freischütz," it has richly earned a good ten years' rest. And the man who writes these words was not, as one Bostonian avowed he was, born hating Weber. Rather the contrary.

Mr. Monteux was the first to conduct Ravel's waltzes, orchestrated as a concert piece, at the Concert Pierre Monteux at the Casino de Paris on Feb. 15, 1914. Opinions differ as to whether these noble and sentimental waltzes are really more effective in the original piano version, or with the stinging modernity of Ravel's orchestration added to the mustard and red pepper of his harmonies. At any rate the orchestral version is fascinating to hear, and the orchestra woke up and did it justice.

The orchestra was also heard to great advantage in the Berlioz excerpt, which Mr. Monteux conducted with sympathy and authority. The audience was probably the smallest that has heard a Boston Symphony concert here since the earliest visits of the orchestra to New York. But it was attentive and cordial.

GLOBE MAR 18

the reading of the most famous compositions, as well as a predilection for special schools of music, that the stimulating kind of musical comparison is made possible and the art life of the city greatly advanced.

The history of the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia is a long and brilliant one, with conductors and soloists forming a bede-roll of achievement unequaled anywhere. This splendid record stands, and that it seemingly has come to an end cannot be viewed except with keen regret.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM

10 1921

IT is with great regret the admirers of the Boston Orchestra witness the definite withdrawal of that organization from the musical life of the city. After 36 years of splendid service it seems deplorable that the patronage of the orchestra should have fallen to the point where it was necessary to discontinue the series. Officially, the explanation was made that increasing demand for the concerts of the orchestra, in the vicinity of Boston, made the change imperative. Those who have watched the career of the famous organization since the removal of Dr. Muck and the disruption following the death of Colonel Higginson, who financed the organization during his lifetime, know that the orchestra itself is a superb instrument, but has had, so far, no leader able enough to overcome the feeling that the orchestra was not playing up to the standard it had maintained for many seasons. After a list of illustrious conductors, men of such note as Georg Henschel, William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Max Fiedler, some of whom were recalled to the position after they had been succeeded by other famous leaders, and in this way served with the orchestra for terms of several years, it was impossible to hold the firmly established clientele with men of the type of Rabaud and Monteux. Rabaud came with a welll-founded reputation as composer and conductor, and with the public mind predisposed in his favor, many of his compositions, notably his fine symphony, having awakened a friendly curiosity among concert audiences. Fine as was his musicianship, he failed utterly to impress our audiences. There was an entire absence of magnetism about the man, and with his advent as conductor it was impossible to hold the patronage that had already begun to decline. There is no doubt at all that a man of attractive personality could have brought back the regular attendance, since the visits of the Boston orchestra have always been of the greatest moment in the musical community of Philadelphia. The engagement of Monteux was a great surprise to everyone, since his principal reputation, in this country, was gained as a conductor of opera. In certain types of music he is very successful and enjoyable, but they are not the types that form steady orchestral diet. Attendance at the concerts offered this season has been erratic. With a popular soloist, the house was filled. The orchestra alone, or with someone not quite so popular, remained unpatronized. The loss of this famous organization to Philadelphia will be keenly felt by the many stanch supporters of the orchestra, people who were willing to look forward to the time when a conductor of commanding power would again take the leadership, and, in the meantime, do their best to hold for the cultural advantage of the city, an institution that has been so potent and successful in advancing musical taste in the community.

* * *

One form of musical enterprise that seems to survive all discouragement is that found in the producers of opera. Despite the many warning experiences of those who have labored to make opera at the Metropolitan a paying adventure, and the series of lamentable failures recorded at that theatre, another company will this week make a bid for public indorsement. Benjamin Primavera, manager of the Verdi Grand Opera Company, may make a success where many fine managers have met defeat, and in the interest of opera in Philadelphia it is hoped he will. The location of the Metropolitan Opera House has always been the stumbling block to entertainment in that edifice, and unless Mr. Primavera can overcome that difficulty he will be more or less apt to meet the lack of public response that has so far been a discouraging factor in the operatic situation in this city. Without audiences it is manifestly impossible to maintain an opera company. The great question is can the Verdi Opera Company attract, to the Metropolitan, sufficient people to enable them to produce opera successfully? One factor in the situation that may, if the Verdi company is as fine an organization as it has been represented to be, help toward establishing a following, is the inability of hundreds to obtain seats at the performances of the Metropolitan in the Academy of Music. The infrequent productions of the New York company, together with the smaller seating capacity of the Academy, has resulted in many of the former regular attendants at the opera being unable to gain admittance. In considering the possibility of engaging the interest of this large class it must be remembered that people accustomed to the best performances of opera will not be satisfied with inferior singers. Only the type of entertainment which they have patronized will appeal to them. During the Hammerstein regime, and later the Chicago company, and with the regular yearly visits of the Metropolitan company, Philadelphians have been treated to the most lavish productions of operatic art. Anything less attractive will not be liable to find a permanent following in this city. Good opera, at prices within the reach of the public, conducted in a part of the city accessible to those interested, would doubtless find a new and growing clientele. It should, however, be started in a smaller and less expensive house than the Metropolitan, and moved to a larger auditorium when attendance warranted that development. The mere feeling of a big empty house has a disastrous effect on both public and singers. If the Verdi company is properly supported we may expect a rapid growth of patronage for that comany and also for the Philadelphia Operatic Company, which has already engaged the favorable interest of a considerable following, and bids fair to become a permanent organization.

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

MAR 17 192

LYRIC

The Boston Orchestra And Erno Dohnanyi.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played last evening at the Lyric, the occasion being one of special sentiment and interest, as the famous organization, after appearing here for more than 30 years, is now discontinuing its Baltimore concerts. Yesterday's concert was its last except for such isolated and occasional visits as the orchestra may pay us in the future. There are, at all events, to be no more "seasons" of Boston concerts.

The program last evening was frankly retrospective and Victorian, a harking back to the melodic outpourings of other days. But if we must have, in this twentieth century, such unimportant works played as the saccherine "Scotch" symphony of Mendelssohn, it is as well to have it given a rendition marked by the sheer virtuosity of the one last evening. Except for a certain suggestion of the "national" in the second movement, the piece is not at any time particularly "Scotch"; but it is delicate and tuneful, and, in its lighter moods, full of that fairylike quality that seems to be a frank characteristic of this composer's work. Moreover, it makes great demands upon the skill of the wood choir as well as the strings, demands met by the men last evening with a high assurance and brilliance.

Mr. Monteux gave also the rather infrequently played overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," and then the nowadays rather absurd "Fete of the Capulets" incident from the "Romeo et Juliet" symphony of Berlioz. Even this, though, is interesting as being an early, noisy piece of program music, a work in a particular idiom that was only afterward to be brought to any state of perfection. One realizes how much of a pioneer in the art of instrumentation Berlioz actually was when hearing an excerpt from his "Romeo et Juliet" symphony.

The assisting artist was Erno Dohnanyi, who has not visited this country for many seasons, and who last evening was heard in the jewel-like and very exquisite G major piano Concerto of Mozart. Dohnanyi is an unusually poetic player, an artist of deep introspective moods and fine poetic instincts, and the rare limpidity of his touch, its caressing beauty and the very marked tenderness of his performance were things that combined to make his reading of the effervescent and melodic classic a perfect delight. Such inherently poetic playing as Mr. Dohnanyi's would be heard to better advantage on a richer-voiced instrument than the one at his disposal yesterday, and in that grateful crepuscule which Baltimore audiences, for some unexplained reason, are no longer permitted to enjoy when the "soloist" is on the platform. But in spite of these handicaps, the pianist made a very deep and satisfying impression. He is a fluent and sympathetic artist, one of the most delightful who has appeared here this season, a perfect exponent of the pure music of Mozart. J. O. L.

VARIE

om.............................

dress New York City

MAR 1 8

te.........

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management announces that after this season the annual visits to Washington, Philadelphia and Baltimore will be eliminated. The orchestra has been playing engagements in these cities for 25 years.

From
EVENING MAIL
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A RICHLY woven tapestry was the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, with the deep hues of Brahms' Second Symphony, Ravel's vagrant Valses Nobles et Sentimentales and the vivid orchestration of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

That full-threated tone which Mr. Monteux produces from his band made the Brahms glow with more than its usual cheerful tints, and for the time the symphony actually seemed the most significant of the four masterpieces of its composer.

More and more one realizes that the Boston orchestra is again close to its old level of serene supremacy.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Globe
New York

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Boston and New York Symphony Concerts in Carnegie Hall.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall for the present season, occurring yesterday, offered a programme shared by German and French composers. Brahms's D major symphony and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture represented the former; Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—"Romeo alone; Grand Fête at the Capulet's"—represented the latter.

Mr. Monteux seems to have a particular fondness for the symphonies of Brahms, to judge from the frequency with which he puts them on his programmes. One of his chief triumphs here was with the C minor symphony. So much cannot be said for his reading of the D major symphony yesterday. The first three movements were tame and listless, deficient in clarity and perspective in the treatment of the various voices. Only in the finale did the band develop anything like sustained vigor. But this symphony has been overdriven for years. Perhaps it is taking its revenge on pitiless conductors and their bands by going to sleep on them.

"The "Euryanthe" overture? . . . What would conductors do without the three overtures of Weber! And how well audiences could do without them! True, the "Euryanthe" has not of late been played so mercilessly often here as the "Oberon." Nevertheless, along with the "Oberon" and their brother "Freischütz," it has richly earned a good ten years' rest. And the man who writes these words was not, as one Bostonian avowed he was, born hating Weber. Rather the contrary.

Mr. Monteux was the first to conduct Ravel's waltzes, orchestrated as a concert piece, at the Concert Pierre Monteux at the Casino de Paris on Feb. 15. 1914. Opinions differ as to whether these noble and sentimental waltzes are really more effective in the original piano version, or with the stinging modernity of Ravel's orchestration added to the mustard and red pepper of his harmonies. At any rate the orchestral version is fascinating to hear, and the orchestra woke up and did it justice.

The orchestra was also heard to great advantage in the Berlioz excerpt, which Mr. Monteux conducted with sympathy and authority. The audience was probably the smallest that has heard a Boston Symphony concert here since the eariest visits of the orchestra to New York. But it was attentive and cordial.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Society gave in the course of its historical cycle a Wagner programme, with Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist in Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and Brünhilde's immolation scene from "Götterdämmerung."

SUN

ss New York City

The Boston Symphony gave its final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme was nicely divided between French and German composers, with the Brahms second symphony as its chief piece and Mr. Monteux conducting the whole.

We have, naturally enough, heard the second Brahms symphony several times during this closing orchestral season. Its lyrical, melodious themes are quite personality proof. Yet the differences were strongly defined last night. Mr. Monteux is in command of a band which under whatever circumstances, has lost none of its magnificence of tone. The brasses breathe a positive glory. The wood winds are a balm of blessedness. But Mr. Monteux lays his emphasis on the breadth, the solidity and mass of the organization. He has to sacrifice gentleness—and does. The exquisiteness of the third movement, despite its joy of tone and good precision, was turned into a parade, which marched steadily toward delicacy, and never quite found it. The first movement, too, struggled for a clarity which it did not always achieve. Yet it was rich, big Brahms in general, more philosophic than poetic, and mixed of such excellent instruments that the brew could not help but warm the heart.

After the intermission the programme held Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Ravel's interesting "Valses Noble et Sentimentales" and the "Fete" excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

EVENING WORLD
New York City

MAR 18

The Boston men are also on their last visit of the season and will say goodby to-morrow afternoon. They gave, under Pierre Monteux's direction, last evening, such a finished interpretation of the Brahms second symphony that the audience got quite stirred up and made the band stand up. With this encouragement, Mr. Monteux attacked the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, an excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales." The Ravel left the audience cold. Perhaps they are too finely chiseled and seemed artificial.

---

om
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

BOSTON AND N. Y. ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS

Monteux Presents a Miscellaneous Programme and Damrosch Plays Wagner.

The exceedingly multifarious season of orchestral concerts is now rapidly drawing to its close after having pretty thoroughly travelled the so-called "standard" repertoire, duplicating again and again a not inconsiderable portion of this via classica, and, as perhaps was to be expected, leaving the highways and the byways largely unexplored and the new vistas into the modernist country scarcely more than glanced at. But such is the manner of orchestral conductors, and the busier they become, the more they appear to enjoy the game of bolting one another programmatically, like the ostrich, the adder, or chasing their own programmatic tails. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has been rather less to be thus categoried than most of his fellows, but what he chose to offer to his audience yesterday at Carnegie Hall—the last of these Thursday evenings this season—was chiefly an ancient miscellany.

One has gathered the impression this season that Mr. Monteux fancies himself somewhat as an interpreter of Brahms. Not a little Brahminism has figured on his programmes and last evening there was still more—the D-major symphony. But one scarcely fancies Mr. Monteux in this role with the same enthusiasm that he himself appears to.

The Second Symphony, if it be anything, is a cyclic study in serenity—the mellow serenity of well-being, of peace, posited immediately in the first movement in that calmly beautiful, meditatively rhapsodic theme in the [illegible] and further borne upon its bosom [illegible] swaying melody in the violoncellos. The adagio but further deepens the uplifted, somewhat aloof Brahmsian mood, but does not materially alter it. The third movement is an intermezzo; it escapes any jocund quality of a scherzo—is, indeed, something like a tender, ruminative serenade, untroubled, gentle gracious and still serene. Nor is the finale, "con spirito," agitatedly spirited; serenity, now firmly fulfilled still dominates Brahms's thought and feeling.

But Mr. Monteux seemed to become a bit peppery under this large restraint of serenity and would have none of it, or very little of it. He felt the symphony as something of dramatic pulse—music generally appears to bear the aspect of drama in his eyes—and he proceeded to supply it with this sort of superimposed stir and movement, but often limp and halt; dull drama, after all. One holds no brief for any rigid, standardized interpretative rule of thumb for everything in the symphonic gambit; absolute music holds an almost infinite elasticity in the grasp of an elucidator with vision, but it must be an undistorted vision—you may read a thousand varied hues and tints of feeling into Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," but you must conceive it to begin and end an elegy, and not become ballad heroics or pastoral humor. Brahms was not writing drama, not even drama of the emotions, in this D major symphony, and a dramatic conception of it (more especially this sort of dramatic conception) leaves it writhing miserably in its own juice.

By the same token, Mr. Monteux was far more successful with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" and the Ball scene from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." The only partially unusual feature of last evening's programme was a performance of Maurice Ravel's "Valsea nobles et sentimentales," orchestrated from his piano pieces of the same title and produced as a ballet in Paris in 1912 under the name of "Adelaide, ou la langage des fleurs." It was played here some years ago by Walter Damrosch and the New York symphony Orchestra and improves re-acquaintance—a clever and most engaging mockery of what we are nowadays pleased to call mid-Victorianism.

The Boston men are also on their last visit of the season and will say goodby to-morrow afternoon. They gave, under Pierre Monteux's direction, last evening, such a finished interpretation of the Brahms second symphony that the audience got quite stirred up and made the band stand no. With this encouragement, Mr. Monteux attacked the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, an excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales." The Ravel left the audience cold. Perhaps they are too finely chiseled and seemed artificial.

W MAR. 18

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of the second symphony of Brahms, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette" symphony. It was an extraordinary programme, put together apparently without the least thought of relationships, of clashing styles or musical symmetry. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, perhaps wished to play Brahms and Ravel and had to add something to make the customary two hours of music. He succeeded in doing just that and nothing else.

Mr. Monteux finds himself entirely in sympathy with the exotic music (exotic to a Frenchman) of Brahms, but it cannot be said that he perfectly assimilates it. He has endeavored to do so, and he conducts it with sincerity, with devotion, but usually from without. He is far happier, of course, in the music of Ravel, which is Gallic, Parisian, urban, palpitating with the vivacity and intelligence of the salon. The waltzes heard last evening have moved numerous Frenchmen to extended comment.

There is room for doubt that they will stir the sluggish imagination of American commentators, who are so frigidly matter of fact that a creative critic like the late James Huneker ruffled the waters of all the great lakes. Of a certainty he could have written much delicate and delicious prose about these airy trifles, which are instinct with grace and captivating in badinage. But they do not seem to be worthy of prolonged lyricism. They are pretty and they are admirably scored.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played better in the latter part of the season than it did in the early days. Possibly it will do still better things next autumn. Meanwhile the note may be made that to-morrow afternoon its final concert will take place.

D. MAR. 18.

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Boston and New York Symphony Concerts in Carnegie Hall.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall for the present season, occurring yesterday, offered a programme shared by German and French composers. Brahms's D major symphony and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture represented the former; Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—"Romeo alone; Grand Fête at the Capulet's"—represented the latter.

Mr. Monteux seems to have a particular fondness for the symphonies of Brahms, to judge from the frequency with which he puts them on his programmes. One of his chief triumphs here was with the C minor symphony. So much cannot be said for his reading of the D major symphony yesterday. The first three movements were tame and listless, deficient in clarity and perspective in the treatment of the various voices. Only in the finale did the band develop anything like sustained vigor. But this symphony has been overdriven for years. Perhaps it is taking its revenge on pitiless conductors and their bands by going to sleep on them.

"The "Euryanthe" overture? . . . What would conductors do without the three overtures of Weber! And how well audiences could do without them! True, the "Euryanthe" has not of late been played so mercilessly often here as the "Oberon." Nevertheless, along with the "Oberon" and their brother "Freischütz," it has richly earned a good ten years' rest. And the man who writes these words was not, as one Bostonian avowed he was, born hating Weber. Rather the contrary.

Mr. Monteux was the first to conduct Ravel's waltzes, orchestrated as a concert piece, at the Concert Pierre Monteux at the Casino de Paris on Feb. 15. 1914. Opinions differ as to whether these noble and sentimental waltzes are really more effective in the original piano version, or with the stinging modernity of Ravel's orchestration added to the mustard and red pepper of his harmonies. At any rate the orchestral version is fascinating to hear, and the orchestra woke up and did it justice.

The orchestra was also heard to great advantage in the Berlioz excerpt, which Mr. Monteux conducted with sympathy and authority. The audience was probably the smallest that has heard a Boston Symphony concert here since the eariest visits of the orchestra to New York. But it was attentive and cordial.

GLOBE MAR 18

afternoon. They Monteux's direc-
such a finished the Brahms second he audience got quite made the band stand encouragement. Mr.
the Weber "Euryan excerpt from and Juliet" and Nobles et Senti-Ravel left the au-
perhaps they are too
and seemed artificial.

MAR. 18.

Symphony Concert. of the Boston Symphony Or-evening concerts took place in Hall last night. The pro-consisted of the second sym-Brahms, Weber's "Euryanthe"
Ravel's "Valses Nobles et es" and one movement from Romeo et Juliette" symphony.
extraordinary programme, put apparently without the least relationships, of clashing musical symmetry. Pierre conductor of the Boston Symchestra, perhaps wished to play and Ravel and had to add to make the customary two music. He succeeded in doing
and nothing else.
nteux finds himself entirely in
with the exotic music (exotic chman) of Brahms, but it can-
d that he perfectly assimilates
s endeavored to do so, and he
t with sincerity, with devotion,
ly from without. He is far course, in the music of Ravel, Gallic, Parisian, urban, palpi-
the vivacity and intelligence on. The waltzes heard last ave moved numerous French-
tended comment.
room for doubt that they will uggish imagination of Ameri-
entators, who are so frigidly
fact that a creative critic like James Huneker ruffled the
all the great lakes. Of a cercould have written much deli-delicious prose about these es, which are instinct with captivating in badinage. But ot seem to be worthy of proicism. They are pretty and dmirably scored.
ston Symphony Orchestra has tter in the latter part of the n it did in the early days.
will do still better things
mn. Meanwhile the note may hat to-morrow afternoon its rt will take place.

RALD. MAR. 18.

MUSIC

PITTS SANBORN.

New York Symphony
erts in Carnegie
Hall.

ening concert of the Bos-
y Orchestra in Carnegie present season, occurring
offered a programme
rman and French com-
ms's D major symphony
"Euryanthe" overture
the former; Ravel's
s et Sentimentales" and
from Berlioz's "Romeo
mphony—"Romeo alone;
the Capulet's"—repre-
ter.

seems to have a par-
ss for the symphonies
judge from the fre-
hich he puts them on
s. One of his chief triws with the C minor

o much cannot be said
g of the D major sym-
day. The first three ere tame and listless, derity and perspective in
of the various voices.
finale did the band de-
g like sustained vigor.
phony has been over-
rs. Perhaps it is taking pitiless conductors and going to sleep on them.
anthe" overture? ...
onductors do without the es of Weber! And how ces could do without he "Euryanthe" has not played so mercilessly
s the "Oberon." Never-with the "Oberon" and "Freischütz," it has a good ten years' rest.
who writes these words
ne Bostonian avowed he ting Weber. Rather the ux was the first to con-

waltzes, orchestrated as ce, at the Concert Pierre
the Casino de Paris on Opinions differ as to se noble and sentimental really more effective in piano version, or with modernity of Ravel's

n added to the mustard per of his harmonies. At the orchestral version is
to hear, and the orchestra
d did it justice.
was also heard to ntage in the Berlioz ex-
Mr. Monteux conducted thy and authority. The probably the smallest a Boston Symphony
the earliest visits
New York. But
ordial.

The Boston Symphony gave its final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme was nicely divided between French and German composers, with the Brahms second symphony as its chief piece and Mr. Monteux conducting the whole.

We have, naturally enough, heard the second Brahms symphony several times during this closing orchestral season. Its lyrical, melodious themes are quite personality proof. Yet the differences were strongly defined last night. Mr. Monteux is in command of a band which under whatever circumstances, has lost none of its magnificence of tone. The brasses breathe a positive glory. The wood winds are a balm of blessedness. But Mr. Monteux lays his emphasis on the breadth, the solidity and mass of the organization. He has to sacrifice gentleness—and does. The exquisiteness of the third movement, despite its joy of tone and good precision, was turned into a parade, which marched steadily toward delicacy, and never quite found it. The first movement, too, struggled for a clarity which it did not always achieve. Yet it was rich, big Brahms in general, more philosophic than poetic, and mixed of such excellent instruments that the brew could not help but warm the heart.

After the intermission the programme held Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Ravel's interesting "Valses Noble et Sentimentales" and the "Fete" excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Boston Symphony Ends Series at Carnegie Hal

LAST night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall terminated the evening series of that orchestra. Pierre Monteaux arranged a programme of familiar compositions.

The opening selection was Brahms' Second Symphony, a work that has found favor with every orchestra conductor this season.

Its performance last night was not epoch-making, so far as eloquence is concerned. Mr. Monteaux's reading was restrained and rigid. The opening movement sounded uninspired and lacking in colorful contrast. Much of the romantic spirit and musical content of the beautiful Adapio was conspicuously absent. Neither by subtle suggestion nor obvious presentation did one gather the warp and woof of melodic material contained in the third movement. The finale, too, was lacking in the tonal warmth that is Brahmesque, and in the nobility that pronounces the work almost Beethovian.

Following the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," the orchestra gave a sympathetic and creditable interpretation of Ravel's Valses, "Nobles et Sentimentales."

The programme ended with an excerpt from Berlioz "Romea et Juliet" symphony, bearing the title, "Romeo alone, Grand Fete at the Capulets."

AMERIC MAR. 18.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FAREWELL CONCERT

Pierre Moneteux Leads Orchestra in Last Brillant Program of Season Here.

The first program of the last pair of concerts to be given in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was presented in Carnegie Hall last evening under the able direction of Pierre Monteux.

The effect of too many symphony programs crowded into a few months is showing itself in smaller audiences as the season nears its close, yet appreciation of the worth of the visiting band of musicians was shown by the patrons of last evening's concert, who applauded the Brahms Second Symphony in D major, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Raovels's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and the ball scene from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

For the final concert Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux will present Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounoff's violin concerto with Richard Burgin, the new concert master of the orchestra, as soloist.

TELEGRAM

BOSTON SYMPHONY STIRS BIG AUDIENCE IN CARNEGIE.

First of Two Farewell Concerts Wins Deep Appreciation—Noteworthy Performance.

Conductor Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met a great reception last night at Carngie Hall at the first of their two farewell concerts for the season. The second will take place to-morrow afternoon. It was an occasion, moreover, in that while the Boston Symphony has officially notified Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington subscribers that the usual tours to those cities will be dropped hereafter, it has been announced that the New York engagements will be continued.

It was welcome news that the French conductor who stepped from grand opera to direct the Symphony will lead his finely drilled forces in our annual war of orchestral harmonies. In his programme last night Mr. Monteux exhibited the same suavity which has [illegible] every performance.

In [illegible] symphony No. 2 in D major, [illegible] clarity and delicacy reached its height in the allegretto grazioso of the third movement and the splendid spirit of allegro, always within the limits of that same limpidity, brought many recalls from the large audience.

The overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe," was delightfully done, but it is doubtful if the suite of Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, despite the glow and rhythemse and romance between the lines, found any real response. They were of too fragile a substance for the mettle of his hearers. The selections from the Berlioz Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," "Romeo Alone" and "The Grand Fete at the Capulets," were the colorful finale.

WORLD. MAR. 18.

Boston Symphony to Give Last Concert To-morrow

Damrosch Presents the First of Closing Two Historical Recitals at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its two final concerts for this season at Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Monteux led a Gallicized version of Brahms's Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73. In Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales he was on familiar ground and therefore not only effective but at his best. The same was true of his conducting of "Romeo Alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets," from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Op. 17. The other number on the program was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." The season's last concert by this orchestra will be given to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. Damrosch gave the first of the closing pair of historical concerts in the afternoon at the same hall. The program was devoted to selections from Wagner's operas. Miss Florence Easton, the soloist, sang Senta's Ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and Brunhilde's Immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." The same program will be repeated this evening.

TRIBUNE. MAR 18

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on its last visit to New York for this season, gave its evening concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Its playing epitomized the success that Mr. Monteux has had in his work so far to bring the orchestra back toward the superlative excellence it had before disruptive forces struck it. That he has wrought much improvement in its playing is evident, even though he has not yet remolded it completely.

The program began with Brahms's second symphony, which Mr. Monteux read with sympathetic appreciation, even though he did not develop certain points and make certain discriminations that have come to be almost traditional and almost expected in a reading of this symphony. But it gave much pleasure, that was made manifest.

The other numbers were Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," brilliant in the opening phrases, uncommonly effective in the mysterious passage suggesting the tomb, but a bit coarse in the violent fortissimo outbursts; Maurice Ravel's instrumentation of his own "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" for piano, and the scene representing "Romeo Alone" in the grand fête at the Capulets, from his dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette."

Ravel's waltzes were played here some years ago. The orchestration conciliates to the ear some of the sourest of the dissonances that are a little uncompromising on the piano, and the orchestral color shows many ingenious and even fascinating touches. But there is something in the incisiveness of the piano that seems needed in these pieces, originally conceived for it, and that the manifold pencilings of the orchestra do not quite compensate for.

The movement from Berlioz's symphony was welcome on the program, for it is one of the composer's most successful orchestral movements—most successful in its seizure of the spirit of the scene, in the musical substance in which this is embodied, and the poetic beauty of the music (which did not always present itself to Berlioz in answer to his urgent summons.

TIMES. MAR. 18.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston's Farewell Concert

To the Editor of the Evening Public Ledger:

Sir—It was with a very, very great regret that I attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Monday evening, and knew that it was the last concert this organization was going to give here, at least for some time. It is a most unfortunate circumstance for any city when they lose such a great organization, which has been the feature of a certain part of its life every season, for no doubt the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the most artistic organization that delighted the city each year, even if they gave but five concerts here; yet they made our season distinctive, and their coming is going to be sadly missed.

Philadelphians who are interested in art in this city should make an inquiry into conditions and find why one after the other the big musical organizations are forsaking Philadelphia. We used to have visits from the Philharmonic Orchestra, of New York, and from the Chicago Opera Co., but for some reason some force, whether radical or indifferent, has driven away these organizations, as well as others, until our musical season has dwindled into almost what might be expected in a third rate city.

This is most unfortunate. Would it not be a good thing for our Chamber of Commerce, which is always trying to do something to help Philadelphia, to appoint a committee of promotion that would arrange to bring all the best musical organizations, whether instrumental or vocal, to this city as well as all the great artists, lecturers, etc.? We need a boom here badly, or eventually we will have to depend entirely upon local organizations for our musical entertainment.

Mrs. WILLIAM T. HINES.

Philadelphia, March 15, 1921.

NEWS MAR 18 1921 M
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Artists Say Goodbye

Orchestra Plays Last Concert, But Its Memory Will Long Remain

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played its last concert in Baltimore and gone, and its place shall know it no more. So runs the current of events. The organization has toiled long, faithfully and well, and henceforth its labors here will become a thing of the past. Its personal touch and personal influence will be absent, but its memory will long remain firmly implanted in the minds of a host of Baltimore's music-lovers, by whom the loss is not as yet fully appreciated.

The cause assigned for discontinuing its annual visits here is that a call from its own home town is imperative and cannot be disregarded. In order to satisfy the conscience that it was not neglect or want of proper support which brought about this decision, Baltimore is going to accept this final dictum as correct. And, at all events, it has the appearance of being perfectly logical and natural. Nevertheless it is a matter of deep regret, and for two reasons—one sentimental and the other musical.

The sentimental reason is very strong, because the Boston Orchestra was the very first of the great organizations to visit Baltimore, and has continued its visits for so many years that it has become one of the foremost musical functions of the season, attracting the musical and social elect of the city. The musical reason is one of deeper import. The annual visits have not only shown Baltimore what an orchestra can do in the way of musical propaganda but it has made the public acquainted with musical compositions and composers which but for an orchestra would have remained unknown. Moreover, it has inspired a greater love for the art and a more intense thirst for knowledge and learning. And a still greater achievement, which must not be overlooked or forgotten, lies in its having fomented in the breasts of local music-lovers a desire to possess an orchestra of their own—a desire which has now become an accomplished fact.

And what can be said about the program presented at this final appearance—a program that almost might be regarded as the orchestra's requiem, as far as Baltimore is concerned. And what about the soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, the pianist. The program was not of a brilliant or happy character for a farewell concert. It was almost suggestive of regret at parting, judging by its general air of somberness.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the opening number. Mendelssohn was a purist in form, a great exponent of straightforward, unadulterated melody, as distinguished from the vagaries of some of the modern music, and a composer whose works are characterized by delicacy and smoothness and in which nothing harsh is ever found. But it is a striking evidence of the advancement in the art, and of the hold modern peculiarities have taken upon the fancy of present-day audiences, that the "Scotch" Symphony produced a slightly soporific effect. In a word, it seemed a trifle trivial, possibly because, although the melodic creations were beautiful, the sudden and harsh harmonic surprises to which the modern ear is becoming accustomed were lacking. The performance, however, was smooth and well expressed the composer's meaning. The most effective and attractive work on the program, and which was presented with much vigor and spirit, was Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. The movement from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet" contained some interesting passages and was well given.

Dohnanyi proved himself an artist endowed with easy, fluent and smooth technical ability and possessed of considerable temperament and power of interpretation. But—it may be heresy to say so—but even the Mozart Concerto, in G major, appeared a trifle simple and unassuming to modern ears. It was therefore not the best choice to enable Mr. Dohnanyi to show to the full his capabilities as an executive artist.

A note of pathos was struck by Mr. Monteux, after the concert, when he intimated that a few persons here would regret the decision of the orchestra authorities not to return.

W. G. O.

[110]

HERALD
ess New York City
8 192
e

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of the second symphony of Brahms, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette" symphony.

It was an extraordinary programme, put together apparently without the least thought of relationships, of clashing styles or musical symmetry. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, perhaps wished to play Brahms and Ravel and had to add something to make the customary two hours of music. He succeeded in doing just that and nothing else.

Mr. Monteux finds himself entirely in sympathy with the exotic music (exotic to a Frenchman) of Brahms, but it cannot be said that he perfectly assimilates it. He has endeavored to do so, and he conducts it with sincerity, with devotion, but usually from without. He is far happier, of course, in the music of Ravel, which is Gallic, Parisian, urban, palpitating with the vivacity and intelligence of the salon. The waltzes heard last evening have moved numerous Frenchmen to extended comment.

There is room for doubt that they will stir the sluggish imagination of American commentators, who are so frigidly matter of fact that a creative critic like the late James Huneker ruffled the waters of all the great lakes. Of a certainty he could have written much delicate and delicious prose about these airy trifles, which are instinct with grace and captivating in badinage. But they do not seem to be worthy of prolonged lyricism. They are pretty and they are admirably scored.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played better in the latter part of the season than it did in the early days. Possibly it will do still better things next autumn. Meanwhile the note may be made that to-morrow afternoon its final concert will take place.

AMERICAN MAR 18 1921 M
New York City

Boston Symphony Ends Series at Carnegie Hall

LAST night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall terminated the evening series of that orchestra. Pierre Monteaux arranged a programme of familiar compositions.

The opening selection was Brahms' Second Symphony, a work that has found favor with every orchestra conductor this season.

Its performance last night was not epoch-making, so far as eloquence is concerned. Mr. Monteaux's reading was restrained and rigid. The opening movement sounded uninspired and lacking in colorful contrast. Much of the romantic spirit and musical content of the beautiful Adapio was conspicuously absent. Neither by subtle suggestion nor obvious presentation did one gather the warp and woof of melodic material contained in the third movement. The finale, too, was lacking in the tonal warmth that is Brahmesque, and in the nobility that pronounces the work almost Beethovian.

Following the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," the orchestra gave a sympathetic and creditable interpretation of Ravel's Valses, "Nobles et Sentimentales."

The programme ended with an excerpt from Berlioz "Romea et Juliet" symphony, bearing the title, "Romeo alone, Grand Fete at the Capulets."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From 8 1921 K
TIMES
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on its last visit to New York for this season, gave its evening concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Its playing epitomized the success that Mr. Monteux has had in his work so far to bring the orchestra back toward the superlative excellence it had before disruptive forces struck it. That he has wrought much improvement in its playing is evident, even though he has not yet remolded it completely.

The program began with Brahms's second symphony, which Mr. Monteux read with sympathetic appreciation, even though he did not develop certain points and make certain discriminations that have come to be almost traditional and almost expected in a reading of this symphony. But it gave much pleasure, that was made manifest.

---

opening phrases, uncommonly effective in the mysterious passage suggesting the tomb, but a bit coarse in the violent fortissimo outbursts; Maurice Ravel's instrumentation of his own "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" for piano, and the scene representing "Romeo Alone" in the grand fête at the Capulets, from his dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette."

Ravel's waltzes were played here some years ago. The orchestration conciliates to the ear some of the sourest of the dissonances that are a little uncompromising on the piano, and the orchestral color shows many ingenious and even fascinating touches. But there is something in the incisiveness of the piano that seems needed in these pieces, originally conceived for it, and that the manifold pencilings of the orchestra do not quite compensate for.

The movement from Berlioz's symphony was welcome on the program, for it is one of the composer's most successful orchestral movements—most successful in its seizure of the spirit of the scene, in the musical substance in which this is embodied, and the poetic beauty of the music (which did not always present itself to Berlioz in answer to his urgent summons.

---

m EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y. e
MAR 1 9 1921 D

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Good Program With Dohnanyi as Solo Pianist.

The program which Pierre Montuex provided for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony season at the Academy last night was so good as to give fresh reason for rejoicing that the great orchestra has not seen fit to cut Brooklyn out of its tours next year, as it has done with Baltimore and Washington. That band once again achieves the beautiful tone and the delicacy and accuracy of finish upon which its reputation was founded and it and its conductor will be welcomed here as often as they can find a place for us in their list of fortunate towns.

The memory of old concertgoers does not reach back to a performance of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony in Brooklyn, and last night it was welcome by way of contrast to some of the more modern music with which we have been regaled. It is too late in the day to call Mendelssohn's music great, but a symphony rich in melody, written with elegance and distinction of style, in which not a single discord assails the ears and not a blare of brass drowns out the careful harmonies, is certainly worth more frequent hearing than this music has had of late. The performance was delightful, especially in the Scherzo, where Mendelssohn's delicate nicety was matched by that of the band.

Liszt decorated the music of a great many other men and some of it he improved. That was hardly the case with Gluck, the simplicity and greatness of whose "Orpheus" moved the facile composer to his "symphonic poem" on the same subject. Liszt was not Gluck, but he was a master of orchestration, and his music in this case is smooth and rich, and even suggests the spirit of its inspiration.

The soloist was Ernest Dohnanyi. Any wonder which auditors may have felt that a modern pianist should choose to play a concerto which Mozart wrote long before the resources of the modern piano had been worked out was removed before Dohnanyi had played half a dozen bars. He reduced the concert grand to the di-of tone, color and of dynamics which were simply bewildering. Tone of the crispness of pizzicati was perhaps the most striking part of his technique, but the technique, although it popped the eyes of the violinists behind him, was yet but a means to an end. Dohnanyi made Mozart musical in a way which is unknown to present concertgoers. It sounded "faint and far, like horns of Elfland softly blowing." The exquisite beauty of the tiny tone was something to remember and dream about. The chance of encountering it often is as small as that of hearing two hermit thrushes in the same night.

The concluding number was Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline," good spirited, dramatic music of the modern French school, an excellent selection to play an audience home with.

en are also on their season and will say row afternoon. They erre Monteux's direc-
ning, such a finished of the Brahms second t the audience got quite nd made the band stand s encouragement, Mr. ached the Weber "Eury-ture, an excerpt from omeo and Juliet" and Valses Nobles et Senti-
The Ravel left the au-Perhaps they are too
ed and seemed artificial.

LD MAR. 18.

on Symphony Concert. of the Boston Symphony Or-vening concerts took place in Hall last night. The pro-onsisted of the second sym-
Brahms, Weber's "Euryanthe"
Ravel's "Valses Nobles et les" and one movement from Romeo et Juliette" symphony.
extraordinary programme, put apparently without the least of relationships, of clashing
musical symmetry. Pierre conductor of the Boston Symhestra, perhaps wished to play
and Ravel and had to add
to make the customary two music. He succeeded in doing
and nothing else.
nteux finds himself entirely in
with the exotic music (exotic
chman) of Brahms, but it can-
d that he perfectly assimilates
s endeavored to do so, and he
t with sincerity, with devotion,
ly from without. He is far
f course, in the music of Ravel,
Gallic, Parisian, urban, palpi-
h the vivacity and intelligence
lon. The waltzes heard last ave moved numerous French-
tended comment.
room for doubt that they will luggish imagination of Ameri-
entators, who are so frigidly
fact that a creative critic like James Huneker ruffled the
all the great lakes. Of a cer-
could have written much deli-delicious prose about these es, which are instinct with captivating in badinage. But ot seem to be worthy of proricism. They are pretty and dmirably scored.
ston Symphony Orchestra has ter in the latter part of the n it did in the early days.
t will do still better things
mn. Meanwhile the note may that to-morrow afternoon its rt will take place.

RALD. MAR. 18.

MUSIC

PITTS SANBORN.

New York Symphony
erts in Carnegie
Hall.

ening concert of the Bos-
y Orchestra in Carnegie
present season, occurring
offered a programme
rman and French com-
ms's D major symphony
"Euryanthe" overture
the former; Ravel's
s et Sentimentales" and
from Berlioz's "Romeo
mphony—"Romeo alone;
the Capulet's"—repre-
er.
k seems to have a par-
ss for the symphonies
judge from the fre-
which he puts them on es. One of his chief tri-was with the C minor
o much cannot be said
g of the D major sym-rday. The first three ere tame and listless, derity and perspective in
of the various voices.
finale did the band de-
g like sustained vigor.
mphony has been over-ars. Perhaps it is taking pitiless conductors and y going to sleep on them.
anthe" overture? . . .
conductors do without the es of Weber! And how ces could do without the "Euryanthe" has not played so mercilessly
s the "Oberon." Never-g with the "Oberon" and r "Freischütz," it has a good ten years' rest.
who writes these words
one Bostonian avowed he ating Weber. Rather the ux was the first to con-
waltzes, orchestrated as ece, at the Concert Pierre
the Casino de Paris on
4. Opinions differ as to se noble and sentimental
really more effective in piano version, or with modernity of Ravel's on added to the mustard pper of his harmonies. At the orchestral version is
to hear, and the orchestra
nd did it justice.
hestra was also heard to antage in the Berlioz ex-h Mr. Monteux conducted pathy and authority. The was probably the smallest heard a Boston Symphony
e since the earliest visits hestra to New York. But entive and cordial.

E-MAR 18

The Boston Symphony gave its final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme was nicely divided between French and German composers, with the Brahms second symphony as its chief piece and Mr. Monteux conducting the whole.

We have, naturally enough, heard the second Brahms symphony several times during this closing orchestral season. Its lyrical, melodious themes are quite personality proof. Yet the differences were strongly defined last night. Mr. Monteux is in command of a band which under whatever circumstances, has lost none of its magnificence of tone. The brasses breathe a positive glory. The wood winds are a balm of blessedness. But Mr. Monteux lays his emphasis on the breadth, the solidity and mass of the organization. He has to sacrifice gentleness—and does. The exquisiteness of the third movement, despite its joy of tone and good precision, was turned into a parade, which marched steadily toward delicacy, and never quite found it. The first movement, too, struggled for a clarity which it did not always achieve. Yet it was rich, big Brahms in general, more philosophic than poetic, and mixed of such excellent instruments that the brew could not help but warm the heart.

After the intermission the programme held Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Ravel's interesting "Valses Noble et Sentimentales" and the "Fete" excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Boston Symphony Ends Series at Carnegie Hall

LAST night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall terminated the evening series of that orchestra. Pierre Monteaux arranged a programme of familiar compositions.

The opening selection was Brahms' Second Symphony, a work that has found favor with every orchestra conductor this season.

Its performance last night was not epoch-making, so far as eloquence is concerned. Mr. Monteaux's reading was restrained and rigid. The opening movement sounded uninspired and lacking in colorful contrast. Much of the romantic spirit and musical content of the beautiful Adapio was conspicuously absent. Neither by subtle suggestion nor obvious presentation did one gather the warp and woof of melodic material contained in the third movement. The finale, too, was lacking in the tonal warmth that is Brahmesque, and in the nobility that pronounces the work almost Beethovian.

Following the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," the orchestra gave a sympathetic and creditable interpretation of Ravel's Valses, "Nobles et Sentimentales."

The programme ended with an excerpt from Berlioz "Romea et Juliet" symphony, bearing the title, "Romeo alone, Grand Fete at the Capulets."

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FAREWELL CONCERT

Pierre Moneteux Leads Orchestra in Last Brillant Program of Season Here.

The first program of the last pair of concerts to be given in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was presented in Carnegie Hall last evening under the able direction of Pierre Monteux.

The effect of too many symphony programs crowded into a few months is showing itself in smaller audiences as the season nears its close, yet appreciation of the worth of the visiting band of musicians was shown by the patrons of last evening's concert, who applauded the Brahms Second Symphony in D major, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Raovels's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and the ball scene from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

For the final concert Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux will present Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" and Glazounoff's violin concerto with Richard Burgin, the new concert master of the orchestra, as soloist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY STIRS BIG AUDIENCE IN CARNEGIE.

First of Two Farewell Concerts Wins Deep Appreciation—Noteworthy Performance.

Conductor Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met a great reception last night at Carngie Hall at the first of their two farewell concerts for the season. The second will take place to-morrow afternoon. It was an occasion, moreover, in that while the Boston Symphony has officially notified Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington subscribers that the usual tours to those cities will be dropped hereafter, it has been announced that the New York engagements will be continued.

It was welcome news that the French conductor who stepped from grand opera to direct the Symphony will lead his finely drilled forces in our annual war of orchestral harmonies. In his programme last night Mr. Monteux exhibited the same suavity which has distinguished his every appearance.

In the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, this clarity and delicacy reached its height in the allegretto grazioso of the third movement and the splendid spirit of allegro, always within the limits of that same limpidity, brought many recalls from the large audience.

The overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe," was delightfully done, but it is doubtful if the suite of Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, despite the glow and rhythemse and romance between the lines, found any real response. They were of too fragile a substance for the mettle of his hearers. The selections from the Berlioz Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," "Romeo Alone" and "The Grand Fete at the Capulets," were the colorful finale.

WORLD. MAR. 18.

Boston Symphony to Give Last Concert To-morrow

Damrosch Presents the First of Closing Two Historical Recitals at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its two final concerts for this season at Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Monteux led a Gallicized version of Brahms's Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73. In Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales he was on familiar ground and therefore not only effective but at his best. The same was true of his conducting of "Romeo Alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets," from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Op. 17. The other number on the program was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." The season's last concert by this orchestra will be given to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. Damrosch gave the first of the closing pair of historical concerts in the afternoon at the same hall. The program was devoted to selections from Wagner's operas. Miss Florence Easton, the soloist, sang Senta's Ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and Brunhilde's Immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." The same program will be repeated this evening.

TRIBUNE-MAR 1

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on its last visit to New York for this season, gave its evening concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Its playing epitomized the success that Mr. Monteux has had in his work so far to bring the orchestra back toward the superlative excellence it had before disruptive forces struck it. That he has wrought much improvement in its playing is evident, even though he has not yet remolded it completely.

The program began with Brahms's second symphony, which Mr. Monteux read with sympathetic appreciation, even though he did not develop certain points and make certain discriminations that have come to be almost traditional and almost expected in a reading of this symphony. But it gave much pleasure, that was made manifest.

The other numbers were Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," brilliant in the opening phrases, uncommonly effective in the mysterious passage suggesting the tomb, but a bit coarse in the violent fortissimo outbursts; Maurice Ravel's instrumentation of his own "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" for piano, and the scene representing "Romeo Alone" in the grand fête at the Capulets, from his dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette."

Ravel's waltzes were played here some years ago. The orchestration conciliates to the ear some of the sourest of the dissonances that are a little uncompromising on the piano, and the orchestral color shows many ingenious and even fascinating touches. But there is something in the incisiveness of the piano that seems needed in these pieces, originally conceived for it, and that the manifold pencilings of the orchestra do not quite compensate for.

The movement from Berlioz's symphony was welcome on the program, for it is one of the composer's most successful orchestral movements—most successful in its seizure of the spirit of the scene, in the musical substance in which this is embodied, and the poetic beauty of the music which did not always present itself to Berlioz in answer to his urgent summons.

TIMES. MAR. 18.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston's Farewell Concert

To the Editor of the Evening Public Ledger:

Sir—It was with a very, very great regret that I attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Monday evening, and knew that it was the last concert this organization was going to give here, at least for some time. It is a most unfortunate circumstance for any city when they lose such a great organization, which has been the feature of a certain part of its life every season, for no doubt the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the most artistic organization that delighted the city each year, even if they gave but five concerts here; yet they made our season distinctive, and their coming is going to be sadly missed.

Philadelphians who are interested in art in this city should make an inquiry into conditions and find why one after the other the big musical organizations are forsaking Philadelphia. We used to have visits from the Philharmonic Orchestra, of New York, and from the Chicago Opera Co., but for some reason some force, whether radical or indifferent, has driven away these organizations, as well as others, until our musical season has dwindled into almost what might be expected in a third rate city.

This is most unfortunate. Would it not be a good thing for our Chamber of Commerce, which is always trying to do something to help Philadelphia, to appoint a committee of promotion that would arrange to bring all the best musical organizations, whether instrumental or vocal, to this city as well as all the great artists, lecturers etc.? We need a boom here badly, or eventually we will have to depend entirely upon local organizations for our musical entertainment.

MRS. WILLIAM T. HINES.

Philadelphia, March 15, 1921.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Artists Say Goodbye

Orchestra Plays Last Concert, But Its Memory Will Long Remain

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played its last concert in Baltimore and gone, and its place shall know it no more. So runs the current of events. The organization has toiled long, faithfully and well, and henceforth its labors here will become a thing of the past. Its personal touch and personal influence will be absent, but its memory will long remain firmly implanted in the minds of a host of Baltimore's music-lovers, by whom the loss is not as yet fully appreciated.

The cause assigned for discontinuing its annual visits here is that a call from its own home town is imperative and cannot be disregarded. In order to satisfy the conscience that it was not neglect or want of proper support which brought about this decision, Baltimore is going to accept this final dictum as correct. And, at all events, it has the appearance of being perfectly logical and natural. Nevertheless it is a matter of deep regret, and for two reasons—one sentimental and the other musical.

The sentimental reason is very strong, because the Boston Orchestra was the very first of the great organizations to visit Baltimore, and has continued its visits for so many years that it has become one of the foremost musical functions of the season, attracting the musical and social elect of the city. The musical reason is one of deeper import. The annual visits have not only shown Baltimore what an orchestra can do in the way of musical propaganda but it has made the public acquainted with musical compositions and composers which but for an orchestra would have remained unknown. Moreover, it has inspired a greater love for the art and a more intense thirst for knowledge and learning. And a still greater achievement, which must not be overlooked or forgotten, lies in its having fomented in the breasts of local music-lovers a desire to possess an orchestra of their own—a desire which has now become an accomplished fact.

And what can be said about the program presented at this final appearance—a program that almost might be regarded as the orchestra's requiem, as far as Baltimore is concerned. And what about the soloist, Erno Dohnanyi, the pianist. The program was not of a brilliant or happy character for a farewell concert. It was almost suggestive of regret at parting, judging by its general air of somberness.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the opening number. Mendelssohn was a purist in form, a great exponent of straightforward, unadulterated melody, as distinguished from the vagaries of some of the modern music, and a composer whose works are characterized by delicacy and smoothness and in which nothing harsh is ever found. But it is a striking evidence of the advancement in the art, and of the hold modern peculiarities have taken upon the fancy of present-day audiences, that the "Scotch" Symphony produced a slightly soporific effect. In a word, it seemed a trifle trivial, possibly because, although the melodic creations were beautiful, the sudden and harsh harmonic surprises to which the modern ear is becoming accustomed were lacking. The performance, however, was smooth and well expressed the composer's meaning. The most effective and attractive work on the program, and which was presented with much vigor and spirit, was Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. The movement from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet" contained some interesting passages and was well given.

Dohnanyi proved himself an artist endowed with easy, fluent and smooth technical ability and possessed of considerable temperament and power of interpretation. But—it may be heresy to say so—but even the Mozart Concerto, in G major, appeared a trifle simple and unassuming to modern ears. It was therefore not the best choice to enable Mr. Dohnanyi to show to the full his capabilities as an executive artist.

A note of pathos was struck by Mr. Monteux, after the concert, when he intimated that a few persons here would regret the decision of the orchestra authorities not to return.

W. G. O.

[110]

HERALD
ess New York City

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's evening concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of the second symphony of Brahms, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and one movement from Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette" symphony.

It was an extraordinary programme, put together apparently without the least thought of relationships, of clashing styles or musical symmetry. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, perhaps wished to play Brahms and Ravel and had to add something to make the customary two hours of music. He succeeded in doing just that and nothing else.

Mr. Monteux finds himself entirely in sympathy with the exotic music (exotic to a Frenchman) of Brahms, but it cannot be said that he perfectly assimilates it. He has endeavored to do so, and he conducts it with sincerity, with devotion, but usually from without. He is far happier, of course, in the music of Ravel, which is Gallic, Parisian, urban, palpitating with the vivacity and intelligence of the salon. The waltzes heard last evening have moved numerous Frenchmen to extended comment.

There is room for doubt that they will stir the sluggish imagination of American commentators, who are so frigidly matter of fact that a creative critic like the late James Huneker ruffled the waters of all the great lakes. Of a certainty he could have written much delicate and delicious prose about these airy trifles, which are instinct with grace and captivating in badinage. But they do not seem to be worthy of prolonged lyricism. They are pretty and they are admirably scored.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played better in the latter part of the season than it did in the early days. Possibly it will do still better things next autumn. Meanwhile the note may be made that to-morrow afternoon its final concert will take place.

AMERICAN
New York City

Boston Symphony Ends Series at Carnegie Hall

LAST night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall terminated the evening series of that orchestra. Pierre Monteaux arranged a programme of familiar compositions.

The opening selection was Brahms' Second Symphony, a work that has found favor with every orchestra conductor this season.

Its performance last night was not epoch-making, so far as eloquence is concerned. Mr. Monteaux's reading was restrained and rigid. The opening movement sounded uninspired and lacking in colorful contrast. Much of the romantic spirit and musical content of the beautiful Adapio was conspicuously absent. Neither by subtle suggestion nor obvious presentation did one gather the warp and woof of melodic material contained in the third movement. The finale, too, was lacking in the tonal warmth that is Brahmesque, and in the nobility that pronounces the work almost Beethovian.

Following the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," the orchestra gave a sympathetic and creditable interpretation of Ravel's Valses, "Nobles et Sentimentales."

The programme ended with an excerpt from Berlioz "Romea et Juliet" symphony, bearing the title, "Romeo alone, Grand Fete at the Capulets."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TIMES
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on its last visit to New York for this season, gave its evening concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Its playing epitomized the success that Mr. Monteux has had in his work so far to bring the orchestra back toward the superlative excellence it had before disruptive forces struck it. That he has wrought much improvement in its playing is evident, even though he has not yet remolded it completely.

The program began with Brahms's second symphony, which Mr. Monteux read with sympathetic appreciation, even though he did not develop certain points and make certain discriminations that have come to be almost traditional and almost expected in a reading of this symphony. But it gave much pleasure, that was made manifest.

The other numbers were Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," brilliant in the opening phrases, uncommonly effective in the mysterious passage suggesting the tomb, but a bit coarse in the violent fortissimo outbursts; Maurice Ravel's instrumentation of his own "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" for piano, and the scene representing "Romeo Alone" in the grand fête at the Capulets, from his dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette."

Ravel's waltzes were played here some years ago. The orchestration conciliates to the ear some of the sourest of the dissonances that are a little uncompromising on the piano, and the orchestral color shows many ingenious and even fascinating touches. But there is something in the incisiveness of the piano that seems needed in these pieces, originally conceived for it, and that the manifold pencilings of the orchestra do not quite compensate for.

The movement from Berlioz's symphony was welcome on the program, for it is one of the composer's most successful orchestral movements—most successful in its seizure of the spirit of the scene, in the musical substance in which this is embodied, and the poetic beauty of the music which did not always present itself to Berlioz in answer to his urgent summons.

---

om EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y. e

MAR 1 1921

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Good Program With Dohnanyi as Solo Pianist.

The program which Pierre Montuex provided for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony season at the Academy last night was so good as to give fresh reason for rejoicing that the great orchestra has not seen fit to cut Brooklyn out of its tours next year, as it has done with Baltimore and Washington. That band once again achieves the beautiful tone and the delicacy and accuracy of finish upon which its reputation was founded and it and its conductor will be welcomed here as often as they can find a place for us in their list of fortunate towns.

The memory of old concertgoers does not reach back to a performance of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony in Brooklyn, and last night it was welcome by way of contrast to some of the more modern music with which we have been regaled. It is too late in the day to call Mendelssohn's music great, but a symphony rich in melody, written with elegance and distinction of style, in which not a single discord assails the ears and not a blare of brass drowns out the careful harmonies, is certainly worth more frequent hearing than this music has had of late. The performance was delightful, especially in the Scherzo, where Mendelssohn's delicate nicety was matched by that of the band.

Liszt decorated the music of a great many other men and some of it he improved. That was hardly the case with Gluck, the simplicity and greatness of whose "Orpheus" moved the facile composer to his "symphonic poem" on the same subject. Liszt was not Gluck, but he was a master of orchestration, and his music in this case is smooth and rich, and even suggests the spirit of its inspiration.

The soloist was Ernest Dohnanyi. Any wonder which auditors may have felt that a modern pianist should choose to play a concerto which Mozart wrote long before the resources of the modern piano had been worked out was removed before Dohnanyi had played half a dozen bars. He reduced the concert grand to the di-

of tone, color and of dynamics which were simply bewildering. Tone of the crispness of pizzicati was perhaps the most striking part of his technique, but the technique, although it popped the eyes of the violinists behind him, was yet but a means to an end. Dohnanyi made Mozart musical in a way which is unknown to present concertgoers. It sounded "faint and far, like horns of Elfland softly blowing." The exquisite beauty of the tiny tone was something to remember and dream about. The chance of encountering it often is as small as that of hearing two hermit thrushes in the same night.

The concluding number was Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline," good spirited, dramatic music of the modern French school, an excellent selection to play an audience home with.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From MAR 19 1921
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Orchestra's Closing Brooklyn Concert

At the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, and with Erno Dohnanyi as piano soloist, closed its series of five Philharmonic Concerts, as scheduled for the current season in Brooklyn under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The occasion called forth an audience flattering in its size, and of most amiable recognition of the spirited playing of the Boston band, and the generally excellent condition and united response of its men to their leader's baton.

Heading the programme's numbers was Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, in A minor, known as the "Scotch." This work, conceived during a vacation in Scotland in 1829, was played by the Philharmonic Society of London, in that city in 1842, the composer conducting. One in sympathy with the modern quest for the new and unusual, and with preference for musical art of recent origin, may be unmoved by the charm of repose which lies in the pictured objectivity of the work—like a peaceful landscape hazily unfolding its length to dreamy contemplation—with the fleck of sunshine and shade over its beauty. Refinement in pianissimi, pizzicatti and dynamics were a part of Mr. Monteux's eloquent exposition of this symphony, carrying the auditors in the hush of attention to unmistakable evidence of approval at the close of the four movements.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and the final overture "Gwendoline" by Chabrier, with Mozart's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major between, completed the programme.

Of the Hungarian pianist, Erno Dohnanyi's playing, it may truly be said, it is a revelation in the highest sense the word may convey. Such complete absorption of the ego into a composition's presentment in full force of musical meaning, with a technique born and blessed by the genuineness of its musicianly parentage, with a rare simplicity entrancing to behold! Here is one who can only be classed as outside all other of the pianist brotherhood. In the Mozart concerto, his playing of which might merit the pen of a rhapsodist, and then not be estimated to full justice. Mr. Dohnanyi had the support in the concord of perfect agreement, of the orchestral section required by the performance of the

---

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 19
CITIZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

ITS FAREWELL CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays at the Academy of Music.

Conductor Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met a great reception last night in the Academy of Music at their farewell concert of the season. Its playing demonstrated the success that Mr. Monteux has had in his work this season. In his programme last night he exhibited the same suavity which has distinguished his every appearance.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony in A minor, in four movements, and Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline" were played by the orchestra, which showed its wonderful responsiveness to the manifold and sensitive indications of the conductor. The audience was extremely enthusiastic and left him in no doubt that his labors were appreciated.

As assisting artist, Erno Dohnanyi, Hungarian pianist and composer, a distinguished man in both capacities, showed remarkable powers. He is an artist of restrained temperament and insight and one who illumines his music with the steady light of understanding and sympathetic imagination; as a technician of high attainments, his command of the mechanism of the piano is comprehensive and complete. He played Mozart's Concert for Pianoforte and Orchestra in G major. His reception was of a warmth and heartiness that spoke of high appreciation.

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York for the present season with its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra has done well this season, and has gone some distance in winning back the high esteem in which it was held for so many years by its New York public. The improvement in its playing under Mr. Monteux's continued direction has made itself felt, and he and his players have found deserved admiration.

The most important number on the program was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony; a rare appearance now on orchestral programs, but deserving the appearances it gets and not ready yet for total oblivion, to which so many of the composer's works have descended. There is certainly a greater vitality in it than there is in Liszt's vacuous symphonic poem "Orpheus," which also appeared on the program, and whose appearances are even rarer. The other orchestral piece was the overture to Chabrier's opera of "Gwendoline," a highly colored and vigorously dramatic composition, admirably devised as an overture foreshadowing the dramatic action to come.

The music is forcibly expressive and harmonized with great richness, but it is permissible to wish that the second theme, descriptive, as Mr. Hale says, of the hero's vision of the Valkyrie, were a little less obvious, a little less banal.

For the first time, the concert master, Richard Burgin, appeared here as soloist. He played Glazunoff's violin concerto, not unknown here recently. Mr. Burgin's appearance was unassuming, unpretentious; his playing was that of an unusually excellent musician, not, perhaps, in all respects of a virtuoso—it is not expected that a concert master shall step to the front from his desk and return to it, showing all the characteristics of a player devoted to the brilliancy and bravura of solo performances—but of a master of his instrument in tone and technique, wholly competent to interpret all the difficulties of the composition and quite sympathetic with its spirit. Mr. Burgin won much applause by his playing, and a number of recalls to the stage.

TIMES, MAR. 20.

Boston Symphony Plays Melodious Music at Farewell

Contrast and Surprise in Programme Arranged by Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was another of those contrivances of contrast and surprise which Mr. Monteux has shown himself an adept at making. The pleasures of the afternoon began with Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. Its simple, healthy, old fashioned tunefulness must have brought happiness to most of the hearers. Of course this is not "modern" and it is anything but "cerebral." It is just plain music, which is sadly out of date in these psychological days when tones are brought together seemingly for the purpose of doing violence to each other and to undeceived human ears.

But Mendelssohn! Pfui! Why Mendelssohn when we might be listening to Malipiero or Resphighi's screeching women and rioting gnomes? And after Mendelssohn, what? Liszt's "Orpheus," surely the reductio ad absurdum of that musician's method of composition. Orpheus moved even the iron gates of the inferno by the magic of his song; but one may be reasonably certain that the song did not consist of an unfinished phrase trimmed with clarionet arpeggios and hoisted by semi-tones in order to be repeated and repeated till enough pages had been filled to make a symphonic poem.

Then presto, change, and the audience listens to Glazounov's violin concerto. The solo performer was the concert master of the orchestra, Richard Burgin. This is Mr. Burgin's first season at the head of the strings of Boston, but it is not likely to be his last. At any rate he played the concerto very well indeed. He has a good tone, a particularly fine G string, a crisp staccato, confidence and a large degree of certainty among harmonics, a cantilena warm and with color and evidences of good musicianship throughout. He was cordially applauded as he deserved to be.

The entertainment was completed with a performance of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. The orchestra acquitted itself generally with credit. At the close of the season its art is much smoother and more rich in texure than it was at the beginning. A part of the improvement is certainly the result of a winter's practice, but no small measure of it should be accredited to Mr. Monteux, who, if not inspired, is undeniably industrious.

HERALD MAR 20

Last of Boston Symphony Concerts Is Simple Affair

Series Ends None Too Gloriously With Program of Familiar Compositions

This year's series of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended none too gloriously yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program was simplicity itself—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Glazounoff's concerto for violin, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," all familiar works.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was a daring choice. It bristles with opportunities for a display of virtuosity by individual sections of the orchestra, and while here and there old members of this organization, survivors of illustrious days, may still be seen in their accustomed places, the present personnel, when subjected to conspicuous individual prominence, invites disastrous and even tragic comparison.

Neither was the audience greatly cheered by a flaccid performance of Giazounoff's concerto by Richard Burgin, this season's concertmaster. The music itself is a mixture of saccharine and gaudiness. Only a fiddler of the first rank could lend it a greater illusion, and Mr. Burgin, an indifferent player of little personality, was far from equal to coping with its insipidity. In Mendelssohn's symphony, as in Chabrier's overture, the orchestra played well, if with little distinction.

TRIBUNE, MAR 20

TRIBUNE, MAR 20 192
New York City

Last of Boston Symphony Concerts Is Simple Affair

Series Ends None Too Gloriously With Program of Familiar Compositions

This year's series of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended none too gloriously yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program was simplicity itself—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Glazounoff's concerto for violin, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," all familiar works.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was a daring choice. It bristles with opportunities for a display of virtuosity by individual sections of the orchestra, and while here and there old members of this organization, survivors of illustrious days, may still be seen in their accustomed places, the present personnel, when subjected to conspicuous individual prominence, invites disastrous and even tragic comparison.

Neither was the audience greatly cheered by a flaccid performance of Giazounoff's concerto by Richard Burgin, this season's concertmaster. The music itself is a mixture of saccharine and gaudiness. Only a fiddler of the first rank could lend it a greater illusion, and Mr. Burgin, an indifferent player of little personality, was far from equal to coping with its insipidity. In Mendelssohn's symphony, as in Chabrier's overture, the orchestra played well, if with little distinction.

ORLD,
New York City
MAR 20 192 X

FAREWELL CONCERT BY BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

"Lohengrin" Sung in English at the Metropolitan—Pavlowa Closes Engagement.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said goodby for the season to its metropolitan following yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was an undemonstrative audience and not so numerous as the Boston men have known in other times. This attitude might have been due to the programme that contained nothing thrilling and that was played in a manner thoroughly convention.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, substituted Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony for the announced Cesar Franck in D minor, and other numbers were Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to the opera "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which the soloist was Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster. Mr. Burgin is an experienced and reliable fiddler and plays as is expected of a concertmaster.

---

m HERALD
dress: New York City
e..

Boston Symphony Plays Melodious Music at Farewell

Contrast and Surprise in Programme Arranged by Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was another of those contrivances of contrast and surprise which Mr. Monteux has shown himself an adept at making. The pleasures of the afternoon began with Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. Its simple, healthy, old fashioned tunefulness must have brought happiness to most of the hearers. Of course this is not "modern" and it is anything but "cerebral." It is just plain music, which is sadly out of date in these psychological days when tones are brought together seemingly for the purpose of doing violence to each other and to undeceived human ears.

But Mendelssohn! Pfui! Why Mendelssohn when we might be listening to Malipiero or Resphighi's screeching women and rioting gnomes? And after Mendelssohn, what? Liszt's "Orpheus," surely the reductio ad absurdum of that musician's method of composition. Orpheus moved even the iron gates of the inferno by the magic of his song; but one may be reasonably certain that the song did not consist of an unfinished phrase trimmed with clarionet arpeggios and hoisted by semi-tones in order to be repeated and repeated till enough pages had been filled to make a symphonic poem.

Then presto, change, and the audience listens to Glazounov's violin concerto. The solo performer was the concert master of the orchestra, Richard Burgin. This is Mr. Burgin's first season at the head of the strings of Boston, but it is not likely to be his last. At any rate he played the concerto very well indeed. He has a good tone, a particularly fine G string, a crisp staccato, confidence and a large degree of certainty among harmonics, a cantilena warm and with color and evidences of good musicianship throughout. He was cordially applauded as he deserved to be.

The entertainment was completed with a performance of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. The orchestra acquitted itself generally with credit. At the close of the season its art is much smoother and more rich in texure than it was at the beginning. A part of the improvement is certainly the result of a winter's practice, but no small measure of it should be accredited to Mr. Monteux, who, if not inspired, is undeniably industrious.

---

om..
TIMES
dress New York City
te.. MAR 20 1921

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York for the present season with its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra has done well this season, and has gone some distance in winning back the high esteem in which it was held for so many years by its New York public. The improvement in its playing under Mr. Monteux's continued direction has made itself felt, and he and his players have found deserved admiration.

The most important number on the program was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony; a rare appearance now on orchestral programs, but deserving the appearances it gets and not ready yet for total oblivion, to which so many of the composer's works have descended. There is certainly a greater vitality in it than there is in Liszt's vacuous symphonic poem "Orpheus," which also appeared on the program, and whose appearances are even rarer. The other orchestral piece was the overture to Chabrier's opera of "Gwendoline," a highly colored and vigorously dramatic composition, admirably devised as an overture foreshadowing the dramatic action to come.

The music is forcibly expressive and harmonized with great richness, but it is permissible to wish that the second theme, descriptive, as Mr. Hale says, of the hero's vision of the Valkyrie, were a little less obvious, a little less banal.

For the first time, the concert master, Richard Burgin, appeared here as soloist. He played Glazounoff's violin concerto, not unknown here recently. Mr. Burgin's appearance was unassuming, unpretentious; his playing was that of an unusually excellent musician, not, perhaps, in all respects of a virtuoso—it is not expected that a concert master shall step to the front from his desk and return to it, showing all the characteristics of a player devoted to the brilliancy and bravura of solo performances—but of a master of his instrument in tone and technique, wholly competent to interpret all the difficulties of the composition and quite sympathetic with its spirit. Mr. Burgin won much applause by his playing, and a number of recalls to the stage.

FAREWELL CONCERT BY BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

"Lohengrin" Sung in English at the Metropolitan—Pavlowa Closes Engagement.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said goodby for the season to its metropolitan following yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was an undemonstrative audience and not so numerous as the Boston men have known in other times. This attitude might have been due to the programme that contained nothing thrilling and that was played in a manner thoroughly convention.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, substituted Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony for the announced Cesar Franck in D minor, and other numbers were Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to the opera "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which the soloist was Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster. Mr. Burgin is an experienced and reliable fiddler and plays as is expected of a concertmaster.

The Metropolitan Opera Company, for its matinee, offered its new production of "Lohengrin" in English, one of the organization's finest achievements. Orville Harrold took Mr. Sembach's place in the title role, and while he is a somewhat portly Knight of the Grail his conception of the part is intelligent and his fine diction adds much to the enjoyment of it. His singing of the final narrative was an artistic piece of work. Florence Easton, Clarence Whitehill, William Gustafson, Julia Claussen as Ortrud, and Robert Leonhardt rounded out the principals. Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

WORLD. MAR 20

[111]

FAREWELL CONCERT BY BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

"Lohengrin" Sung in English at the Metropolitan—Pavlowa Closes Engagement.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said goodby for the season to its metropolitan following yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was an undemonstrative audience and not so numerous as the Boston men have known in other times. This attitude might have been due to the programme that contained nothing thrilling and that was played in a manner thoroughly convention.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, substituted Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony for the announced Cesar Franck in D minor, and other numbers were Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to the opera "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which the soloist was Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster. Mr. Burgin is an experienced and reliable fiddler and plays as is expected of a concertmaster.

The Metropolitan Opera Company, for its matinee, offered its new production of "Lohengrin" in English, one of the organization's finest achievements. Orville Harrold took Mr. Sembach's place in the title role, and while he is a somewhat portly Knight of the Grail his conception of the part is intelligent and his fine diction adds much to the enjoyment of it. His singing of the final narrative was an artistic piece of work. Florence Easton, Clarence Whitehill, William Gustafson, Julia Claussen as Ortrud, and Robert Leonhardt rounded out the principals. Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

Anna Pavlowa and her ballet concluded their engagement at the Manhattan Opera House in the evening, the performance also terminating a long season's tour of the country.

The popular dancer found America as great an admirer of her art as ever, judging by figures the management volunteered last evening. If they be genuine it would appear that Pavlowa has in the past season here danced to the tune of $750,000, an average of $35,000 a week. The dancer's share of this is $100,000 and the manager's, Fortune Gallo, $150,000. The most profitable engagement was in Chicago, where a matinee and an evening performance netted $17,000. New York paid $50,000 to see the last twelve performances. F. H. W.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
MAR 26 1921

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Plays at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first of its last two concerts for the current season at Carnegie Hall, New York, on Tuesday evening, March 17. Under the able leadership of Pierre Monteux, a well balanced program, including Brahms' Second Symphony, Weber's Overture to the Opera "Euryanthe," Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentals" and the ballroom music from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," was enthusiastically received. Especially noteworthy was the oboe solo of Georges Longy, in the Berlioz number. The final concert was heard on Saturday afternoon.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Supply and Demand

By Linton Martin

It is amazing and incredible that the musical activities of a city of the size and culture of Philadelphia should be decreased, instead of increased to keep pace with the city's growth. Yet such is the paradox brought to a focus by the final concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Monday evening, and reflected in the caliber of the Metropolitan Opera Company's presentation of "Rigoletto" the following evening.

True, musical activities in other ways have grown to pr[illegible]tions little dreamed of even comparatively few years ago. The season's calendar is crowded with recitals and concerts of the first order, and there has been a mushroom growth of popular priced performances of grand opera during the last season. But it is the symphonic roster, of our own and visiting orchestras, and the ambitious and more expensive operatic performances that determine the standards, and are of the utmost importance consequently. And it is right here that the anomaly in the operation of the law of supply and demand is presented.

* * *

Nobody who notes the acute congestion in the audiences at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra each week can fail to realize that more concerts are urgently necessary

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 19 1921
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Orchestra's Closing Brooklyn Concert

At the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, and with Erno Dohnanyi as piano soloist, closed its series of five Philharmonic Concerts, as scheduled for the current season in Brooklyn under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The occasion called forth an audience flattering in its size, and of most amiable recognition of the spirited playing of the Boston band, and the generally excellent condition and united response of its men to their leader's baton.

Heading the programme's numbers was Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, in A minor, known as the "Scotch." This work, conceived during a vacation in Scotland in 1829, was played by the Philharmonic Society of London, in that city in 1842, the composer conducting. One in sympathy with the modern quest for the new and unusual, and with preference for musical art of recent origin, may be unmoved by the charm of repose which lies in the pictured objectivity of the work—like a peaceful landscape hazily unfolding its length to dreamy contemplation—with the fleck of sunshine and shade over its beauty. Refinement in pianissimi, pizzicatti and dynamics were a part of Mr. Monteux's eloquent exposition of this symphony, carrying the auditors in the hush of attention to unmistakable evidence of approval at the close of the four movements.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and the final overture "Gwendoline" by Chabrier, with Mozart's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major between, completed the programme.

Of the Hungarian pianist, Erno Dohnanyi's playing, it may truly be said, it is a revelation in the highest sense the word may convey. Such complete absorption of the ego into a composition's presentment in full force of musical meaning, with a technique born and blessed by the genuineness of its musicianly parentage, with a rare simplicity entrancing to behold! Here is one who can only be classed as outside all other of the pianist brotherhood. In the Mozart concerto, his playing of which might merit the pen of a rhapsodist, and then not be estimated to full justice, Mr. Dohnanyi had the support in the concord of perfect agreement, of the orchestral section required by the performance of the

---

ESTABLISHED 1881
From CITIZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

ITS FAREWELL CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays at the Academy of Music.

Conductor Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met a great reception last night in the Academy of Music at their farewell concert of the season. Its playing demonstrated the success that Mr. Monteux has had in his work this season. In his programme last night he exhibited the same suavity which has distinguished his every appearance.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony in A minor, in four movements, and Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline" were played by the orchestra, which showed its wonderful responsiveness to the manifold and sensitive indications of the conductor. The audience was extremely enthusiastic and left him in no doubt that his labors were appreciated.

As assisting artist, Erno Dohnanyi, Hungarian pianist and composer, a distinguished man in both capacities, showed remarkable powers. He is an artist of restrained temperament and insight and one who illumines his music with the steady light of understanding and sympathetic imagination; as a technician of high attainments, his command of the mechanism of the piano is comprehensive and complete. He played Mozart's Concert for Pianoforte and Orchestra in G major. His reception was of a warmth and heartiness that spoke of high appreciation.

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York for the present season with its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra has done well this season, and has gone some distance in winning back the high esteem in which it was held for so many years by its New York public. The improvement in its playing under Mr. Monteux's continued direction has made itself felt, and he and his players have found deserved admiration.

The most important number on the program was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony; a rare appearance now on orchestral programs, but deserving the appearances it gets and not ready yet for total oblivion, to which so many of the composer's works have descended. There is certainly a greater vitality in it than there is in Liszt's vacuous symphonic poem "Orpheus," which also appeared on the program, and whose appearances are even rarer. The other orchestral piece was the overture to Chabrier's opera of "Gwendoline," a highly colored and vigorously dramatic composition, admirably devised as an overture foreshadowing the dramatic action to come.

The music is forcibly expressive and harmonized with great richness, but it is permissible to wish that the second theme, descriptive, as Mr. Hale says, of the hero's vision of the Valkyrie, were a little less obvious, a little less banal.

For the first time, the concert master, Richard Burgin, appeared here as soloist. He played Glazunoff's violin concerto, not unknown here recently. Mr. Burgin's appearance was unassuming, unpretentious; his playing was that of an unusually excellent musician, not, perhaps, in all respects of a virtuoso—it is not expected that a concert master shall step to the front from his desk and return to it, showing all the characteristics of a player devoted to the brilliancy and bravura of solo performances—but of a master of his instrument in tone and technique, wholly competent to interpret all the difficulties of the composition and quite sympathetic with its spirit. Mr. Burgin won much applause by his playing, and a number of recalls to the stage.

TIMES MAR. 20.

Boston Symphony Plays Melodious Music at Farewell

Contrast and Surprise in Programme Arranged by Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was another of those contrivances of contrast and surprise which Mr. Monteux has shown himself an adept at making. The pleasures of the afternoon began with Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. Its simple, healthy, old fashioned tunefulness must have brought happiness to most of the hearers. Of course this is not "modern" and it is anything but "cerebral." It is just plain music, which is sadly out of date in these psychological days when tones are brought together seemingly for the purpose of doing violence to each other and to undeceived human ears.

But Mendelssohn! Pfui! Why Mendelssohn when we might be listening to Malipiero or Resphighi's screeching women and rioting gnomes? And after Mendelssohn, what? Liszt's "Orpheus," surely the reductio ad absurdum of that musician's method of composition. Orpheus moved even the iron gates of the inferno by the magic of his song; but one may be reasonably certain that the song did not consist of an unfinished phrase trimmed with clarionet arpeggios and hoisted by semi-tones in order to be repeated and repeated till enough pages had been filled to make a symphonic poem.

Then presto, change, and the audience listens to Glazounov's violin concerto. The solo performer was the concert master of the orchestra, Richard Burgin. This is Mr. Burgin's first season at the head of the strings of Boston, but it is not likely to be his last. At any rate he played the concerto very well indeed. He has a good tone, a particularly fine G string, a crisp staccato, confidence and a large degree of certainty among harmonics, a cantilena warm and with color and evidences of good musicianship throughout. He was cordially applauded as he deserved to be.

The entertainment was completed with a performance of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. The orchestra acquitted itself generally with credit. At the close of the season its art is much smoother and more rich in texure than it was at the beginning. A part of the improvement is certainly the result of a winter's practice, but no small measure of it should be accredited to Mr. Monteux, who, if not inspired, is undeniably industrious.

HERALD MAR 20

Last of Boston Symphony Concerts Is Simple Affair

Series Ends None Too Gloriously With Program of Familiar Compositions

This year's series of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended none too gloriously yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program was simplicity itself—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Glazounoff's concerto for violin, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," all familiar works.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was a daring choice. It bristles with opportunities for a display of virtuosity by individual sections of the orchestra, and while here and there old members of this organization, survivors of illustrious days, may still be seen in their accustomed places, the present personnel, when subjected to conspicuous individual prominence, invites disastrous and even tragic comparison.

Neither was the audience greatly cheered by a flaccid performance of Giazounoff's concerto by Richard Burgin, this season's concertmaster. The music itself is a mixture of saccharine and gaudiness. Only a fiddler of the first rank could lend it a greater illusion, and Mr. Burgin, an indifferent player of little personality, was far from equal to coping with its insipidity. In Mendelssohn's symphony, as in Chabrier's overture, the orchestra played well, if with little distinction.

TRIBUNE MAR 20

TRIBUNE, MAR 20 19
New York City

Last of Boston Symphony Concerts Is Simple Affair

Series Ends None Too Gloriously With Program of Familiar Compositions

This year's series of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended none too gloriously yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program was simplicity itself—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Glazounoff's concerto for violin, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," all familiar works.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was a daring choice. It bristles with opportunities for a display of virtuosity by individual sections of the orchestra, and while here and there old members of this organization, survivors of illustrious days, may still be seen in their accustomed places, the present personnel, when subjected to conspicuous individual prominence, invites disastrous and even tragic comparison.

Neither was the audience greatly cheered by a flaccid performance of Giazounoff's concerto by Richard Burgin, this season's concertmaster. The music itself is a mixture of saccharine and gaudiness. Only a fiddler of the first rank could lend it a greater illusion, and Mr. Burgin, an indifferent player of little personality, was far from equal to coping with its insipidity. In Mendelssohn's symphony, as in Chabrier's overture, the orchestra played well, if with little distinction.

ORLD,
New York City

MAR 20

FAREWELL CONCERT BY BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

"Lohengrin" Sung in English at the Metropolitan—Pavlowa Closes Engagement.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said goodby for the season to its metropolitan following yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was an undemonstrative audience and not so numerous as the Boston men have known in other times. This attitude might have been due to the programme that contained nothing thrilling and that was played in a manner thoroughly convention.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, substituted Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony for the announced Cesar Franck in D minor, and other numbers were Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to the opera "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which the soloist was Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster. Mr. Burgin is an experienced and reliable fiddler and plays as is expected of a concertmaster.

---

m HERALD
ress: New York City
e.................................

Boston Symphony Plays Melodious Music at Farewell

Contrast and Surprise in Programme Arranged by Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was another of those contrivances of contrast and surprise which Mr. Monteux has shown himself an adept at making. The pleasures of the afternoon began with Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. Its simple, healthy, old fashioned tunefulness must have brought happiness to most of the hearers. Of course this is not "modern" and it is anything but "cerebral." It is just plain music, which is sadly out of date in these psychological days when tones are brought together seemingly for the purpose of doing violence to each other and to undeceived human ears.

But Mendelssohn! Pfui! Why Mendelssohn when we might be listening to Malipiero or Resphighi's screeching women and rioting gnomes? And after Mendelssohn, what? Liszt's "Orpheus," surely the reductio ad absurdum of that musician's method of composition. Orpheus moved even the iron gates of the inferno by the magic of his song; but one may be reasonably certain that the song did not consist of an unfinished phrase trimmed with clarionet arpeggios and hoisted by semi-tones in order to be repeated and repeated till enough pages had been filled to make a symphonic poem.

Then presto, change, and the audience listens to Glazounov's violin concerto. The solo performer was the concert master of the orchestra, Richard Burgin. This is Mr. Burgin's first season at the head of the strings of Boston, but it is not likely to be his last. At any rate he played the concerto very well indeed. He has a good tone, a particularly fine G string, a crisp staccato, confidence and a large degree of certainty among harmonics, a cantilena warm and with color and evidences of good musicianship throughout. He was cordially applauded as he deserved to be.

The entertainment was completed with a performance of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. The orchestra acquitted itself generally with credit. At the close of the season its art is much smoother and more rich in texure than it was at the beginning. A part of the improvement is certainly the result of a winter's practice, but no small measure of it should be accredited to Mr. Monteux, who, if not inspired, is undeniably industrious.

---

om.......................................
TIMES
dress New York City
te....................... MAR 20 1921

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York for the present season with its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra has done well this season, and has gone some distance in winning back the high esteem in which it was held for so many years by its New York public. The improvement in its playing under Mr. Monteux's continued direction has made itself felt, and he and his players have found deserved admiration.

The most important number on the program was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony; a rare appearance now on orchestral programs, but deserving the appearances it gets and not ready yet for total oblivion, to which so many of the composer's works have descended. There is certainly a greater vitality in it than there is in Liszt's vacuous symphonic poem "Orpheus," which also appeared on the program, and whose appearances are even rarer. The other orchestral piece was the overture to Chabrier's opera of "Gwendoline," a highly colored and vigorously dramatic composition, admirably devised as an overture foreshadowing the dramatic action to come.

The music is forcibly expressive and harmonized with great richness, but it is permissible to wish that the second theme, descriptive, as Mr. Hale says, of the hero's vision of the Valkyrie, were a little less obvious, a little less banal.

For the first time, the concert master, Richard Burgin, appeared here as soloist. He played Glazunoff's violin concerto, not unknown here recently. Mr. Burgin's appearance was unassuming, unpretentious; his playing was that of an unusually excellent musician, not, perhaps, in all respects of a virtuoso—it is not expected that a concert master shall step to the front from his desk and return to it, showing all the characteristics of a player devoted to the brilliancy and bravura of solo performances—but of a master of his instrument in tone and technique, wholly competent to interpret all the difficulties of the composition and quite sympathetic with its spirit. Mr. Burgin won much applause by his playing, and a number of recalls to the stage.

FAREWELL CONCERT BY BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

"Lohengrin" Sung in English at the Metropolitan—Pavlowa Closes Engagement.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said goodby for the season to its metropolitan following yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was an undemonstrative audience and not so numerous as the Boston men have known in other times. This attitude might have been due to the programme that contained nothing thrilling and that was played in a manner thoroughly convention.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, substituted Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony for the announced Cesar Franck in D minor, and other numbers were Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to the opera "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which the soloist was Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster. Mr. Burgin is an experienced and reliable fiddler and plays as is expected of a concertmaster.

The Metropolitan Opera Company, for its matinee, offered its new production of "Lohengrin" in English, one of the organization's finest achievements. Orville Harrold took Mr. Sembach's place in the title role, and while he is a somewhat portly Knight of the Grail his conception of the part is intelligent and his fine diction adds much to the enjoyment of it. His singing of the final narrative was an artistic piece of work. Florence Easton, Clarence Whitehill, William Gustafson, Julia Claussen as Ortrud, and Robert Leonhardt rounded out the principals. Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

WORLD. MAR 20.

[111]

FAREWELL CONCERT BY BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

"Lohengrin" Sung in English at the Metropolitan—Pavlowa Closes Engagement.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said goodby for the season to its metropolitan following yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was an undemonstrative audience and not so numerous as the Boston men have known in other times. This attitude might have been due to the programme that contained nothing thrilling and that was played in a manner thoroughly convention.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, substituted Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony for the announced Cesar Franck in D minor, and other numbers were Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," Chabrier's overture to the opera "Gwendoline," and Glazounoff's violin concerto, in which the soloist was Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster. Mr. Burgin is an experienced and reliable fiddler and plays as is expected of a concertmaster.

The Metropolitan Opera Company, for its matinee, offered its new production of "Lohengrin" in English, one of the organization's finest achievements. Orville Harrold took Mr. Sembach's place in the title role, and while he is a somewhat portly Knight of the Grail his conception of the part is intelligent and his fine diction adds much to the enjoyment of it. His singing of the final narrative was an artistic piece of work. Florence Easton, Clarence Whitehill, William Gustafson, Julia Claussen as Ortrud, and Robert Leonhardt rounded out the principals. Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

Anna Pavlowa and her ballet concluded their engagement at the Manhattan Opera House in the evening, the performance also terminating a long season's tour of the country.

The popular dancer found America as great an admirer of her art as ever, judging by figures the management volunteered last evening. If they be genuine it would appear that Pavlowa has in the past season here danced to the tune of $750,000, an average of $35,000 a week. The dancer's share of this is $100,000 and the manager's, Fortune Gallo, $150,000. The most profitable engagement was in Chicago, where a matinee and an evening performance netted $17,000. New York paid $50,000 to see the last twelve performances. F. H. W.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From AR 26 1921

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Plays at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first of its last two concerts for the current season at Carnegie Hall, New York, on Tuesday evening, March 17. Under the able leadership of Pierre Monteux, a well balanced program, including Brahms' Second Symphony, Weber's Overture to the Opera "Euryanthe," Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentals" and the ballroom music from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," was enthusiastically received. Especially noteworthy was the oboe solo of Georges Longy, in the Berlioz number. The final concert was heard on Saturday afternoon.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Supply and Demand

By Linton Martin

It is amazing and incredible that the musical activities of a city of the size and culture of Philadelphia should be decreased, instead of increased to keep pace with the city's growth. Yet such is the paradox brought to a focus by the final concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Monday evening, and reflected in the caliber of the Metropolitan Opera Company's presentation of "Rigoletto" the following evening.

True, musical activities in other ways have grown to pr[illegible]tions little dreamed of even comparatively few years ago. The season's calendar is crowded with recitals and concerts of the first order, and there has been a mushroom growth of popular priced performances of grand opera during the last season. But it is the symphonic roster, of our own and visiting orchestras, and the ambitious and more expensive operatic performances that determine the standards, and are of the utmost importance consequently. And it is right here that the anomaly in the operation of the law of supply and demand is presented.

* * *

Nobody who notes the acute congestion in the audiences at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra each week can fail to realize that more concerts are urgently necessary

...ERT BY
...S ORCHESTRA

...Sung in English at
...olitan—Pavlowa
...Engagement.

Symphony Orchestra
for the season to its following yesterday afrnegie Hall. It was an ive audience and not so the Boston men have er times. This attitude
been due to the pro-
contained nothing thril-
was played in a manner
nvention.
ux, the conductor, sub-lessohn's Scotch symhe announced Cesar minor, and other num-zt's symphonic poem abrier's overture to the oline," and Glazounoff's
o, in which the soloist
Burgin, the orchestra's
Mr. Burgin is an ex-
reliable fiddler and xpected of a concert-
olitan Opera Company,
e, offered its new pro-
ohengrin" in English,
organization's finest Orville Harrold took place in the title role,
is a somewhat portly
Grail his conception intelligent and his fine much to the enjoyment
ging of the final narra-artistic piece of work.
n, Clarence Whitehill, son, Julia Claussen as bert Leonhardt round-
cipals. Mr. Bodanzky
a and her ballet con-
gagement at the Man-
House in the evening,
ce also terminating a
our of the country.
dancer found America
mirer of her art as
y figures the manage-ed last evening. If e it would appear that the past season here
ine of $750,000, an av-
0 a week. The dan-
his is $100,000 and the rtune Gallo, $150,000.
able engagement was ere a matinee and an
mance netted $17,000.
$50,000 to see the last
ances. F. H. W.

Billboard
...nati, O.
MAR 26 1921

SYMPHONY
Carnegie Hall

ny Orchestra played the concerts for the current ll, New York, on Tuesday
Under the able leadership
well balanced program,
cond Symphony, Weber's
ra "Euryanthe," Ravel's
ntimentals" and the ball-ios's "Romeo and Juliet," received. Especially oboe solo of Gergeos number. The final con-
turday afternoon.

...1921
...RICAN
...Pa.

...Supply
...emand

...on Martin

and incredible that class of a city of the of Philadelphia
sed, instead of in-pace with the city's ch is the paradox
us by the final con-
Boston Symphony
onday evening, and
aliber of the Metro-
mpany's presentation
e following evening.
activities in other
to pr... ...tions little comparatively few season's calendar is tals and concerts of
and there has been
rowth of popular ces of grand opera
eason. But it is the
of our own and
as, and the ambi-
expensive operatic at determine the of the utmost im-ntly. And it is the anomaly in the aw of supply and
d.

Now that it has been endowed by popular subscription, the orchestra truly belongs to the city, and some regular arrangement should certainly be made to provide for those who cannot now obtain admission to either series of concerts.

Hitherto, we have had [illegible] additional concerts supplied regularly each season by both the New York and Boston Symphony orchestras. But now that the visits of the Boston orchestra have been permanently and definitely withdrawn, upon the ground that there is an increased demand for concerts in and around Boston, it becomes apparent that something should be done to offset this decrease in vital musical fare.

* * *

The operatic situation is somewhat different, but has its points of similarity also, in the congestion caused by transferring the opera from the Metropolitan to the Academy. With the house virtually sold out on subscription, it is impossible for the general public to satisfy its thirst for first-class opera, and there can be no possible doubt that there is a crying need for more opera of the first class for the discriminating music lovers of the city.

Then, too, the question of healthy competition is a vital one. In the old days, with the Metropolitan at the Academy, and Hammerstein (followed by his succeeding organization, the Philadelphia-Chicago Company), at the Metropolitan, the city enjoyed the best operatic casts, and the greatest variety and interest in the works presented that it has ever known.

This year the Metropolitan company's offerings have been far more varied, and greater in novelty, than last season. But there is not the spur of competition to bring casts of old-time excellence, while at the same time only a limited number can gain admission to the performances that are given.

* * *

Of course, the obvious answer to this situation is that it would be a mighty fine thing for the city to have the annual visits of the Chicago company resumed, and the Metropolitan Opera House is the logical place. The fact that the company's engagement of one week two years ago did not crowd the house at a few performances was due wholly to conditions at the time, not to any lack of interest or unwillingness to support the performances. The Chicago company, with the one and only Mary Garden, is seriously missed, and its return would undoubtedly be hailed with gratitude and hearty support by the many who know what it has done, and what it might do here in the future.

All of this is said with due appreciation of what the Metropolitan company has done and is doing now. But the return of the Chicago forces under Captain Mary, would surely have everything in its favor, to say nothing of the impetus it would give to musical affairs, and there should be no real reason to prevent the Metropolitan Opera House from being utilized to house it.

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Out Go the Orchestras and On Come the Recitalers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its local ministrations for this season in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon; the Symphony Society of New York completed its home season in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux chose for his parting symphony Mendelssohn's "Scotch," which at least is not overdriven these days. Played very beautifully by the Bostonians, it proved a welcome revival. Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," which likewise is not overdriven in this city of much Liszt, Glazounoff's violin concerto (revealing the sincerity and musicianship of the Boston concert master, Richard Burgin), and the splendid overture to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," were the other numbers on the farewell programme.

GLOBE MAR 2...

Concerts and Operas

Mr. Monteux may not have quite as good an orchestra as Dr. Muck had, but he makes better programmes for those who attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra's final concert, on Saturday afternoon, brought Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which one was glad to hear again, and which was played gracefully; Glazounoff's violin concerto, well played by the orchestra's concert master, Richard Burgin; and between them Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," the beauties of which were admirably set forth by M. Monteux and his well trained players. It is not, as a whole, one of Liszt's most successful works, but there are pages in it which touch the very sources of musical inspiration. When Wagner first heard this symphonic poem it made so indelible an impression on him that he borrowed one passage in it for his "Parsifal," a quarter of a century later.

POST MAR...

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City
MAR 21 1921

Damrosch, Monteux and Mengelberg

Both Walter Damrosch and Pierre Monteux made their final appearances for the season on Sunday and Saturday at the head of their respective orchestras, whilst Willem Mengelberg entered the last week of his stay here as conductor of the National Symphony. There was nothing of overwhelming import that transpired during any of these three concerts. Mr. Damrosch, yesterday afternoon at Aeolian Hall, presented in clear and straightforward fashion Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, too much overlooked generally by conductors hereabouts. He repeated Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" fragments from one of the mid-week concerts, and Paul Kochanski gave about as interesting an account of Bruch's "Scotch" fantasia as this considerably jejune composition warrants.

The Scotch "snap" was also motived by Mr. Monteux at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Mendelssohn's symphony written as the outcome of his browsing about in the land of bare-kneed balladry having been the principal number on this programme. The music grows thinner and thinner of substance year by year—a deal more than the modicum of Scotch snap in it would be needed to save it from fast approaching limbo. Mr. Monteux also played Liszt's "Orpheus" (likewise showing heavy wearage) and the overture to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," between which Richard Burgin, the orchestra's principal violin, played the Glazunov concerto in rather concertmasterlike fashion.

Mr. Mengelberg's Sunday evening concert again brought forward Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," dedicated to the conductor and therefore, perhaps, an excusable repetition, and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. Between these, Alexander Schmuller gave another performance of the Beethoven concerto of as little compelling power as his first a week or so ago with the Philharmonic Orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 2...

BOSTON SYMPHONY

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

Sir—Having been a regular subscriber for more than twenty-five years to the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I was glad to see your timely and appreciative editorial in your issue of March 16. There is one point, however, that many of us would like to have made clear: Why has the decision been made that we are to have no more regular concerts by this orchestra? I understand Washington and Baltimore are still to have their regular series.

The only reason I have seen given is that the demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston is so great that Philadelphia is to be omitted from the list. This is certainly not an adequate explanation. Have we shown any discourtesy, financial or otherwise, to this wonderful organization to which Philadelphia owes so much of its musical life?

A REGULAR SUBSCRIBER TO THE PUBLIC LEDGER.
Philadelphia, March 20, 1921.

20TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Work by Kalinnikoff Is Played for the First Time in Boston

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN IN BEETHOVEN PIECE

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Kalinnikoff, Symphony No. 1, G minor (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto in G major, No 4, for piano (Arthur Rubinstein, pianist); Chadwick, Dramatic Overture, "Melpomene."

Kalinnikoff's symphony, which was produced at Kieff in 1897, should have been heard in Boston long before yesterday. Why did the conductors neglect it? Is it too melodious? Is it too "light"? The audience found it most agreeable music, unmistakably Slav in spirit, yet not aggressively nationalistic. Here and there the influence of Tschaikowsky is felt, but there is no servile imitation. On the contrary, Kalinnikoff has much to say for himself. He was very poor in his early years. When he was 27 years old his future was bright; his ability as a composer was recognized; he had an honorable position at Moscow in the Italian Opera House. The next year he was "ordered South." During the remaining years—he died within two days of being 35—he composed in the Crimea and waited for the end.

It is customary to say when a composer is thus fated that his works show a melancholy akin to despair. This has been said of many in various walks of [illegible] thus be[illegible] physical weakness and mental perturbation. Beethoven in a most dismal mood wrote a singularly cheerful symphony. Brahms was sometimes musically in doleful dumps when he was enjoying his restaurant life in Vienna, gay in his rude manner with his many friends.

Now in Kalinnikoff's Symphony certain themes and phases of their development are tinged with melancholy, but it is not a personal lamentation, never a wail, never a shriek, as is the case with many pages of Tschaikowsky; there is no suggestion of sullen, morose despair as in pages of Brahms. There is the melancholy that so often characterizes the Russian folk song, though the words of the song may be anything but sombre. Kalinnikoff' themes are often simple, but they make a direct appeal through their honesty of sentiment and expression. He had a sense of grace and beauty. He could be ingenious in harmonic and orchestral treatment without seeming merely a haphazard experimenter. Contriving unusual effects for the Andante and the Trio of the Scherzo, he knew well what he was about. The symphony, finely played, was welcomed yesterday with more than ordinary warmth.

Mr. Chadwick's overture was composed in 1886. To use his own words, it was his purpose to typify in tones "an atmosphere of tragic poetry in general." That he succeeded in doing this is indisputable. There have been iconoclasts, revolutionaries, impressionists, anarchists in music during the last 35 years. There have been works that at the time were furiously applauded, declared "epoch-making"; and where are they today? There have been novel harmonic systems with constant experimentation in orchestral colors; much progress, legitimate and desirable; often merely a vain attempt to impress or startle by superficial means, orchestral juggling, the mere ear tickling or ear stunning of the moment. Mr. Chadwick's overture remains a noble work, nobly planned, nobly executed, with musical ideas that are inherently tragic, deeply emotional. There is Greek feeling in modern expression. In this instance the title of the work does not belie its contents.

Mr. Rubinstein, who played here for the first time with the orchestra, gave an excellent performance of the Concerto. The Andante is one of Beethoven's supreme conceptions. Its very simplicity is a stumbling block to many, the simplicity of Beethoven when he was greatest. Mr. Rubinstein's technical ability, conspicuous as it is, was not ostentatiously displayed; it served gladly the composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major for strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello concerto, No. 1 (Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem, op. 4 (First time in Boston.)

HERALD APR 2

SYMPHONY RESTORES CHADWICK

Master Work Heard After 32 Years on Shelf

BY OLIN DOWNES

Kalinnikoff's symphony in G minor, played for the first time in Boston; Beethoven's G major concerto, with Arthur Rubinstein as pianist, and George W. Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture, made the programme of the 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Chadwick was present at the concert.

A DELIGHTFUL SYMPHONY

This was the first time Kalinnikoff had figured on a symphony programme. He was born at Woma, Russia, in 1866. He died in 1901. Why the performance of his symphony, which has been heard in many other American cities, and which was first heard in 1897, has been delayed so long, it is difficult to say. For this is a delightful symphony or should be, if the last two of its four movements are representative of the whole.

The form is conventional for the most part, but the ideas are charming. They are genuinely and characteristically Slavic, as witness the theme of the opening movement which recurs in the finale; also the main theme of the slow movement, which likewise recurs; the fascinating middle portion of the scherzo; the racial quality, from the first note to the last, of the concluding section. The symphony sails along, as lucid, dexterous as you like, following established procedure, following it with both ease and sincerity. The composer is pleasantly at home in his form. His instrumentation is clear and brilliant.

Mr. Rubinstein's Playing

Mr. Rubinstein, in turn, gave a delightful performance of Beethoven's most original and romantic composition for piano and orchestra. He was brilliant without being metallic or superficial. He was imaginative, poetic, without losing for a moment that note of underlying virility and force which is felt in the most [illegible] of Beethoven. We do not remember a finer performance of the concerto in G major. Mr. Rubinstein was repeatedly recalled.

Then came what is to the writer Mr. Chadwick's greatest orchestral composition, the overture which after 35 years remains in its vein the greatest outstanding achievement of American orchestral composition. It is not merely the sounds of the instruments, as Whitman would say, which move us when we listen to this music. It is the spirit behind the instruments, the genius of the music itself. It has the feeling of Greek drama. There is felt the imminence of destiny, of terrible penalties and atonements. There is the exaltation of the moment when the puny being called man, cleansed, ennobled, majestic through knowledge, suffering and resignation, confronts calmly the high gods of his fate. This overture was written by a young man fresh from his European studies nearly four decades ago. In it are the things the race will not willingly let die.

Remarkable Workmanship

There are remarkable qualities of workmanship which, accompanying the depth and sincerity of feeling, make the music so significant today. The form, though it shows intense devotion to the classic architectural tradition, is not at all a slavish following of rules. It is the characteristic vehicle of original thought, compact but never stiff, inflexible or unsusceptible to dramatic requirements. The musical motives possess that force which impresses the idea on the hearer and engenders heat and additional strength in development. The orchestration seems the one inevitable dress of that musical thought. Nothing but the English horn and oboe could properly intone the motive, ominous and fateful, which sounds over rolling drums.

Later on the sombreness of low registers of the strings and wind instruments is suddenly set off by the wild shrill fanfare of the trumpets. Then recall the passage at the beginning of the coda, if memory serves, in which the basses stalk about with the initial motive of the allegro.

Mr Monteux's performance was compelling in its eloquence, proportions and sweep. Hearing it, one asked with considerable wonder why this overture has not been more frequently played at the symphony concerts. The last performance at these concerts was in 1902. That is unjustifiable neglect of music which the rising generation cannot do without.

To its invincible sincerity, its loftiness of spirit, its uncompromising pursuit of a great purpose, the deepest respect, the humblest gratitude are due.

Mr. Chadwick, who was present at this performance, may very well congratulate himself on a composition which sets him apart from every other American composer of his period, and which will long remain a monument to his talent and his ideals.

POST APR. 2.

RUBINSTEIN HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Plays in Beethoven's G Major Piano Concerto

Arthur Rubinstein, the soloist, at yesterday's Symphony concert, was warmly applauded for his playing in Beethoven's G major piano concerto. His phrasing was that of a sensitive and intelligent musician. His technique is adequate, but his chief interest seems to be in giving a faithful and clean cut interpretation of the composer's intention.

The deftness and imagination that made Mr Rubinstein's performance enjoyable, were conspicuously lacking in the orchestral accompaniment, which was unpardonably ragged and perfunctory, owing, perhaps, to insufficient rehearsal. The slow movement, especially, was marred by the failure of Mr Monteux and the orchestra to mark and vary the accents in the tragic figure for strings in octaves which recurs at intervals.

The First Symphony of Kalinnikoff substituted for the Sibelius originally announced, was given a spirited and intelligent performance. If not a supreme masterpiece, it is at least clever and agreeable music. Kalinnikoff at least borrows with discretion from a wide range of sources, adapting to his purpose the styles, rather than the themes of such composers as Brahms, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The other number was Mr Chadwick's familiar "Melpomene" overture, with which there is no fault to find except that one would rather listen to Brahms' "Tragic Overture," a far more poignant appeal to the muse of tragedy.

Next week Alwin Schroeder, the veteran cellist, admired here for 40 years as a member of the Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet, will be the soloist, in Saint-Saens' A minor concerto. The other numbers are Schubert's seldom-heard Fourth Symphony, an "Epic Poem" by Vassilenko and Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, in E major.

GLOBE APR 2

An all-Tschaikowsky program will make the last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3.30, one of the musical events of the season.

Alwin Schroeder, the veteran violoncellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9, playing the Saint-Saens' violoncello

RECORD APR 2

SUNDAY afternoon, April 10, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting, for the profit of its Pension Fund. The programme will be drawn wholly from the music of Chaikovsky—his Fifth Symphony of the songful slow movement; his "Italian Caprice" and "Slavic March"; the first movement of his Concerto for Violin, with Mr. Burgin in the solo part, and his Rococo Variations for Violoncello, with Mr. Bedetti as soloist. They are the twin glories of the present string-choir. Already the town knows the newer and finer mettle of the orchestra and applauds the conductor's powers.

RESURRECTIONS from Schubert intermittently tempt conductors. After all the Unfinished Symphony, the symphony in C major, the Overture and the Ballet Music of "Rosamünde" are a slender repertory. Back accordingly goes choice to the earlier Symphonies, otherwise little heeded. Dr. Muck resurrected one—the Third—in his day; while at the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux purposes to disinter another—the Fourth in C minor, commonly called the "Tragic Symphony." A songful Andante in true Schubertian vein distinguishes it. The other novel piece upon the programme is an "Epic Poem" by the little known Russian, Vassilenko. According to Mr. Montagu-Nathan's solemn affirmation in his book about Muscovite music, "it exhibits a taste and talent for mediævalism, supported by a profound knowledge of modal and church music." Two other pieces round out Mr. Monteux's list: Mr. Foote's Suite in E major for string choir and Saint-Saens's Concerto for Violoncello, with Mr. Schroeder of the first desk to play the solo part.

Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" will likewise be played at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening, as final item of a programme that begins with Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony and proceeds with Lalo's Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra. In the latter piece, Mr. Gerardi of the string choir will play the solo-part.

TRANS. APR. 2.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE GRAVE AND TWO EASY-GOING PIECES

A New Chadwick Looms Large Out of His Old "Melpomene" Overture — A Bright, Eager, Songful, Fanciful Music from the Russian, Kalinnikov—Arthur Rubinstein, Virtuoso Pianist, According to Type

IN a sense the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was a concert of surprises. It yielded, first, a light, transparent, unlabored, altogether pleasing Symphony—the Russian Kalinnikov's in G minor—that other publics in America have heard gladly, but that conductors in Boston have hitherto overlooked. And in these days of "cerebration" and the cosmos in tones, a simple and songful symphony is a rare bird that should be promptly netted. Secondly the concert restored in the pianist of the day, Mr. Rubinstein, a virtuoso of a type now nearly vanished—of singular aspect, of individual, if not peculiar, manner, content with his own skill playing over the surface of the chosen piece. Finally, for the surprise of surprises, Mr. Chadwick's overture of the eighties, "Melpomene," was played for the first time in many years. And lo! the Chadwick of those days was composer of large mind and warm imagination, gaining grave beauty, commanding sober power—no tired juggler with new forms, new manners, the commonplaces of a later day, as he has seemed too often for his own good in recent tone-poems. With reason a pleasured audience gave continuous evidence of its enjoyment. From October through April there are twenty-four pairs of Symphony Concerts. Naturally, properly, many of them bring exacting music. By the same token a few of them should be easy-going. The flexible Monteux knows above most of his predecessors the virtue of variety.

In those days, a full thirty-five years ago, Mr. Chadwick would hymn the Muse of Tragedy, as Greeks and Romans knew the nine sisters, guardians of the arts—the darkling dolorous Melpomene of fate predestined, woes endured, tumults traversed, of heroic resolution and heroic resignation. Hence a music of large design and voice, moving in agitation, sombrely colored, keeping always to an austere progress. There is darksome beginning as of overspreading doom and destiny; middle measures of stress, struggle, turbulent vicissitude, noble contention; an end, within the pall of fate again, but now mantle to human fortitude. The bowed heads are still proud and not unlamented. Formally, Mr. Chadwick has achieved a pervading unity of design. He has written an overture according to orthodox prescription—slow introduction, "main body" of changeful matter and mood; due climax; epilogue which is as prologue renewed and transfigured. The purists may not quarrel with him.

Fused as completely within this formal progress is the poetic, the emotional content of the piece—destiny of the high gods, brave human resolution; storm and stress, tumult and torture; fate the invincible, but fate not unillumined. The champions of matter over manner may rest well content. Always again, Mr. Chadwick's means achieve his ends. The motivs have clear profile, individual substance, bear or develop expressive voice. The note of destiny penetrates, haunts, takes specific mood in the unfolding, at will of the composer. The clash of combat strikes large and full, drives high, shivers against the unconquerable; and, at finis, by no small imagination in the transfiguring of motif, fate also pities. Throughout the darksome harmonies shadow, but never cloud, the sombre background; in the measures of strife come modulations that pierce or clang; there

ONCERT BY N'S ORCHESTRA

" Sung in English at opolitan—Pavlowa
s Engagement.

n Symphony Orchestra
for the season to its following yesterday af-arnegie Hall. It was an
ive audience and not so
the Boston men have er times. This attitude
been due to the pro-
contained nothing thril-
was played in a manner
nvention.
eux, the conductor, sub-elssohn's Scotch sym-the announced Cesar minor, and other numiszt's symphonic poem
abrier's overture to the oline," and Glazounoff's
o, in which the soloist
Burgin, the orchestra's
Mr. Burgin is an ex-
reliable fiddler and
xpected of a concert-

olitan Opera Company,
e, offered its new pro-
ohengrin" in English,
organization's finest Orville Harrold took place in the title role,
is a somewhat portly
Grail his conception
intelligent and his fine
uch to the enjoyment
ging of the final narra-rtistic piece of work.
on, Clarence Whitehill, fson, Julia Claussen as bert Leonhardt round-
cipals. Mr. Bodanzky

a and her ballet con-
gagement at the Man-
House in the evening,
ce also terminating a
our of the country.
dancer found America
dmirer of her art as
y figures the manage-red last evening. If it would appear that the past season here
une of $750,000, an av-0 a week. The dan-
his is $100,000 and the
rtune Gallo, $150,000.
able engagement was ere a matinee and an
mance netted $17,000.
$50,000 to see the last
ances. F. H. W.

MAR 2 6 1921

SYMPHONY
Carnegie Hall

ny Orchestra played the concerts for the current ll, New York, on Tuesday
Under the able leadership
well balanced program,
cond Symphony, Weber's
ra "Euryanthe," Ravel's
ntimentals" and the ball-oz's "Romeo and Juliet," received. Especially oboe solo of Gorgeos number. The final con-
turday afternoon.

RICAN
Pa.

Supply Demand

on Martin

and incredible that ties of a city of the e of Philadelphia
sed, instead of in-pace with the city's ch is the paradox
ns by the final con-
Boston Symphony
onday evening, and
aliber of the Metro-
mpany's presentation
e following evening.
activities in other
to pr tions little comparatively few
season's calendar is itals and concerts of
and there has been rowth of popular
ces of grand opera
eason. But it is the
of our own and
as, and the ambi-
expensive operatic hat determine the re of the utmost im-dently. And it is the anomaly in the law of supply and nted.

otes the acute confidences at the Fri-d Saturday evening
Philadelphia Orches-fail to realize that essary.

Now that it has been endowed by popular subscription, the orchestra truly belongs to the city, and some regular arrangement should certainly be made to provide for those who cannot now obtain admission to either series of concerts.

Hitherto, we have had additional concerts supplied regularly each season by both the New York and Boston Symphony orchestras. But now that the visits of the Boston orchestra have been permanently and definitely withdrawn, upon the ground that there is an increased demand for concerts in and around Boston, it becomes apparent that something should be done to offset this decrease in vital musical fare.

* * *

The operatic situation is somewhat different, but has its points of similarity also, in the congestion caused by transferring the opera from the Metropolitan to the Academy. With the house virtually sold out on subscription, it is impossible for the general public to satisfy its thirst for first-class opera, and there can be no possible doubt that there is a crying need for more opera of the first class for the discriminating music lovers of the city.

Then, too, the question of healthy competition is a vital one. In the old days, with the Metropolitan at the Academy, and Hammerstein (followed by his succeeding organization, the Philadelphia-Chicago Company), at the Metropolitan, the city enjoyed the best operatic casts, and the greatest variety and interest in the works presented that it has ever known.

This year the Metropolitan company's offerings have been far more varied, and greater in novelty, than last season. But there is not the spur of competition to bring casts of old-time excellence, while at the same time only a limited number can gain admission to the performances that are given.

* * *

Of course, the obvious answer to this situation is that it would be a mighty fine thing for the city to have the annual visits of the Chicago company resumed, and the Metropolitan Opera House is the logical place. The fact that the company's engagement of one week two years ago did not crowd the house at a few performances was due wholly to conditions at the time, not to any lack of interest or unwillingness to support the performances. The Chicago company, with the one and only Mary Garden, is seriously missed, and its return would undoubtedly be hailed with gratitude and hearty support by the many who know what it has done, and what it might do here in the future.

All of this is said with due appreciation of what the Metropolitan company has done and is doing now. But the return of the Chicago forces under Captain Mary, would surely have everything in its favor, to say nothing of the impetus it would give to musical affairs, and there should be no real reason to prevent the Metropolitan Opera House from being utilized to house it.

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Out Go the Orchestras and On Come the Recitalers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its local ministrations for this season in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon; the Symphony Society of New York completed its home season in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux chose for his parting symphony Mendelssohn's "Scotch," which at least is not overdriven these days. Played very beautifully by the Bostonians, it proved a welcome revival. Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus," which likewise is not overdriven in this city of much Liszt, Glazounoff's violin concerto (revealing the sincerity and musicianship of the Boston concert master, Richard Burgin), and the splendid overture to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," were the other numbers on the farewell programme.

Concerts and Operas

Mr. Monteux may not have quite as good an orchestra as Dr. Muck had, but he makes better programmes for those who attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra's final concert, on Saturday afternoon, brought Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which one was glad to hear again, and which was played gracefully; Glazounoff's violin concerto, well played by the orchestra's concert master, Richard Burgin; and between them Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," the beauties of which were admirably set forth by M. Monteux and his well trained players. It is not, as a whole, one of Liszt's most successful works, but there are pages in it which touch the very sources of musical inspiration. When Wagner first heard this symphonic poem it made so indelible an impression on him that he borrowed one passage in it for his "Parsifal," a quarter of a century later.

POST N

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

MAR 2

Damrosch, Monteux and Mengelberg.

Both Walter Damrosch and Pierre Monteux made their final appearances for the season on Sunday and Saturday at the head of their respective orchestras, whilst Willem Mengelberg entered the last week of his stay here as conductor of the National Symphony. There was nothing of overwhelming import that transpired during any of these three concerts. Mr. Damrosch, yesterday afternoon at Aeolian Hall, presented in clear and straightforward fashion Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, too much overlooked generally by conductors hereabouts. He repeated Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" fragments from one of the mid-week concerts, and Paul Kochanski gave about as interesting an account of Bruch's "Scotch" fantasia as this considerably jejune composition warrants.

The Scotch "snap" was also motived by Mr. Monteux at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Mendelssohn's symphony written as the outcome of his browsing about in the land of bare-kneed balladry having been the principal number on this programme. The music grows thinner and thinner of substance year by year—a deal more than the modicum of Scotch snap in it would be needed to save it from fast approaching limbo. Mr. Monteux also played Liszt's "Orpheus" (likewise showing heavy wearage) and the overture to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," between which Richard Burgin, the orchestra's principal violin, played the Glazunov concerto in rather concertmasterlike fashion.

Mr. Mengelberg's Sunday evening concert again brought forward Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," dedicated to the conductor and therefore, perhaps, an excusable repetition, and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. Between these, Alexander Schmuller gave another performance of the Beethoven concerto of as little compelling power as his first a week or so ago with the Philharmonic Orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

Sir—Having been a regular subscrib for more than twenty-five years to the co certs given by the Boston Symphony O chestra, I was glad to see your timely and appreciative editorial in your issue of March 16. There is one point, however, that many of us would like to have made clear: Why has the decision been made that we are to have no more regular concerts by this orchestra? I understand Washington and Baltimore are still to have their regular series.

The only reason I have seen given is that the demand for concerts in the vicinity of Boston is so great that Philadelphia is to be omitted from the list. This is certainly not an adequate explanation. Have we shown any discourtesy, financial or otherwise, to this wonderful organization to which Philadelphia owes so much of its musical life?

A REGULAR SUBSCRIBER TO THE PUBLIC LEDGER.
Philadelphia, March 20, 1921.

20TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Work by Kalinnikoff Is Played for the First Time in Boston

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN IN BEETHOVEN PIECE

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Kalinnikoff, Symphony No. 1, G minor (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto in G major, No 4, for piano (Arthur Rubinstein, pianist); Chadwick, Dramatic Overture, "Melpomene."

Kalinnikoff's symphony, which was produced at Kieff in 1897, should have been heard in Boston long before yesterday. Why did the conductors neglect it? Is it too melodious? Is it too "light"? The audience found it most agreeable music, unmistakably Slav in spirit, yet not aggressively nationalistic. Here and there the influence of Tschaikowsky is felt, but there is no servile imitation. On the contrary, Kalinnikoff has much to say for himself. He was very poor in his early years. When he was 27 years old his future was bright; his ability as a composer was recognized; he had an honorable position at Moscow in the Italian Opera House. The next year he was "ordered South." During the remaining years—he died within two days of being 35—he composed in the Crimea and waited for the end.

It is customary to say when a composer is thus fated that his works show a melancholy akin to despair. This has been said of many in various walks of life. The [illegible] remains that some do not thus betray physical weakness and mental perturbation. Beethoven in a most dismal mood wrote a singularly cheerful symphony. Brahms was sometimes musically in doleful dumps when he was enjoying his restaurant life in Vienna, gay in his rude manner with his many friends.

Now in Kalinnikoff's Symphony certain themes and phases of their development are tinged with melancholy, but it is not a personal lamentation, never a wail, never a shriek, as is the case with many pages of Tschaikowsky; there is no suggestion of sullen, morose despair as in pages of Brahms. There is the melancholy that so often characterizes the Russian folk song, though the words of the song may be anything but sombre. Kalinnikoff' themes are often simple, but they make a direct appeal through their honesty of sentiment and expression. He had a sense of grace and beauty. He could be ingenious in harmonic and orchestral treatment without seeming merely a haphazard experimenter. Contriving unusual effects for the Andante and the Trio of the Scherzo, he knew well what he was about. The symphony, finely played, was welcomed yesterday with more than ordinary warmth.

Mr. Chadwick's overture was composed in 1886. To use his own words, it was his purpose to typify in tones "an atmosphere of tragic poetry in general." That he succeeded in doing this is indisputable. There have been iconoclasts, revolutionaries, impressionists, anarchists in music during the last 35 years. There have been works that at the time were furiously applauded, declared "epoch-making"; and where are they today? There have been novel harmonic systems with constant experimentation in orchestral colors; much progress, legitimate and desirable; often merely a vain attempt to impress or startle by superficial means, orchestral juggling, the mere ear tickling or ear stunning of the moment. Mr. Chadwick's overture remains a noble work, nobly planned, nobly executed, with musical ideas that are inherently tragic, deeply emotional. There is Greek feeling in modern expression. In this instance the title of the work does not belie its contents.

Mr. Rubinstein, who played here for the first time with the orchestra, gave an excellent performance of the Concerto. The Andante is one of Beethoven's supreme conceptions. Its very simplicity is a stumbling block to many, the simplicity of Beethoven when he was greatest. Mr. Rubinstein's technical ability, conspicuous as it is, was not ostentatiously displayed; it served gladly the composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major for strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello concerto, No. 1 (Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem, op. 4 (First time in Boston.)

HERALD APR 2

SYMPHONY RESTORES CHADWICK

Master Work Heard After 32 Years on Shelf

BY OLIN DOWNES

Kalinnikoff's symphony in G minor, played for the first time in Boston; Beethoven's G major concerto, with Arthur Rubinstein as pianist, and George W. Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture, made the programme of the 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Chadwick was present at the concert.

A DELIGHTFUL SYMPHONY

This was the first time Kallinnikoff had figured on a symphony programme. He was born at Woma, Russia, in 1866. He died in 1901. Why the performance of his symphony, which has been heard in many other American cities, and which was first heard in 1897, has been delayed so long, it is difficult to say. For this is a delightful symphony or should be, if the last two of its four movements are representative of the whole.

The form is conventional for the most part, but the ideas are charming. They are genuinely and characteristically Slavic, as witness the theme of the opening movement which recurs in the finale; also the main theme of the slow movement, which likewise recurs; the fascinating middle portion of the scherzo; the racial quality, from the first note to the last, of the concluding section. The symphony sails along, as lucid, dexterous as you like, following established procedure, following it with both ease and sincerity. The composer is pleasantly at home in his form. His instrumentation is clear and brilliant.

Mr. Rubinstein's Playing

Mr. Rubinstein, in turn, gave a delightful performance of Beethoven's most original and romantic composition for piano and orchestra. He was brilliant without being metallic or superficial. He was imaginative, poetic, without losing for a moment that note of underlying virility and force which is felt in the most tender passage of Beethoven. We do not remember a finer performance of the concerto in G major. Mr. Rubinstein was repeatedly recalled.

Then came what is to the writer Mr. Chadwick's greatest orchestral composition, the overture which after 35 years remains in its vein the greatest outstanding achievement of American orchestral composition. It is not merely the sounds of the instruments, as Whitman would say, which move us when we listen to this music. It is the spirit behind the instruments, the genius of the music itself. It has the feeling of Greek drama. There is felt the imminence of destiny, of terrible penalties and atonements. There is the exaltation of the moment when the puny being called man, cleansed, ennobled, majestic through knowledge, suffering and resignation, confronts calmly the high gods of his fate. This overture was written by a young man fresh from his European studies nearly four decades ago.—In it are the things the race will not willingly let die.

Remarkable Workmanship

There are remarkable qualities of workmanship which, accompanying the depth and sincerity of feeling, make the music so significant today. The form, though it shows intense devotion to the classic architectural tradition, is not at all a slavish following of rules. It is the characteristic vehicle of original thought, compact but never stiff, inflexible or unsusceptible to dramatic requirements. The musical motives possess that force which impresses the idea on the hearer and engenders heat and additional strength in development. The orchestration seems the one inevitable dress of that musical thought. Nothing but the English horn and oboe could properly intone the motive, ominous and fateful, which sounds over rolling drums.

Later on the sombreness of low registers of the strings and wind instruments is suddenly set off by the wild shrill fanfare of the trumpets. Then recall the passage at the beginning of the coda, if memory serves, in which the basses stalk about with the initial motive of the allegro.

Mr Monteux's performance was compelling in its eloquence, proportions and sweep. Hearing it, one asked with considerable wonder why this overture has not been more frequently played at the symphony concerts. The last performance at these concerts was in 1902. That is unjustifiable neglect of music which the rising generation cannot do without.

To its invincible sincerity, its loftiness of spirit, its uncompromising pursuit of a great purpose, the deepest respect, the humblest gratitude are due.

Mr. Chadwick, who was present at this performance, may very well congratulate himself on a composition which sets him apart from every other American composer of his period, and which will long remain a monument to his talent and his ideals.

POST APR. 2.

RUBINSTEIN HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Plays in Beethoven's G Major Piano Concerto

Arthur Rubinstein, the soloist, at yesterday's Symphony concert, was warmly applauded for his playing in Beethoven's G major piano concerto. Hi phrasing was that of a sensitive and intelligent musician. His technique i adequate, but his chief interest seem to be in giving a faithful and clean cu interpretation of the composer's intention.

The deftness and imagination tha made Mr Rubinstein's performance enjoyable, were conspicuously lacking i the orchestral accompaniment, whic was unpardonably ragged and perfunctory, owing, perhaps, to insufficient rehearsal. The slow movement, especially, was marred by the failure of M Monteux and the orchestra to mark an vary the accents in the tragic figure fo strings in octaves which recurs at intervals.

The First Symphony of Kalinnikoff substituted for the Sibelius originall announced, was given a spirited and intelligent performance. If not a suprem masterpiece, it is at least clever an agreeable music. Kalinnikoff at leas borrows with discretion from a wid range of sources, adapting to his purpose the styles, rather than the themes of such composers as Brahms, Wagne and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The other number was Mr Chadwick' familiar "Melpomene" overture, wit which there is no fault to find excep that one would rather listen to Brahms "Tragic Overture," a far more poignan appeal to the muse of tragedy.

Next week Alwin Schroeder, the veteran cellist, admired here for 40 year as a member of the Symphony Orchestr and the Kneisel Quartet, will be the soloist, in Saint-Saens' A minor concerto The other numbers are Schubert's seldom-heard Fourth Symphony; an "Epi Poem" by Vassilenko and Arthu Foote's Suite for Strings, in E major.

GLOBE APR. 2.

An all-Tschaikowsky program will make the last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3.30, one of the musical events of the season.

Alwin Schroeder, the veteran violoncellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at th next pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9 playing the Saint-Saens' violoncell

---

ent, stuck as a part of the stillness
the Fourth Section Burial grounds which rolls up from the ubbly shore behind Bennington st.
through the hours these cavaliers

RECORD APR. 2.

SUNDAY afternoon, April 10, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting, for the profit of its Pension Fund. The programme will be drawn wholly from the music of Chaikovsky—his Fifth Symphony of the songful slow movement; his "Italian Caprice" and "Slavic March"; the first movement of his Concerto for Violin, with Mr. Burgin in the solo-part, and his Rococo Variations for Violoncello, with Mr. Bedetti as soloist. They are the twin glories of the present string-choir. Already the town knows the newer and finer mettle of the orchestra and applauds the conductor's powers.

RESURRECTIONS from Schubert intermittently tempt conductors. After all the Unfinished Symphony, the Symphony in C major, the Overture and the Ballet Music of "Rosamünde" are a slender repertory. Back accordingly goes choice to the earlier Symphonies, otherwise little heeded. Dr. Muck resurrected one—the Third—in his day; while at the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux purposes to disinter another—the Fourth in C minor, commonly called the "Tragic Symphony." A songful Andante in true Schubertian vein distinguishes it. The other novel piece upon the programme is an "Epic Poem" by the little known Russian, Vassilenko. According to Mr. Montagu-Nathan's solemn affirmation in his book about Muscovite music, "it exhibits a taste and talent for mediævalism, supported by a profound knowledge of modal and church music." Two other pieces round out Mr. Monteux's list: Mr. Foote's Suite in E major for string choir and Saint-Säens's Concerto for Violoncello, with Mr. Schroeder of the first desk to play the solo part.

Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" will likewise be played at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening, as final item of a programme that begins with Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony and proceeds with Lalo's Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra. In the latter piece, Mr. Gerardi of the string choir will play the solo-part.

TRANS. APR. 2.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE GRAVE AND TWO EASY-GOING PIECES

A New Chadwick Looms Large Out of His Old "Melpomene" Overture — A Bright, Eager, Songful, Fanciful Music from the Russian, Kalinnikov—Arthur Rubinstein, Virtuoso Pianist, According to Type

IN a sense the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was a concert of surprises. It yielded, first, a light, transparent, unlabored, altogether pleasing Symphony—the Russian Kalinnikov's in G minor—that other publics in America have heard gladly, but that conductors in Boston have hitherto overlooked. And in these days of "cerebration" and the cosmos in tones, a simple and songful symphony is a rare bird that should be promptly netted. Secondly the concert restored in the pianist of the day, Mr. Rubinstein, a virtuoso of a type now nearly vanished—of singular aspect, of individual, if not peculiar, manner, content with his own skill playing over the surface of the chosen piece. Finally, for the surprise of surprises, Mr. Chadwick's overture of the eighties, "Melpomene," was played for the first time in many years. And lo! the Chadwick of those days was composer of large mind and warm imagination, gaining grave beauty, commanding sober power—no tired juggler with new forms, new manners, the commonplaces of a later day, as he has seemed too often for his own good in recent tone-poems. With reason a pleasured audience gave continuous evidence of its enjoyment. From October through April there are twenty-four pairs of Symphony Concerts. Naturally, properly, many of them bring exacting music. By the same token a few of them should be easy-going. The flexible Monteux knows above most of his predecessors the virtue of variety.

In those days, a full thirty-five years ago, Mr. Chadwick would hymn the Muse of Tragedy, as Greeks and Romans knew the nine sisters, guardians of the arts—the darkling dolorous Melpomene of fate predestined, woes endured, tumults traversed, of heroic resolution and heroic resignation. Hence a music of large design and voice, moving in agitation, sombrely colored, keeping always to an austere progress. There is darksome beginning as of overspreading doom and destiny; middle measures of stress, struggle, turbulent vicissitude, noble contention; an end, within the pall of fate again, but now mantle to human fortitude. The bowed heads are still proud and not unlamented. Formally, Mr. Chadwick has achieved a pervading unity of design. He has written an overture according to orthodox prescription—slow introduction, "main body" of changeful matter and mood; due climax; epilogue which is as prologue renewed and transfigured. The purists may not quarrel with him.

Fused as completely within this formal progress is the poetic, the emotional content of the piece—destiny of the high gods, brave human resolution; storm and stress, tumult and torture; fate the invincible, but fate not unillumined. The champions of matter over manner may rest well content. Always again, Mr. Chadwick's means achieve his ends. The motivs have clear profile, individual substance, bear or develop expressive voice. The note of destiny penetrates, haunts takes specific mood in the unfolding, at will of the composer. The clash of combat strikes large and full, drives high, shivers against the unconquerable; and, at finis, by no small imagination in the transfiguring of motif, fate also pities. Throughout the darksome harmonies shadow, but never cloud, the sombre background; in the measures of strife come modulations that pierce or clang; there are contrasts of timbres—as when resistance pales, shatters upon the inevitable—that were, that remain power. A noble reticence glows through the sombre end. And even in the overture thrums the high heroic note. In those days, it seems, Mr. Chadwick might summon and convey deep tone of exaltation. Back to Mozart says this voice among the makers and the commentators of music in these troubled times. Back to Beethoven cries another throat. Since a place upon current programmes is counted Mr. Chadwick's due, why not back to the Chadwick of these earlier pieces—this "Melpomene"; the neglected "Adonais"; and, in another vein, the Symphonic Sketches? They far excel the tone-poems of obligation and the fashion in these, the composer's infertile years. It is the custom nowadays to turn the smile that barely misses sneer upon the "New England group" of elder composers, to count them as inconsequential as though they were Longfellows or Whittiers of minor verse. Yet hardly an American not a New Englander could have compassed the austerities—and the nobilities—of this overture of the Tragic Muse.

Kalinnikov's Symphony is a light and pleasing music. Kalinnikov, it seems, was a Russian of the generation that is now middle-aged. Tuberculosis smote him; he died relatively young; he left behind a considerable baggage—outside this particular Symphony unknown to concert-halls and opera houses in the western world, not too often heard from Russian stages. Apparently his were the mind and the spirit that go their own independent way; while precarious health compelled him to life apart. He was not of the old Russians taking thought of Glinka and of Dargomyzhsky; he was not of the Russian nationalists, Balakirev and Musorgsky en tête; he was as far from the neurotic and super-saturated Chaikovsky, as he was from the harmonic magnificence, the instrumental splendor, the lush oriental opulence of Rimsky-Korsakov. No more is he semi-Germanized Russian in the manner of Rakhmaninov and Medtner. In a word, he was merely and simply Kalinnikov, putting to paper the music that was in him to make. The prodigious and occasionally pedantic prophets of the programme-books discover a "Russian" physiognomy in his motivs, even in a few measures of his preluding. To one and another casual hearer, yesterday, it was not so apparent. Somehow the impression did persist that any man, anywhere might have written Kalinnikov's Symphony—if he happened to be Kalinnikov.

Throughout, it is a pleasurable Symphony to hear—as clear as the day, as bright as the sunshine with only a littl passing cloud, here and there, to cross, shadow and agreeably diversify it. Quickly Kalinnikov's motives flower into melodies that are as pure instrumental song, though by no means so deeply felt, as Schubert's own. He develops them fancifully; adorns them gracefully, conducts them warmly; sets them in unforced contrast; bestows artful little ingenuities upon them like the twitterings of the harp over the first motiv of the slow movement, like the sparkling showers of figures dappling more stationary measures; lifts them eagerly through crescendo to climax. Con amore, wrote Kalinnikov through this Symphony; youthful ardors kindle the music; youthful candors release it; from first measure to last it is delightfully free from calculating, brooding, striving self-consciousness. Happily for Kalinnikov and his hearers, the cosmos little interested him. There was music in his heart; he set it free with his mind to guide and choose the way. Yet his were no indiscriminate youthful heats. He is selective with apt means; he is sensitive to moods. It was good to hear again a robust and hoofing, rather than flickering, fleering Scherzo. Charm exhaled from an Andante, melancholy without Gallic sophistication. And he was very "grand," indeed, as the youngsters say, when he martialled almost all his motivs through the commingled sonorities of the Fin[illegible]. Young blood is good blood when it flows so eagerly, brightly, honestly as it does through this one and only "opus"—in American concert-halls—of Kalinnikov.

Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, pianist and intermezzo of the afternoon between Symphony and Overture, is none of your professional gentlemen of this hour of Hofmann and Bauer, Kreisler and Spalding, who come to their audiences in business-like aspect and manner and in like fashion give proof of the artistry and the individuality veiled within. Rather Mr. Rubinstein is of an elder, a vanishing, and yet a perennially renewed species of virtuosi. His locks are not as the hair of other men; he wears the frock-coat of Reisenauer, Paderewski, Busoni; his face is a pale ovel of singular contours; his manner has idiosyncrasy: with upturned face and closed eyes, he plays through many a measure; or a moment of meditation bows him closer to the keyboard. And all this without a trace of personal flourish, of impression sought upon an audience. Seemingly it is honest second-nature to him, virtuoso second-nature.

As virtuoso Mr. Rubinstein likewise made way through the piano-part of Beethoven's Concerto in G major—the Concerto of the [illegible] movement wherein the piano sighs first seductive and then resigned—against strings that will not be persuaded out of mutterings. The first division is manipulation, modulation, "passage-work" to satiety, and through it Mr. Rubinstein was adept with limpid and thin, cool and crystalline tone that rippled over figure, twined into arabesque, impassive as pellucid stream. The second division was akin—were it not that Beethoven there asks a sentiment that evaded equally the chiseling Rubinstein and a perfunctory and monotonous Monteux. To the finale of sprightly pattern-weaving the pianist added tonal glint, rhythmic élan, and a lengthy, a paling Concerto was done. Probably in first and last movement there remain now no more than the surfaces Mr. Rubinstein expertly skimmed: but the Andante runs deeper than his virtuoso-shallows, and such quality, quite missed yesterday by both conductor and pianist, is the one and only to this Concerto in concert-halls.

The London Symphony Anew?

Possible Repetition at the Symphony Concerts

As plausible report goes, Mr. Monteux is considering a repetition of Vaughan Williams' London Symphony in the course of the Symphony Concerts through April. With reason the conductor sets it high in the music of our time; believes that better acquaintance with it only deepens the pleasure that it yields; finds in it matter that new performance and new hearing are sure to ripen. It is safe to say that many frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are like-minded. The London Symphony impressed them beyond any new music of the year. They remember in it much that they would gladly know afresh; they anticipate from a repetition much that at first hearing inevitably escaped them; they trust that Mr. Monteux's present "consideration" will become favorable decision. After all, the public of the Symphony Concerts that welcomes the new things, the fine things, of music in this immediate day deserves—once and again—to be humored.

TRANS. APR. 2.

Tschaikowsky for Pension Fund

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the last pension fund concert of the present season, which will consist entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky, the great Russian composer. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the Russian violinist, who came from his native country last autumn to be concert master of the orchestra, who will play the first movement of the master Russian's violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the eminene leader of the 'cello section, who will be heard in the Rococo Variations. The symphony on this occasion will be the Fifth in E-minor, which, composed in Tchaikowsky's last years, is now considered one of his greatest achievements. The remaining numbers will be the Italian Caprice, constructed on popular Italian melodies after a visit to Italy by Tschaikowsky, and, finally, the well-known "Marche Slave."

Boston Symphony Programme

At the 21st pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9, Alvin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist of the orchestra who was once a member of the Kneisel Quartet, and now sits at the first stand, will play the concerto for violoncello by Saint-Saens.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's Fourth Symphony in C minor, which is less known than the C major and "Unfinished" symphonies, but very highly regarded and particularly famous for the beauty of its slow movement.

The other numbers on the programme will be Arthur Foote's Suite for string orchestra in E major, consisting of Prelude, Pizzicato and Adagietto, and Fugue, and, to close the programme, the Epic Poem, by the young Russian composer, Vassilenko, to be heard for the first time in Boston.

POST APR. 3.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the last pension fund concert of the present season, which will be a musical event in that it will consist entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky, the great Russian composer. There will be two soloists. Richard Burgin, the Russian violinist who came from his native country last autumn to be concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the first movement of the violin concerto; Jean Bedetti, the eminent leader of the 'cello section, will play the Rococo Variations. The symphony on this occasion will be the Fifth in E minor, which, composed in Tschaikowsky's last years, is now considered one of his greatest achievements. The third movement, a waltz, has helped to make the symphony popular wherever it has been heard. The remaining numbers will be the Italian Caprice, constructed on popular Italian melodies after a visit to Italy, and, finally, the well-known Marche Slav.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the 21st pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9, Alvin Schroeder, the veteran violoncellist of the orchestra, who was once a member of the Kneisel Quartette and now sits at the first stand, will play the concerto for violoncello by Saint-Saens. Mr. Monteux will conduct Schubert's Fourth Symphony in C minor, the "Tragic," which is less well known than the C-major and "Unfinished" symphonies, but is highly regarded, especially for the beauty of the slow movement. The other numbers will be Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major, consisting of prelude, pizzicato and adagietto, and fugue, and the Epic Poem by Vassilenko, which will then be heard for the first time in Boston.

HERALD. APR. 3.

POLICEMAN IS HURT IN FIGHT

Patrolman George Reid of the Back Bay police was badly beaten late last night in an encounter with a man giving his name as Nicholas Forlani, 32 years old, of Hemenway street, who, according to his statement to the police, is a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Only for the appearance of citizens the patrolman would have been more seriously injured, as Forlani is alleged to have had the policeman down on the street and to have been in the act of pointing a loaded gun at him when the three men arrived.

Patrolman Reid saw Forlani coming out of the rear of a house at 199 Commonwealth avenue. He approached him and questioned him as to what he was doing there. Not satisfied with the replies, the patrolman started to take the man to the box when the man drew a gun from his pocket and attacked the officer.

A bitter fight followed. In the mix-up the patrolman lost his stick, and Forlani finally got him on the street and had the officer down and was pressing his knee into the officer's chest and pointing a loaded revolver in his face when three citizen arrived on the scene and rushed to the officer's assistance.

POST APR 4

PHOTO
HORNER BOSTON

NICHOLAS FORLANI,
Former Symphony Orchestra player, who is held for assault with intent to kill Patrolman George L. W. Reid.

FORLANI TELLS OF HIS LOVE

Declares Back Bay Woman Is Object of His Affections

Discharged From Army for Mental Disease

Not Known by Family of Woman He Names

Although there seemed to be something of a mystery relative to the doings of Nicholas Forlani, former second clarinet player in the Symphony Orchestra, previous to his desperate assault on Patrolman George L. W. Reid of the Back Bay police division late Sunday night, this was partially cleared up last night.

Mr. Forlani told Captain Thomas F. Goode of the Back Bay police that he was in love with a Back Bay woman and that she was in love with him. He had been to see her, he claimed. The family of the young woman say they do not know Mr. Forlani.

COULDN'T GET IN

According to Forlani, he met the young woman at one of the Symphony concerts and that there has been several meetings with here. Sunday night he went to her home, he stated, going first to the front door and then to the rear entrance, but he couldn't get in.

Forlani, who lives at 115 Hemenway street, was arraigned at Central Court yesterday and held in $5000 on the charge of assault with intent to kill with a loaded revolver on Patrolman Reid, for appearance April 11. The policeman's injuries are not so serious as was supposed and although he is still at the City Hospital suffering from painful wounds about the head it is expected he will be able to be out in a few days.

Violence Part of Disease

When Forlani was searched at the police station, after his arrest, papers were found in his pockets which stated he had been discharged from Camp Devens, where he was bandmaster during the war, because he had dementia precox. Medical experts state that this is a form of mental disease beginning in a comparatively young person and gradually growing worse, and that such persons are subject to hallucinations and are at times apt to be violent and excitable.

It was asserted by the police last night that if three citizens had not come to the rescue of Patrolman Reid he would probably have been beaten to death with the butt of a revolver in the hands of the musician. He was sitting astride the policeman and was beating him over the head when pulled away, they say.

Was Acting Suspiciously

Ralph Lowe of 190 Commonwealth avenue, next door to the Fay residence, one of the rescuers, is manager of the Exeter Street Theatre.

"My wife had noticed this man walking up and down in front of the theatre Saturday night," said Mr. Lowe last night to a Post man. He seemed rather shabby in appearance and she became suspicious. When he came again on Sunday evening and walked up and down in front of the theatre, she spoke to me about it.

Started to Run Away

"Later, when Officer Reid came along, we both went over and spoke to him about the man. The officer walked up to him and asked him what he was doing and what he wanted. We couldn't hear what was said, but we saw the officer take the man up the front steps of the Fay house and ring the bell. No one came to the door and they came down the steps again.

"Then the man started to run away and the officer cried out to him to stop. After a short chase the officer caught the man and took hold of his arm. There was a struggle. The officer was thrown to the sidewalk. The man began to pummel Officer Reid over the head with the butt of a revolver.

Rescue the Officer

"I ran to the officer's assistance, and fortunately an automobile came along just then with two men, who jumped out and helped and finally the man was pulled off the officer and his gun taken away."

The two men in the automobile were Leroy C. Stone of 12 Newbury street, and Wendell H. Phillips.

POST APR. 5

Prompted by his own desires and not a few requests, Mr. Monteux has decided to repeat Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" at the Symphony Concerts of next week. None of the novel music of the year has better deserved such fortune.

TRANS. APR. 5.

Items and Incidents

Three pieces fill the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week: Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," to be repeated as the outstanding new music of the year; Arthur Shepherd's Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra to be played for the first times in Boston in public, with Mr. Gebbard for the solo-part; and Chaikovsky's tone-poem, "Romeo and Juliet," long unheard hereabouts.

According to George Ade writing a "humorous editorial" in The Cosmopolitan: "Be comforted by the reflection that all music is good. Because you seek the drugging effects of rag-time, do not contradict those who claim to get an actual kick [illegible] Orchestra."

TRANS. APR. 7.

Mendelssohn Prevails

Not Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" nor Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," but the Scotch Symphony of one Felix Mendelssohn, was the freshest music of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening. It has been the custom hereabouts—and probably elsewhere to take the "Scotch Symphony" from its shelf once in every five or ten years, dust it politely, perform it dutifully and replace it with pious satisfaction. Not long ago Mr. Monteux took it upon himself to give the piece its occasional hearing, but somehow the condescension and tolerance with which it has been the fashion to regard it were turned into frank and out-spoken enthusiasm. Possibly Mr. Monteux's undeniably excellent performance has worked this change in us, or perhaps the scales have fallen from our eyes. Tradition has told us that the symphonies of Schumann, for example, are much greater than those of Mendelssohn, that Mendelssohn, though a very pretty fellow in his time, has been much over-rated and that however charming certain of his overtures may be, his symphonies, even The Scotch—admittedly the best of them—are decidedly second-rate. Yet Mr. Monteux has been most assiduous with these same symphonies of Schumann and some of us have been wondering how we could so long have overlooked their ineptness, their short-breathed, unsymphonic themes, their clumsy orchestration. Then, after its customary silence, came this symphony of Mendelssohn's and it was found to be replete with atmosphere, its melodies salient, arresting, its instrumentation unfailingly felicitous—in short, an example of perfect craftsmanship, of the art which conceals itself. Granting the taint of sentimentality in the Adagio and a hint of something dangerously close to pathos in the final Allegro maestoso, the Scotch Symphony has proven capital entertainment in two concerts of a single season.

From his desk among the first violins, where he has sat these nine years, Mr. Antonio Gerardi came forward last evening and played the solo part ish Symphony. Mr. Gerardi's hard one, not alone because of culty of the music but becaus strangeness of his position. It w surprising that at first he should signs of nervousness, but he soon re ered himself and throughout the the piece played with technical ease feeling for the peculiar elegance music and—especially in the Andante warm flowing tone.

Of itself Lalo's music sounded a li faltering and ineffectual after the ing sureness of Mendelssohn's and in turn Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" somewhat labored and manufactur derivative rather than essentially and original. Yet it is interesting even exciting, to hear and the its justification in a certain larg bardic quality, that pervades it—du to the massive, brassy instrumentation This music has plangency and po not a little of it is emptily noisy, the themes particularly striking, thou broad melody of which the compose so fond has a certain impressivene it lends itself well to the sonorous ment it receives.

W. S. S.

NS. APR. 8.

21ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Program Includes "Tragic" Symphony by Schubert and Vassilenko Epic

VIOLONCELLO PIECE GIVEN BY SCHROEDER

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major for strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello concerto No. 1 (Mr. Schroeder, violoncellist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem for Orchestra, op. 4 (first time in Boston).

The Andante from Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony was for some years a favorite piece in Boston. Theodore Thomas brought it here in 1871 and it was played three times at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra within four years. The symphony was composed in 1816, but the whole of it was not heard in public until George Grove brought a manuscript copy of it from Vienna for performance at the Crystal Palace early in 1869. Yesterday the whole of the symphony was played for the first time in Boston, as far as we are able to ascertain.

Was it worth while to exhume this symphony? To modern ears there is little that is "tragic" in the work except in the Introduction; otherwise the music is rather amiable; the Andante is frankly sentimental. The symphony is chiefly valuable for its showing a step in the development of the composer. Only in the Introduction does he strike an individual note. The other movements are hardly Schubertian except perhaps the Minuet. He had not yet caught the secret of surprising yet apparently inevitable modulations; the music is free from the peculiar and characteristic melancholy, nor is there the careless spontaneity of the great melodist of the after years. Schubert was only 19 years old when he wrote this symphony, which was beautifully played: one appreciated the performance even when the music seemed commonplace.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for reviving Mr. Foote's Suite. The revival was more than a compliment to a Boston musician; the pleasure in hearing the music was more than parochial pride in the success of a fellow townsman. This Suite would be heard gladly in any city; not merely because it is by an American. The Prelude, skilfully constructed, is in form both classic and romantic, charmingly melodious throughout. Then comes the second movement, Pizzicato, with a tender episode, now wistful, now reassuring, an admirable contrast to the capriciously plucked strings. "Capriciously"? The word may be misleading. There are pizzicato movements in which the composer too evidently aims at surprising the hearers and trapping their applause. Mr. Foote's Pizzicato persuades one that he could not have thought of this music in any other way. After this movement applause was so hearty, so genuine that Mr. Foote was obliged to acknowledge it. The Finale is a fugue, not too scholastic; not too long drawn out; that holds the attention while it commands respect.

Vassilenko of Moscow supplied no program for his "Epic Poem." A biographer has said that it shows the composer's "taste and talent for mediaevalism which receives support from a profound knowledge of modal and church music." This may all be, but the chief impression made by the work is that it pictures hard and desperate fighting. The musical ideas are not striking; the instrumentation is heavy. The Poem, an early work of the composer, who was born in 1872, is middle-class German rather than Russian so far as it is concerned. Vassilenko's name might be Mueller and Obe or Eisleben his dwelling place.

Mr. Shroeder must have been pleased, deeply affected by the souled tribute paid him by conductor and orchestra after his performance of Saint-Saens's concerto which still holds a high place in the literature of the violoncello. Schroeder joined the orchestra. He has been before the are contrasts of timbres—as when resistance pales, shatters upon the inevitable—that were, that remain power. A noble reticence glows through the sombre end. And ever in the overture thrums the high heroic note. In those days, it seems, Mr. Chadwick might summon and convey deep tone of exaltation. Back to Mozart says this voice among the makers and the commentators of music in these troubled times. Back to Beethoven cries another throat. Since a place upon current programmes is counted Mr. Chadwick's due, why not back to the Chadwick of these earlier pieces—this "Melpomene"; the neglected "Adonais"; and, in another vein, the Symphonic Sketches? They far excel the tone-poems of obligation and the fashion in these, the composer's infertile years. It is the custom nowadays to turn the smile that barely misses sneer upon the "New England group" of elder composers, to count them as inconsequential as though they were Longfellows or Whittiers of minor verse. Yet hardly an American not a New Englander could have compassed the austerities—and the nobilities—of this overture of the Tragic Muse.

Kalinnikov's Symphony is a light and pleasing music. Kalinnikov, it seems, was a Russian of the generation that is now middle-aged. Tuberculosis smote him; he died relatively young; he left behind a considerable baggage—outside this particular Symphony unknown to concert-halls and opera houses in the western world, not too often heard from Russian stages. Apparently his were the mind and the spirit that go their own independent way; while precarious health compelled him to life apart. He was not of the old Russians taking thought of Glinka and of Dargomyzhsky; he was not of the Russian nationalists, Balakirev and Musorgsky en tête; he was as far from the neurotic and super-saturated Chaikovsky, as he was from the harmonic magnificence, the instrumental splendor, the lush oriental opulence of Rimsky-Korsakov. No more is he semi-Germanized Russian in the manner of Rakhmaninov and Medtner. In a word, he was merely and simply Kalinnikov, putting to paper the music that was in him to make. The prodigious and occasionally pedantic prophets of the programme-books discover a "Russian" physiognomy in his motivs, even in a few measures of his preluding. To one and another casual hearer, yesterday, it was not so apparent. Somehow the impression did persist that any man, anywhere might have written Kalinnikov's Symphony—if he happened to be Kalinnikov.

Throughout, it is a pleasurable Symphony to hear—as clear as the day, as bright as the sunshine with only a littl passing cloud, here and there, to cross, shadow and agreeably diversify it. Quickly Kalinnikov's motives flower into melodies that are as pure instrumental song, though by no means so deeply felt, as Schubert's own. He develops them fancifully; adorns them gracefully, conducts them warmly; sets them in unforced contrast; bestows artful little ingenuities upon them like the twitterings of the harp over the first motiv of the slow movement, like the sparkling showers of figures dappling more stationary measures; lifts them eagerly through crescendo to climax. Con amore, wrote Kalinnikov through this Symphony; youthful ardors kindle the music; youthful candors release it; from first measure to last it is delightfully free from calculating, brooding, striving self-consciousness. Happily for Kalinnikov and his hearers, the cosmos little interested him. There was music in his heart; he set it free with his mind to guide and choose the way. Yet his were no indiscriminate youthful heats. He is selective with apt means; he is sensitive to moods. It was good to hear again a robust and hoofing, rather than flickering, fleering Scherzo. Charm exhaled from an Andante, melancholy without Gallic sophistication. And he was very "grand," indeed, as the youngsters say, when he martialled almost all his motivs through the commingled sonorities of the Fin. Young blood is good blood when it flow so eagerly, brightly, honestly as it does through this one and only "opus"—in American concert-halls—of Kalinnikov.

Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, pianist and intermezzo of the afternoon between Symphony and Overture, is none of your professional gentlemen of this hour of Hofmann and Bauer, Kreisler and Spalding, who come to their audiences in business-like aspect and manner and in like fashion give proof of the artistry and the individuality veiled within. Rather Mr. Rubinstein is of an elder, a vanishing, and yet a perennially renewed species of virtuosi. His locks are not as the hair of other men; he wears the frock-coat of Reisenauer, Paderewski, Busoni; his face is a pale ovel of singular contours; his manner has idiosyncrasy; with upturned face and closed eyes, he plays through many a measure; or a moment of meditation bows him closer to the keyboard. And all this without a trace of personal flourish, of impression sought upon an audience. Seemingly it is honest second-nature to him, virtuoso second-nature.

As virtuoso Mr. Rubinstein likewise made way through the piano-part of Beethoven's Concerto in G major—the Concerto of the slow movement wherein the piano sighs first seductive and then resigned—against strings that will not be persuaded out of mutterings. The first division is manipulation, modulation, "passage-work" to satiety, and through it Mr. Rubinstein was adept with limpid and thin, cool and crystalline tone that rippled over figure, twined into arabesque, impassive as pellucid stream. The second division was akin—were it not that Beethoven there asks a sentiment that evaded equally the chiseling Rubinstein and a perfunctory and monotonous Monteux. To the finale of sprightly pattern-weaving the pianist added tonal glint, rhythmic élan, and a lengthy, a paling Concerto was done. Probably in first and last movement there remain now no more than the surfaces Mr. Rubinstein expertly skimmed; but the Andante runs deeper than his virtuoso-shallows, and such quality, quite missed yesterday by both conductor and pianist, is the one and only [illegible] this Concerto in concert-halls

---

The London Symphony Anew?

Possible Repetition at the Symphony Concerts

As plausible report goes, Mr. Monteux is considering a repetition of Vaughan Williams' London Symphony in the course of the Symphony Concerts through April. With reason the conductor sets it high in the music of our time; believes that better acquaintance with it only deepens the pleasure that it yields; finds in it matter that new performance and new hearing are sure to ripen. It is safe to say that many frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are like-minded. The London Symphony impressed them beyond any new music of the year. They remember in it much that they would gladly know afresh; they anticipate from a repetition much that at first hearing inevitably escaped them; they trust that Mr. Monteux's present "consideration" will become favorable decision. After all, the public of the Symphony Concerts that welcomes the new things, the fine things, of music in this immediate day deserves—once and again—to be humored.

TRANS. APR. 2.

Tschaikowsky for Pension Fund

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the last pension fund concert of the present season, which will consist entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky, the great Russian composer. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the Russian violinist, who came from his native country last autumn to be concert master of the orchestra, who will play the first movement of the master Russian's violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the eminene leader of the 'cello section, who will be heard in the Rococo Variations. The symphony on this occasion will be the Fifth in E-minor, which, composed in Tchaikowsky's last years, is now considered one of his greatest achievements. The remaining numbers will be the Italian Caprice, constructed on popular Italian melodies after a visit to Italy by Tschaikowsky, and, finally, the well-known "Marche Slave."

Boston Symphony Programme

At the 21st pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9, Alvin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist of the orchestra who was once a member of the Kneisel Quartet, and now sits at the first stand, will play the concerto for violoncello by Saint-Saens.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's Fourth Symphony in C minor, which is less known than the C major and "Unfinished" symphonies, but very highly regarded and particularly famous for the beauty of its slow movement.

The other numbers on the programme will be Arthur Foote's Suite for string orchestra in E major, consisting of Prelude, Pizzicato and Adagietto, and Fugue, and, to close the programme, the Epic Poem, by the young Russian composer, Vassilenko, to be heard for the first time in Boston.

POST APR. 3.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the last pension fund concert of the present season, which will be a musical event in that it will consist entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky, the great Russian composer. There will be two soloists. Richard Burgin, the Russian violinist who came from his native country last autumn to be concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the first movement of the violin concerto; Jean Bedetti, the eminent leader of the 'cello section, will play the Rococo Variations. The symphony on this occasion will be the Fifth in E minor, which, composed in Tschaikowsky's last years, is now considered one of his greatest achievements. The third movement, a waltz, has helped to make the symphony popular wherever it has been heard. The remaining numbers will be the Italian Caprice, constructed on popular Italian melodies after a visit to Italy, and, finally, the well-known Marche Slav.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the 21st pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9, Alwin Schroeder, the veteran violoncellist of the orchestra, who was once a member of the Kneisel Quartette and now sits at the first stand, will play the concerto for violoncello by Saint-Saens. Mr. Monteux will conduct Schubert's Fourth Symphony in C minor, the "Tragic," which is less well known than the C-major and "Unfinished" symphonies, but is highly regarded, especially for the beauty of the slow movement. The other numbers will be Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major, consisting of prelude, pizzicato and adagietto, and fugue, and the Epic Poem by Vassilenko, which will then be heard for the first time in Boston.

HERALD. APR. 3.

[113]

POLICEMAN IS HURT IN FIGHT

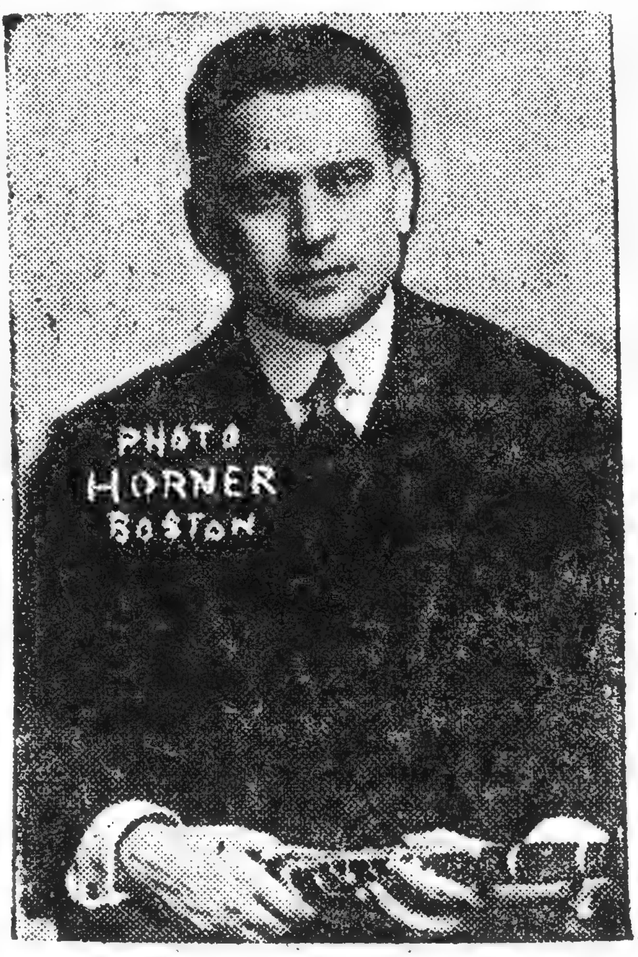
Patrolman George Reid of the Back Bay police was badly beaten late last night in an encounter with a man giving his name as Nicholas Forlani, 32 years old, of Hemenway street, who, according to his statement to the police, is a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Only for the appearance of citizens the patrolman would have been more seriously injured, as Forlani is alleged to have had the policeman down on the street and to have been in the act of pointing a loaded gun at him when the three men arrived.

Patrolman Reid saw Forlani coming out of the rear of a house at 199 Commonwealth avenue. He approached him and questioned him as to what he was doing there. Not satisfied with the replies, the patrolman started to take the man to the box when the man drew a gun from his pocket and attacked the officer.

A bitter fight followed. In the mix-up the patrolman lost his stick, and Forlani finally got him on the street and had the officer down and was pressing his knee into the officer's chest and pointing a loaded revolver in his face when three citizen arrived on the scene and rushed to the officer's assistance.

POST APR. 4



NICHOLAS FORLANI,
Former Symphony Orchestra player, who is held for assault with intent to kill Patrolman George L. W. Reid.

FORLANI TELLS OF HIS LOVE

Declares Back Bay Woman Is Object of His Affections

Discharged From Army for Mental Disease

Not Known by Family of Woman He Names

Although there seemed to be something of a mystery relative to the doings of Nicholas Forlani, former second clarinet player in the Symphony Orchestra, previous to his desperate assault on Patrolman George L. W. Reid of the Back Bay police division late Sunday night, this was partially cleared up last night.

Mr. Forlani told Captain Thomas F. Goode of the Back Bay police that he was in love with a Back Bay woman and that she was in love with him. He had been to see her, he claimed. The family of the young woman say they do not know Mr. Forlani.

COULDN'T GET IN

According to Forlani, he met the young woman at one of the Symphony concerts and that there has been several meetings with here. Sunday night he went to her home, he stated, going first to the front door and then to the rear entrance, but he couldn't get in.

Forlani, who lives at 115 Hemenway street, was arraigned at Central Court yesterday and held in $5000 on the charge of assault with intent to kill with a loaded revolver on Patrolman Reid, for appearance April 11. The policeman's injuries are not so serious as was supposed and although he is still at the City Hospital suffering from painful wounds about the head it is expected he will be able to be out in a few days.

Violence Part of Disease

When Forlani was searched at the police station, after his arrest, papers were found in his pockets which stated he had been discharged from Camp Devens, where he was bandmaster during the war, because he had dementia precox. Medical experts state that this is a form of mental disease beginning in a comparatively young person and gradually growing worse, and that such persons are subject to hallucinations and are at times apt to be violent and excitable.

It was asserted by the police last night that if three citizens had not come to the rescue of Patrolman Reid he would probably have been beaten to death with the butt of a revolver in the hands of the musician. He was sitting astride the policeman and was beating him over the head when pulled away, they say.

Was Acting Suspiciously

Ralph Lowe of 190 Commonwealth avenue, next door to the Fay residence, one of the rescuers, is manager of the Exeter Street Theatre.

"My wife had noticed this man walking up and down in front of the theatre Saturday night," said Mr. Lowe last night to a Post man. He seemed rather shabby in appearance and she became suspicious. When he came again on Sunday evening and walked up and down in front of the theatre, she spoke to me about it.

Started to Run Away

"Later, when Officer Reid came along, we both went over and spoke to him about the man. The officer walked up to him and asked him what he was doing and what he wanted. We couldn't hear what was said, but we saw the officer take the man up the front steps of the Fay house and ring the bell. No one came to the door and they came down the steps again.

"Then the man started to run away and the officer cried out to him to stop. After a short chase the officer caught the man and took hold of his arm. There was a struggle. The officer was thrown to the sidewalk. The man began to pummel Officer Reid over the head with the butt of a revolver.

Rescue the Officer

"I ran to the officer's assistance, and fortunately an automobile came along just then with two men, who jumped out and helped and finally the man was pulled off the officer and his gun taken away."

The two men in the automobile were Leroy C. Stone of 12 Newbury street, and Wendell H. Phillips.

POST APR. 5

Prompted by his own desires and not a few requests, Mr. Monteux has decided to repeat Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" at the Symphony Concerts of next week. None of the novel music of the year has better deserved such fortune.

TRANS. APR. 5.

Items and Incidents

Three pieces fill the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week: Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," to be repeated as the outstanding new music of the year; Arthur Shepherd's Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra to be played for the first times in Boston in public, with Mr. Gebbard for the solo-part; and Chaikovsky's tone-poem, "Romeo and Juliet," long unheard hereabouts.

According to George Ade writing a "humorous editorial" in The Cosmopolitan: "Be comforted by the reflection that all music is good. Because you seek the drugging effects of rag-time, do not contradict those who claim to get an actual kick ~~from the Boston Symphony Orches~~tra."

TRANS. APR. 7

Mendelssohn Prevails

Not Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" nor Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," but the Scotch Symphony of one Felix Mendelssohn, was the freshest music of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening. It has been the custom hereabouts—and probably elsewhere to take the "Scotch Symphony" from its shelf once in every five or ten years, dust it politely, perform it dutifully and replace it with pious satisfaction. Not long ago Mr. Monteux took it upon himself to give the piece its occasional hearing, but somehow the condescension and tolerance with which it has been the fashion to regard it were turned into frank and out-spoken enthusiasm. Possibly Mr. Monteux's undeniably excellent performance has worked this change in us, or perhaps the scales have fallen from our eyes. Tradition has told us that the symphonies of Schumann, for example, are much greater than those of Mendelssohn, that Mendelssohn, though a very pretty fellow in his time, has been much over-rated and that however charming certain of his overtures may be, his symphonies, even The Scotch—admittedly the best of them—are decidedly second-rate. Yet Mr. Monteux has been most assiduous with these same symphonies of Schumann and some of us have been wondering how we could so long have overlooked their ineptness, their short-breathed, unsymphonic themes, their clumsy orchestration. Then, after its customary silence, came this symphony of Mendelssohn's and it was found to be replete with atmosphere, its melodies salient, arresting, its instrumentation unfailingly felicitous—in short, an example of perfect craftsmanship, of the art which conceals itself. Granting the taint of sentimentality in the Adagio and a hint of something dangerously close to bathos in the final Allegro maestoso, the Scotch Symphony has proven capital entertainment in two concerts of a single season.

From his desk among the first violins, where he has sat these nine years, Mr. Antonio Gerardi came forward last evening and played the solo part in Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Mr. Gerardi's task was a hard one, not alone because of the difficulty of the music but because of the strangeness of his position. It was not surprising that at first he should show signs of nervousness, but he soon recovered himself and throughout the rest of the piece played with technical ease and feeling for the peculiar elegance of the music and—especially in the Andante—a warm flowing tone.

Of itself Lalo's music sounded a little faltering and ineffectual after the refreshing sureness of Mendelssohn's and in its turn Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" seemed somewhat labored and manufactured, derivative rather than essentially creative and original. Yet it is interesting, at times even exciting, to hear and the [illegible] finds its justification in a certain largeness, a bardic quality, that pervades it—due partly to the massive, brassy instrumentation. This music has plangency and pomp, yet not a little of it is emptily noisy, nor are the themes particularly striking, though the broad melody of which the composer seems so fond has a certain impressiveness and it lends itself well to the sonorous treatment it receives.

W. S. S.

H. APR. 8.

21ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Program Includes "Tragic" Symphony by Schubert and Vassilenko Epic

VIOLONCELLO PIECE GIVEN BY SCHROEDER

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major for strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello concerto No. 1 (Mr. Schroeder, violoncellist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem for Orchestra, op. 4 (first time in Boston).

The Andante from Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony was for some years a favorite piece in Boston. Theodore Thomas brought it here in 1871 and it was played three times at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra within four years. The symphony was composed in 1816, but the whole of it was not heard in public until George Grove brought a manuscript copy of it from Vienna for performance at the Crystal Palace early in 1869. Yesterday the whole of the symphony was played for the first time in Boston, as far as we are able to ascertain.

Was it worth while to exhume this symphony? To modern ears there is little that is "tragic" in the work, except in the Introduction; otherwise the music is rather amiable; the Andante is frankly sentimental. The symphony is chiefly valuable for its showing a step in the development of the composer. Only in the Introduction does he strike an individual note. The other movements are hardly Schubertian except perhaps the Minuet. He had not yet caught the secret of surprising yet apparently inevitable modulations; the music is free from the peculiar and characteristic melancholy, nor is there the careless spontaneity of the great melodist of the after years. Schubert was only 19 years old when he wrote this symphony, which was beautifully played: one appreciated the performance even when the music seemed commonplace.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for reviving Mr. Foote's Suite. The revival was more than a compliment to a Boston musician; the pleasure in hearing the music was more than parochial pride in the success of a fellow townsman. This Suite would be heard gladly in any city; not merely because it is by an American. The Prelude, skilfully constructed, is in form both classic and romantic, charmingly melodious throughout. Then comes the second movement, Pizzicato, with a tender episode, now wistful, now reassuring, an admirable contrast to the capriciously plucked strings. "Capriciously"? The word may be misleading. There are pizzicato movements in which the composer too evidently aims at surprising the hearers and trapping their applause. Mr. Foote's Pizzicato persuades one that he could not have thought of this music in any other way. After this movement applause was so hearty, so genuine that Mr. Foote was obliged to acknowledge it. The Finale is a fugue, not too scholastic; not too long drawn out; a fugue that holds the attention while it commands respect.

Vassilenko of Moscow supplied no program for his "Epic Poem." A biographer has said that it shows the composer's "taste and talent for mediaevalism which receives support from a profound knowledge of modal and church music." This may all be, but the chief impression made by the Poem is that it pictures hard and desperate fighting. The musical ideas are [illegible] striking; the instrumentation is [illegible]. The Poem, an early work of the composer, who was born in 1872, is middle-class German rather than Russian. As far as it is concerned, Vassilenko's name might be Mueller and Chemnitz or Eisleben his dwelling place.

Mr. Shroeder must have been greatly pleased, deeply affected by the warm-souled tribute paid him by audience, conductor and orchestra after his performance of Saint-Saens's concerto, which still holds a high place in the violoncello literature. [illegible] Schroeder joined the orchestra [illegible] He has been before the public [illegible] but because of ... position. It was not at first he should show usness, but he soon recov- and throughout the rest of ayed with technical ease ample the peculiar elegance of the —especially in the Andante—a wing tone.

Lale's music sounded a little d ineffectual after the refresh- ces of Mendelssohn's and in its ssilenko's "Epic Poem" seemed labored and manufactured; rather than essentially creative al. Yet it is interesting, at times ting, to hear and the title finds ification in a certain largeness, a quality that pervades it—due partly massive, brassy instrumentation. music has plangency and pomp, yet little of it is emptily noisy, nor are mes particularly striking, though the melody of which the composer seems d has a certain impressiveness and s itself well to the sonorous treat- it receives.

W. S. S.

ANS. APR. 8

ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

ogram Includes "Tragic" ymphony by Schubert and Vassilenko Epic

OLONCELLO PIECE IVEN BY SCHROEDER

By PHILIP HALE

e 21st concert of the Boston Sym- y Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, con- tor, took place yesterday afternoon Symphony Hall. The program was follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Sym- y, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello certo No. 1 (Mr. Schroeder, violon- ist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem for hestra, op. 4 (first time in Boston).

he Andante from Schubert's "Tragic" phony was for some years a favor- piece in Boston. Theodore Thomas ught it here in 1871 and it was played ee times at concerts of the Boston phony Orchestra within four years. symphony was composed in 1816, but whole of it was not heard in public til George Grove brought a manu- ipt copy of it from Vienna for per- mance at the Crystal Palace early 1869. Yesterday the whole of the phony was played for the first time Boston, as far as we are able to certain.

Was it worth while to exhume this mphony? To modern ears there is tle that is "tragic" in the work, cept in the Introduction; otherwise the usic is rather amiable; the Andante is ankly sentimental. The symphony is iefly valuable for its showing a step in e development of the composer. Only the Introduction does he strike an dividual note. The other movements hardly Schubertian except perhaps e Minuet. He had not yet caught the cret of surprising yet apparently in- itable modulations; the music is free om the peculiar and characteristic elancholy, nor is there the careless ontaneity of the great melodist of the ter years. Schubert was only 19 years d when he wrote this symphony, hich was beautifully played: one ap- reciated the performance even when e music seemed commonplace.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for re- iving Mr. Foote's Suite. The revival as more than a compliment to a Bos- on musician; the pleasure in hearing he music was more than parochial ride in the success of a fellow towns- an. This Suite would be heard gladly any city; not merely because it is by n American. The Prelude, skilfully onstructed, is in form both classic nd romantic, charmingly melodious hroughout. Then comes the second ovement, Pizzicato, with a tender pisode, now wistful, now reassuring, an dmirable contrast to the capriciously lucked strings. "Capriciously"? The ord may be misleading. There are izzicato movements in which the com- oser too evidently aims at surprising e hearers and trapping their applause. r. Foote's Pizzicato persuades one that could not have thought of this music n any other way. After this movement pplause was so hearty, so genuine that . Foote was obliged to acknowledge it. The Finale is a fugue, not too scho- stic; not too long drawn out; music at holds the attention while it com- ands respect.

Vassilenko of Moscow supplied no rogram for his "Epic Poem." A iographer has said that it shows the composer's "taste and talent for me- diaevalism which receives support from profound knowledge of modal and church music." This may all be, but the chief impression made by the Poem is that it pictures hard and desperate fighting. The musical ideas are not striking; the instrumentation is heavy. The Poem, an early work of the com- poser, who was born in 1872, is middle- class German rather than Russian. As far as it is concerned, Vassilenko's name might be Mueller and Chemnitz or Eisleben his dwelling place.

Mr. Shroeder must have been greatly pleased, deeply affected by the whole- souled tribute paid him by audience, conductor and orchestra after his per- formance of Saint-Saens's concerto, which still holds a high place in the literature of the violoncello. Mr. [illegible] joined the orchestra in [illegible]

oncellist since 1875. During all these years he has served his art faithfully and honorably. It is not too much to say, that while his excellent qualities have been appreciated in cities of this country and of Europe, he is here peculiarly at home; he is a Boston institution. Young in heart, receptive, not disturbed or perplexed by changing and novel forms of musical expression, he

HERALD, APR. 9

A SCHUBERT WORK THAT'S NOVEL

By FRED J. McISAAC.

That a Schubert symphony could remain unperformed until this late date in Boston seems incredible, yet the fourth symphony, known as the "Tragic," was given yesterday at the Boston Symphony concert for the first time as a whole.

The Andante, which is very lovely, Schubert in his most exquisite and lyric vein, has had a number of performances, but the remainder of the symphony was a novelty.

Franz Shubert is best known by his songs. Nobody ever lived who could equal him as a song writer. His symphonic works found favor much more slowly. Most of them remained in manuscript for half a century after his death. The fourth symphony was published in 1884. Schubert died in 1828, being only thirty-one years of age.

The Tragic symphony is not to be considered a great work. Produced by a modern composer it would be severely criticised for its poverty of orchestral design, and yet it is notable in its mood and full of pleasant and interesting melody. There is usually a reason when the work of a great composer is ignored for a long period. There were more interesting Schubert symphonies to play, and the Andante is really all you remember after hearing the complete fourth symphony.

It was good to hear the Arthur Foote suite for strings in E major. Arthur Foote, more than most American composers, has the gift of melody, and his suite is agreeable and pleasant, while the fugue is exceedingly ingenious.

Another first performance in Boston was the Vassilenko Epic poem. Vassilenko is a Russian composer still living in Moscow if the Bolshevists haven't got him since the Slav nation was covered by a fog of revolution. This tone poem is couched in a grand manner, you might almost say dactylic hexameters, and it proceeds in an imposing and sonorous manner with a narrative suggestive of great deeds and mighty achievement. Vassilenko is solemn, almost Gregorian in places, but he avoids the wild cacophony of most of his Russian confreres and tells his tale tunefully if grandiloquently. It was worth hearing.

Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist of the orchestra, played the Saint-Saens concerto in A minor, a work which is by no means in the great Frenchman's best style, and which as Schroeder played it was rather tiresome. But the library of 'cello music is not large and very great 'cellists are rare.

AMER. APR. 9

SYMPHONY RESTORES OLD WORK

Schubert's 4th Played; Schroeder, 'Cellist, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony in C minor, No. 4, was played for the first time as a whole in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The two Schubert symphonies which figure in the standard repertory of the orchestra are of course the 9th and the 10th symphonies in C major and B minor. The others are seldom heard and are commonly accounted negligible and immature manifestations of Schubert's genius.

A VERY VITAL WORK

On the contrary, this fourth symphony is a very vital work. First of all, it is much more concise than the great symphony in C major, and although in the early work, developments of ideas are not as rich and as varied as they are in the C major symphony, there is a directness of expression and a coherence of structure fitting well the dramatic and melancholy character of the work. The symphony is of a piece. It is not a string of four movements put together in a shambling way by a composer whose ideas came out too fast for him to whip [illegible] into proper shape, as often happened with Schubert. The instrumentation is somewhat immature, a little blocky, a little of first one group of instruments and then another.

Charm in Melodic Passages

On the other hand, there are inspired places where Schubert uses the one inevitable instrument for an idea, as only he knew how to use it in a way that could not be learned, and always there is adequate sonority and appropriate changes of color for different passages. There are unforgettable melodic passages, as witness the principal melodies of the slow movement and the characteristic charm of the middle section of the minuet, one of the countless pearls of melody always dropping from Schubert's sleeve.

But above all there is the powerful mood of the symphony. The audience greatly enjoyed the symphony. It was moved by this simple, songful work, with an almost childish and naive instrumental scheme, with no idea on the part of the composer that he was doing a wonderful thing.

Mr. Schroeder, the Master

Alwin Schroeder, a veteran of the orchestra, a member of the former Kneisel Quartet, and intermittently of the Boston Symphony since 1891, stepped from his seat in the ranks and played his solo—the Saint-Saens A minor concerto, played it with the wisdom that years bring, and that nothing else but years and experience of life may bring; with the mental grip and mastery of a master of many great performances, with a rhythm that ruled, with a cantilena never sentimental, yet superbly expressive and capable of transforming trivial passages into expressions of significance.

He was applauded long and loudly, after which he modestly returned to his seat in the orchestra.

Arthur Foote's Suite

It was a pleasure to hear again Arthur Foote's melodious and admirably written E major suite for string orchestra, op. 63. It is music written in a spirit of true modesty, in which ideas are treated felicitously, and not pretentiously, for what they are worth.

The instrumental dress is simple, as befits the substance of the music. The music is artistic in form and finish, in workmanship, and it gave much pleasure.

The composer was several times called to his feet to accept the thanks and appreciation of the audience.

Vassilenko's Epic Poem

An Epic Poem for Orchestra by Sergei Vassilenko was played for the first time here. It has an imposing introduction, like a gloomy medieval castle in a painting by Roerich, in which a thundering old religious chant is heard. This is heroic, sombre, and, on the whole, magnificent. Then there is much orchestral pother, leading to the complete announcement of a savage, warlike theme. One catches now and then a savor of that great wind which blows across the Russian steppes and through the pages, for example, of Gogol's "Taras Bulba." Yes, there is here the germ of a truly epic, medieval Russian symphonic poem.

Unfortunately, the flight is not sustained, and the instrumentation is swollen and almost throughout very noisy. The climax is reached almost at once, therefore there is no climax. Would there were. Would that that grim old chant might have grown upon us and reached its apotheosis through battle music, and gathered force till the very earth trembled under it. But it is not easy to write a symphonic poem. A composer must be as great as his theme. Few composers may match in their scores the spirit of Taras Bulba.

POST- APR. 9

SCHROEDER HAILED IN 'CELLO CONCERTO

Veteran of the Symphony Orchestra Is Soloist

Schubert and Vassilenko Provide Novelties in the Program

Alwin Schroeder, well known here for 30 years as a 'cellist in the Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet, was applauded with unusual warmth at yesterday's Symphony concert both before and after his performance of Saint-Saens' A minor concerto. It was his 18th appearance as soloist at these concerts. To many in the audience he seems an old and valued friend. His playing, as always, showed rare technical skill and soundly imaginative musicianship. The concerto is well made, agreeable music.

There were two novelties on the program, one of them composed in 1816, but never before played in its entirety in this city, despite the fame of Schubert, its composer. This "Tragic Symphony," in C minor, is the work of a boy of 19, immature in technique, influenced too strongly by Beethoven and Mozart, yet with a thoroughly ingratiating sincerity and spontaneity.

A wise teacher could have done much in teaching Schubert as a boy to scrutinize the sources of his musical ideas and to make his expression of them polished and well considered. But such a teacher would have killed the adolescent quality, the imaginative innocence that makes this symphony so thoroughly delightful to the sophisticated listener. He might have killed the genuine originality that crops out in it again and again in curious anticipations of the later songs and the C major symphony. The performance was excellent.

The other novelty, pretentiously entitled "Epic Poem," by a living Russian, Vassilenko, hitherto unknown to Boston, is of coarser fiber than Schubert. Except that its harmonies are less vulgar and its vitality less genuine, this "Epic Poem" is akin to Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. The influence of Rimsky-Korsakoff and of Wagner pervades much of the music. Vassilenko often "plays the sedulous ape" to musical betters, something Schubert never did, despite his many unconscious borrowings. The performance was appropriately obstreperous.

Arthur Foote's suite in E major, for string orchestra, is carefully contrived and correctly entertaining music. If Mr Foote does not set the Charles on fire he at least pleases without surprising his audience. The improvement in the work of the orchestra was manifest in this number. Mr Monteux was able to achieve a few nuances successfully, something he failed to do earlier in the season in Mendelssohn's octet for strings.

GLOBE-APR. 9

Pension Fund Concert Tomorrow

In Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 an all-Tschaikowsky program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the net proceeds to be devoted to the pension fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concert-master of Orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist.

22d Symphony Program

At the 22d pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 15 and 16, the soloist will be Heinrich Gebhard, the noted Bostonian pianist, playing with the Orchestra Arthur Shepard's Fantasie for Pianoforte and Orchestra, to be heard for the first time in Boston. Also the London Symphony of Vaughan Williams and Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," will be heard.

TRAV. APR. 9

Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" to Be Repeated—A New Fantasia by Arthur Shepherd to Be Played—A Restored Cecilia in "The Damnation of Faust"

BY his own inclination and in deference to not a few requests from frequenters of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will repeat next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," first heard here two months ago. No new music, the season through, has proved more interesting and impressive. None has seemed to run so deep, so tempted to more thorough acquaintance, seems more likely to ripen under recurring performance. Wisely, then, the conductor has resolved on repetition, while the "London Symphony" is still fresh in many memories. A much-praised piece as yet unheard publicly in Boston will follow—Arthur Shepherd's Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra with Mr. Gebhard for the solo part. It is written in free modern fashion and, if it justifies the praise privately bestowed upon it, the music should prove well worth playing and hearing. From Chaikovsky at his romantic best will come the final number—his tone-poem of Romeo and Juliet.

Chaikovsky—and Chaikovsky alone—will provide the music for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, for the increase of its Pension Fund. By exception it is the third such concert in the course of the season—added to the usual two to replace omitted occasion when the late war disturbed the even tenor of the band. The programme will bring the Russian's Fifth Symphony—of the long and songful slow movement—unheard in Boston these many years; the lighter Italian Caprice; the sonorous and moody Slavic March; the first movement of the Concerto for Violin; the Rococo Variations—a few omitted—for Violoncello. In the Concerto, Mr. Burgin, the leader of the violins, will play the solo-part. In the Variations it will fall to Mr. Bedetti, leader of the violoncellos. Both sit in the orchestra; yet each by clear title is virtuoso and musician excelling many who wander up and down concert-halls.

TRANS. APR. 9

In Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.30, an all-Tschaikowsky program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the net proceeds to be devoted to the Pension Fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. Pierre Monteux will conduct the Fifth Symphony in E minor, which, although one of the finest and most popular of Tschaikowsky's works, has seldom been heard in Boston in recent years. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the Russian concert-master of orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist.

At the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 15 and 16, the soloist will be Heinrich Gebhard, the noted Bostonian pianist, playing with the orchestra Arthur Shepard's Fantasie for Pianoforte and Orchestra, to be heard for the first time in Boston.

Pierre Monteux will repeat the London Symphony of Vaughan Williams, which was heard earlier in the season, and in New York and Boston both have aroused considerable interest and enthusiasm. The closing number will be Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo

RECORD-APR. 9

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BACK TO SCHUBERT; FORWARD TO FOOTE

Sentiment and Music in Mingled Flow—Mr. Monteux Resurrects a Piece from 1816 and Another, Quite as Ancient, in the Big Bow-Wow of the Nineties—A Parisian and a New Englander for Livelier Pleasure — Compliments to Mr. Schroeder

SENTIMENT and music flowed freely at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon in pleasant stream of entertainment. There was sentiment for Mr. Foote, the composer, at pause and at the end of his Suite for Strings happily revived by Mr. Monteux. The audience so enjoyed the Pizzicato movement that it called the composer from his seat. It so enjoyed the whole piece that it bade him rise again. In fact, it would not have done until it had brought the orchestra also to its feet. Conductor and string choir had played the Suite well, with bright, transparent, plastic tone; each movement had sounded in characteristic pace, rhythm, quality; often the blended or parted voices had been agreeably shaded. None the less the music was not such as to test the finest mettle of the band any more than was Kalinnikov's Symphony, a week ago, when the audience of Friday insisted upon like tribute to the performance. On both occasions the music had pleased it much; because of that pleasure it seemed to infer that the orchestra had achieved some rare feat of virtuosity; whereas it had done with the piece merely what any band of its abilities should do. It may excel itself, as it has done more than once this season, in novel and highly exacting pieces; but if the music failed to stir hearers, the performance has gone unacknowledged. Some day some one will write a little book, "The Philosophy (sic) of Applause." It should be an amusing monograph—of lively human interest.

Sentiment flowed again over Mr. Schroeder, violoncellist in the orchestra, and usually at the first desk, since 1891, less an occasional interval. For the first time in ten years he was invited to play the solo-part of a Concerto in the regular course of the concerts. Modestly he came from his place to begin; as modestly he returned to it when he had finished. Mr. Monteux set chair for him; Mr. Burgin replaced it; Mr. Bedetti who shares his music-stand, shook him warmly by the hand; the men of the orchestra were quick with sincere friendly applause. Equal was the good will of the listeners, some of whom had known Mr. Schroeder while he was a young man newly come from Germany. It was two or three minutes before the clapping made room for the music; as many were the recalls of reward. Had the violoncellist been no familiar figure, high in the regard of hearers, he would have deserved these plaudits. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor was the chosen piece—a continuous music through which the solo-voice threads in unsentimentalized song, polished "figures," reticent ornament-work of a composer designing clearly, proceeding dexterously and surely, using measure in all things. Discerningly Mr. Schroeder played, pliant of bow and fingers in pattern-weaving; clear, round, flowing and just of tone in sustained song; sensitive of accent, light of stroke always—the performance of virtuoso and musician in whom quiet poise is now the harvest of the years.

As the music of the day went, the elder and familiar composers had much the better of it. Since a Concerto for Violoncello still remains a part of the whole duty of music-making, Saint-Saëns's piece may pass for a model in kind. Writing continuously, he avoids the division into three compartments—one to display the 'cello in expanding motiv and diligent figuration; one to reveal it in sustained melody; one to set it capering—and sometimes squeaking—apace. Writing with discretion, he neither sugars the song nor turns the capering grotesque. Writing lightly, artfully, he does not overtax the form, the instrument, the patience of the audience. Writing elegantly, he is fanciful with motiv and mechanism, apt with euphony and transition, flowing, uninsistent always. A model Concerto, indeed, full of French discernment of the fitness of things—one that will bear repetition quite as well as Haydn's, Dvorak's, Lalo's, Schumann's. And—to dare boldly—there might be relief from this recurring round. Elgar has lately written a Concerto for Violoncello; it has given pleasure to audiences in England; it can be bought they say—it might be profitably heard as well, in America.

In kind, Mr. Foote's Suite, overpassed for eleven years at the Symphony Concerts, returned similar satisfactions. The design is modest—no more than a brief, concise music for string orchestra in three divisions, with an interlude of quiet song in the midst of pizzicato playfulness. Mr. Foote is simple of form—a Prelude running short course from a single motiv reticently developed; the Pizzicato and the Adagietto aforesaid and as unlabored; a miniature Fugue that ought to be in the handbooks of composition, because it is at once so clear, terse and well-gaited. Everywhere Mr. Foote is economical. He strives not to shape motivs. Fitly they come at his bidding. He does not exhaust them in development, preferring to choose only the best that his material may yield. A quiet skill plays through the Suite finding the clear means to the desired end, touching it, besides, with a quiet reticent fancy. Charm as well as dexterity please in the shadings of the Prelude; the Pizzicato is playfulness for the sake of sport, not show; the Adagietto has the gentle grace of the like measures in Bizet's music to "L'Arlésienne"—the fragrance of remote things remembered; the Fugue is mirror to happy inventions. Again, like Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene" the other day—though in different quality—a New Englander's music, cool, clear, circumspect, choice.

The younger composers of the afternoon were a certain Franz Schbert, aged nineteen in the Vienna of 1816, and one Sergei Vassilenko still living in Moscow, as the programme-book noted with the precaution of the interrogation point that might plausibly be the symbol of present Russia. This Franz Schubert had written a Symphony in C minor which "in entirety" was played for the first time at the Symphony Concerts. Often—say on twenty occasions apiece—his Unfinished Symphony and his Symphony in C major have been heard there. Perhaps for that reason, conductors, a little weary of such alternate repetition and believing some of their hearers like-minded, have quested among Schubert's earlier Symphonies. Dr. Muck chose for resurrection the Fifth, in B flat, and over a dozen years recollection still resents the thin, unfertile, uncharacteristic music. Mr. Monteux pitched upon the Fourth in C minor, labelled "Tragic," and for no discoverable reason in the content. Throughout, it is a light, airy, fluent music much more in the manner of Mozart, Haydn—and many a minor Viennese composer—than of Schubert in the masterpieces of the swiftly ripening years.

An Andante, of old played by itself, is presumed to halo and perpetuate this Tragic Symphony. It contains frank, flowing, suave and songful periods; it contrasts with them more restless measures, as a hint of a frequent procedure in the maturer music; occasionally a modulation suggests the imagination that is intuition; occasionally Schubert prefers a vivid instrumental voice to assembled choirs, countering one another. Inevitably the listener hears the Andante retrospectively, fancies he detects these tokens of a later Schubert; yet his reason tells him that he might find almost every one of these omens on the crackling pages of some other Viennese composer, dust these hundred years? Nearly all else in Schubert's Symphony is workaday according to the time and the fashion descended from Mozart and Haydn. The grave sonorities, the large modelling of the introductory measures hark back to the "greater" Mozart. The Minuet, in spite of a few chromatic touches, is Haydn-like in simple tune and contrasts. The two Allegros are quick-spirited, straightforward, deft and smiling music-making in the prevailing mode. In 1921 we read Schubertian touches into them, as in a disposition to modulation or instrumental color not quite conventional. Probably a Viennese audience of 1816, had it heard the symphony, would not have though twice of either. Yet withal a cheerful music in spite of resurrection, retrospect and other "funeral baked meats."

Vassilenko's "Epic Poem," heard also for the first time in Boston, is as conventional as Schubert's Tragic Symphony, though the particular convention to which it conforms is quite different. The earlier convention prevailed over the end of the eighteenth century into the nineteenth; the later convention stretched, say, from 1890 through 1910. Less rather than more the Russians practised it in comparison with the Germans, the French and other makers of music. Everyone who frequents orchestral concerts was long since saturated with both matter and manner. The largely shaped, deeply voiced beginning; a first division choppy and turbulent; a second division sustained and songful; a third and last division in which these motivs and moods struggle for mastery, ascend to resounding climax, fall away into drab silence. The manner is chromatic; the counterpoint runs in thickly woven strands; the trowel is often an implement of contrast; the instruments move en masse in patches of color and blunt strokes. Set on a cosmic title—"Epic Poem," "The World Well Lost," "From Blackness to Bliss," "The Riddle of Life" and the deed is done. Of course each conjurer with these conventions makes play with individual tricks, but Vassilenko's are neither many nor salient. Occasionally, in the blending or the parting of the instrumental voices, in a passing harmonic suggestion, he achieves a workmanship of his own. Once at least—in the gaunt and sombre introduction, striding through an ancient chant, come personal imagination and illuding power. They flash only to fade and the rest proceeds in fuss and formula. If Mr. Monteux and many another like the species, by all means let us hear a masterpiece in it—say "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. APR. 9

One could have dispensed with the repetition of Vaughn-Williams' "London Symphony" promised for this week's symphony concerts. But there are those who prefer their moderns not too modern. Stravinsky would please some younger listeners better than the disguised commonplaces of Vaughn-Williams. Arthur Shepard's Fantasy will be awaited with interest by his many Boston friends.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 22d program. "London Symphony," Vaughn-Williams; Fantasy, Arthur Shepard; "Romeo and Juliet" overture, Tschaikowsky. Soloist Heinrich Gebhard.

SYMPHONY HALL, Huntington and Mass Avs—Today at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concert in aid of the Pension Fund. Tschaikowsky program. Fifth Symphony, in E minor; First Movement from Violin Concerto; Rococo Variations; Italian Caprice; Marche Slave. Soloists: Richard Burgin, and Jean Bedetti.

GLOBE APR. 10

[114]

Gerardi alone because of the dif- music but because of the of his position. It was not that at first he should show nervousness, but he soon recov- self and throughout the rest of e played with technical ease, ample for the peculiar elegance of the and—especially in the Andante—a owing tone. self. Lalo's music sounded a little g and ineffectual after the refresh- eness of Mendelssohn's and in its Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" seemed nat labored and manufactured; rather than essentially creative ginal. Yet it is interesting, at times xciting, to hear and the t[illegible] finds stification in a certain largeness, a quality, that pervades it—du[illegible] partly massive, brassy instrumentation. music has plangency and pomp, yet little of it is emptily noisy, nor are emes particularly striking, though the melody of which the composer seems nd has a certain impressiveness and ds itself well to the sonorous treat- it receives.

W. S. S.

ANS. APR. 8

ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

ogram Includes "Tragic" Symphony by Schubert and Vassilenko Epic

OLONCELLO PIECE IVEN BY SCHROEDER

By PHILIP HALE

ne 21st concert of the Boston Sym- ny Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, con- tor, took place yesterday afternoon Symphony Hall. The program was follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Sym- ny, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello certo No. 1 (Mr. Schroeder, violon- ist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem for chestra, op. 4 (first time in Boston).

he Andante from Schubert's "Tragic" nphony was for some years a favor- piece in Boston. Theodore Thomas ught it here in 1871 and it was played ee times at concerts of the Boston nphony Orchestra within four years. e symphony was composed in 1816, but whole of it was not heard in public til George Grove brought a manu- ipt copy of it from Vienna for per- rmance at the Crystal Palace early 1869. Yesterday the whole of the nphony was played for the first time Boston, as far as we are able to certain.

Was it worth while to exhume this nphony? To modern ears there is tle that is "tragic" in the work, cept in the Introduction; otherwise the usic is rather amiable; the Andante is ankly sentimental. The symphony is iefly valuable for its showing a step in e development of the composer. Only the Introduction does he strike an dividual note. The other movements e hardly Schubertian except perhaps e Minuet. He had not yet caught the cret of surprising yet apparently in- vitable modulations; the music is free om the peculiar and characteristic elancholy, nor is there the careless ontaneity of the great melodist of the ter years. Schubert was only 19 years d when he wrote this symphony, hich was beautifully played: one ap- reciated the performance even when e music seemed commonplace.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for re- iving Mr. Foote's Suite. The revival as more than a compliment to a Bos- on musician; the pleasure in hearing he music was more than parochial ride in the success of a fellow towns- nan. This Suite would be heard gladly n any city; not merely because it is by n American. The Prelude, skilfully onstructed, is in form both classic nd romantic, charmingly melodious hroughout. Then comes the second movement, Pizzicato, with a tender pisode, now wistful, now reassuring, an admirable contrast to the capriciously plucked strings. "Capriciously"? The word may be misleading. There are pizzicato movements in which the composer too evidently aims at surprising the hearers and trapping their applause. Mr. Foote's Pizzicato persuades one that he could not have thought of this music in any other way. After this movement applause was so hearty, so genuine that Mr. Foote was obliged to acknowledge it. The Finale is a fugue, not too scholastic; not too long drawn out; music that holds the attention while it commands respect.

Vassilenko of Moscow supplied no program for his "Epic Poem." A biographer has said that it shows the composer's "taste and talent for mediaevalism which receives support from a profound knowledge of modal and church music." This may all be, but the chief impression made by the Poem is that it pictures hard and desperate fighting. The musical ideas are not striking; the instrumentation is heavy. The Poem, an early work of the composer, who was born in 1872, is middle-class German rather than Russian. As far as it is concerned, Vassilenko's name might be Mueller and Chemnitz or Eisleben his dwelling place.

Mr. Shroeder must have been greatly pleased, deeply affected by the whole-souled tribute paid him by audience, conductor and orchestra after his performance of Saint-Saens's concerto, which still holds a high place in the literature of the violoncello. Mr. [illegible] joined the orchestra in 1891 [illegible] before the public as a violoncellist since 1875. During all these years he has served his art faithfully and honorably. It is not too much to say, that while his excellent qualities have been appreciated in cities of this country and of Europe, he is here peculiarly at home; he is a Boston institution. Young in heart, receptive, not disturbed or perplexed by changing and novel forms of musical expression, he

HERALD APR. 9

A SCHUBERT WORK THAT'S NOVEL

By FRED J. McISAAC.

That a Schubert symphony could remain unperformed until this late date in Boston seems incredible, yet the fourth symphony, known as the "Tragic," was given yesterday at the Boston Symphony concert for the first time as a whole.

The Andante, which is very lovely Schubert in his most exquisite and lyric vein, has had a number of performances, but the remainder of the symphony was a novelty.

Franz Shubert is best known by his songs. Nobody ever lived who could equal him as a song writer. His symphonic works found favor much more slowly. Most of them remained in manuscript for half a century after his death. The fourth symphony was published in 1884. Schubert died in 1828, being only thirty-one years of age.

The Tragic symphony is not to be considered a great work. Produced by a modern composer it would be severely criticised for its poverty of orchestral design, and yet it is noble in its mood and full of pleasant and interesting melody. There is usually a reason when the work of a great composer is ignored for a long period. There were more interesting Schubert symphonies to play, and the Andante is really all you remember after hearing the complete fourth symphony.

It was good to hear the Arthur Foote suite for strings in E major. Arthur Foote, more than most American composers, has the gift of melody, and his suite is agreeable and pleasant, while the fugue is exceedingly ingenious.

Another first performance in Boston was the Vassilenko Epic poem. Vassilenko is a Russian composer still living in Moscow if the Bolshevists haven't got him since the Slav nation was covered by a fog of revolution. This tone poem is couched in a grand manner, you might almost say dactylic hexameters, and it proceeds in an imposing and sonorous manner with a narrative suggestive of great deeds and mighty achievement. Vassilenko is solemn, almost Gregorian in places, but he avoids the wild cacophony of most of his Russian confreres and tells his tale tunefully if grandiloquently. It was worth hearing.

Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist of the orchestra, played the Saint-Saens concerto in A minor, a work which is by no means in the great Frenchman's best style, and which as Schroeder played it was rather tiresome. But the library of 'cello music is not large and very great 'cellists are rare.

AMER. APR

SYMPHONY RESTORES OLD WORK

Schubert's 4th Played; Schroeder, 'Cellist, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony in C minor, No. 4, was played for the first time as a whole in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The two Schubert symphonies which figure in the standard repertory of the orchestra are of course the 9th and the 10th symphonies in C major and B minor. The others are seldom heard and are commonly accounted negligible and immature manifestations of Schubert's genius.

A VERY VITAL WORK

On the contrary, this fourth symphony is a very vital work. First of all, it is much more concise than the great symphony in C major, and although in the early work, developments of ideas are not as rich and as varied as they are in the C major symphony, there is a directness of expression and a coherence of structure fitting well the dramatic and melancholy character of the work. The symphony is of a piece. It is not a string of four movements put together in a shambling way by a composer whose ideas came out too fast for him to whip them into proper shape, as often happened with Schubert. The instrumentation is somewhat immature, a little blocky, a little of first one group of instruments and then another.

Charm in Melodic Passages

On the other hand, there are inspired places where Schubert uses the one inevitable instrument for an idea, as only he knew how to use it in a way that could not be learned, and always there is adequate sonority and appropriate changes of color for different passages. There are unforgettable melodic passages, as witness the principal melodies of the slow movement and the characteristic charm of the middle section of the minuet, one of the countless pearls of melody always dropping from Schubert's sleeve.

But above all there is the powerful mood of the symphony. The audience greatly enjoyed the symphony. It was moved by this simple, songful work, with an almost childish and naive instrumental scheme, with no idea on the part of the composer that he was doing a wonderful thing.

Mr. Schroeder, the Master

Alwin Schroeder, a veteran of the orchestra, a member of the former Kneisel Quartet, and intermittently of the Boston Symphony since 1891, stepped from his seat in the ranks and played his solo—the Saint-Saens A minor concerto, played it with the wisdom that years bring, and that nothing else but years and experience of life may bring; with the mental grip and mastery of a master of many great performances, with a rhythm that ruled, with a cantilena never sentimental, yet superbly expressive and capable of transforming trivial passages into expressions of significance.

He was applauded long and loudly, after which he modestly returned to his seat in the orchestra.

Arthur Foote's Suite

It was a pleasure to hear again Arthur Foote's melodious and admirably written E major suite for string orchestro, op. 63. It is music written in a spirit of true modesty, in which ideas are treated felicitously, and not pretentiously, for what they are worth.

The instrumental dress is simple, as befits the substance of the music. The music is artistic in form and finish, in workmanship, and it gave much pleasure.

The composer was several times called to his feet to accept the thanks and appreciation of the audience.

Vassilenko's Epic Poem

An Epic Poem for Orchestra by Sergei Vassilenko was played for the first time here. It has an imposing introduction, like a gloomy medieval castle in a painting by Roerich, in which a thundering old religious chant is heard. This is heroic, sombre, and, on the whole, magnificent. Then there is much orchestral pother, leading to the complete announcement of a savage, warlike theme. One catches now and then a savor of that great wind which blows across the Russian steppes and through the pages, for example, of Gogol's "Taras Bulba." Yes, there is here the germ of a truly epic, medieval Russian symphonic poem.

Unfortunately, the flight is not sustained, and the instrumentation is swollen and almost throughout very noisy. The climax is reached almost at once, therefore there is no climax. Would there were. Would that that grim old chant might have grown upon us and reached its apotheosis through battle music, and gathered force till the very earth trembled under it. But it is not easy to write a symphonic poem. A composer must be as great as his theme. Few composers may match in their scores the spirit of Taras Bulba.

POST- APR. 9

SCHROEDER HAILED IN 'CELLO CONCERTO

Veteran of the Symphony Orchestra Is Soloist

Schubert and Vassilenko Provide Novelties in the Program

Alwin Schroeder, well known here for 30 years as a 'cellist in the Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet, was applauded with unusual warmth at yesterday's Symphony concert both before and after his performance of Saint-Saens' A minor concerto. It was his 18th appearance as soloist at these concerts. To many in the audience he seems an old and valued friend. His playing, as always, showed rare technical skill and soundly imaginative musicianship. The concerto is well made, agreeable music.

There were two novelties on the program, one of them composed in 1816, but never before played in its entirety in this city, despite the fame of Schubert, its composer. This "Tragic Symphony," in C minor, is the work of a boy of 19, immature in technique, influenced too strongly by Beethoven and Mozart, yet with a thoroughly ingratiating sincerity and spontaneity.

A wise teacher could have done much in teaching Schubert as a boy to scrutinize the sources of his musical ideas and to make his expression of them polished and well considered. But such a teacher would have killed the adolescent quality, the imaginative innocence that makes this symphony so thoroughly delightful to the sophisticated listener. He might have killed the genuine originality that crops out in it again and again in curious anticipations of the later songs and the C major symphony. The performance was excellent.

The other novelty, pretentiously entitled "Epic Poem," by a living Russian, Vassilenko, hitherto unknown to Boston, is of coarser fiber than Schubert. Except that its harmonies are less vulgar and its vitality less genuine, this "Epic Poem" is akin to Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. The influence of Rimsky-Korsakoff and of Wagner pervades much of the music. Vassilenko often "plays the sedulous ape" to musical betters, something Schubert never did, despite his many unconscious borrowings. The performance was appropriately obstreperous.

Arthur Foote's suite in E major, for string orchestra, is carefully contrived and correctly entertaining music. If Mr Foote does not set the Charles on fire he at least pleases without surprising his audience. The improvement in the work of the orchestra was manifest in this number. Mr Monteux was able to achieve a few nuances successfully, something he failed to do earlier in the season in Mendelssohn's octet for strings.

GLOBE-APR. 9

Pension Fund Concert Tomorrow

In Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 an all-Tschaikowsky program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the net proceeds to be devoted to the pension fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, concert-master of Orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist.

22d Symphony Program

At the 22d pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 15 and 16, the soloist will be Heinrich Gebhard, the noted Bostonian pianist, playing with the Orchestra Arthur Shepard's Fantasie for Pianoforte and Orchestra, to be heard for the first time in Boston. Also the London Symphony of Vaughan Williams and Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," will be heard.

TRAV. APR. 9

Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" to Be Repeated—A New Fantasia by Arthur Shepherd to Be Played—A Restored Cecilia in "The Damnation of Faust"

BY his own inclination and in deference to not a few requests from frequenters of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will repeat next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," first heard here two months ago. No new music, the season through has proved more interesting and impressive. None has seemed to run so deep so tempted to more thorough acquaintance seems more likely to ripen under recurring performance. Wisely, then, the conductor has resolved on repetition, while the "London Symphony" is still fresh in many memories. A much-praised piece as yet unheard publicly in Boston will follow—Arthur Shepherd's Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra with Mr. Gebhard for the solo-part. It is written in free modern fashion and, if it justifies the praise privately bestowed upon it, the music should prove well worth playing and hearing. From Chaikovsky at his romantic best will come the final number—his tone-poem of Romeo and Juliet.

Chaikovsky—and Chaikovsky alone—will provide the music for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, for the increase of its Pension Fund. By exception it is the third such concert in the course of the season—added to the usual two to replace omitted occasion when the late war disturbed the even tenor of the band. The programme will bring the Russian's Fifth Symphony—of the long and songful slow movement—unheard in Boston these many years; the lighter Italian Caprice; the sonorous and moody Slavic March; the first movement of the Concerto for Violin; the Rococo Variations—a few omitted—for Violoncello. In the Concerto, Mr. Burgin, the leader of the violins, will play the solo-part. In the Variations it will fall to Mr. Bedetti, leader of the violoncellos. Both sit in the orchestra; yet each by clear title is virtuoso and musician excelling many who wander up and down concert-halls.

TRANS. APR. 9

In Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.30, an all-Tschaikowsky program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the net proceeds to be devoted to the Pension Fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. Pierre Monteux will conduct the Fifth Symphony in E minor, which, although one of the finest and most popular of Tschaikowsky's works, has seldom been heard in Boston in recent years. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the Russian concert-master of orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist.

At the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 15 and 16, the soloist will be Heinrich Gebhard, the noted Bostonian pianist, playing with the orchestra Arthur Shepard's Fantasie for Pianoforte and Orchestra, to be heard for the first time in Boston.

Pierre Monteux will repeat the London Symphony of Vaughan Williams, which was heard earlier in the season, and in New York and Boston both have aroused considerable interest and enthusiasm. The closing number will be Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo

RECORD-APR. 9

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BACK TO SCHUBERT; FORWARD TO FOOTE

Sentiment and Music in Mingled Flow—Mr. Monteux Resurrects a Piece from 1816 and Another, Quite as Ancient, in the Big Bow-Wow of the Nineties—A Parisian and a New Englander for Livelier Pleasure — Compliments to Mr. Schroeder

SENTIMENT and music flowed freely at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon in pleasant stream of entertainment. There was sentiment for Mr. Foote, the composer, at pause and at the end of his Suite for Strings happily revived by Mr. Monteux. The audience so enjoyed the Pizzicato movement that it called the composer from his seat. It so enjoyed the whole piece that it bade him rise again. In fact, it would not have done until it had brought the orchestra also to its feet. Conductor and string choir had played the Suite well, with bright, transparent, plastic tone; each movement had sounded in characteristic pace, rhythm, quality; often the blended or parted voices had been agreeably shaded. None the less the music was not such as to test the finest mettle of the band any more than was Kalinnikov's Symphony, a week ago, when the audience of Friday insisted upon like tribute to the performance. On both occasions the music had pleased it much; because of that pleasure it seemed to infer that the orchestra had achieved some rare feat of virtuosity; whereas it had done with the piece merely what any band of its abilities should do. It may excel itself, as it has done more than once this season, in novel and highly exacting pieces; but if the music failed to stir hearers, the performance has gone unacknowledged. Some day some one will write a little book, "The Philosophy (sic) of Applause." It should be an amusing monograph—of lively human interest.

Sentiment flowed again over Mr. Schroeder, violoncellist in the orchestra, and usually at the first desk, since 1891, less an occasional interval. For the first time in ten years he was invited to play the solo-part of a Concerto in the regular course of the concerts. Modestly he came from his place to begin; as modestly he returned to it when he had finished. Mr. Monteux set chair for him; Mr. Burgin replaced it; Mr. Bedetti who shares his music-stand, shook him warmly by the hand; the men of the orchestra were quick with sincere friendly applause. Equal was the good will of the listeners. some of whom had known Mr. Schroeder while he was a young man newly come from Germany. It was two or three minutes before the clapping made room for the music; as many were the recalls of reward. Had the violoncellist been no familiar figure, high in the regard of hearers, he would have deserved these plaudits. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor was the chosen piece—a continuous music through which the solo-voice threads in unsentimentalized song, polished "figures," reticent ornament-work of a composer designing clearly, proceeding dexterously and surely, using measure in all things. Discerningly Mr. Schroeder played, pliant of bow and fingers in pattern-weaving; clear, round, flowing and just of tone in sustained song; sensitive of accent, light of stroke always—the performance of virtuoso and musician in whom quiet poise is now the harvest of the years.

As the music of the day went, the elder and familiar composers had much the better of it. Since a Concerto for Violoncello still remains a part of the whole duty of music-making, Saint-Saëns's piece may pass for a model in kind. Writing continuously, he avoids the division into three compartments—one to display the 'cello in expanding motiv and diligent figuration; one to reveal it in sustained melody; one to set it capering—and sometimes squeaking—apace. Writing with discretion, he neither sugars the song nor turns the capering grotesque. Writing lightly, artfully, he does not overtax the form, the instrument, the patience of the audience. Writing elegantly, he is fanciful with motiv and mechanism, apt with euphony and transition, flowing, uninsistent always. A model Concerto, indeed, full of French discernment of the fitness of things—one that will bear repetition quite as well as Haydn's, Dvořák's, Lalo's, Schumann's. And—to dare boldly—there might be relief from this recurring round. Elgar has lately written a Concerto for Violoncello; it has given pleasure to audiences in England; it can be bought they say—it might be profitably heard as well, in America.

In kind, Mr. Foote's Suite, overpassed for eleven years at the Symphony Concerts, returned similar satisfactions. The design is modest—no more than a brief, concise music for string orchestra in three divisions, with an interlude of quiet song in the midst of pizzicato playfulness. Mr. Foote is simple of form—a Prelude running short course from a single motiv reticently developed; the Pizzicato and the Adagietto aforesaid and as unlabored; a miniature Fugue that ought to be in the handbooks of composition, because it is at once so clear, terse and well-gaited. Everywhere Mr. Foote is economical. He strives not to shape motivs. Fitly they come at his bidding. He does not exhaust them in development, preferring to choose only the best that his material may yield. A quiet skill plays through the Suite finding the clear means to the desired end, touching it, besides, with a quiet reticent fancy. Charm as well as dexterity please in the shadings of the Prelude; the Pizzicato is playfulness for the sake of sport, not show; the Adagietto has the gentle grace of the like measures in Bizet's music to "L'Arlésienne"—the fragrance of remote things remembered; the Fugue is mirror to happy inventions. Again, like Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene" the other day—though in different quality—a New Englander's music, cool, clear, circumspect, choice.

The younger composers of the afternoon were a certain Franz Schbert, aged nineteen in the Vienna of 1816, and one, Sergei Vassilenko still living in Moscow, as the programme-book noted with the precaution of the interrogation point that might plausibly be the symbol of present Russia. This Franz Schubert had written a Symphony in C minor which "in entirety" was played for the first time at the Symphony Concerts. Often—say on twenty occasions apiece—his Unfinished Symphony and his Symphony in C major have been heard there. Perhaps for that reason, conductors, a little weary of such alternate repetition and believing some of their hearers like-minded, have quested among Schubert's earlier Symphonies. Dr. Muck chose for resurrection the Fifth, in B flat, and over a dozen years recollection still resents the thin, unfertile, uncharacteristic music. Mr. Monteux pitched upon the Fourth in C minor, labelled "Tragic," and for no discoverable reason in the content. Throughout, it is a light, airy, fluent music much more in the manner of Mozart, Haydn—and many a minor Viennese composer—than of Schubert in the masterpieces of the swiftly ripening years.

An Andante, of old played by itself, is presumed to halo and perpetuate this Tragic Symphony. It contains frank, flowing, suave and songful periods; it contrasts with them more restless measures, as a hint of a frequent procedure in the maturer music; occasionally a modulation suggests the imagination that is intuition; occasionally Schubert prefers a vivid instrumental voice to assembled choirs, countering one another. Inevitably the listener hears the Andante retrospectively, fancies he detects these tokens of a later Schubert; yet his reason tells him that he might find almost every one of these omens on the crackling pages of some other Viennese composer, dust these hundred years? Nearly all else in Schubert's Symphony is workaday according to the time and the fashion descended from Mozart and Haydn. The grave sonorities, the large modelling of the introductory measures hark back to the "greater" Mozart. The Minuet, in spite of a few chromatic touches, is Haydn-like in simple tune and contrasts. The two Allegros are quick-spirited, straightforward, deft and smiling music-making in the prevailing mode. In 1921 we read Schubertian touches into them, as in a disposition to modulation or instrumental color not quite conventional. Probably a Viennese audience of 1816, had it heard the symphony, would not have though twice of either. Yet withal a cheerful music in spite of resurrection, retrospect and other "funeral baked meats."

Vassilenko's "Epic Poem," heard also for the first time in Boston, is as conventional as Schubert's Tragic Symphony, though the particular convention to which it conforms is quite different. The earlier convention prevailed over the end of the eighteenth century into the nineteenth; the later convention stretched, say, from 1890 through 1910. Less rather than more the Russians practised it in comparison with the Germans, the French and other makers of music. Everyone who frequents orchestral concerts was long since saturated with both matter and manner. The largely shaped, deeply voiced beginning; a first division choppy and turbulent; a second division sustained and songful; a third and last division in which these motivs and moods struggle for mastery, ascend to resounding climax, fall away into drab silence. The manner is chromatic; the counterpoint runs in thickly woven strands; the trowel is often an implement of contrast; the instruments move en masse in patches of color and blunt strokes. Set on a cosmic title—"Epic Poem," "The World Well Lost," "From Blackness to Bliss," "The Riddle of Life" and the deed is done. Of course each conjurer with these conventions makes play with individual tricks, but Vassilenko's are neither many ncr salient. Occasionally, in the blending or the parting of the instrumental voices, in a passing harmonic suggestion, he achieves a workmanship of his own. Once at least—in the gaunt and sombre introduction, striding through an ancient chant, come personal imagination and illuding power. They flash only to fade and the rest proceeds in fuss and formula. If Mr. Monteux and many another like the species, by all means let us hear a masterpiece in it—say "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss.

H. T. PA[illegible]

TRANS. APR. 9

One could have dispensed with the repetition of Vaughn-Williams' "London Symphony" promised for this week's symphony concerts. But there are those who prefer their moderns not too modern. Stravinsky would please some younger listeners better than the disguised commonplaces of Vaughn-Williams. Arthur Shepard's Fantasy will be awaited with interest by his many Boston friends.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 22d program. "London Symphony," Vaughn-Williams; Fantasy, Arthur Shepard; "Romeo and Juliet" overture, Tschaikowsky. Soloist Heinrich Gebhard.

SYMPHONY HALL, Huntington and Mass Avs—Today at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concert in aid of the Pension Fund. Tschaikowsky program. Fifth Symphony, in E minor; First Movement from Violin Concerto; Rococo Variations; Italian Caprice; Marche Slave. Soloists: Richard Burgin, and Jean Bedetti.

GLOBE APR. 10

[11.4]

TSCHAIKOWSKY TODAY

The 39th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund for retired musicians will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:3 Mr. Monteux will devote the concert to the compositions of Tschaikowsky. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor, which, while one of the Russian master's greatest works and a favorite in other cities, has seldom been heard in Boston in recent years. There will be two soloists, Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the opening movement of the Violin Concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the first violoncellist, who will play the Rococo Variations. The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be the Italian Caprice and the Marche Slav.

22D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Mr. Monteux, in response to the evident desire on the part of the Symphony subscribers to hear again the London Symphony by Vaughan Williams, recently played at these concerts, will repeat this work at the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony, which has created so much interest in New York and Boston this season, is said to describe—the Thames at dawn; the morning bustle of the Strand and nearby streets; the shabby district known as Bloomsbury, where a strolling musician is heard playing his plaintive tune; evening on the Thames embankment, and, finally, the poverty and cruel oppression of the slums. The Fantaisie for piano and orchestra by Arthur Shepard, formerly of Boston, now assistant conductor of the Cleveland orchestra, will be played. Mr. Gebhard will be the pianist. The final piece will be Tschaikowsky's Overture Fantaisie "Romeo and Juliet."

HERALD. APR. 10.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Program of Exceptional Merit Receives Warm Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 39th concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted. The hall was well filled and an appreciative audience listened to the rather long program, which was made up of works by Tschaikowsky.

The first half of the program was his symphony in E minor. Even with its finale of tremendous force, this symphony largely gives the impression of sombre and plaintive melody. The second half was in strong contrast, and the violin concerto in D major gave Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, a rare opportunity for the display of his excellent technic and emotional expression. Mr. Burgin was recalled four times to receive the applause of the audience.

The "Italian Caprice" brought out the full strength of the orchestra. Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist, played the "Variations on a Rococo Theme" with orchestral accompaniment, and he also returned several times to acknowledge the hearty plaudits which his playing justified.

The "Marche Slave," with its strongly marked Russian characteristics, was a fitting ending to a program of exceptional merit.

HERALD. APR. 10.

Symphony Offers Tschaikowsky Program

At Symphony Hall this afternoon will be given the thirty-ninth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Pierre Monteux will devote the entire concert to the compositions of Tschaikowsky. The symphony will be the fifth, in E minor, which has seldom been heard in Boston in recent years.

There will be two soloists, Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, who will play the opening movement of the violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist, who will be heard in the "Rococo Variations." The "Italian Caprice" and "Marche Slav" will also be played.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux, in response to the evident desire on the part of the Symphony subscribers to hear again the "London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams, will repeat this work at the concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The "Fantaisie for Pianoforte and Orchestra," by the noted Bostonian composer, Arthur Shepard, will be played with Heinrich Gebhard as soloist, and Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

ADVERTISER. APR. 10.

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

D'INDY'S ANNOUNCED VISIT TO AMERICA

An Opportunity for the Symphony Orchestra to Make Him Its Guest—Chaikovsky Restored and Vindicated — The People's Orchestra in Merit and Shortcoming—Mr. Monteux's and Mr. McCormack's Plans

By invitation of Mr. Flagler, the sustainer, and Mr. Damrosch, the conductor, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Monsieur d'Indy, the French composer, will revisit America late next autumn. According to official outgiving, he will conduct in his own music and in other Parisian pieces at two concerts early in December. It is not likely that he wil cross and recross the Atlantic merely for the fortnight necessary to prepare and acomplish these concerts or that he will tarry in New York only. He will be disposed to go elsewhere, to be guest of other conductors. In particular, he may be inclined to revisit Boston where he spent a month in 1905 at the invitation of Mr. Higginson, Mr. Gericke and the orchestra of this town. He then lead the band in concerts at home and abroad, shared in performances of his own chamber-music, lectured at Harvard, went the round of illustrious guests in the arts. He interested the public concerned with these things, seemed pleased with its regard, made known sundry French music—some of his own included—that impressed American ears.

As Monsieur d'Indy was made welcome in Boston in 1905, so should he be made welcome there in 1921. In the sixteen intervening years, his music has become familiar part of the "standard repertory" at the Symphony Concerts under German and French conductors alike. His high place among the composers of our time is better understood. Many nowadays have come to know something of his other activities, as master of the Schola Cantorum, as zealous propagandist of his own faiths. He needed introductions in 1905; in 1921 his credentials would speak largely for themselves. Again the Symphony Orchestra might wisely honor him. In a few weeks Mr. Monteux will depart for Paris. He should carry with him an invitation to Monsieur d'Indy to symphony concerts in Boston as well as in New York. With such a guest in question, there should be no thought of polite orchestral rivalries or of ancient and restricted routine, of distrust of composers as conductors. Sixteen years ago Monsieu d'Indy won his spurs in Boston. In the interval, no doubt he has sharpened them.

H. T. P.

Two Hours of Chaikovsky

The Symphony Orchestra is generous to the public of the concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund. Many such hearers—conductor and manager seem to believe—seek it only on these occasions. To them accordingly it would return full measure. Hence programmes two hours long and programmes as often as not of the music of a single composer. Even Beethoven has so served a good cause; these many years Wagner has been prop and pillar to it; and next to Wagner, Chaikovsky. Usually, it has been the Chaikovsky of the Pathetic Symphony, the Nutcracker Ballet, or both. Yesterday, however, Mr. Monteux, as his frequent way is, departed from precedent. "All-Chaikovsky," as the patois of the concert-hall puts it, was to be the programme; but by will of the conductor it traversed his Fifth Symphony, his Italian Caprice, his Slavic March, his Rococo Variations for Violoncello and Orchestra, the first movement of his Concerto for Violin. As frequenters of the regular Symphony Concerts know, Chaikovsky has there been in long eclipse. Dr. Muck disliked his music and mistrusted himself as conductor in it; Mr. Rabaud accepted unquestioned parochial Parisian scorn of it; only Mr. Monteux—and of late—has been open-minded to it and by no means unresponsive under the tests of actual performance. The more the pity then that no larger audience came to the well-spread board of yesterday. Possibly a casual public begins and ends with the Chaikovsky of the Pathetic Symphony and the Nutcracker Dances. Possibly a superior public mislikes the Slavic March or the Italian Caprice because they are played at the Pops. Yet they are not less inspiriting pieces in kind; while for many years in many cities, the Russian's Fifth Symphony has borne many sons of scrutiny.

There was no mistaking either the pleasure that this music yielded or the just desert that it received in such restoration to the active repertory. The Rococo Variations may be as intricate, ornate and long-spun as the title implies; the violoncellist may for instant stumble, as did Mr. Bedetti on Sunday; yet in his tone the songful measures do not lack sensuous beauty nor the ornate measures fluent grace, nor the pattern-weaving piquant intricacy. A fragment of the Concerto for Violin remains a fragment, but in it Mr. Burgin did feats of virtuosity in the weaving of the cadenza, caught not a little of Russian fire and bite in the transitions, sounded the sensuous fullness of Chaikovsky's melody. Too finely in the cadenza he sometimes drew his tone, but elsewhere it warmed the ear. Agreed that the Italian Caprice is no match for Rimsky-Korsakov's similar Spanish adventure in instrumental and harmonic dress and in artful play with rhythms. But the very candors of Chaikovsky speak for him in the drenched Italian dance-tunes the rhythmic vigors, the high colors, the broad strokes of a music designed to blaze and crackle. And the Slavic March is a march of racial moods as well as of racial hymn.

Yet it was the Symphony that brought Chaikovsky, conductor and orchestra fullest deserving. Theorize about the composer and his music as the doubter may "in the closet," pose as some of us do over both when we are in the company of the superior, yet in the concert-hall and in this Fifth Symphony, there is no resisting him. Hear again the sombre introduction follow the tumults of the first movement; catch the mood of the half-sensuous, half-sentimental, full-throated, amply paced melody, and illusion begins. The long song of the Andante from the instant that the horn sounds it through the instant in which the violins resummon it makes of illusion emotion. The Waltz that is Scherzo is music of Chaikovsky haunted and fantasmal. The dark beginnings, the thrust into riotous turbulence in the Finale may be no more than routine Chaikovsky; but the splendors, the vigors, the proclamation of the will to live and the joy of living, flame at the end with power. Chaikovsky like Puccini may not abide the contacts of the study. The one, the other needs the contacts of concert-hall or opera house. For in their music, above all shortcomings, is human voice to as human emotion.

H. T. P.

Within a week after the close of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux will depart, on May 6, for a visit to Paris, London and possibly other European cities in quest of interesting music for next season, of a few recruits for the orchestra and for the rest and change he well deserves.

TRANS. APR. 11.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play for the first times anywhere a short Rhapsody on a Persian Theme, written by Stuart Mason, a resident composer—teacher of music and writer about it as well. The other novel number will be the long promised Suite of Milhaud, one of the newest Parisians, cause for hisses in the concert-hall and acrid debate in the newspapers. His music does sometimes emit strange sounds.

TRANS. APR. 13

TSCHAIKOWSKY FOR PENSION FUND MUSIC

Symphony Orchestra Gives a Varied Program

Dai Buell, Pianist, Assists at the People's Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a Tschaikowsky program yesterday afternoon to an audience which left numerous vacant seats in Symphony Hall. There was warm applause for the orchestra, for Mr Monteux, and for the two soloists, Richard Burgin, concertmaster, and Jean Bedetti, first cellist. The concert was the third this season for the benefit of the pension fund.

Mr Burgin gave a spirited performance of the allegro moderato from Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. Mr Bedetti coped successfully with the intricate, but tiresome variations on a Rococo theme. The orchestra did better work than at the two previous pension fund concerts.

Its playing was not perfunctory this time, though there might have been more absolute precision in ensemble. Only at regular concerts, however, are Mr Monteux and his men thoroughly on their mettle, a state of affairs which contrasts with that which prevailed under Muck, who often surpassed himself at such special concerts as this one.

It is the critical fashion nowadays to sneer at Tschaikowsky's music as vulgar and uninspired. His reputation has shrunk tremendously in the past 15 years. But even an unsympathetic listener cannot help feeling the crude, nervous vitality of the Marche Slave, the Italian Caprice, and the first and last movements of the Fifth Symphony.

The harmonies are too often banal, the rhythms lack subtlety, the themes are never delicate. Yet, like Verdi and Puccini, of whom the same criticisms are often made, Tschaikowsky had inspiration. His taste is not that of Mozart or Debussy, but he is in his way a genius, a sort of musical Kipling.

GLOBE APR. 11.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Music of Tschaikowsky made the programme of the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestra furnished two of the soloists at this concert. They were Mr. Burgin, the concert master, who played the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist, who played the "Variations on a Roccoco Theme." The orchestral compositions were the Fifth Symphony, the "Italian Caprice" and the "Marche Slav." Mr. Burgin is soloist with orchestra par excellence. He has the breadth and musicianly authority, he has the enthusiasm of his youth and a virile brilliant tone well suited to Tschaikowsky music. He was applauded to the echo after his performance.

Mr. Bedetti would make far more trivial music than the "Variations on a Roccoco Theme" significant. He gives superficial ornamentation of a melody character and importance. He sings a melody itself with a nobility of tone and sentiment gloriously typical of his instrument, and he in turn reaped applause.

The Fifth Symphony is the one work in which Tschaikowsky is an optimist. The first three movements are tragic or of a poetic melancholy, like the slow movement with the celebrated horn solo. The finale repeats a theme, which had been introduced in the minor key, in the major, and the dirge is turned to a wild chant of victory.

POST APR. 11.

Last Concert

OF BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Pierre Monteux Will Lead Orchestra in Notable Concert. Felix Fox Piano Soloist.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night in Infantry Hall in their last concert of this season, Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This symphony was one of the great Russian composer's final works, and, in the opinion of many, is one of his most splendid achievements. It was written in the spring of 1888 at Foolooskoe, near Moscow, the landscape of which Tschaikowsky declared he preferred to all the sublimities of Switzerland, the Caucasus, and Italy. The success of this masterpiece was evident to the world when it was first performed in St Petersburg a little later.

Felix Fox, the noted pianist who will be the soloist at this concert, will play with the orchestra another work which figures prominently on every orchestral repertoire, the Fourth Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven in G Minor. In the poetic beauty of its conception this splendid achievement is considered by many to be finer tha the "Emperor" Concerto.

The brilliant overture of Lal "Le Roi d' Ys" ("The King Ys"), with a notable cello sol will close the concert.

This concert promises to be t most remarkable of a successf year of the Boston Symphony this city.

BROWN HERALD APR

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Tschaikowsky Composition Features Final Concert.

FELIX FOX PIANO SOLOIST

Event Fitting Climax to Year's Series.—Large Audience Shows Enthusiasm Over Both Orchestra and Assisting Artists. — Monteux Commanding Figure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist. The concert proved a fitting climax to a series which, in some respects, has been the most successful in the history of the organization's visits here. In the matter of attendance this season's showing eclipses all records for previous years, and interest and enthusiasm have been correspondingly great. Mr. Monteux has accomplished much with his forces since the recent change in the orchestra's personnel. It is, indeed, a herculean task to mould into artistic ensemble such a great body of players, no matter how efficient individually each may be; and by his success as orchestral drill master, and his gifts as interpreter of the symphonic classics, he has become a commanding figure among our American orchestral conductors.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky....Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
Andante.
Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
Valse (Allegro moderato).
Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace.
Beethoven....Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58.
Allegro moderato.
Andante con moto.
Rondo: Vivace.
Lalo................Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"

The feature number, Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, is one of his greatest symphonic writings. In it is foreshadowed the brooding melancholy which reaches complete expression in his sixth symphony, the "Pathetic." The first two movements of the E-minor are its best in creative thought. The solemn principal theme, recurring again and again in sombre tonal dress seems to suggest despairing effort, to solve the mystery of life, while the steady, rythmic beat of bass viol and percussion instruments stalks like inexorable fate through the dark hued but gorgeous harmonies. The third movement, a waltz, strikes the listener as a pathetic attempt to be gay and the finale an eager but futile effort to portray a triumphant solution of the great riddle.

Mr. Fox, who has many Providence friends, received very cordial recognition after his playing of the Beethoven concerto. This is a work in which the soloist is not required to battle with superior instrumental numbers. It is one that gives the solo instrument a decorative part in the ensemble.

Grace, lightness and the utterance of flowing phrase are qualities which enter largely into its most effective portrayal. The performance was delightfully clear in the technical musicianly and artistic strongly in evidence.

The Andante is a particula and attractive movement and made much of its opportuni sweetness and deft finger wor mentation. It was an exhibi tistry that brought a great burst of applause at the close Fox was obliged to return sever in acknowledgment.

Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Y brilliantly orchestrated piece. Th is used effectively on many occ and the overture is brought to a ous and stirring climax. Decided and virtuosity in its playing were ing features in this closing number which both Mr. Monteux and his were required to bow to the app of an apparently well-satisfied audi

A. F.

PROV. JOURN. APR 13

Arthur Shepherd's New Fantasia
Piano and Orchestra at the Symph
Concert Tomorrow—Music According
Mrs. John Barrymore—Programme
Prospect

Perhaps never before in the his
of the Symphony Concerts music by American composers peared with such regularity as in Monteux's recent and prospective grammes. Since the first of March positions by Gilbert, Carpenter, Loeff Chadwick and Foote have all been he and, now, this week comes Arthur Sh herd and next Stuart Mason. Fo while Mr. Monteux seemed indiffe toward our native music; but he has made ample reparation. Mr. Shephe piece is a Fantasia for piano and chestra, first played two years ago concert of the New England Conse tory, with Mr. Lee Pattison as the ist. It was then rewritten and prod last November by the Cleveland S phony Orchestra, of which Mr. Sheph is now the assistant conductor. In C land the piano-part was taken by Heinrich Gebhard, to whom the pi dedicated, and he will be the soloi
the forthcoming performance here.
far as the prominence of the solo in ment is concerned, it may be said the Fantasia is not a concerto in older sense of the word, nor yet is piece for orchestra with pianoforte bligato as, for example, d'Indy's "S phony on a Mountain Air," or Loeff
"Pagan Poem."

In other words Mr. Shepherd has f a golden mean between these two extre
In glancing through the score the preva impression is of the composer's econom musical material. From an introduc motive of ascending fifths, repeated a fo higher and followed by a cadenza for solo instrument, is evolved the princ theme which, with a cantabile motiv measures in length, holds sway for the thirty-two pages. A broad, essen lyric theme then makes its appearance in the orchestra, then repeated by the p
Music in the character of a Scherzo fo with the lyric theme constantly in the b ground. There is a return to the first ject, a succeeding slow movement bas the songful theme, a division ma
"maetoso molto e ben cantando," in w
the same melody predominates. The p ends with a spirited coda derived from t opening fifths. Mr. Shepherd has wri skillfully, but not dryly, his orchestra is well made and effective; the piano p though difficult and complex, is essen

For the Symphony Concerts of week, Mr. Monteux proposes a program traversing Mozart's "Jupiter" Sympho
Stuart Mason's "Rhapsody on a Pers Theme"; Milhaud's Second Suite;
Dukas's familiar Scherzo, "The Sorcer Apprentice." Mr. Mason's Rhapsody w be played for the first time anywhe Monsieur Milhaud's Suite for the first tim in America. It runs in five divisio
Overture, Prelude and Fugue, Pasto
Nocturne, Finale. At the last pair Symphony Concerts on April 29 and 30, a another piece new to Boston will be play Bloch's tone-poem, "Winter-Spring."
deserves place among our moderns.

The programme for the final concert
the Musical Association in Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, April 27, has been a tered in a single item. Mr. Bingham
"Citizens of the Barnyard or Tame Anim Tunes"—a piece for small orchestra—w not be heard. Instead, Reginald Swee Prelude to his opera drawn from Synge tragedy of Irish fisher-folk, "Riders to t Sea," will be played for the first time
Boston. A month ago, at concerts of t Philharmonic Society in New York, it m some stir.

TRANS. APR. 14

TSCHAIKOWSKY TODAY

The 39th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund for retired musicians will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. Mr. Monteux will devote the concert to the compositions of Tschaikowsky. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor, which, while one of the Russian master's greatest works and a favorite in other cities, has seldom been heard in Boston in recent years. There will be two soloists, Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the opening movement of the Violin Concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the first violoncellist, who will play the Rococo Variations. The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be the Italian Caprice and the Marche Slav.

22D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Mr. Monteux, in response to the evident desire on the part of the Symphony subscribers to hear again the London Symphony by Vaughan Williams, recently played at these concerts, will repeat this work at the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony, which has created so much interest in New York and Boston this season, is said to describe—the Thames at dawn; the morning bustle of the Strand and nearby streets; the shabby district known as Bloomsbury, where a strolling musician is heard playing his plaintive tune; evening on the Thames embankment, and, finally, the poverty and cruel oppression of the slums. The Fantaisie for piano and orchestra by Arthur Shepard, formerly of Boston, now assistant conductor of the Cleveland orchestra, will be played. Mr. Gebhard will be the pianist. The final piece will be Tschaikowsky's Overture Fantaisie "Romeo and Juliet."

HERALD. APR. 10.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Program of Exceptional Merit Receives Warm Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 39th concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted. The hall was well filled and an appreciative audience listened to the rather long program, which was made up of works by Tschaikowsky.

The first half of the program was his symphony in E minor. Even with its finale of tremendous force, this symphony largely gives the impression of sombre and plaintive melody. The second half was in strong contrast, and the violin concerto in D major gave Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, a rare opportunity for the display of his excellent technic and emotional expression. Mr. Burgin was recalled four times to receive the applause of the audience.

The "Italian Caprice" brought out the full strength of the orchestra. Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist, played the "Variations on a Rococo Theme" with orchestral accompaniment, and he also returned several times to acknowledge the hearty plaudits which his playing justified.

The "Marche Slave," with its strongly marked Russian characteristics, was a fitting ending to a program of exceptional merit.

HERALD. APR. 11.

Symphony Offers Tschaikowsky Program

AT Symphony Hall this afternoon will be given the thirty-ninth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Pierre Monteux will devote the entire concert to the compositions of Tschaikowsky. The symphony will be the fifth, in E minor, which has seldom been heard in Boston in recent years.

There will be two soloists, Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, who will play the opening movement of the violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist, who will be heard in the "Rococo Variations." The "Italian Caprice" and "Marche Slav" will also be played.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux, in response to the evident desire on the part of the Symphony subscribers to hear again the "London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams, will repeat this work at the concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The "Fantaisie for Pianoforte and Orchestra," by the noted Bostonian composer, Arthur Shepard, will be played with Heinrich Gebhard as soloist, and Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

ADVERTISER. APR. 10.

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

D'INDY'S ANNOUNCED VISIT TO AMERICA

An Opportunity for the Symphony Orchestra to Make Him Its Guest—Chaikovsky Restored and Vindicated — The People's Orchestra in Merit and Shortcoming—Mr. Monteux's and Mr. McCormack's Plans

BY invitation of Mr. Flagler, the sustainer, and Mr. Damrosch, the conductor, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Monsieur d'Indy, the French composer, will revisit America late next autumn. According to official outgiving, he will conduct in his own music and in other Parisian pieces at two concerts early in December. It is not likely that he wil cross and recross the Atlantic merely for the fortnight necessary to prepare and acomplish these concerts or that he will tarry in New York only. He will be disposed to go elsewhere, to be guest of other conductors. In particular, he may be inclined to revisit Boston where he spent a month in 1905 at the invitation of Mr. Higginson, Mr. Gericke and the orchestra of this town. He then lead the band in concerts at home and abroad, shared in performances of his own chamber-music, lectured at Harvard, went the round of illustrious guests in the arts. He interested the public concerned with these things, seemed pleased with its regard, made known sundry French music—some of his own included—that impressed American ears.

As Monsieur d'Indy was made welcome in Boston in 1905, so should he be made welcome there in 1921. In the sixteen intervening years, his music has become familiar part of the "standard repertory" at the Symphony Concerts under German and French conductors alike. His high place among the composers of our time is better understood. Many nowadays have come to know something of his other activities, as master of the Schola Cantorum, as zealous propagandist of his own faiths. He needed introductions in 1905; in 1921 his credentials would speak largely for themselves. Again the Symphony Orchestra might wisely honor him. In a few weeks Mr. Monteux will depart for Paris. He should carry with him an invitation to Monsieur d'Indy to symphony concerts in Boston as well as in New York. With such a guest in question, there should be no thought of polite orchestral rivalries or of ancient and restricted routine, of distrust of composers as conductors. Sixteen years ago Monsieu d'Indy won his spurs in Boston. In the interval, no doubt he has sharpened them. H. T. P.

Two Hours of Chaikovsky

The Symphony Orchestra is generous to the public of the concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund. Many such hearers—conductor and manager seem to believe—seek it only on these occasions. To them accordingly it would return full measure. Hence programmes two hours long and programmes as often as not of the music of a single composer. Even Beethoven has so served a good cause; these many years Wagner has been prop and pillar to it; and next to Wagner, Chaikovsky. Usually, it has been the Chaikovsky of the Pathetic Symphony, the Nutcracker Ballet, or both. Yesterday, however, Mr. Monteux, as his frequent way is, departed from precedent. "All-Chaikovsky," as the patois of the concert-hall puts it, was to be the programme; but by will of the conductor it traversed his Fifth Symphony, his Italian Caprice, his Slavic March, his Rococo Variations for Violoncello and Orchestra, the first movement of his Concerto for Violin. As frequenters of the regular Symphony Concerts know, Chaikovsky has there been in long eclipse. Dr. Muck disliked his music and mistrusted himself as conductor in it: Mr. Rabaud accepted unquestioned parochial Parisian scorn of it; only Mr. Monteux—and of late—has been open-minded to it and by no means unresponsive under the tests of actual performance. The more the pity then that no larger audience came to the well-spread board of yesterday. Possibly a casual public begins and ends with the Chaikovsky of the Pathetic Symphony and the Nutcracker Dances. Possibly a superior public mislikes the Slavic March or the Italian Caprice because they are played at the Pops. Yet they are not less inspiriting pieces in kind; while for many years in many cities, the Russian's Fifth Symphony has borne many sons of scrutiny.

There was no mistaking either the pleasure that this music yielded or the just desert that it received in such restoration to the active repertory. The Rococo Variations may be as intricate, ornate and long-spun as the title implies; the violoncellist may for instant stumble, as did Mr. Bedetti on Sunday; yet in his tone the songful measures do not lack sensuous beauty nor the ornate measures fluent grace, nor the pattern-weaving piquant intricacy. A fragment of the Concerto for Violin remains a fragment, but in it Mr. Burgin did feats of virtuosity in the weaving of the cadenza, caught not a little of Russian fire and bite in the transitions, sounded the sensuous fullness of Chaikovsky's melody. Too finely in the cadenza he sometimes drew his tone, but elsewhere it warmed the ear. Agreed that the Italian Caprice is no match for Rimsky-Korsakov's similar Spanish adventure in instrumental and harmonic dress and in artful play with rhythms. But the very candors of Chaikovsky speak for him in the drenched Italian dance-tunes the rhythmic vigors, the high colors, the broad strokes of a music designed to blaze and crackle. And the Slavic March is a march of racial moods as well as of racial hymn.

Yet it was the Symphony that brought Chaikovsky, conductor and orchestra fullest deserving. Theorize about the composer and his music as the doubter may "in the closet," pose as some of us do over both when we are in the company of the superior, yet in the concert-hall and in this Fifth Symphony there is no resisting him. Hear again the sombre introduction; follow the tumults of the first movement; catch the mood of the half-sensuous, half-sentimental, full-throated, amply paced melody, and illusion begins. The long song of the Andante from the instant that the horn sounds it through the instant in which the violins resummon it makes of illusion emotion. The Waltz that is Scherzo is music of Chaikovsky haunted and fantasmal. The dark beginnings, the thrust into riotous turbulence in the Finale may be no more than routine Chaikovsky; but the splendors, the vigors, the proclamation of the will to live and the joy of living, flame at the end with power. Chaikovsky like Puccini may not abide the contacts of the study. The one, the other needs the contacts of concert-hall or opera house. For in their music, above all shortcomings, is human voice to as human emotion. H. T. P.

Within a week after the close of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux will depart, on May 6, for a visit to Paris, London and possibly other European cities in quest of interesting music for next season, of a few recruits for the orchestra and for the rest and change he well deserves.

TRANS. APR 11.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play for the first times anywhere a short Rhapsody on a Persian Theme, written by Stuart Mason, a resident composer—teacher of music and writer about it as well. The other novel number will be the long promised Suite of Milhaud, one of the newest Parisians, cause for hisses in the concert-hall and acrid debate in the newspapers. His music does sometimes emit strange sounds.

TRANS. APR. 13

TSCHAIKOWSKY FOR PENSION FUND MUSIC

Symphony Orchestra Gives a Varied Program

Dai Buell, Pianist, Assists at the People's Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a Tschaikowsky program yesterday afternoon to an audience which left numerous vacant seats in Symphony Hall. There was warm applause for the orchestra, for Mr Monteux, and for the two soloists, Richard Burgin, concertmaster, and Jean Bedetti, first cellist. The concert was the third this season for the benefit of the pension fund.

Mr Burgin gave a spirited performance of the allegro moderato from Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. Mr Bedetti coped successfully with the intricate, but tiresome variations on a Rococo theme. The orchestra did better work than at the two previous pension fund concerts.

Its playing was not perfunctory this time, though there might have been more absolute precision in ensemble. Only at regular concerts, however, are Mr Monteux and his men thoroughly on their mettle, a state of affairs which contrasts with that which prevailed under Muck, who often surpassed himself at such special concerts as this one.

It is the critical fashion nowadays to sneer at Tschaikowsky's music as vulgar and uninspired. His reputation has shrunk tremendously in the past 15 years. But even an unsympathetic listener cannot help feeling the crude, nervous vitality of the Marche Slave, the Italian Caprice, and the first and last movements of the Fifth Symphony.

The harmonies are too often banal, the rhythms lack subtlety, the themes are never delicate. Yet, like Verdi and Puccini, of whom the same criticisms are often made, Tschaikowsky had inspiration. His taste is not that of Mozart or Debussy, but he is in his way a genius, a sort of musical Kipling.

GLOBE APR. 11.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Music of Tschaikowsky made the programme of the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestra furnished two of the soloists at this concert. They were Mr. Burgin, the concert master, who played the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist, who played the "Variations on a Roccoco Theme." The orchestral compositions were the Fifth Symphony, the "Italian Caprice" and the "Marche Slav." Mr. Burgin is soloist with orchestra par excellence. He has the breadth and musicianly authority, he has the enthusiasm of his youth and a virile brilliant tone well suited to Tschaikowsky music. He was applauded to the echo after his performance.

Mr. Bedetti would make far more trivial music than the "Variations on a Roccoco Theme" significant. He gives superficial ornamentation of a melody character and importance. He sings a melody itself with a nobility of tone and sentiment gloriously typical of his instrument, and he in turn reaped applause.

The Fifth Symphony is the one work in which Tschaikowsky is an optimist. The first three movements are tragic or of a poetic melancholy, like the slow movement with the celebrated horn solo. The finale repeats a theme, which had been introduced in the minor key, in the major, and the dirge is turned to a wild chant of victory.

POST APR. 11.

[115]

Last Concert

OF BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Pierre Monteux Will Lead Orchestra in Notable Concert. Felix Fox Piano Soloist.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night in Infantry Hall in their last concert of this season, Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This symphony was one of the great Russian composer's final works, and, in the opinion of many, is one of his most splendid achievements. It was written in the spring of 1888 at Foolooskoe, near Moscow, the landscape of which Tschaikowsky declared he preferred to all the sublimities of Switzerland, the Caucasus, and Italy. The success of this masterpiece was evident to the world when it was first performed in St. Petersburg a little later.

Felix Fox, the noted pianist who will be the soloist at this concert, will play with the orchestra another work which figures prominently on every orchestral repertoire, the Fourth Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven in G Minor. In the poetic beauty of its conception this splendid achievement is considered by many to be finer tha the "Emperor" Concerto.

The brilliant overture of Lal "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King Ys"), with a notable cello sol will close the concert.

This concert promises to be t most remarkable of a successf year of the Boston Symphony this city.

BROWN HERALD APR

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Tschaikowsky Composition Features Final Concert.

FELIX FOX PIANO SOLOIST

Event Fitting Climax to Year's Series.—Large Audience Shows Enthusiasm Over Both Orchestra and Assisting Artists.—Monteux Commanding Figure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist. The concert proved a fitting climax to a series which, in some respects, has been the most successful in the history of the organization's visits here. In the matter of attendance this season's showing eclipses all records for previous years, and interest and enthusiasm have been correspondingly great. Mr. Monteux has accomplished much with his forces since the recent change in the orchestra's personnel. It is, indeed, a herculean task to mould into artistic ensemble such a great body of players, no matter how efficient individually each may be; and by his success as orchestral drill master, and his gifts as interpreter of the symphonic classics, he has become a commanding figure among our American orchestral conductors.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky....Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
- Andante.
- Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
- Valse (Allegro moderato).
- Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace.

Beethoven....Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58.
- Allegro moderato.
- Andante con moto.
- Rondo: Vivace.

Lalo................Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"

The feature number, Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, is one of his greatest symphonic writings. In it is foreshadowed the brooding melancholy which reaches complete expression in his sixth symphony, the "Pathetic." The first two movements of the E-minor are its best in creative thought. The solemn principal theme, recurring again and again in sombre tonal dress seems to suggest despairing effort, to solve the mystery of life, while the steady, rythmic beat of bass viol and percussion instruments stalks like inexorable fate through the dark hued but gorgeous harmonies. The third movement, a waltz, strikes the listener as a pathetic attempt to be gay and the finale an eager but futile effort to portray a triumphant solution of the great riddle.

Mr. Fox, who has many Providence friends, received very cordial recognition after his playing of the Beethoven concerto. This is a work in which the soloist is not required to battle with superior instrumental numbers. It is one that gives the solo instrument a decorative part in the ensemble.

Grace, lightness and the utterance of flowing phrase are qualities which enter largely into its most effective portrayal. The performance was delightfully clear in the technical sense and musicianly and artistic qualit strongly in evidence.

The Andante is a particularly and attractive movement and the made much of its opportunities sweetness and deft finger work mentation. It was an exhibition of ar tistry that brought a great and burst of applause at the close and Mr. Fox was obliged to return several times in acknowledgment.

Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" is a brilliantly orchestrated piece. The is used effectively on many occasions and the overture is brought to a vigo ous and stirring climax. Decided and virtuosity in its playing were ing features in this closing number, after which both Mr. Monteux and his men were required to bow to the applause of an apparently well-satisfied audience. A. F. P.

JOURNAL. APR. 13

Arthur Shepherd's New Fantasia
Piano and Orchestra at the Symph
Concert Tomorrow—Music According
Mrs. John Barrymore—Programmes
Prospect

PERHAPS never before in the his of the Symphony Concerts music by American composers peared with such regularity as in Monteux's recent and prospective grammes. Since the first of March positions by Gilbert, Carpenter, Loeff Chadwick and Foote have all been he and, now, this week comes Arthur Sh herd and next Stuart Mason. For while Mr. Monteux seemed indiffe toward our native music, but he has made ample reparation. Mr. Sheph piece is a Fantasia for piano and chestra, first played two years ago concert of the New England Conse tory, with Mr. Lee Pattison as the ist. It was then rewritten and prod last November by the Cleveland phony Orchestra, of which Mr. Shep is now the assistant conductor. In Cl land the piano-part was taken by Heinrich Gebhard, to whom the pi dedicated, and he will be the solois the forthcoming performances here far as the prominence of the solo ins ment is concerned, it may be said the Fantasia is not a concerto in older sense of the word, nor yet is piece for orchestra with pianoforte bligato as, for example, d'Indy's " phony on a Mountain Air," or Loeff "Pagan Poem."

In other words Mr. Shepherd has f a golden mean between these two extre In glancing through the score the preva impression is of the composer's econom musical material. From an introduc motive of ascending fifths, repeated a fo higher and followed by a cadenza for solo instrument, is evolved the princ theme which, with a cantabile motiv measures in length, holds sway for the thirty-two pages. A broad, essent lyric theme then makes its appearance, in the orchestra, then repeated by the p Music in the character of a Scherzo fo with the lyric theme constantly in the ground. There is a return to the first ject, a succeeding slow movement base the songful theme, a division ma "maetoso molto e ben cantando," in w the same melody predominates. The ends with a spirited coda derived from opening fifths. Mr. Shepherd has wr skillfully, but not dryly, his orchestra is well made and effective; the piano though difficult and complex, is essen

For the Symphony Concerts of week, Mr. Monteux proposes a program traversing Mozart's "Jupiter" Sympho Stuart Mason's "Rhapsody on a Per Theme"; Milhaud's Second Suite; Dukas's familiar Scherzo, "The Sorcer Apprentice." Mr. Mason's Rhapsody be played for the first time anywh Monsieur Milhaud's Suite for the first in America. It runs in five divisi Overture, Prelude and Fugue, Pasto Nocturne, Finale. At the last pair Symphony Concerts on April 29 and 30, another piece new to Boston will be play Bloch's tone-poem, "Winter-Spring," deserves place among our moderns.

The programme for the final concert the Musical Association in Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, April 27, has been tered in a single item. Mr. Bingham's "Citizens of the Barnyard or Tame Anim Tunes"—a piece for small orchestra—wi not be heard. Instead, Reginald Swee Prelude to his opera drawn from Synge tragedy of Irish fisher-folk, "Riders to th Sea," will be played for the first time Boston. A month ago, at concerts of Philharmonic Society in New York, it m some stir.

APR. 14

udience.
e is a particularly delicate e movement and the artist of its opportunities for tonal and deft finger work in orna-
It was an exhibition of ar-brought a great and sincere applause at the close and Mr.
obliged to return several times
owledgment.
overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" is a orchestrated piece. The brass effectively on many occasions overture is brought to a vigor-stirring climax. Decided rythm rtuosity in its playing were pleas-atures in this closing number, after both Mr. Monteux and his men required to bow to the applause
n apparently well-satisfied audience.
A. F. P.

OV. JOURN. APR 13

ur Shepherd's New Fantasia
no and Orchestra at the Symphony ncert Tomorrow—Music According a John Barrymore—Programmes
spect

ERHAPS never before in the history of the Symphony Concerts has music by American composers ap-
ed with such regularity as in Mr.
teux's recent and prospective pro-
mmes. Since the first of March com-
tions by Gilbert, Carpenter, Loeffler,
dwick and Foote have all been heard.
now, this week comes Arthur Shep-
and next Stuart Mason. For e Mr. Monteux seemed indifferent rd our native music; but he has now
e ample reparation. Mr. Shepherd's
e is a Fantasia for piano and or-tra, first played two years ago at cert of the New England Conserva-
with Mr. Lee Pattison as the solo
It was then rewritten and produc
November by the Cleveland Sym-
ny Orchestra, of which Mr. Shepherd ow the assistant conductor. In Cleve the piano-part was taken by rich Gebhard, to whom the piece cated, and he will be the soloist forthcoming performances here.
as the prominence of the solo instru
t is concerned, it may be said th Fantasia is not a concerto in th
r sense of the word, nor yet is it
e for orchestra with pianoforte
ato as, for example, d'Indy's "Sym ny on a Mountain Air," or Loeffler gan Poem."
other words Mr. Shepherd has foun lden mean between these two extreme ancing through the score the prevail ession is of the composer's economy ical material. From an introductory ve of ascending fifths, repeated a fo er, and followed by a cadenza for instrument, is evolved the princi
e which, with a cantabile motiv sures in length, holds sway for the fi
y-two pages. A broad, essentially theme then makes its appearance,
e orchestra, then repeated by the piano.
c in the character of a Scherzo follows
the lyric theme constantly in the back-
nd. There is a return to the first suba succeeding slow movement based on songful theme, a division marked etoso molto e ben cantando," in which same melody predominates. The piece with a spirited coda derived from the ing fifths. Mr. Shepherd has written fully, but not dryly, his orchestration
ell made and effective; the piano part,
gh difficult and complex, is essentially

the Symphony Concerts of ne
Mr. Monteux proposes a programme
sing Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony Mason's "Rhapsody on a Persian
e"; Milhaud's Second Suite; and
s's familiar Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's ntice." Mr. Mason's Rhapsody will layed for the first time anywhere;
ieur Milhaud's Suite for the first times merica. It runs in five divisions—
ure, Prelude and Fugue, Pastoral urne, Finale. At the last pair of hony Concerts on April 29 and 30, still er piece new to Boston will be played,
's tone-poem, "Winter-Spring." He
ves place among our moderns.
programme for the final concert of Musical Association in Jordan Hall on esday evening, April 27, has been al-
in a single item. Mr. Bingham's
zens of the Barnyard or Tame Animal s"—a piece for small orchestra—will e heard. Instead, Reginald Sweet's de to his opera drawn from Synge's dy of Irish fisher-folk, "Riders to the " will be played for the first time on. A month ago, at concerts of the armonic Society in New York, it ma stir.

ANS. APR. 14

22D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" Is the Feature of Program

SHEPHERD FANTASY HEARD FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Vaughan Williams, A London Symphony; Shepherd, Fantasy for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebbard, pianist); Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet;" Overture Fantasia (after Shakespeare).

The London Symphony will bear many repetitions. The impression made by it when it was produced here last February was yesterday enlarged and deepened. The music might have been frankly panoramic, it might have been a variant of Elgar's "Cockaigne," but Vaughan Williams, as other music of his has proved, while he is sufficiently realistic in this symphony, while he reproduces the roar and the din of the streets, is imaginative and emotional. The Thames is more to him than a convenient river for commercial purposes; he expresses in tones the loneliness of now shabby, once fashionable and frequented districts, as if he had been inspired by reading "Tales of Mean Streets," his bustling London is also stony-hearted; he hears the bitter cry of outcast London and reproduces it in tones without undue sentimentalism. And he might have put as motto to this most impressive work a sentence from Thomas Decker's apostrophe to the city uttered over three centuries ago: "Thou hast all things in thee to make thee fairest, and all things in thee to make three foulest." The man that has written the mysterious introduction of this symphony, expressed loneliness and tragic shabbiness in the second movement, the cruelty of the great city in the finale, is more than an accomplished musician; he is a rare poet in tones.

Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy, played at these concerts for the first time, has excellent measures and measures that are ineffectively noisy. The opening arouses pleasurable expectation. The thematic material throughout is salient; but the treatment of it is often confused. The music is modern in its harmonic schemes, but the instrumentation is too often injuriously thick. Nor is there throughout the work a fine sense of proportion in dynamic values, or a due regard for contrasts. Mr. Gebbard played well, as is his habit, but he and the composer's intentions suffered frequently from the crushing orchestration. Mr. Shepherd was in the audience and acknowledged the applause.

We well remember the sensation made by Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" when it was brought out by Mr. Nikisch. It was one of his battle horses. His treatment of the passage in which the horns wail in syncopation against the Love Theme, perhaps the most original and the most emotional measures in the overture, stirred all hearers. He left us; other conductors put the overture on their programs; but not till yesterday, under Mr. Monteux's leadership, did this section give the old thrill. Much of the overture has grown old and seedy; the introduction now seems interminably drawn out; the constant repetition of insignificant phrases—the tossing of them about to various instruments—a favorite trick of Tschaikowsky's—distract the attention of the hearer and break the continuity of the dramatic-musical flow.

The performance of the orchestra throughout was of the highest order. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony; Stuart Mason, Rhapsody on a Persian Air, for orchestra with pianoforte obbligato (first performance); Milhaud, Orchestral Suite No. 2 (first time in America); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

HERALD APR

THE POPS AGAIN

The regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall is nearly over. In fact, two weeks from next Monday the last will have been given and the season of Pop concerts will open on May 2, to take complete possession of the hall every night except Sunday for ten weeks. A full sized orchestra of eighty players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served at the tables and at the bar as usual. Splendid things in the way of new popular music are already being prepared by Mr. Jacchia. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

AMER. APR

GEBHARD SOLOIST IN SHEPHERD'S FANTASY

Pianist Plays With the Symphony Orchestra

Williams and Tschaikowsky Pieces Fill Out the Program

Heinrich Gebhard played the solo part in a new fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra by Arthur Shepherd at yesterday's Symphony concert with the skill and taste which long since won him many admirers in this, his home city. Since Mr Shepherd was for many years connected as student and teacher with the New England Conservatory, his piece had also a local interest. Friendly applause compelled him to rise in his place in the audience and share the credit with Mr Gebhard and Mr Monteux.

The fantasy was originally entitled "Fantaisie Humoresque," a designation fully warranted by the whimsical rhythms of much of the music. It is adroitly written, sprightly and solemn by turns, in an individual modern style. The performance did full justice to the music.

The listener found no reason yesterday to change his previous unfavorable opinion of Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," first played earlier in the season. Its orchestration is clumsy, there is no trace of melodic inspiration, no sign of constructive power. A certain harmonic gift is this composer's entire stock in trade. He has nothing else in common with the true great.

Debussy, Stravinsky and all their great predecessors in the history of music have the gift of inventing new and distinctive melodies. Vaughan Williams, in default of it, is reduced to restless and impotent juggling with fragments of street songs and other borrowed or meaningless bits of tune. Mr Monteux and the orchestra galvanized the huge mass of notes into a semblance of life, and were rewarded for their pains by prolonged applause from about one-tenth of those present.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the other number on an exceptionally uninteresting program, has at least several genuinely original tunes in it, and consierable imaginative power. It is akin to Verdi rather than to Berlioz, Debussy and Mozart, vigorous without refinement.

For next week, Mr Monteux has arranged a program of far greater interest. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, novelties by Stuart Mason and Darius Milhaud and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" should make a concert as attractive as most of those under his conductorship have been.

GLOBE APR. 16.

MODERN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Sheperd's Fantasy for First Time—Gebhard Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vaughn Williams' London Symphony was repeated after a first Boston performance given some weeks ago, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Arthur Sheperd's Fantasy for piano and orchestra was played for the first time in Boston, with Heinrich Gebhard as pianist, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture brought the end.

GENUINE MUSIC OF A CITY

Williams' symphony gains, and does not lose, by repetition. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave a surpassingly brilliant performance. This reviewer was able, not unnaturally, to find more in the work than he found when he first heard it. It is highly original and imaginative. It is genuine music of a city, in that it has both the exterior stir and bustle and the more profound and recurrent pulse of a great centre of life. It has, in addition, a racial melancholy, characteristic, one believes, of the English temperament.

The second movement, which seemed at a first hearing overlong, and perhaps is, has, nevertheless, that which De Quincey felt when he wandered about forlorn and silent streets of London town. Most impressive was the climax of the dramatic final movement, and the epilogue, harking back to the poetic introduction of the dramatic final movement, and the sounds of the city heard from afar off, the flowing river, the striking of Big Ben. Again one notes in this symphony the influence of Strawinsky and of modern Frenchmen, but it is an influence, not a determining factor in the makeup of the work. The composer retains his sincerity and individuality. He is sufficiently master of himself to utilize this and that device in a way to intensify the effect of his ideas.

Sheperd's Fantasy Liked

Mr. Sheperd's fantasy received a very enthusiastic greeting from the audience. There was a hearty and long-continued applause, craning of necks to look at the composer, a composer who neither seeks nor enjoys publicity, and who has shunned at all times in his career the slightest superficiality by which he might have made a quick momentary appeal. The fantasy, as explained in the programme book, is based on three themes, and is roughly after the Dondo form. Of these three themes the third, the most lyrical, has also, in the abominable parlance of professional musicmakers, the most "juice." It is poetically employed, and it is matter for a sweeping apotheosis at the end. Also, it is over-orchestrated at this place. The earlier themes are more nimble but also more dry. The humor is to us a little sour—not merely sardonic, fanatical, but sour. The piano part is brilliant, very difficult, and, one would say, not too grateful to the player, and too frequently overbalanced by the orchestra.

Inclined to Academic

At a first hearing the exposition of tho first two themes was inclined to the academic. Later the composer lets himself go. Well, he could have begun earlier. There is a certain constraint, a certain feeling of corners. We wish Mr. Sheperd would write more, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say we wish he played more, so that he could gain greater ease and perspective on his own work. We believe that in that case he would throw half this fantasy away, reorchestrate the other half, add a little fresh development to work it of required length, and find himself with a handsome concert piece on his hands.

The "Romeo and Juliet" overture would be worth a journey if only to hear Tschaikowsky's love music. Here is the incomparable expression in tones of the southern passion of Juliet, and it is strangely Shaksperian. The remainder of the overture is rather rank Russian, with the exception of the music of Friar Laurence and the noble requiem at the end.

Tschaikowsky Underrated

But always there haunts the memory that sensuous love theme, and the gorgeous orchestral coloring, the purple and gold with which it is decked out—decked out, as one might say, for the final tragedy. Tschaikowsky, yesterday overrated, is today underrated. He should be heard more often at the Symphony concerts.

It is easy to point to his coarseness, his howling and groaning. Once let him become possessed of an emotion, and there are few modern composers whom he does not leave behind. His intense feeling, his childlike naivete found their way into his music. Listening to it one forgets its dross; one is moved past politenesses or reservations. One calls this man "brother."

POST. APR 16

Boston Notes

BOSTON, Massachusetts — The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on April 15. The program was as follows: Vaughn Williams, A London Symphony; Arthur Shepherd, Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet."

The "London" symphony was given for the second time this season. This second performance was more than justified for it brought forth many new and interesting points in the symphony. A work of such large conception must be heard many times before an adequate idea of it can be obtained. Curiously enough the parts which created the most striking impressions at the time of the first hearing proved to be the least interesting. The beauty of the work as a whole, however, is undoubted and the selection of any particular parts for praise or blame would be to record impressions which are purely personal. The performance was thoroughly sympathetic.

Arthur Shepherd's fantasy was played for the first time at these concerts. It is difficult to describe music of this character. The composer is quite evidently of serious intent. There are well-constructed pages; occasional happy effects of orchestration; a few moments of lyrical expressiveness. Yet the work as a whole left us cold. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist. He played with evident admiration for the composition and must be praised for his conscientious performance of it.

Mr. Monteux gave an admirable reading of Tschaikowsky's overture. For all its theatricalism it is still appealing when interpreted as it was at yesterday's concert.

MONITOR. APR 16.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

REPETITION, REVIVAL—AND ALSO NOVELTY

Vaughan Williams's Music of London Deservingly Heard and Applauded Anew—Chaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" After Six Years—The Russian in the Ears of 1921—Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy for Type and Moral

FOR a composer, admittedly out of the fashion and by some called moribund, Chaikovsky has fared well of late with the Symphony Orchestra. Last Sunday his music filled a whole concert; yesterday afternoon the final number was his Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; soon his pieces will dapple the programmes of The Pops. Beyond doubting, the workaday public hears him gladly, though, by more than one sign of Sunday, it may not care for him through two hours on end. As plainly many a frequenter of the Symphony Concerts is not displeased to find a piece by Chaikovsky on Mr. Monteux's lists. That conductor has been more generous to him than either of his immediate predecessors. Mr. Rabaud would have none of the Russian's music; Dr. Muck added to distaste for it, distrust of himself with it. Mr. Monteux, on the other hand, plays Chaikovsky well. Often he seems to visualize the piece in hand; almost always he can find in it tang of the theatre; he takes Chaikovsky at his word in directness, even obviousness, of effect.

The conductor, as he should, spared not in the music of strife and brawl that recurs in the tone-poem of yesterday; he wrung as much as he might out of the love-music, though as voice of passion, it is far inferior to that bestowed by Chaikovsky in another Fantasia upon Paolo and Francesca of Rimini. Mr. Monteux did more, however, than make the obvious emphatic; he caught and conveyed the note of mystery that winds through many a measure as though these loves of Montague for Capulet were as spell predestined and unconquerable, laid upon both by fate. Such fatality touches a transitional passage here and there; Mr. Monteux did not overlook it; while so doing he restored to a fading music, occasional color of imagination. Last Sunday again, he was as penetrating and communicating with the fantasmal quality of the Scherzo-Waltz in the Fifth Symphony, with the moodiness that makes the Slavic March racial expression as well as racial glorification. And the orchestra—perhaps any orchestra—plays Chaikovsky zealously. Not for nothing in the Fifth Symphony may the first horn publish the song of the slow movement, or the strings lead it in glowing return. The square-cut sonorities of the Finale are an easy orchestral eloquence; even the snapping rhythms of the Italian Caprice, common as they are, spur the assembled virtuosi. Blessed be effects, designed or spontaneous, so long as they be obvious. Orchestras and audiences both crave them.

The Chaikovsky that has faded and withered wrote many a measure of "Romeo and Juliet." However ears heard it twenty or thirty years ago, bettered taste and widening view have dried the music of strife into commonplace stuff, recurring to weariness. Most Russian composers—Musorgsky excepted—seem repetitious; but while others, like Rimsky-Korsakov, vary the repeating, Chaikovsky renews obvious and sometimes tricky means. To ears, again, of 1921, the love-music neither plumbs the depths nor scales the heights of passion. It is of Chaikovsky, in a limbo of striving, imagining intensities for which he hardly finds full expression, missing the inspiration—there is no other word—which, when it really kindles him, makes him irresistible still. In "Romeo and Juliet," it comes only in the music of a love that is mysterious spell predestined. Then it is at finest; the hearer heeds not the manner of saying; the emotion, the illusion sway him, as, doubtless, they swayed the composer.

To write enduringly Chaikovsky seems to have needed almost a demoniac possession. The slow song of the Fifth Symphony is such outpouring. If ever music was written because it swelled within the composer and swept away every barrier to release, it is this Andante. Hence beauty, power, permanence, recurring human response. So also come into tonal being the bleak and carking desolation, the black and suffocating despair, the sheer spiritual annihilation of the Finale of the Pathetic Symphony. From inspiration, yet again, springs the love-music of the tone-poem of Francesca, Paolo and Dante. In yet other voice, albeit in less degree, it winds through the fantasmal movements—the Scherzo-Waltz, the Allegro of the ghostly drum-beat—in the Fifth and the Sixth Symphonies. It is such visitation, present or absent, recurring, upspringing, that sets the best of Chaikovsky, as in the cited passages, so far from the worst of Chaikovsky—as in the trumpery street-tunes of the Italian Caprice, the march movement of the Pathetic Symphony. Therein only a frenzy of rhythm, a fury of unloosed sound may save him—and not to all judges—from mere din.

Between these extremes are likewise two Chaikovskys—he who was labored and dull at mere music-making as in the Rococo Variations for violoncello; he who could summon the power that sends the orchestra striding superbly through the final measures of the Fifth Symphony or that sweeps the piano through the great chords that martial the flaming melody of the familiar Concerto. In turn the melody of the Russian points these contrasts. He may drench it with the beauty of longing as in the Andante aforesaid; he may wing it with power as in the introduction to the Piano-Concerto; he may permeate it with singular and penetrating suggestion—some call it obscenity—as in the first movement of the Pathetic Symphony. Yet again and it is the obvious—sentimentalized, tricked out almost beyond Puccinian powers. No wonder Chaikovsky so mettled, so enduring the passage of the years, teases conductors, puzzles hearers, sounds antiquated, seems perennial, is neither altogether alive nor quite dead, now holds, again wearies, the public ear. Place, however, he does keep and may long keep on orchestral programmes. Through glowing moments inspiration or something near to it did come to Chaikovsky and down wind blow tricks and triteness.

To this revival from Chaikovsky—"Romeo and Juliet" had not been heard in Boston for six years—Mr. Monteux mated Arthur Shepherd's Fantasy for Piano and Orchestra, hitherto known hereabouts by private performance only and praised as it seemed yesterday, beyond actual desert. Mr. Gebhard played the solo-part, with understanding and sympathy, with impeccable skill and such compass of tone as circumstances permitted him. Mr. Monteux was as well disposed with the orchestral voices. There were plentiful plaudits at the end; the composer, sought by curious eyes, rose to acknowledge them. By these tokens, piece and performance will pass as "successful." Yet, almost steadily, the music left impression of the dryness, the neutrality, the "middle grayness" that beset so many American composers of both the elder and the younger generations. Mediocre may be too harsh a word for them and their music. Lack of individuality better describes—the more because it is a negative phrase—their pervading quality. They miss distinctive imagination, they yield no personal flavor, they almost never depart from those twin bourgeois blessings, safety and sanity; they are too discreet to fall low—or to rise high. Beside them our few composers with a clear flame of their own—a Loeffler, a Carpenter, a Gilbert, a Bloch—gain by sheer contrast a merit, perhaps beyond their actual and enduring worth. Individuality is the zest of the arts. In them, safety is the dullest of virtues.

To write these things is not to reproach Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy beyond the degree of its kind. It is a well-made piece, articulated in short divisions, each flowing into each and everyone by workmanlike device, maintaining the unity, advancing the cumulation of the whole. The harmonic background sets off and diversifies the progress and the development of motiv and melody; the instrumental coloring often gives pleasure, utilizes, without quite embracing, modern ways with tonal speech; sundry thick and unwieldy measures aside, the voices of piano and orchestra are well balanced. Everywhere through the Fantasy plays the schooled skill of a considerate craftsman.

Mr. Shepherd knows the routine of his job; invention, imagination, emotion with it are another thing. With the best will in the world, it is hard to find the three motivs whence the Fantasy springs either interesting or individual. In varying degree, dry they are in statement and dry in progress and amplification. Workmanship interlaces or contrasts them, distributes them between orchestra and piano, draws this, that or the other suggestion from them. But where do they or all this process touch the listening imagination, impart more than obvious mood, stir responsive emotion, hint that Arthur Shepherd, making music, is of other mind, spirit, outlook, than a hundred more makers thereof? Once and again for a passing moment comes a personal stroke, but the rest, the considerable rest, seems neither more nor less than a music of dry competence, no more individual, significant or pleasurable than a working journalist's daily stint when it happens to be a good article. Competence may do the work of the world, but hardly the work of the arts therein.

Deserved repetition of Vaughan Williams's London Symphony, as the outstanding and abiding novel music of the year, filled the other half of the concert—in more eloquent and plastic, if not in more rugged performance than it has hitherto received and at last to eager interest and tense applause. It was good to see an audience so engrossed and stirred, since little symphonic music of recent years is freer from rhetoric and device. The composer works with bare hand, with eye fixed on the object of his vision—the life, the aspects, the spirit of London that have wakened in him sensation and creation. From inner impulse and not from composer's working will seems to spring this London Sympathy. Before music so generated and produced, the hearer takes little thought of method and means. So fused are the matter and the manner, the substance and the form that structure and procedure seem only the flow into expression of thought, mood, sensation. Few modern symphonies begin in such sombre and mysterious splendor; few end in a rarer music of austere brooding. In both there are depths as well as surfaces. Night as well as dawn may brood upon Williams's city. Between goes a manifold London—first in ardent rhythmical and melodic tumult; again in the melancholy and the pity of the gray quarters haunted and shrivelled by decay; once more in the din of jigging, squeaking, snarling slum only a little mist-softened; finally in the thud and grind, the mockery, the seeming hate of great cities upon those who may not master their way through them. Again not merely surfaces, but also depths. A city has entered into Williams's imagination and possessed it. He pictures its life, he summons its spirit; yet is there a symphony. In our day music has done few such feats.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. APR. 16

Symphony Programme

At the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 22 and 23, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in this country the Second Orchestral Suite by the daring young French composer, Darius Milhaud. When first played in Paris this score was greeted with a violent demonstration and hisses which in that city has more than once been the reception of a new great work. Mr. Monteux will conduct from the manuscript score which he has received from the composer.

Another new work at these concerts will be the "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" by the Boston composer, Stuart Mason. Th symphony will be the masterpiece of Mozart in C major, which is called "Jupiter," and the closing number "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas.

POST-APR.17

[416] echnical sense and Mr. Ge and artistic qualities were in evidence.

ndante is a particularly delicate ractive movement and the artist much of its opportunities for tonal ness and deft finger work in orna-ation. It was an exhibition of ar-that brought a great and sincere of applause at the close and Mr.
was obliged to return several times
knowledgment.
o's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" is a antly orchestrated piece. The brass sed effectively on many occasions the overture is brought to a vigor-and stirring climax. Decided rythm virtuosity in its playing were pleas-features in this closing number, after h both Mr. Monteux and his men
required to bow to the applause
n apparently well-satisfied audience.

A. F. P.

RAV. JOURN. APR. 13

ur Shepherd's New Fantasia fo
ano and Orchestra at the Symphony ncert Tomorrow—Music According t
s. John Barrymore—Programmes in spect

ERHAPS never before in the history
of the Symphony Concerts has
music by American composers ap-
ed with such regularity as in Mr.
teux's recent and prospective pro-
mmes. Since the first of March com-
tions by Gilbert, Carpenter, Loeffler,
dwick and Foote have all been heard,
now, this week comes Arthur Shep-
and next Stuart Mason. For le Mr. Monteux seemed indifferent ard our native music, but he has now
e ample reparation. Mr. Shepherd's
e is a Fantasia for piano and or-tra, first played two years ago at a cert of the New England Conserva-
, with Mr. Lee Pattison as the solo-
It was then rewritten and produced
November by the Cleveland Sym-
ny Orchestra, of which Mr. Shepherd
ow the assistant conductor. In Clevethe piano-part was taken by Mr.
rich Gebhard, to whom the piece is cated, and he will be the soloist in forthcoming performances here. S
as the prominence of the solo instrut is concerned, it may be said the Fantasia is not a concerto in the r sense of the word, nor yet is it
e for orchestra with pianoforte obato as, for example, d'Indy's "Sym-y on a Mountain Air," or Loeffler's
gan Poem."
other words Mr. Shepherd has found den mean between these two extremes ancing through the score the prevailing ession is of the composer's economy of ical material. From an introductory ve of ascending fifths, repeated a fourth er, and followed by a cadenza for the instrument, is evolved the principal e which, with a cantabile motiv two sures in length, holds sway for the fir
y-two pages. A broad, essentially theme then makes its appearance, fir e orchestra, then repeated by the piano.
e in the character of a Scherzo follows
the lyric theme constantly in the back-
nd. There is a return to the first sub-
a succeeding slow movement based on songful theme, a division marked
etoso molto e ben cantando," in which same melody predominates. The piece s with a spirited coda derived from the ing fifths. Mr. Shepherd has written
fully, but not dryly, his orchestration
ell made and effective; the piano part
gh difficult and complex, is essentially

the Symphony Concerts of ne
Mr. Monteux proposes a programme
rsing Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Mason's "Rhapsody on a Persian
e"; Milhaud's Second Suite; and
s's familiar Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's
ntice." Mr. Mason's Rhapsody will layed for the first time anywhere;
ieur Milhaud's Suite for the first time
merica. It runs in five divisions—
ure, Prelude and Fugue, Pastoral, rne, Finale. At the last pair of hony Concerts on April 29 and 30, still
er piece new to Boston will be played,
's tone-poem, "Winter-Spring." He
ves place among our moderns.
programme for the final concert of Musical Association in Jordan Hall on nesday evening, April 27, has been al-
in a single item. Mr. Bingham's
zens of the Barnyard or Tame Animal
s"—a piece for small orchestra—will be heard. Instead, Reginald Sweet's
de to his opera drawn from Synge's edy of Irish fisher-folk, "Riders to the " will be played for the first time in
on. A month ago, at concerts of the armonic Society in New York, it made stir.

ANS APR. 14

22D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" Is the Feature of Program

SHEPHERD FANTASY HEARD FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Vaughan Williams, A London Symphony; Shepherd, Fantasy for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist); Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet;" Overture Fantasia (after Shakespeare).

The London Symphony will bear many repetitions. The impression made by it when it was produced here last February was yesterday enlarged and deepened. The music might have been frankly panoramic, it might have been a variant of Elgar's "Cockaigne," but Vaughan Williams, as other music of his has proved, while he is sufficiently realistic in this symphony, while he reproduces the roar and the din of the streets, is imaginative and emotional. The Thames is more to him than a convenient river for commercial purposes; he expresses in tones the loneliness of now shabby, once fashionable and frequented districts, as if he had been inspired by reading "Tales of Mean Streets," his bustling London is also stony-hearted; he hears the bitter cry of outcast London and reproduces it in tones without undue sentimentalism. And he might have put as motto to this most impressive work a sentence from Thomas Decker's apostrophe to the city uttered over three centuries ago: "Thou hast all things in thee to make thee fairest, and all things in thee to make three foulest." The man that has written the mysterious introduction of this symphony, expressed loneliness and tragic shabbiness in the second movement, the cruelty of the great city in the finale, is more than an accomplished musician; he is a rare poet in tones.

Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy, played at these concerts for the first time, has excellent measures and measures that are ineffectively noisy. The opening arouses pleasurable expectation. The thematic material throughout is salient; but the treatment of it is often confused. The music is modern in its harmonic schemes, but the instrumentation is too often injuriously thick. Nor is there throughout the work a fine sense of proportion in dynamic values, or a due regard for contrasts. Mr. Gebbard played well, as is his habit, but he and the composer's intentions suffered frequently from the crushing orchestration. Mr. Shepherd was in the audience and acknowledged the applause.

We well remember the sensation made by Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" when it was brought out by Mr. Nikisch. It was one of his battle horses. His treatment of the passage in which the horns wail in syncopation against the Love Theme, perhaps the most original and the most emotional measures in the overture, stirred all hearers. He left us; other conductors put the overture on their programs; but not till yesterday, under Mr. Monteux's leadership, did this section give the old thrill. Much of the overture has grown old and seedy; the Introduction now seems interminably drawn out; the constant repetition of insignificant phrases—the tossing of them about to various instruments—a favorite trick of Tschaikowsky's—distract the attention of the hearer and break the continuity of the dramatic-musical flow.

The performance of the orchestra throughout was of the highest order. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony; Stuart Mason, Rhapsody on a Persian Air, for orchestra with pianoforte obbligato (first performance); Milhaud, Orchestral Suite No. 2 (first time in America); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

HE

THE POPS AGAIN

The regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall is nearly over. In fact, two weeks from next Monday the last will have been given and the season of Pop concerts will open on May 2, to take complete possession of the hall every night except Sunday for ten weeks. A full sized orchestra of eighty players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served at the tables and at the bar as usual. Splendid things in the way of new popular music are already being prepared by Mr. Jacchia. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

HERALD

GEBHARD SOLOIST IN SHEPHERD'S FANTASY

Pianist Plays With the Symphony Orchestra

Williams and Tschaikowsky Pieces Fill Out the Program

Heinrich Gebhard played the solo part in a new fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra by Arthur Shepherd at yesterday's Symphony concert with the skill and taste which long since won him many admirers in this, his home city. Since Mr Shepherd was for many years connected as student and teacher with the New England Conservatory, his piece had also a local interest. Friendly applause compelled him to rise in his place in the audience and share the credit with Mr Gebhard and Mr Monteux.

The fantasy was originally entitled "Fantaisie Humoresque," a designation fully warranted by the whimsical rhythms of much of the music. It is adroitly written, sprightly and solemn by turns, in an individual modern style. The performance did full justice to the music.

The listener found no reason yesterday to change his previous unfavorable opinion of Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," first played earlier in the season. Its orchestration is clumsy, there is no trace of melodic inspiration, no sign of constructive power. A certain harmonic gift is this composer's entire stock in trade. He has nothing else in common with the true great.

Debussy, Stravinsky and all their great predecessors in the history of music have the gift of inventing new and distinctive melodies. Vaughan Williams, in default of it, is reduced to restless and impotent juggling with fragments of street songs and other borrowed or meaningless bits of tune. Mr Monteux and the orchestra galvanized the huge mass of notes into a semblance of life, and were rewarded for their pains by prolonged applause from about one-tenth of those present.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the other number on an exceptionally uninteresting program, has at least several genuinely original tunes in it, and consierable imaginative power. It is akin to Verdi rather than to Berlioz, Debussy and Mozart, vigorous without refinement.

For next week, Mr Monteux has arranged a program of far greater interest. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, novelties by Stuart Mason and Darius Milhaud and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" should make a concert as attractive as most of those under his conductorship have been.

GLOBE APR. 16.

MODERN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Sheperd's Fantasy for First Time—Gebhard Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vaughn Williams' London Symphony was repeated after a first Boston performance given some weeks ago, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Arthur Sheperd's Fantasy for piano and orchestra was played for the first time in Boston, with Heinrich Gebhard as pianist, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture brought the end.

GENUINE MUSIC OF A CITY

Williams' symphony gains, and does not lose, by repetition. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave a surpassingly brilliant performance. This reviewer was able, not unnaturally, to find more in the work than he found when he first heard it. It is highly original and imaginative. It is genuine music of a city, in that it has both the exterior stir and bustle and the more profound and recurrent pulse of a great centre of life. It has, in addition, a racial melancholy, characteristic, one believes, of the English temperament.

The second movement, which seemed at a first hearing overlong, and perhaps is, has, nevertheless, that which De Quincey felt when he wandered about forlorn and silent streets of London town. Most impressive was the climax of the dramatic final movement, and the epilogue, harking back to the poetic introduction of the dramatic final movement, and the sounds of the city heard from afar off, the flowing river, the striking of Big Ben. Again one notes in this symphony the influence of Strawinsky and of modern Frenchmen, but it is an influence, not a determining factor in the makeup of the work. The composer retains his sincerity and individuality. He is sufficiently master of himself to utilize this and that device in a way to intensify the effect of his ideas.

Sheperd's Fantasy Liked

Mr. Sheperd's fantasy received a very enthusiastic greeting from the audience. There was a hearty and long-continued applause, craning of necks to look at the composer, a composer who neither seeks nor enjoys publicity, and who has shunned at all times in his career the slightest superficiality by which he might have made a quick momentary appeal. The fantasy, as explained in the programme book, is based on three themes, and is roughly after the Dondo form. Of these three themes the third, the most lyrical, has also, in the abominable parlance of professional musicmakers, the most "juice." It is poetically employed, and it is matter for a sweeping apotheosis at the end. Also, it is over-orchestrated at this place. The earlier themes are more nimble but also more dry. The humor is to us a little sour—not merely sardonic, fanatical, but sour. The piano part is brilliant, very difficult, and, one would say, not too grateful to the player, and too frequently overbalanced by the orchestra.

Inclined to Academic

At a first hearing the exposition of the first two themes was inclined to the academic. Later the composer lets himself go. Well, he could have begun earlier. There is a certain constraint, a certain feeling of corners. We wish Mr. Sheperd would write more, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say we wish he played more, so that he could gain greater ease and perspective on his own work. We believe that in that case he would throw half this fantasy away, reorchestrate the other half, add a little fresh development to work it of required length, and find himself with a handsome concert piece on his hands.

The "Romeo and Juliet" overture would be worth a journey if only to hear Tschaikowsky's love music. Here is the incomparable expression in tones of the southern passion of Juliet, and it is strangely Shaksperian. The remainder of the overture is rather rank Russian, with the exception of the music of Friar Laurence and the noble requiem at the end.

Tschaikowsky Underrated

But always there haunts the memory that sensuous love theme, and the gorgeous orchestral coloring, the purple and gold with which it is decked out—decked out, as one might say, for the final tragedy. Tschaikowsky, yesterday overrated, is today underrated. He should be heard more often at the Symphony concerts.

It is easy to point to his coarseness, his howling and groaning. Once let him become possessed of an emotion, and there are few modern composers whom he does not leave behind. His intense feeling, his childlike naivete found their way into his music. Listening to it one forgets its dross; one is moved past politenesses or reservations. One calls this man "brother."

POST. APR 16

Boston Notes

BOSTON, Massachusetts — The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on April 15. The program was as follows: Vaughn Williams, A London Symphony; Arthur Shepherd, Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet."

The "London" symphony was given for the second time this season. This second performance was more than justified for it brought forth many new and interesting points in the symphony. A work of such large conception must be heard many times before an adequate idea of it can be obtained. Curiously enough the parts which created the most striking impressions at the time of the first hearing proved to be the least interesting. The beauty of the work as a whole, however, is undoubted and the selection of any particular parts for praise or blame would be to record impressions which are purely personal. The performance was thoroughly sympathetic.

Arthur Shepherd's fantasy was played for the first time at these concerts. It is difficult to describe music of this character. The composer is quite evidently of serious intent. There are well-constructed pages; occasional happy effects of orchestration; a few moments of lyrical expressiveness. Yet the work as a whole left us cold. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist. He played with evident admiration for the composition and must be praised for his conscientious performance of it.

Mr. Monteux gave an admirable reading of Tschaikowsky's overture. For all its theatricalism it is still appealing when interpreted as it was at yesterday's concert.

MONITOR. APR 16.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

REPETITION, REVIVAL—AND ALSO NOVELTY

Vaughan Williams's Music of London Deservingly Heard and Applauded Anew—Chaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" After Six Years—The Russian in the Ears of 1921—Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy for Type and Moral

FOR a composer, admittedly out of the fashion and by some called moribund, Chaikovsky has fared well of late with the Symphony Orchestra. Last Sunday his music filled a whole concert; yesterday afternoon the final number was his Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; soon his pieces will dapple the programmes of The Pops. Beyond doubting, the workaday public hears him gladly, though, by more than one sign of Sunday, it may not care for him through two hours on end. As plainly many a frequenter of the Symphony Concerts is not displeased to find a piece by Chaikovsky on Mr. Monteux's lists. That conductor has been more generous to him than either of his immediate predecessors. Mr. Rabaud would have none of the Russian's music; Dr. Muck added to distaste for it, distrust of himself with it. Mr. Monteux, on the other hand, plays Chaikovsky well. Often he seems to visualize the piece in hand; almost always he can find in it tang of the theatre; he takes Chaikovsky at his word in directness, even obviousness, of effect.

The conductor, as he should, spared not in the music of strife and brawl that recurs in the tone-poem of yesterday; he wrung as much as he might out of the love-music, though as voice of passion, it is far inferior to that bestowed by Chaikovsky in another Fantasia upon Paolo and Francesca of Rimini. Mr. Monteux did more, however, than make the obvious emphatic; he caught and conveyed the note of mystery that winds through many a measure as though these loves of Montague for Capulet were as spell predestined and unconquerable, laid upon both by fate. Such fatality touches a transitional passage here and there; Mr. Monteux did not overlook it; while so doing he restored to a fading music, occasional color of imagination. Last Sunday again, he was as penetrating and communicating with the fantasma. quality of the Scherzo-Waltz in the Fifth Symphony, with the moodiness that makes the Slavic March racial expression as well as racial glorification. And the orchestra—perhaps any orchestra—plays Chaikovsky zealously. Not for nothing in the Fifth Symphony may the first horn publish the song of the slow movement, or the strings lead it in glowing return. The square-cut sonorities of the Finale are an easy orchestral eloquence; even the snapping rhythms of the Italian Caprice, common as they are, spur the assembled virtuosi. Blessed be effects, designed or spontaneous, so long as they be obvious. Orchestras and audiences both crave them.

The Chaikovsky that has faded and withered wrote many a measure of "Romeo and Juliet." However ears heard it twenty or thirty years ago, bettered taste and widening view have dried the music of strife into commonplace stuff, recurring to weariness. Most Russian composers—Musorgsky excepted—seem repetitious; but while others, like Rimsky-Korsakov, vary the repeating, Chaikovsky renews obvious and sometimes tricky means. To ears, again, of 1921, the love-music neither plumbs the depths nor scales the heights of passion. It is of Chaikovsky, in a limbo of striving, imagining intensities for which he hardly finds full expression, missing the inspiration—there is no other word—which, when it really kindles him, makes him irresistible still. In "Romeo and Juliet," it comes only in the music of a love that is mysterious spell predestined. Then it is at finest; the hearer heeds not the manner of saying; the emotion, the illusion sway him, as, doubtless, they swayed the composer.

To write enduringly Chaikovsky seems to have needed almost a demoniac possession. The slow song of the Fifth Symphony is such outpouring. If ever music was written because it swelled within the composer and swept away every barrier to release, it is this Andante. Hence beauty, power, permanence, recurring human response. So also come into tonal being the bleak and carking desolation, the black and suffocating despair, the sheer spiritual annihilation of the Finale of the Pathetic Symphony. From inspiration, yet again, springs the love-music of the tone-poem of Francesca, Paolo and Dante. In yet other voice, albeit in less degree, it winds through the fantasmal movements—the Scherzo-Waltz, the Allegro of the ghostly drum-beat—in the Fifth and the Sixth Symphonies. It is such visitation, present or absent, recurring, upspringing, that sets the best of Chaikovsky, as in the cited passages, so far from the worst of Chaikovsky—as in the trumpery street-tunes of the Italian Caprice, the march movement of the Pathetic Symphony. Therein only a frenzy of rhythm, a fury of unloosed sound may save him—and not to all judges—from mere din.

Between these extremes are likewise two Chaikovskys—he who was labored and dull at mere music-making as in the Rococo Variations for violoncello; he who could summon the power that sends the orchestra striding superbly through the final measures of the Fifth Symphony or that sweeps the piano through the great chords that martial the flaming melody of the familiar Concerto. In turn the melody of the Russian points these contrasts. He may drench it with the beauty of longing as in the Andante aforesaid; he may wing it with power as in the introduction to the Piano-Concerto; he may permeate it with singular and penetrating suggestion—some call it obscenity—as in the first movement of the Pathetic Symphony. Yet again and it is the obvious—sentimentalized, tricked out almost beyond Puccinian powers. No wonder Chaikovsky so mettled, so enduring the passage of the years, teases conductors, puzzles hearers, sounds antiquated, seems perennial, is neither altogether alive nor quite dead, now holds, again wearies, the public ear. Place, however, he does keep and may long keep on orchestral programmes. Through glowing moments inspiration or something near to it did come to Chaikovsky and down wind blow tricks and triteness.

To this revival from Chaikovsky—"Romeo and Juliet" had not been heard in Boston for six years—Mr. Monteux mated Arthur Shepherd's Fantasy for Piano and Orchestra, hitherto known hereabouts by private performance only and praised as it seemed yesterday, beyond actual desert. Mr. Gebhard played the solo-part, with understanding and sympathy, with impeccable skill and such compass of tone as circumstances permitted him. Mr. Monteux was as well disposed with the orchestral voices. There were plentiful plaudits at the end; the composer, sought by curious eyes, rose to acknowledge them. By these tokens, piece and performance will pass as "successful." Yet, almost steadily, the music left impression of the dryness, the neutrality, the "middle grayness" that beset so many American composers of both the elder and the younger generations. Mediocre may be too harsh a word for them and their music. Lack of individuality better describes—the more because it is a negative phrase—their pervading quality. They miss distinctive imagination, they yield no personal flavor, they almost never depart from those twin bourgeois blessings, safety and sanity; they are too discreet to fall low—or to rise high. Beside them our few composers with a clear flame of their own—a Loeffler, a Carpenter, a Gilbert, a Bloch—gain by sheer contrast a merit, perhaps beyond their actual and enduring worth. Individuality is the zest of the arts. In them, safety is the dullest of virtues.

To write these things is not to reproach Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy beyond the degree of its kind. It is a well-made piece, articulated in short divisions, each flowing into each and everyone by workmanlike device, maintaining the unity, advancing the cumulation of the whole. The harmonic background sets off and diversifies the progress and the development of motiv and melody; the instrumental coloring often gives pleasure, utilizes, without quite embracing, modern ways with tonal speech; sundry thick and unwieldy measures aside, the voices of piano and orchestra are well balanced. Everywhere through the Fantasy plays the schooled skill of a considerate craftsman.

Mr. Shepherd knows the routine of his job; invention, imagination, emotion with it are another thing. With the best will in the world, it is hard to find the three motivs whence the Fantasy springs either interesting or individual. In varying degree, dry they are in statement and dry in progress and amplification. Workmanship interlaces or contrasts them, distributes them between orchestra and piano, draws this, that or the other suggestion from them. But where do they or all this process touch the listening imagination, impart more than obvious mood, stir responsive emotion, hint that Arthur Shepherd, making music, is of other mind, spirit, outlook, than a hundred more makers thereof? Once and again for a passing moment comes a personal stroke, but the rest, the considerable rest, seems neither more nor less than a music of dry competence, no more individual, significant or pleasurable than a working journalist's daily stint when it happens to be a good article. Competence may do the work of the world, but hardly the work of the arts therein.

Deserved repetition of Vaughan Williams's London Symphony, as the outstanding and abiding novel music of the year, filled the other half of the concert—in more eloquent and plastic, if not in more rugged performance than it has hitherto received and at last to eager interest and tense applause. It was good to see an audience so engrossed and stirred, since little symphonic music of recent years is freer from rhetoric and device. The composer works with bare hand, with eye fixed on the object of his vision—the life, the aspects, the spirit of London that have wakened in him sensation and creation. From inner impulse and not from composer's working will seems to spring this London Sympathy. Before music so generated and produced, the hearer takes little thought of method and means. So fused are the matter and the manner, the substance and the form that structure and procedure seem only the flow into expression of thought, mood, sensation. Few modern symphonies begin in such sombre and mysterious splendor; few end in a rarer music of austere brooding. In both there are depths as well as surfaces. Night as well as dawn may brood upon Williams's city. Between goes a manifold London—first in ardent rhythmical and melodic tumult; again in the melancholy and the pity of the gray quarters haunted and shrivelled by decay; once more in the din of jigging, squeaking, snarling slum only a little mist-softened; finally in the thud and grind, the mockery, the seeming hate of great cities upon those who may not master their way through them. Again not merely surfaces, but also depths. A city has entered into Williams's imagination and possessed it. He pictures its life, he summons its spirit; yet is there a symphony. In our day music has done few such feats.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. APR. 16

Symphony Programme

At the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 22 and 23, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in this country the Second Orchestral Suite by the daring young French composer, Darius Milhaud. When first played in Paris this score was greeted with a violent demonstration and hisses which in that city has more than once been the reception of a new great work. Mr. Monteux will conduct from the manuscript score which he has received from the composer.

Another new work at these concerts will be the "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" by the Boston composer, Stuart Mason. Th symphony will be the masterpiece of Mozart in C major, which is called "Jupiter," and the closing number "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas.

POST-APR. 17

[416]

POP CONCERTS TO OPEN MAY 2

Two weeks from to-morrow, on Monday, May 2, the Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall. An orchestra of eighty Boston Symphony players, a number sufficient not only for popular music but for the most exacting modern scores, will be conducted by the favorite leader, Agide Jacchia. An enlarged menu of refreshments will be served at the tables and the new bar.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the firsft time in this country the second orchestral suite by the young French composer, Darius Milhaud. Mr. Monteux will conduct from the manuscript score which he has received from the composer. Another novelty will be the "Rhapsody on a Persian Air," by the Boston composer, Stuart Mason. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas will also be played.

ADVERTISER APR. 17

Twenty-Third Symphony

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 22 and 23, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program: Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony in C major; Rhapsody on a Persian Air, by Stuart Mason, and the Second Orchestral Suite of Darius Milhaud. The closing number will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas.

The Pops

The regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall being nearly over, the season of Pop concerts will open on May 2. A full-sized orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served as usual. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

TRAV. APR 16

Musical Jottings

The regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall is nearly over. In fact, two weeks from next Monday the last will have been given and the season of Pop Concerts will open on May 2, to take complete possession of the hall every night except Sunday for 10 weeks. A full-sized orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served at the tables and at the bar as usual. Splendid things in the way of new popular music are already being prepared by Mr. Jacchia. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 22 and 23, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program: Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony in C major; Rhapsody on a Persian Air by the Bostonian composer, Stuart Mason, to be heard for the first time at these concerts, and the Second Orchestral Suite of the daring young French composer, Darius Milhaud, which will on this occasion have its first performance in America. This score, hissed in Paris, will be conducted by Mr. Monteux from the manuscript. The closing number will be the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Paul Dukas.

RECORD. APR 16

Milhaud's Suite and Mason's Rhapsody for Novel Music—Mme. Gauthier and Mr. Schmitz in a Notable Programme — A Flute-Players' Matinee—Mr. Zimbalist and Mme. Gluck Return

THOUGH the season wanes, the zest for novel music in Mr. Monteux, his orchestra and his audience at the Symphony Concerts does not lessen. For next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at Symphony Hall, he announces two such pieces: the Second Orchestral Suite of Milhaud; a Rhapsody on a Persian Theme by Stuart Mason. The Suite will bring to hearing one of the newer generation of Parisian composers whose music has occasioned tumults in concert-hall and sharp debate in print. Here, though it sound strangely, it will probably be heard tranquilly. The Rhapsody is work of a Bostonian composer, known also as writer about music. It is brief and warmly colored; and among the voices is a piano obligato to be played by the composer. More about both these novel numbers will be printed in this place. For the rest Mozart's familiar "Jupiter Symphony" will begin Mr. Monteux's programme; while Dukas's sprightly and graphic Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," will end it.

TRAN. APR. 16

23D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in this country the second orchestral suite by the daring young French composer, Darius Milhaud. When first played in Paris this score was greeted with a violent demonstration and hisses, which in that city has more than once been the reception of a new, great work. Mr. Monteux will conduct from the manuscript score which he has received from the composer. Another new work at these concerts will be the Rhapsody on a Persian Air by the Boston composer, Stuart Mason. The symphony will be the masterpiece of Mozart in C major, "The Jupiter." The closing number will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas.

THE POPS ON MAY 2

Two weeks from tomorrow, on Monday, May 2, the season of music in lighter vein at Symphony Hall will begin, to continue every night except Sunday for 10 weeks.

All circumstances indicate one of the fullest and most successful seasons in Pops history. An orchestra of 80 Boston Symphony players (a number sufficient not only for popular music but for the most exacting modern scores) will be conducted by the enduring favorite of all Pops leaders, Agide Jacchia. An enlarged list of refreshments will be served at the tables and the new bar. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

HERALD. APR 16

It is a safe bet that there will be no row at next Friday's Symphony concert over Milhaud's new orchestral suite, hissed so vociferously at its first performance in Paris not long ago. This piece is the first important work of the much discussed group of "Six" young French composers to be given in Boston.

◆

Mr Monteux has been sedulously fair to American composers this year in making up his programs. We have had orchestral numbers by Chadwick, Loeffler, Arthur Foote, E. B. Hill, Arthur Shepherd, Seth Bingham, Carpenter, Griffes, Daniel Gregory Mason, and now this week a new piece by Stuart Mason.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 23d program. "Jupiter" Symphony, in C major, Mozart; Second Suite, Darius Milhaud (first time in America); Rhapsody on a Persian Air, Stuart Mason (first time); "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Dukas. There is so soloist.

GLOBE APR. 17.

The Boston Symphony season of 1920-21 came to an end last night with a signal triumph for Mr. Monteux and his men. It is good to record a success which has been so richly deserved. Mr. Monteux took the Boston Symphony conductorship under a handicap. He inherited the orchestra's troubles which originated during war time. He then went through all the difficulties of the strike. He has had in all virtually three times to reassemble and perfect the Boston Symphony organization. He has, in the face of all this, achieved wonderful results.

Mr. Monteux has not only assembled and co-ordinated players new and old in very difficult tasks. He has also sensitized the orchestra. As its actual technical standards have improved and returned to traditional excellences the band has become the more subtle and faithful reflection of the ideas of its leader. It would be hard in any one of the last 20 seasons of the orchestra to recall more brilliant performances than have been given during late months.

Also, from the beginning, Mr Monteux has triumphed as a programme maker. He is so broad-minded, so catholic in his musical tastes that some have exclaimed that he had no individual tastes, no preferences, no partialities to music of any composer. It is a good reputation for a conductor to have. Mr Monteux has not held aloof from any composer or any school. He has brought to the study of modern works a zeal which burned a little brighter when it encountered a score difficult to understand. The novelties have been in far the greater number worth performing and keeping the repertory, and not merely freak pieces to be played once and thereafter to adorn the Boston Symphony library shelves. They have kept the Symphony audiences well abreast of developments of the day in music. In every way the past Symphony season has been notable. The orchestra has won back its prestige, which for a time was trembling in the balance, thanks to this conductor and to the expert business management of the orchestra. Other orchestras are changing with time, disappearing, welding together, subservient to and very seldom indeed, whatever the occasion, defiant of the dictates of a union. The Boston Symphony has remained by itself, on both business and artistic grounds, and its course has been justified by its fruits. Its financial difficulties are not at an end, but they will be solved and the orchestra's position and permanency made the more sure through Bostonians who have learned the value of the great organization founded by Major Higginson and who will see that it is perpetuated.

POST - MAY 1.

From..

Address New York City APR 2 192

Date..

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITHDRAWS FROM THREE CITIES

Will Not Play in Phila., Baltimore or Washington Next Year.

LOSES MUCH PRESTIGE

Organization Never Recovered from Muck Scandal During the War.

Musical circles in New York are much interested in the news that the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, once the leading organization of its kind in America, if not in the world, will greatly curtail its activities outside of its home city next season.

While the Boston orchestra will give its customary five pairs of concerts at Carnegie Hall next winter, it will not go to Philadelphia, Baltimore or Washington, which have been regularly on its visiting list for upwards of a third of a century.

It is reported that other cities also will be dropped from the orchestra's itinerary and that its work will be confined almost entirely to Boston and New York.

There seems to be several reasons for this situation. One is the black eye received by the orchestra because of pro-German activities of its former conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and of a dozen or more Teutonic members of the ensemble during the war.

The Muck scandal resulted in the elimination of the conductor himself and of the German members of the orchestra, thus sadly disturbing the balance of what was once a perfect musical machine.

This blow never has been fully recovered from, from an artistic sense, which has had something to do with the orchestra not holding its popularity and prestige, not only in Boston but in other cities.

While in its heyday the Boston orchestra concerts at Carnegie Hall were fully subscribed before the opening of the season, but there has been plenty of seats available during the past two or three years, and the Philadelphia orchestra has stepped into the popularity once enjoyed here by the elder organization, as all of its concerts this year were sold out before the season began.

Aside from this loss of prestige, another reason for the decrease in attendance in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore has been the growth in popularity in all these cities, not only of the Philadelphia orchestra, but of Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra as well, the latter now being as firmly established in the three cities mentioned as the Boston orchestra formerly was.

Thus the rise in popularity of its competitors, topping the disgrace into which the Boston orchestra fell during the war, has been more than the organization could stand.

---

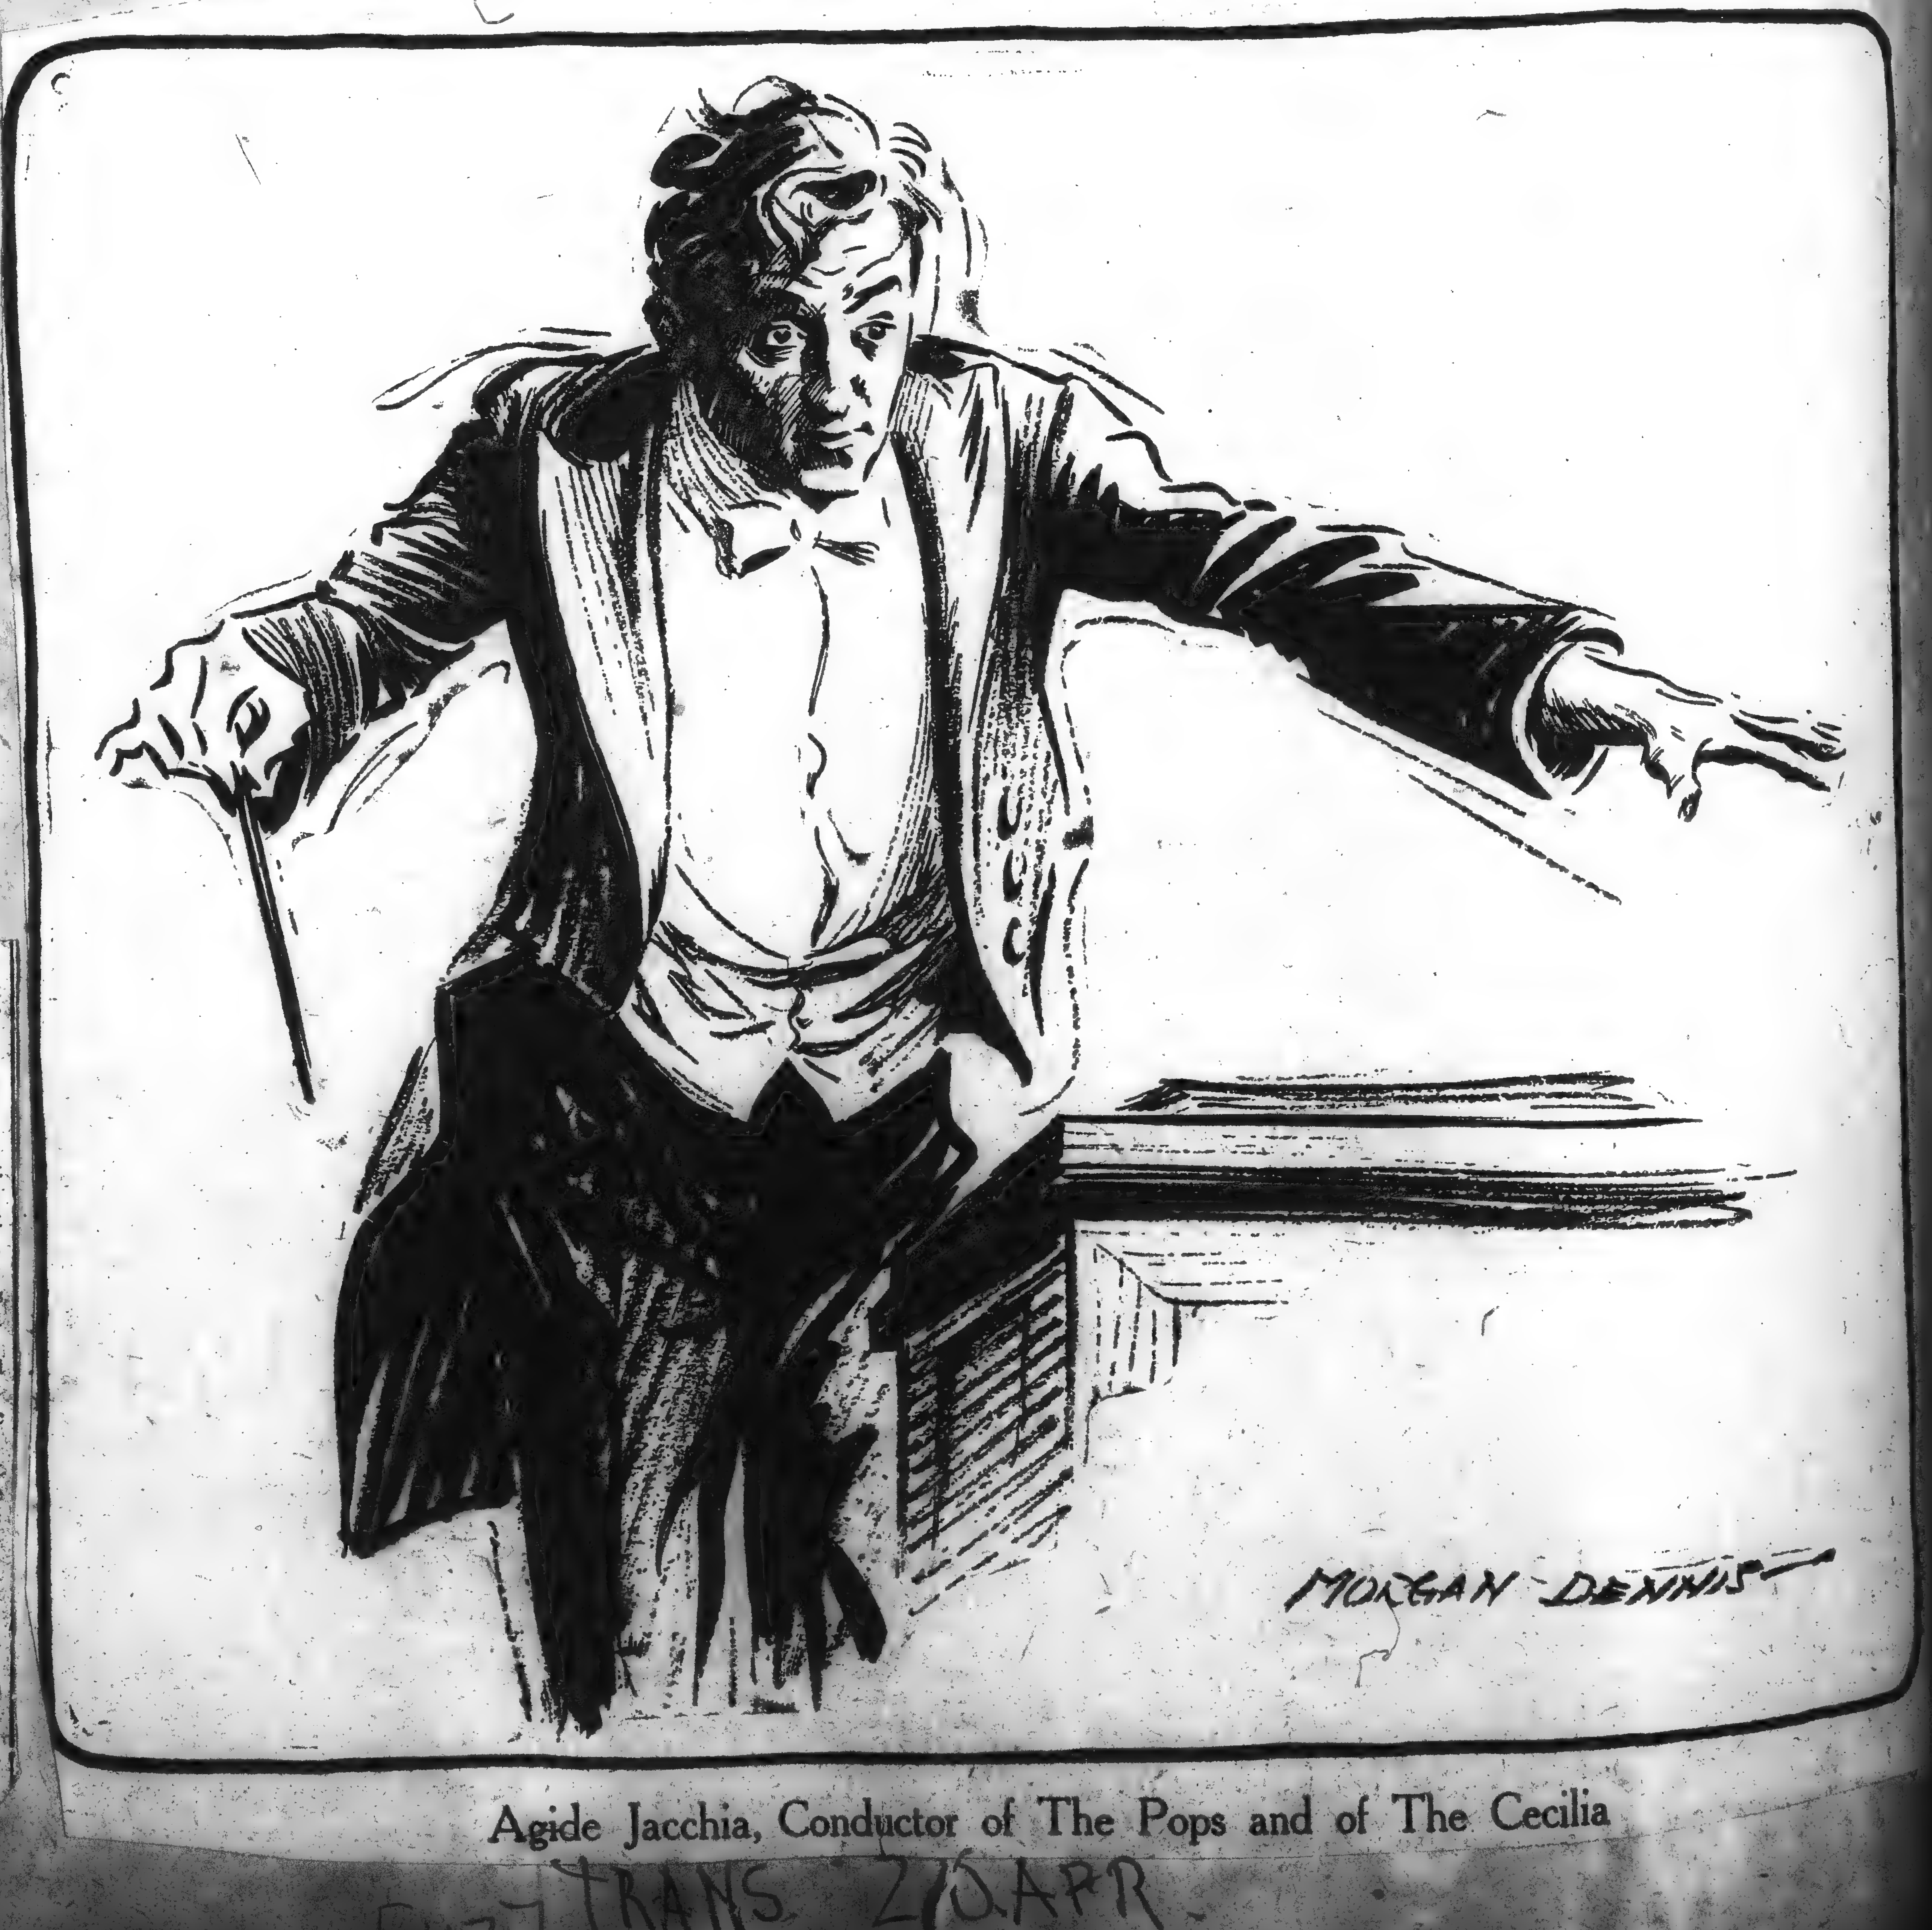
om

ERALD

Rochester, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra deficit for its last fiscal year is $130,000. So, Boston doesn't bite its thumb at New York or Chicago. But is the condition to be blamed on canned music, or the movies?

His Wonted Fires



Agide Jacchia, Conductor of The Pops and of The Cecilia

TRANS. 2/30 APR

POP CONCERTS TO OPEN MAY 2

Two weeks from to-morrow, on Monday, May 2, the Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall. An orchestra of eighty Boston Symphony players, a number sufficient not only for popular music but for the most exacting modern scores, will be conducted by the favorite leader, Agide Jacchia. An enlarged menu of refreshments will be served at the tables and the new bar.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the firsfit time in this country the second orchestral suite by the young French composer, Darius Milhaud. Mr. Monteux will conduct from the manuscript score which he has received from the composer. Another novelty will be the "Rhapsody on a Persian Air," by the Boston composer, Stuart Mason. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas, will also be played.

ADVERTISER APR. 17

Twenty-Third Symphony

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 22 and 23, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program: Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony in C major; Rhapsody on a Persian Air, by Stuart Mason, and the Second Orchestral Suite of Darius Milhaud. The closing number will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas.

The Pops

The regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall being nearly over, the season of Pop concerts will open on May 2. A full-sized orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served as usual. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

TRAV. APR 16

Musical Jottings

The regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall is nearly over. In fact, two weeks from next Monday the last will have been given and the season of Pop Concerts will open on May 2, to take complete possession of the hall every night except Sunday for 10 weeks. A full-sized orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. Refreshments will be served at the tables and at the bar as usual. Splendid things in the way of new popular music are already being prepared by Mr. Jacchia. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

For the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 22 and 23, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program: Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony in C major; Rhapsody on a Persian Air by the Bostonian composer, Stuart Mason, to be heard for the first time at these concerts, and the Second Orchestral Suite of the daring young French composer, Darius Milhaud, which will on this occasion have its first performance in America. This score, hissed in Paris, will be conducted by Mr. Monteux from the manuscript. The closing number will be the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Paul Dukas.

RECORD. APR. 16

Milhaud's Suite and Mason's Rhapsody for Novel Music—Mme. Gauthier and Mr. Schmitz in a Notable Programme — A Flute-Players' Matinee—Mr. Zimbalist and Mme. Gluck Return

THOUGH the season wanes, the zest for novel music in Mr. Monteux, his orchestra and his audience at the Symphony Concerts does not lessen. For next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at Symphony Hall, he announces two such pieces: the Second Orchestral Suite of Milhaud; a Rhapsody on a Persian Theme by Stuart Mason. The Suite will bring to hearing one of the newer generation of Parisian composers whose music has occasioned tumults in concert-hall and sharp debate in print. Here, though it sound strangely, it will probably be heard tranquilly. The Rhapsody is work of a Bostonian composer, known also as writer about music. It is brief and warmly colored; and among the voices is a piano obligato to be played by the composer. More about both these novel numbers will be printed in this place. For the rest Mozart's familiar "Jupiter Symphony" will begin Mr. Monteux's programme; while Dukas's sprightly and graphic Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," will end it.

TRAN. APR. 16

23D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts but one of the present season, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in this country the second orchestral suite by the daring young French composer, Darius Milhaud. When first played in Paris this score was greeted with a violent demonstration and hisses, which in that city has more than once been the reception of a new, great work. Mr. Monteux will conduct from the manuscript score which he has received from the composer. Another new work at these concerts will be the Rhapsody on a Persian Air by the Boston composer, Stuart Mason. The symphony will be the masterpiece of Mozart in C major, "The Jupiter." The closing number will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas.

THE POPS ON MAY 2

Two weeks from tomorrow, on Monday, May 2, the season of music in lighter vein at Symphony Hall will begin, to continue every night except Sunday for 10 weeks.

All circumstances indicate one of the fullest and most successful seasons in Pops history. An orchestra of 80 Boston Symphony players (a number sufficient not only for popular music but for the most exacting modern scores) will be conducted by the enduring favorite of all Pops leaders, Agide Jacchia. An enlarged list of refreshments will be served at the tables and the new bar. Negotiations are under way by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Women's City Club and other organizations to engage parts of the house on particular nights for their special entertainment.

HERALD. APR. 16

It is a safe bet that there will be no row at next Friday's Symphony concert over Milhaud's new orchestral suite, hissed so vociferously at its first performance in Paris not long ago. This piece is the first important work of the much discussed group of "Six" young French composers to be given in Boston.

◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

Mr Monteux has been sedulously fair to American composers this year in making up his programs. We have had orchestral numbers by Chadwick, Loeffler, Arthur Foote, E. B. Hill, Arthur Shepherd, Seth Bingham, Carpenter, Griffes, Daniel Gregory Mason, and now this week a new piece by Stuart Mason.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 23d program. "Jupiter" Symphony, in C major, Mozart; Second Suite, Darius Milhaud (first time in America); Rhapsody on a Persian Air, Stuart Mason (first time); "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Dukas. There is so soloist.

GLOBE APR. 17.

The Boston Symphony season of 1920-21 came to an end last night with a signal triumph for Mr. Monteux and his men. It is good to record a success which has been so richly deserved. Mr. Monteux took the Boston Symphony conductorship under a handicap. He inherited the orchestra's troubles which originated during war time. He then went through all the difficulties of the strike. He has had in all virtually three times to reassemble and perfect the Boston Symphony organization. He has, in the face of all this, achieved wonderful results.

Mr. Monteux has not only assembled and co-ordinated players new and old in very difficult tasks. He has also sensitized the orchestra. As its actual technical standards have improved and returned to traditional excellences the band has become the more subtle and faithful reflection of the ideas of its leader. It would be hard in any one of the last 20 seasons of the orchestra to recall more brilliant performances than have been given during late months.

Also, from the beginning, Mr Monteux has triumphed as a programme maker. He is so broad-minded, so catholic in his musical tastes that some have exclaimed that he had no individual tastes, no preferences, no partialities to music of any composer. It is a good reputation for a conductor to have. Mr Monteux has not held aloof from any composer or any school. He has brought to the study of modern works a zeal which burned a little brighter when it encountered a score difficult to understand. The novelties have been in far the greater number worth performing and keeping the repertory, and not merely freak pieces to be played once and thereafter to adorn the Boston Symphony library shelves. They have kept the Symphony audiences well abreast of developments of the day in music. In every way the past Symphony season has been notable. The orchestra has won back its prestige, which for a time was trembling in the balance, thanks to this conductor and to the expert business management of the orchestra. Other orchestras are changing with time, disappearing, welding together, subservient to and very seldom indeed, whatever the occasion, defiant of the dictates of a union. The Boston Symphony has remained by itself, on both business and artistic grounds, and its course has been justified by its fruits. Its financial difficulties are not at an end, but they will be solved and the orchestra's position and permanency made the more sure through Bostonians who have learned the value of the great organization founded by Major Higginson and who will see that it is perpetuated.

POST- MAY 1.

From

Address New York City

Date APR 2

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITHDRAWS FROM THREE CITIES

Will Not Play in Phila., Baltimore or Washington Next Year.

LOSES MUCH PRESTIGE

Organization Never Recovered from Muck Scandal During the War.

Musical circles in New York are much interested in the news that the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, once the leading organization of its kind in America, if not in the world, will greatly curtail its activities outside of its home city next season.

While the Boston orchestra will give its customary five pairs of concerts at Carnegie Hall next winter, it will not go to Philadelphia, Baltimore or Washington, which have been regularly on its visiting list for upwards of a third of a century.

It is reported that other cities also will be dropped from the orchestra's itinerary and that its work will be confined almost entirely to Boston and New York.

There seems to be several reasons for this situation. One is the black eye received by the orchestra because of pro-German activities of its former conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and of a dozen or more Teutonic members of the ensemble during the war.

The Muck scandal resulted in the elimination of the conductor himself and of the German members of the orchestra, thus sadly disturbing the balance of what was once a perfect musical machine.

This blow never has been fully recovered from, from an artistic sense, which has had something to do with the orchestra not holding its popularity and prestige, not only in Boston but in other cities.

While in its heyday the Boston orchestra concerts at Carnegie Hall were fully subscribed before the opening of the season, but there have been plenty of seats available during the past two or three years, and the Philadelphia orchestra has stepped into the popularity once enjoyed here by the older organization, as all of its concerts this year were sold out before the season began.

Aside from this loss of prestige, another reason for the decrease in attendance in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore has been the growth in popularity in all these cities, not only of the Philadelphia orchestra, but of Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra as well, the latter now being as firmly established in the three cities mentioned as the Boston orchestra formerly was.

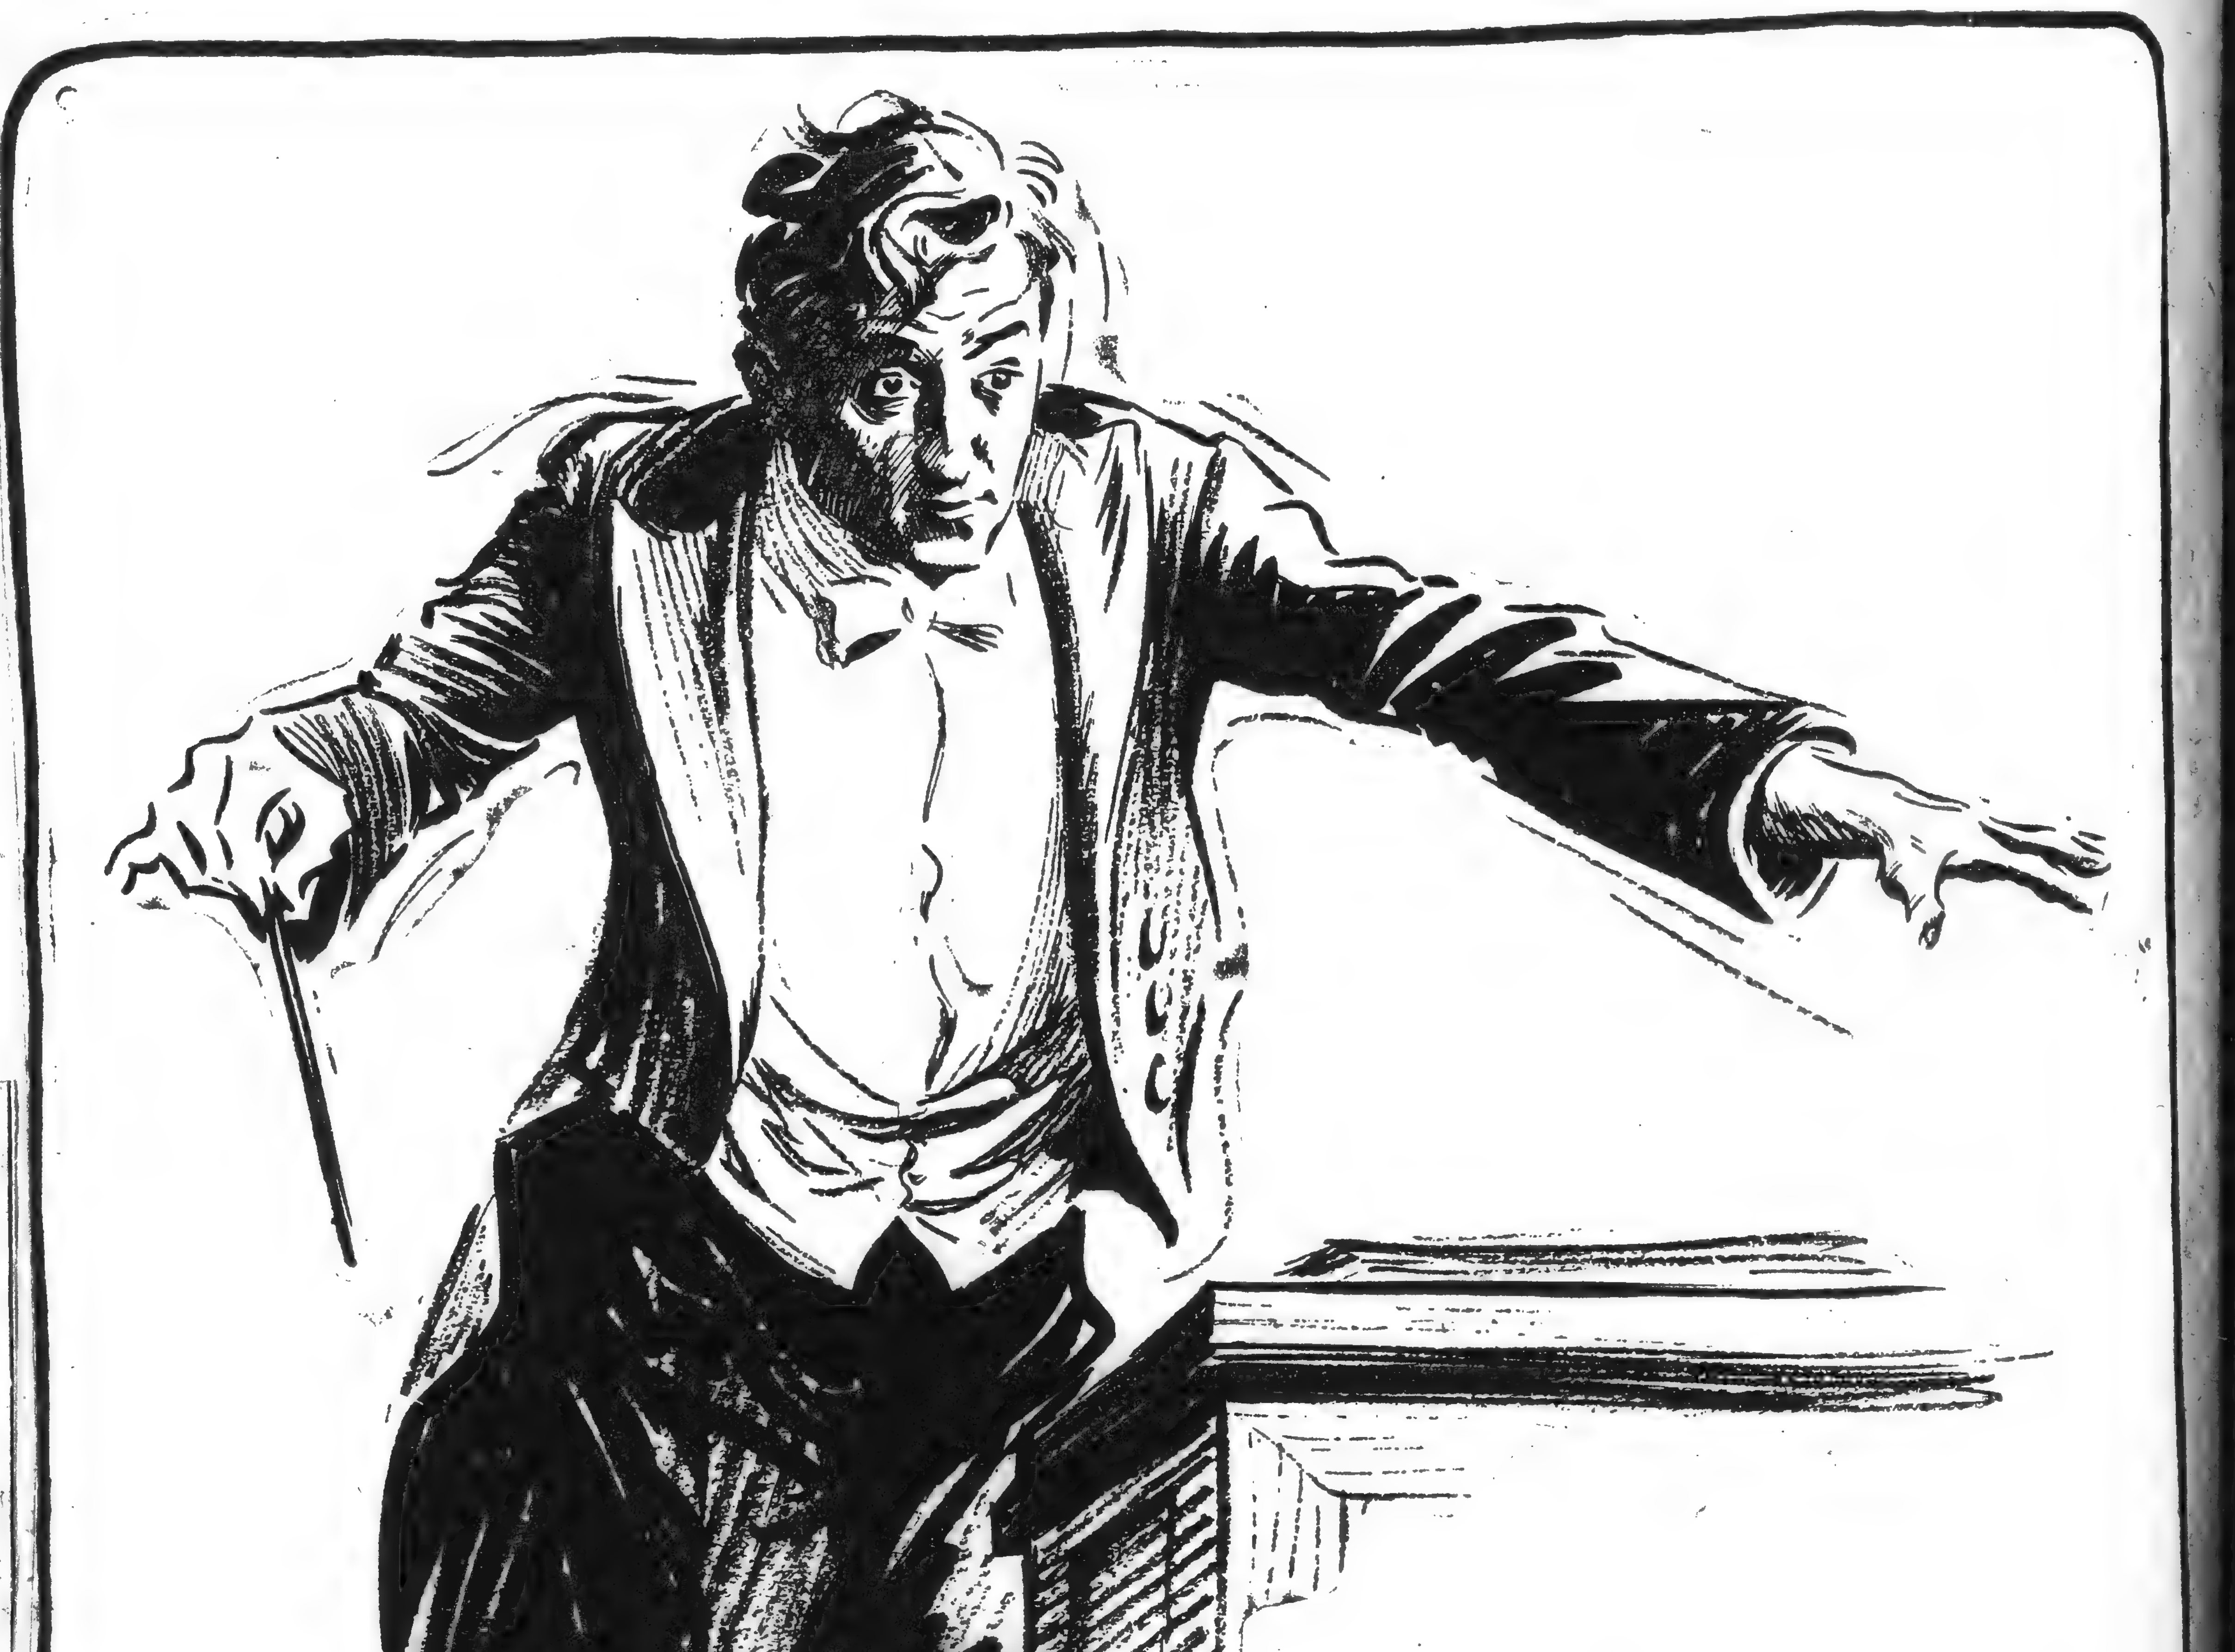
Thus the rise in popularity of its competitors, topping the disgrace into which the Boston orchestra fell during the war, has been more than the organization could stand.

---

om
ERALD
Rochester, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra deficit for its last fiscal year is $130,000. So, Boston doesn't bite its thumb at New York or Chicago. But is the condition to be blamed on canned music, or the movies?

His Wonted Fires



Agide Jacchia, Conductor of The Pops and of The Cecilia

TRANS 20 APR.

FROM APR 3 1921
Providence, R. I.

pupils.

For the last concert here this season by the Boston Symphony on the night of Tuesday, April 12, Mr. Monteux has arranged a particularly interesting programme of which the magnificent Fifth Symphony in E-minor by Tschaikowsky will be the chief number.

This, one of the Russian composer's last works, is generally conceded to be also one of his finest achievements. Beethoven's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto in G-major is always popular wherever heard and will be played on this occasion by Felix Fox, the pianist, of Boston, who was enthusiastically applauded when he appeared as soloist with the same orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, last season. Although this concerto is less brilliant than the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, it is regarded as equally beautiful and, in particular, the poetry of the slow movement which blends the tones of piano and orchestra in miraculous fashion, marks Beethoven's finest moments.

The brilliant closing number will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), particularly notable for the beauty of the incidental cello solo.

NEW YORK Journal
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM APR 3 1921
Providence R. I.

Last Symphony Concert.

Felix Fox of Boston will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, April 12th, at 8:15. He will be heard in the fourth pianoforte concerto in G-major of Beethoven. The symphony on this occasion will be the fifth of Tschaikowsky in E-minor, and the closing number will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), which contains a beautiful incidental 'cello solo.

TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

CLOSING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A splendid program should make memorable the closing Boston Symphony concert of this season, to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, April 12, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will conduct on this occasion Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor which, written in the Russian master's last years, is generally considered one of his grandest and most artistic achievements. This work has become additionally popular by virtue of the entrancing third movement which is a waltz.

As soloist of the evening Felix Fox, the noted pianist of Boston, will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G minro which, together with the "Emperor" concerto, ranks as the most beautiful concerto for that instrument in all music. It is less brilliant than some, but its beauties mark Beethoven's highest moments of inspiration and the Andante blends the tones of piano and orchestra in a way never achieved before or since.

The brilliant closing number will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" (The King of Ys), a popular work on every orchestral repertory, which is made the more so by the beauty of the long 'cello solo.

• • •

PIANO RECITAL

TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

NOTES.

Owing to the increasing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual series of concerts. The orchestra is foregoing these visits for three reasons—because it is finding a widening field for concerts in cities nearer Boston—in New England in general and in Massachusetts in particular; because trustees, manager and conductor are planning new ventures at home for next season and the future generally; because present fares on the railroads for a hundred men make the cost of these "southern trips" no small charge upon the treasury of the orchestra. New York, however, remains the musical capital of the United States, where the band deserves to be heard and where it has maintained itself through 30 years and more. Before long, the plans for new work by the orchestra at home and in New England will be announced.

From
Evening Globe
New York

HIGGINSON, PATRON OF MUSIC, LEFT $2,599,564

BOSTON, May 4.—Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died several months ago, left $2,599,564, according to an inventory filed in the probate court to-day.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

FELIX FOX

Well-Known Boston Pianist, He Will be the Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Fifth and Last Concert of the Season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening, April 12.

From POST
Address New York City
Date

Samuel Gardner

One of the notable events in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season was the performance at Providence of a new violin concerto by Samuel Gardner, who played the solo part. Franz Kneisel was among those who heard this latest and most mature work of his former pupil, of whom he is particularly proud. It was composed for the most part last summer at Estes Park, Col., but orchestrated in New York. The Providence Journal wrote that "the solo violin voice is interesting throughout; originality is written on every page; the thematic material is excellent, and in the working out of his ideas the composer has shown a fine grasp of orchestral technique. . . . The slow movement breathes the spirit of the Orient—or is it a tinge of that Russian sombreness born of generations of oppression?—for Gardner was born in Russia, and inherited mental tendencies are not easily blotted out, even though one is brought up in free America. . . . All in all, this concerto ought to place its creator in the front rank of this country's composers."

Mr. Gardner is only twenty-seven years old, but he has already won signal honors. His most widely known composition is a Southern melody called "From the Canebrake," which according to Schirmer's report is one of the three best sellers among American pieces for violin. His symphonic poem, "New Russia," won the Loeb prize of $500 three years ago, and Columbia University in the same year gave him the Pulitzer prize of $1,500 for a string quartet in D minor, which has been played here by the Flonzaley Quartet and will probably be played by them in London. Mr. Gardner is at present on a European tour, which will keep him busy several months. A few days ago his engagement was announced to the genuinely musical young pianist, Miss Stella Barnard of Montclair, N. J. Mr. Gardner's ambition at present is to become a conductor. He has already conducted his own works and others at the head of half a dozen of the leading American orchestras.

From AMERICAN
New York City
5/3/'21

Boston Symphony Patron Left Estate of $2,599,564

BOSTON, May 4.—Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died several months ago, left an estate valued at $2,599,564. The inventory was filed with the probate court to-day.

His personal property included instruments and scores in use by the orchestra, and many works of art.

From
TIMES
New York City

HIGGINSON LEFT $2,599,694.

Boston Banker's Estate Includes the Scores Used by Symphony Orchestra

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 4.—Major Henry L. Higginson left an estate valued at $2,599,694.65, $2,498,651.47 in personal property and $101,043.18 in real estate. His stocks ranged in value from five-one-hundredths of a cent to $440 a share.

The inventory discloses that he held one $50 Liberty Bond of the first issue; $200 of the second issue; $350 of the second convertible; $50,000 of the third loan and $30,000 of the fourth. He owned $1.50 in Thrift Stamps and $20 in War Savings Stamps.

The furniture, books, pictures, silver, bric-a-brac, &c., at 191 Commonwealth Avenue are valued at $9,207.14, and at his West Manchester home at $450. His pictures are valued at $56,750; cattle and horses at $34,805. Musical instruments and scores in use by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are valued at $32,765.

His estate received shares of stock and bonds valued at $1,713,624 in settlement of the interest of the testator in the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. The testator had an undivided interest in securities belonging to the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., not yet liquidated, which is valued at $185,000.

ESTABLISHED 1881
MAY 5 1921
From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

The Symphony Orchestra

New England has cause for serious concern in the maintenance of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has incurred a deficit of $150,000 this season and is appealing to the public for fresh guarantees which will put it on a sound financial basis. "The best thing in New 'England,' it is often called in other parts of the country, and what it has done to sustain the artistic prestige of Boston, Massachusetts and New England during the past 30 years or so can hardly be overstated; in literature there might be a decline, but while Boston's famous orchestra was kept at the hight of its perfection cultural leadership could not be wholly lost.

Boston must not let so precious an asset go. If the continuity should once be broken, the orchestra which Maj Higginson built up could never be restored. In such matters traditions and the pride taken in them count for much. The Boston Symphony orchestra has a worldwide fame and a prestige which is the result of half a century of effort. The fame and the prestige are not lost, but they are in peril. There are splendid orchestras now not only in New York, but in Chicago, Philadelphia and other cities; competition is much keener than it was. Boston can hold its own if it will, but if it should let the opportunity pass it would be left hopelessly behind.

It may be hoped that the public-spirited people of Boston will realize in time the critical character of the situation, and not only provide for immediate needs but arrange for such an endowment as will make the future of the orchestra secure. It costs more, in these costly days, than when Mr Higginson used to look on the financing of it as about the equivalent of keeping a steam yacht, but equitably divided the burden would not be heavy, and it is hard to see how Bostonians who seek the welfare of their city could get so much for their money as by helping to keep Boston's most famous institution up to the high standard which it has attained.

After the unusual musical activity at Easter time, the outlook into the immediate future appears somewhat calm by contrast. However, there is quality to make up for quantity in three outstanding events, the first the Ponselle-Vidas joint recital this afternoon at the Shubert Majestic Theatre, the concert by the Rhode Island Trio next Wednesday evening in Churchill House, and the final appearance this season of the Boston Symphony a week from the coming Tuesday in Infantry Hall. Interspersed there are various recitals and club programmes of interest, giving vigor to the waning season.

• • •

[118]

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 10 1921

SEASON'S LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A program of direct appeal, but of the highest artistic beauty, will be given by Pierre Monteux at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, which will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, April 12th, at 8:15.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, particularly famous on account of the waltz movement, will be the principal number on the program. This music, composed in the spring of 1888 on a beautiful estate at Frolovskoe, near Moscow, numbers among the great Russian composer's final creative productions. His high hopes of its success, expressed in a letter written to his friend and confidant, Madame von Meck, were gloriously realized when it was played for the first time in St. Petersburg the following season.

Felix Fox, the noted pianist, who will be soloist at this concert, will play with the orchestra another work which figures prominently on every orchestral repertory—the Fourth Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven in G major. In the poetic beauty of its conception this splendid achievement of Beethoven is considered to be even finer than the "Emperor" Concerto, and indeed it has been upheld as the greatest pianoforte concerto ever written.

The brilliant overture of Lalo, "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), with a notable 'cello solo, will close the concert.

• • •

FROM APR 10 1921

day Night at Infantry Hall

Just preceding the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence comes the comforting announcement that the programme for the 1921-1922 season will consist of the usual number of five concerts. They will also be held in Infantry Hall.

The present season has been the most successful one of the past few years in Providence, while the Boston season has equalled any on record. The orchestra has also won back the position it held in the esteem of New York audiences before its troubles over leadership and partial disruption by the action of union musicians. The rapid improvement of the reorganized orchestra under the leadership of Pierre Monteux was recognized after the latest New York engagement by the critic who had been most insistent in his disapproval, and who acknowledged that he was ready to retract all that he had previously said by way of condemnation.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony in E-minor at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, at 8:15. This symphony was one of the great Russian composer's final works and, in the opinion of many, one of his most splendid achievements. It was written in the spring of 1888 at Frolovskoe near Moscow, the landscape of which Tschaikowsky declared he preferred to all the sublimities of Switzerland, the Caucasus and Italy. The success of this masterpiece was evident to the world when it was first performed in St. Petersburg a little later.

Felix Fox, the noted pianist, who will be soloist at this concert, will play with the orchestra another work which figures prominently on every orchestral repertory, the Fourth Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven in G-minor. In the poetic beauty of its conception this splendid achievement of Beethoven is considered by many to be finer than the "Emperor" concerto.

The brilliant overture of Lalo, "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), with notable 'cello solo, will close the concert.

• • •

SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
APR 13

A New Concert Curtain De

From the Boston Globe.

They tell me that Pierre Mo who now conducts the concerts Boston Symphony Orchestra, has tuted a new device at the rehe This is a great curtain hung dow the ceiling, behind the conduct men on the stage. It is hung that Mr. Monteux may gain a m act idea of the way the music wil at the concert.

It appears that without the cu throw back the tone of the orches empty hall plays tricks that may a conductor's ears as to balance instrumental tone and kindred.

No other conductor than Mr. M has ever adopted this device.

It is also true that Mr. Montet the exception of William Oerick best drillmaster the Boston Sy Orchestra ever had.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 13 1921

CONCERT BY SYMPHONY.

The fifth and last concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Infantry Hall last evening before a very large and a distinctly representative Providence audience. This concert closed one of the most successful series ever given here by the magnificent orchestra, a fact due in large measure to the splendid organized ability as well as the superlative musicianship of its conductor, Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Felix Fox, pianist of Boston, was the soloist, and the program follows: "Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, Op. 64," Tschiakowsky; 1, Andante; 2, Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza; 3, Valse (Allegro moderato); 4, Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace; "Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58, Beethoven; 1, Allegro moderato; 2, Andante con moto; 3, Rondo: Vivace; overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.

The Fifth Symphony, as a whole, is one of the composer's most characteristic works. Composed in the spring of 1888, at his beautiful estate at Frolovskoe, near Moscow, it is among the great composer's final creative productions. It was performed for the first time at Petrograd, Nov. 17, 1888, when it created a profound impression and this impression has not lessened with the passing of time. Indeed, it bears well one of the most exacting tests to which music can be subjected, namely, repetition.

The opening movement, the Andante, is one of the most spontaneously beautiful utterances of any composer of Tschaikowsky's time, and the waltz movement of the symphony brought out exquisite effects in harmony and phrasing among the strings, horns and bassoons, while a splendid force was shown in the final movement.

The Symphony, as a whole was given a magnificent reading by Mr. Monteaux and the orchestra played with familiar richness and power of tone and with large sweep emphasis and contrast.

Felix Fox played with the orchestra the fourth piano forte concerto of Beethoven in G-major. It is a composition full of melody lightness, grace and elegance in which fascinating rythmical motives recur again and again under ever-changing conditions of melody, harmony and instruction.

Mr. Fox rose to the requirements of the difficult concerto with such success as to call forth full recognition from his hearers, and he was recalled several times at the close of the concert. Lalo's lovely overture brought the concert to a brilliant close.

BULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.
APR 13 1921

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SUCCESSFUL CONCERT SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist. The concert proved a fitting climax to a series which, in some respects, has been the most successful in the history of the organization's visits here. In the matter of attendance this season's showing eclipses all records for previous years, and interest and enthusiasm have been correspondingly great. Mr. Monteux has accomplished much with his forces since the recent change in the orchestra's personnel. It is, indeed, a herculean task to mould into artistic ensemble such a great body of players, no matter how efficient individually each may be; and by his success as orchestral drill master, and his gifts as interpreter of the symphonic classics, he has become a commanding figure among our American orchestral conductors.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky....Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
Andante.
Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
Valse (Allegro moderato).
Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace.
Beethoven....Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58.
Allegro moderato.
Andante con moto.
Rondo: Vivace.
Lalo..............Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"

The feature number, Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, is one of his greatest symphonic writings. In it is foreshadowed the brooding melancholy which reaches complete expression in his sixth symphony, the "Pathetic." The first two movements of the E-minor are its best in creative thought. The solemn principal theme, recurring again and again in sombre tonal dress seems to suggest despairing effort, to solve the mystery of life, while the steady, rythmic beat of bass viol and percussion instruments stalks like inexorable fate through the dark hued but gorgeous harmonies. The third movement, a waltz, strikes the listener as a pathetic attempt to be gay and the finale an eager but futile effort to portray a triumphant solution of the great riddle.

Mr. Fox, who has many Providence friends, received very cordial recognition after his playing of the Beethoven concerto. This is a work in which the soloist is not required to battle with superior instrumental numbers. It is one that gives the solo instrument a decorative part in the ensemble.

Grace, lightness and the utterance of flowing phrase are qualities which enter largely into its most effective portrayal. The performance was delightfully clear in the technical sense and Mr. Fox's musicianship and artistic qualities were strongly in evidence.

The Andante is a particularly delicate and attractive movement and the artist made much of its opportunities for tonal sweetness and deft finger work in ornamentation. It was an exhibition of artistry that brought a great and sincere burst of applause at the close and Mr. Fox was obliged to return several times in acknowledgment.

Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" is a brilliantly orchestrated piece. The brass is used effectively on many occasions and the overture is brought to a ous and stirring max.

...its former
...ch, and of a
...outside members of
...ing the war.
...ional resulted in the
...the conductor himself
...members of the
...easily disturbing the
...was once a perfect

...ves has been fully re-
...from an artistic sense,
...something to do with
...not holding its popular-
...not only in Boston

...heyday the Boston or-
...at Carnegie Hall were
...before the opening of
...there have been plenty
...during the past two
...and the Philadelphia
...stepped into the popu-
...ployed here by the older
...all of its concerts this
...out before the season

...this loss of prestige, an-
...for the decrease in at-...Philadelphia, Washington
...has been the growth in
...all these cities, not only
...elphia orchestra, but of
...osch's New York Sym-
...ra as well, the latter now
...established in the three
...as the Boston orches-

...e in popularity of its
...pping the disgrace into
...on orchestra fell during
...n more than the organ-
...land.

N. Y.

...Symphony Orchestra
...fiscal year is $130,-
...doesn't bite its thumb
...r Chicago. But is the
...e blamed on canned
...ovies?

FROM APR 3 1921
...dence, R. I.

pupils.

For the last concert here this seaso[n] by the Boston Symphony on the nigh[t] of Tuesday, April 12, Mr. Monteux ha[s] arranged a particularly interesting pro[-]gramme of which the magnificent Fift[h] Symphony in E-minor by Tschaikowsk[y] will be the chief number.

This, one of the Russian composer's last works, is generally conceded to be also one of his finest achievements. Beethoven's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto in G-major is always popular wherever heard and will be played on this occasion by Felix Fox, the pianist, of Boston, who was enthusiastically applauded when he appeared as soloist with the same orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, last season. Although this concerto is less brilliant than the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, it is regarded as equally beautiful and, in particular, the poetry of the slow movement which blends the tones of piano and orchestra in miraculous fashion, marks Beethoven's finest moments.

The brilliant closing number will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), particularly notable for the beauty of the incidental 'cello solo.

* * *

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM

Last Symphony Concert.

Felix Fox of Boston will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, April 12th, at 8:15. He will be heard in the fourth pianoforte concerto in G-major of Beethoven. The symphony on this occasion will be the fifth of Tschaikowsky in E-minor, and the closing number will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), which contains a beautiful incidental 'cello solo.

TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.

CLOSING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A splendid program should make memorable the closing Boston Symphony concert of this season, to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, April 12, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will conduct on this occasion Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor which, written in the Russian master's last years, is generally considered one of his grandest and most artistic achievements. This work has become additionally popular by virtue of the entrancing third movement which is a waltz.

As soloist of the evening Felix Fox, the noted pianist of Boston, will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G minro which, together with the "Emperor" concerto, ranks as the most beautiful concerto for that instrument in all music. It is less brilliant than some, but its beauties mark Beethoven's highest moments of inspiration and the Andante blends the tones of piano and orchestra in a way never achieved before or since.

The brilliant closing number will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" (The King of Ys), a popular work on every orchestral repertory, which is made the more so by the beauty of the long 'cello solo.

* * *

...PIANO RECITAL

TRIBUNE
ss: Providence, R. I.

NOTES.

Owing to the increasing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual series of concerts. The orchestra is foregoing these visits for three reasons—because it is finding a widening field for concerts in cities nearer Boston—in New England in general and in Massachusetts in particular; because trustees, manager and conductor are planning new ventures at home for next season and the future generally; because present fares on the railroads for a hundred men make the cost of these "southern trips" no small charge upon the treasury of the orchestra. New York, however, remains the musical capital of the United States, where the band deserves to be heard and where it has maintained itself through 30 years and more. Before long, the plans for new work by the orchestra at home and in New England will be announced.

From
Evening Globe
New York

HIGGINSON, PATRON OF MUSIC, LEFT $2,599,564

BOSTON, May 4.—Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died several months ago, left $2,599,564, according to an inventory filed in the probate court to-day.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

FELIX FOX

Well-Known Boston Pianist, He Will be the Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Fifth and Last Concert of the Season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening, April 12.

---

om POST
dress New York City
e

Samuel Gardner

One of the notable events in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season was the performance at Providence of a new violin concerto by Samuel Gardner, who played the solo part. Franz Kneisel was among those who heard this latest and most mature work of his former pupil, of whom he is particularly proud. It was composed for the most part last summer at Estes Park, Col., but orchestrated in New York. The Providence Journal wrote that "the solo violin voice is interesting throughout; originality is written on every page; the thematic material is excellent, and in the working out of his ideas the composer has shown a fine grasp of orchestral technique. . . . The slow movement breathes the spirit of the Orient—or is it a tinge of that Russian sombreness born of generations of oppression?—for Gardner was born in Russia, and inherited mental tendencies are not easily blotted out, even though one is brought up in free America. . . . All in all, this concerto ought to place its creator in the front rank of this country's composers."

Mr. Gardner is only twenty-seven years old, but he has already won signal honors. His most widely known composition is a Southern melody called "From the Canebrake," which according to Schirmer's report is one of the three best sellers among American pieces for violin. His symphonic poem, "New Russia," won the Loeb prize of $500 three years ago, and Columbia University in the same year gave him the Pulitzer prize of $1,500 for a string quartet in D minor, which has been played here by the Flonzaley Quartet and will probably be played by them in London. Mr. Gardner is at present on a European tour, which will keep him busy several months. A few days ago his engagement was announced to the genuinely musical young pianist, Miss Stella Barnard of Montclair, N. J. Mr. Gardner's ambition at present is to become a conductor. He has already conducted his own works and others at the head of half a dozen of the leading American orchestras.

---

rom 3/5/21
MERICAN
New York City

Boston Symphony Patron Left Estate of $2,599,564

BOSTON, May 4.—Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died several months ago, left an estate valued at $2,599,564. The inventory was filed with the probate court to-day.

His personal property included instruments and scores in use by the orchestra, and many works of art.

TIMES
New York City

HIGGINSON LEFT $2,599,694.

Boston Banker's Estate Includes the Scores Used by Symphony Orchestra

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 4.—Major Henry L. Higginson left an estate valued at $2,599,694.65, $2,498,651.47 in personal property and $101,043.18 in real estate. His stocks ranged in value from five-one-hundredths of a cent to $440 a share.

The inventory discloses that he held one $50 Liberty Bond of the first issue; $200 of the second issue; $350 of the second convertible; $50,000 of the third loan and $30,000 of the fourth. He owned $1.50 in Thrift Stamps and $20 in War Savings Stamps.

The furniture, books, pictures, silver, bric-a-brac, &c., at 191 Commonwealth Avenue are valued at $9,207.14, and at his West Manchester home at $450. His pictures are valued at $56,750; cattle and horses at $34,805. Musical instruments and scores in use by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are valued at $32,755.

His estate received shares of stock and bonds valued at $1,713,624 in settlement of the interest of the testator in the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. The testator had an undivided interest in securities belonging to the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., not yet liquidated, which is valued at $185,000.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

The Symphony Orchestra

New England has cause for serious concern in the maintenance of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has incurred a deficit of $150,000 this season and is appealing to the public for fresh guarantees which will put it on a sound financial basis. "The best thing in New 'England,' it is often called in other parts of the country, and what it has done to sustain the artistic prestige of Boston, Massachusetts and New England during the past 30 years or so can hardly be overstated; in literature there might be a decline, but while Boston's famous orchestra was kept at the hight of its perfection cultural leadership could not be wholly lost.

Boston must not let so precious an asset go. If the continuity should once be broken, the orchestra which Maj Higginson built up could never be restored. In such matters traditions and the pride taken in them count for much. The Boston Symphony orchestra has a worldwide fame and a prestige which is the result of half a century of effort. The fame and the prestige are not lost, but they are in peril. There are splendid orchestras now not only in New York, but in Chicago, Philadelphia and other cities; competition is much keener than it was. Boston can hold its own if it will, but if it should let the opportunity pass it would be left hopelessly behind.

It may be hoped that the public-spirited people of Boston will realize in time the critical character of the situation, and not only provide for immediate needs but arrange for such an endowment as will make the future of the orchestra secure. It costs more, in these costly days, than when Mr Higginson used to look on the financing of it as about the equivalent of keeping a steam yacht, but equitably divided the burden would not be heavy, and it is hard to see how Bostonians who seek the welfare of their city could get so much for their money as by helping to keep Boston's most famous institution up to the high standard which it has attained.

After the unusual musical activity at Easter time, the outlook into the immediate future appears somewhat calm by contrast. However, there is quality to make up for quantity in three outstanding events, the first the Ponselle-Vidas joint recital this afternoon at the Shubert Majestic Theatre, the concert by the Rhode Island Trio next Wednesday evening in Churchill House, and the final appearance this season of the Boston Symphony a week from the coming Tuesday in Infantry Hall. Interspersed there are various recitals and club programmes of interest, giving vigor to the waning season.

* * *

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 10 1921

SEASON'S LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A program of direct appeal, but of the highest artistic beauty, will be given by Pierre Monteux at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, which will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, April 12th, at 8:15.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, particularly famous on account of the waltz movement, will be the principal number on the program. This music, composed in the spring of 1888 on a beautiful estate at Frolovskoe, near Moscow, numbers among the great Russian composer's final creative productions. His high hopes of its success, expressed in a letter written to his friend and confidant, Madame von Meck, were gloriously realized when it was played for the first time in St. Petersburg the following season.

Felix Fox, the noted pianist, who will be soloist at this concert, will play with the orchestra another work which figures prominently on every orchestral repertory—the Fourth Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven in G major. In the poetic beauty of its conception this splendid achievement of Beethoven is considered to be even finer than the "Emperor" Concerto, and indeed it has been upheld as the greatest pianoforte concerto ever written.

The brilliant overture of Lalo, "Le Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), with a notable 'cello solo, will close the concert.

* *

FROM

day Night at Infantry Hall

Just preceding the last concert of t[he] Boston Symphony Orchestra in Pro[vi]dence comes the comforting announ[ce]ment that the programme for the 19 1922 season will consist of the usual nu[m]ber of five concerts. They will also held in Infantry Hall.

The present season has been the m[ost] successful one of the past few years Providence, while the Boston season equalled any on record. The orches has also won back the position it h in the esteem of New York audien before its troubles over leadership partial disruption by the action of u musicians. The rapid improvement of reorganized orchestra under the lea ship of Pierre Monteux was recogn after the latest New York engagen by the critic who had been most sistent in his disapproval, and who knowledged that he was ready to ret all that he had previously said by of condemnation.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Tsc kowski's Fifth Symphony in E-mino the last Boston Symphony concert of t present season, in Infantry Hall, Tuesda evening, at 8:15. This symphony w one of the great Russian composer's fin works and, in the opinion of many, one of his most splendid achievement It was written in the spring of 1888 Frolovskoe near Moscow, the landsca of which Tschaikowsky declared preferred to all the sublimities of Sw zerland, the Caucasus and Italy. T success of this masterpiece was evide to the world when it was first perform in St. Petersburg a little later.

Felix Fox, the noted pianist, who w be soloist at this concert, will play w the orchestra another work which f ures prominently on every orchest repertory, the Fourth Pianoforte Co certo of Beethoven in G-minor. In t poetic beauty of its conception this spl did achievement of Beethoven is cons ered by many to be finer than the "E peror" concerto.

The brilliant overture of Lalo, Roi d'Ys" ("The King of Ys"), with notable 'cello solo, will close the conce

* * *

SUN
ss: Baltimore, Md.

A New Concert Curtain De

From the Boston Globe.

They tell me that Pierre Mo who now conducts the concerts Boston Symphony Orchestra, has tuted a new device at the rehe This is a great curtain hung dow the ceiling, behind the conduct men on the stage. It is hung in that Mr. Monteux may gain a m act idea of the way the music will at the concert.

It appears that without the cu throw back the tone of the orches empty hall plays tricks that may a conductor's ears as to balance instrumental tone and kindred.

No other conductor than Mr. M has ever adopted this device.

It is also true that Mr. Monte the exception of Wilhelm Oerick best drillmaster the Boston Sy Orchestra ever had.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 12 1921

CONCERT BY SYMPHONY.

The fifth and last concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Infantry Hall last evening before a very large and a distinctly representative Providence audience. This concert closed one of the most successful series ever given here by the magnificent orchestra, a fact due in large measure to the splendid organized ability as well as the superlative musicianship of its conductor, Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Felix Fox, pianist of Boston, was the soloist, and the program follows: "Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, Op. 64," Tschiakowsky; 1, Andante; 2, Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza; 3, Valse (Allegro moderato); 4, Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace; "Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58, Beethoven; 1, Allegro moderato; 2, Andante con moto; 3, Rondo: Vivace; overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.

The Fifth Symphony, as a whole, is one of the composer's most characteristic works. Composed in the spring of 1888, at his beautiful estate at Frolovskoe, near Moscow, it is among the great composer's final creative productions. It was performed for the first time at Petrograd, Nov. 17, 1888, when it created a profound impression and this impression has not lessened with the passing of time. Indeed it bears well one of the most exacting tests to which music can be subjected, namely, repetition.

The opening movement, the Andante, is one of the most spontaneously beautiful utterances of any composer of Tschaikowsky's time, and the waltz movement of the symphony brought out exquisite effects in harmony and phrasing among the strings, horns and bassoons, while a splendid force was shown in the final movement.

The Symphony, as a whole was given a magnificent reading by Mr. Monteaux and the orchestra played with familiar richness and power of tone and with large sweep emphasis and contrast.

Felix Fox played with the orchestra the fourth piano forte concerto of Beethoven in G-major. It is a composition full of melody lightness, grace and elegance in which fascinating rythmical motives recur again and again under ever-changing conditions of melody, harmony and instruction.

Mr. Fox rose to the requirements of the difficult concerto with such success as to call forth full recognition from his hearers, and he was recalled several times at the close of the concert. Lalo's lovely overture brought the concert to a brilliant close.

BULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SUCCESSFUL CONCERT SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist. The concert proved a fitting climax to a series which, in some respects, has been the most successful in the history of the organization's visits here. In the matter of attendance this season's showing eclipses all records for previous years, and interest and enthusiasm have been correspondingly great. Mr. Monteux has accomplished much with his forces since the recent change in the orchestra's personnel. It is, indeed, a herculean task to mould into artistic ensemble such a great body of players, no matter how efficient individually each may be; and by his success as orchestral drill master, and his gifts as interpreter of the symphonic classics, he has become a commanding figure among our American orchestral conductors.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky....Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
Andante.
Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
Valse (Allegro moderato).
Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace.
Beethoven....Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58.
Allegro moderato.
Andante con moto.
Rondo: Vivace.
Lalo................Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"

The feature number, Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, is one of his greatest symphonic writings. In it is foreshadowed the brooding melancholy which reaches complete expression in his sixth symphony, the "Pathetic." The first two movements of the E-minor are its best in creative thought. The solemn principal theme, recurring again and again in sombre tonal dress seems to suggest despairing effort, to solve the mystery of life, while the steady, rythmic beat of bass viol and percussion instruments stalks like inexorable fate through the dark hued but gorgeous harmonies. The third movement, a waltz, strikes the listener as a pathetic attempt to be gay and the finale an eager but futile effort to portray a triumphant solution of the great riddle.

Mr. Fox, who has many Providence friends, received very cordial recognition after his playing of the Beethoven concerto. This is a work in which the soloist is not required to battle with superior instrumental numbers. It is one that gives the solo instrument a decorative part in the ensemble.

Grace, lightness and the utterance of flowing phrase are qualities which enter largely into its most effective portrayal.

The performance was delightfully clear in the technical sense and Mr. Fox's musicianly and artistic qualities were strongly in evidence.

The Andante is a particularly delicate and attractive movement and the artist made much of its opportunities for tonal sweetness and deft finger work in ornamentation. It was an exhibition of artistry that brought a great and sincere burst of applause at the close and Mr. Fox was obliged to return several times in acknowledgment.

Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" is a brilliantly orchestrated piece. The brass is used effectively on many occasions and the overture is brought to a vigorous and stirring climax. Decided rythm and virtuosity in its playing were pleasing features in this closing number, after which both Mr. Monteux and his men were required to bow to the applause of an apparently well-satisfied audience.

A. F. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
Providence, R. I.
APR 13 1921 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Tschaikowsky Composition Features Final Concert.

FELIX FOX PIANO SOLOIST

Event Fitting Climax to Year's Series.—Large Audience Shows Enthusiasm Over Both Orchestra and Assisting Artists.—Monteux Commanding Figure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist. The concert proved a fitting climax to a series which, in some respects, has been the most successful in the history of the organization's visits here. In the matter of attendance this season's showing eclipses all records for previous years, and interest and enthusiasm have been correspondingly great. Mr. Monteux has accomplished much with his forces since the recent change in the orchestra's personnel. It is, indeed, a herculean task to mould into artistic ensemble such a great body of players, no matter how efficient individually each may be; and by his success as orchestral drill master, and his gifts as interpreter of the symphonic classics, he has become a commanding figure among our American orchestral conductors.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky....Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
  Andante.
  Andante cantabile, con alcuma licenza.
  Valse (Allegro moderato).
  Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace.
Beethoven....Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58.
  Allegro moderato.
  Andante con moto.
  Rondo: Vivace.
Lalo..............Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"

The feature number, Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, is one of his greatest symphonic writings. In it is foreshadowed the brooding melancholy which reaches complete expression in his sixth symphony, the "Pathetic." The first two movements of the E-minor are its best in creative thought. The solemn principal theme, recurring again and again in sombre tonal dress seems to suggest despairing effort, to solve the mystery of life, while the steady, rythmic beat of bass viol and percussion instruments stalks like inexorable fate through the dark-hued but gorgeous harmonies. The third movement, a waltz, strikes the listener as a pathetic attempt to be gay and the finale an eager but futile effort to portray a triumphant solution of the great riddle.

Mr. Fox, who has many Providence friends, received very cordial recognition after his playing of the Beethoven concerto. This is a work in which the soloist is not required to battle with superior instrumental numbers. It is one that gives the solo instrument a decorative part in the ensemble.

Grace, lightness and the utterance of flowing phrase are qualities which enter largely into its most effective portrayal. The performance was delightfully clear in the technical sense and Mr. Fox's musicianly and artistic qualities were strongly in evidence.

The Andante is a particularly delicate and attractive movement and the artist made much of its opportunities for tonal sweetness and deft finger work in ornamentation. It was an exhibition of artistry that brought a great and sincere burst of applause at the close and Mr. Fox was obliged to return several times in acknowledgment.

Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" is a brilliantly orchestrated piece. The brass is used effectively on many occasions and the overture is brought to a vigorous and stirring climax. Decided rythm and virtuosity in its playing were pleasing features in this closing number, after which both Mr. Monteux and his men were required to bow to the applause of an apparently well-satisfied audience.

A. F. P.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM

Boston challenges the whole citizenship to back the Symphony Orchestra which has helped to make the city famous the world over. It misses Major Higginson, whose management and money meant so much to it in the past. This year's deficit, which music lovers are asked to make good, totals $150,000; and there is agitation to raise a fund of three millions to make the orchestra permanently a feature of the life of the city.

ESTABLISHED 1881
APR 21 1921 P
Republican
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT NORTHAMPTON

Large Audience Hears Substantial Orchestral Program—Miss Dale Pleases in Well-Chosen Solos

Northampton, April 20—One of the largest audiences of the season, and as large as the John M. Greene hall could well hold, heard this evening the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is always the star attraction of the excellent Smith college course. Several times its appearance has been given an added interest by the co-operation of members of the musical faculty, and tonight the soloist was Miss Esther Dale, soprano, who in addition to her teaching at Smith college has been a well known choir singer in Springfield, and has lately been giving increased attention to concert work. Her song recital in Boston at Jordan hall on March 31 received much praise.

A Northampton audience is, of course, familiar with her singing, but this was a welcome opportunity to hear her voice against an orchestral background such as its unusual amplitude warrants. She chose with excellent taste a song by Lalo and Lia's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigu," by Claude De Bussy, a strongly dramatic composition, which needs not only an unusual vocal equipment, but such a beautiful accompaniment as the Boston Symphony orchestra can give. It is exacting, and it would be too much to say that the singer's purpose always found perfect technical realization, but the effect was notable, and it was evidently one of the most popular numbers of the evening. Vocally more grateful, though it lies rather low for a soprano, is the splendid song "Marine," by Lalo, which has the rich cantilene quality which marks nearly all the work of this highly talented composer. Miss Dale's lower notes are full for a soprano, yet the range of her voice lies up rather than down, and with a more precise focus her high notes would be telling even with a large orchestra. She had an enthusiastic reception.

From First Page

Orchestral Program Substantial

The orchestral program was of the substantial sort that best fits a concert for an audience of collegians who want a thorough acquaintance with the great musical classics. Among them must certainly be reckoned the Brahms Symphony No 2, in D major, which was the principal work of the evening. It is by far the most popular of the Brahms symphonies, and a preference for any of the others, such as a few devout Brahmsians affect, is a very esoteric taste indeed. When played as finely as was the case tonight under the baton of Mr Monteux it never fails to charm and interest the most indifferent audience. It was a more conservative reading than that given by the famous Italian conductor, Toscanini, on his tour in this country with the orchestra from La Scala, and put considerably less stress on the melodic character which the Italian players brought out with such fluent suavity, but it was very far from being dry or conventional, and the lively code of the first movement, as fine as anything which Brahms wrote, was given a haunting charm.

In fine contrast though equally classical, were the selections from the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" music in which the spontaneous freshness and gayety of the composer's genius appear at their best. When he tried to be deep Mendelssohn usually failed dismally; when he followed his bent he came as near as any composer to perfection. The disparagement which set in with the anti-Victorian revolt was due largely to uncritical praise of Mendelssohn for qualities which he did not possess. It has already begun to subside and such gems as are to be found in this amzingly precocious work are admired without stint. The scherzo it is always a thing of joy when the players and particularly the first violin have the indispensable crispness and clarity of touch. It would be too much today that they yet equal the extraordinary virtuosity in which the first violins of the Boston orchestra used to be incomparable, yet their playing was clear, delicate, and always charming. Mendelssohn gives some beautiful and difficult solo passages to players of wind instruments, and the horn player and flutist had to rise and receive well merited applause. The concert closed with a superb performance of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet."

Some fine attractions are announced for next season including besides the Boston orchestra and the New York Philharmonic society the Spanish contralto Mme J'Alvarez, the violinist Jescha Heifitz, the 'cellist Pablo Casals, and the pianist Gabrilowitsch.

hc',m..fiN,n..cmvf tao mw ww m

ARMS ON WAY

From Republican
Springfield, Mas

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT NORTHAMPTON

Large Audience Hears Substantial Orchestral Program—Miss Dale Pleases in Well-Chosen Solos

Northampton, April 20—One of the largest audiences of the season, and as large as the John M. Greene hall could well hold, heard this evening the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is always the star attraction of the excellent Smith college course. Several times its appearance has been given an added interest by the co-operation of members of the musical faculty, and tonight the soloist was Miss Esther Dale, soprano, who in addition to her teaching at Smith college has been a well known choir singer in Springfield, and has lately been giving increased attention to concert work. Her song recital in Boston at Jordan hall on March 31 received much praise.

A Northampton audience is, of course, familiar with her singing, but this was a welcome opportunity to hear her voice against an orchestral background such as its unusual amplitude warrants. She chose with excellent taste a song by Lalo and Lia's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue," by Claude De Bussy, a strongly dramatic composition, which needs not only an unusual vocal equipment, but such a beautiful accompaniment as the Boston Symphony orchestra can give. It is exacting, and it would be too much to say that the singer's purpose always found perfect technical realization, but the effect was notable, and it was evidently one of the most popular numbers of the evening. Vocally more grateful, though it lies rather low for a soprano, is the splendid song "Marine," by Lalo, which has the rich cantilene quality which marks nearly all the work of this highly talented composer. Miss Dale's lower notes are full for a soprano, yet the range of her voice lies up rather than down, and with a more precise focus her high notes would be telling even with a large orchestra. She had an enthusiastic reception.

Orchestral Program Substantial

The orchestral program was of the substantial sort that best fits a concert for an audience of collegians who want a thorough acquaintance with the great musical classics. Among them must certainly be reckoned the Brahms Symphony No 2, in D major, which was the principal work of the evening. It is by far the most popular of the Brahms symphonies, and a preference for any of the others, such as a few devout Brahmsians affect, is a very esoteric taste indeed. When played as finely as was the case tonight under the baton of Mr Monteux it never fails to charm and interest the most indifferent audience. It was a more conservative reading than that given by the famous Italian conductor, Toscanini, on his tour in this country with the orchestra from La Scala, and put considerably less stress on the melodic character which the Italian players brought out with such fluent suavity, but it was very far from being dry or conventional, and the lively code of the first movement, as fine as anything which Brahms wrote, was given a haunting charm.

In fine contrast though equally classical, were the selections from the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" music in which the spontaneous freshness and gayety of the composer's genius appear at their best. When he tried to be deep Mendelssohn usually failed dismally; when he followed his bent he came as near as any composer to perfection. The disparagement which set in with the anti-Victorian revolt was due largely to uncritical praise of Mendelssohn for qualities which he did not possess. It has already begun to subside and such gems as are to be found in this amazingly precocious work are admired without stint. The scherzo it is always a thing of joy when the players and particularly the first violin have the indispensable crispness and clarity of touch. It would be too much today that they yet equal the extraordinary virtuosity in which the first violins of the Boston orchestra used to be incomparable, yet their playing was clear, delicate, and always charming. Mendelssohn gives some beautiful and difficult solo passages to players of wind instruments, and the horn player and flutist had to rise and receive well merited applause. The concert closed with a superb performance of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet."

Some fine attractions are announced for next season including besides the Boston orchestra and the New York Philharmonic society the Spanish contralto Mme J'Alvarez, the violinist Jascha Heifetz, the 'cellist Pablo Casals, and the pianist Gabrilowitsch.

FROM AND OF "THE SIX"

THE NEWEST PARISIAN MUSIC IN PROSPECT

A Much Debated Suite to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow for the First Time in America—Darius Milhaud, the Composer Who Wrote It—Antecedents and Characteristics as Brief Survey of His Work Discloses Them—His Fellow "Post-Impressionists"

IT is not without significance that Darius Milhaud's first quartet for strings, written in 1912, was dedicated to the memory of Paul Cézanne. For the group of younger French composers, of which Milhaud is at present the dominating figure, may be said to bear the same relation to the school of Debussy that the post-impressionist painters bore to Manet and his followers. Although of an earlier generation and of different musical tendencies, Albert Roussel, in an article contributed two years ago to The Chesterian, has admirably set forth what may be regarded as the common aim and ideal of these musicians. In part he says:

> They are bound by no clanship of origin; some of them have passed through the schools, others have more or less formed themselves. And similarly, the influences they have undergone and the preferences they have for such and such a master are of the most varied, and extend from Chabrier to Satie and Stravinsky. Come into the musical world at a period when impressionism was in full vogue, admiring Claude Debussy but fully aware of the danger that threatens music by an exaggeration of a system of tonal indistinctness, vague outline and blurred design, they strive for a more sober and clear expression with more sharply defined lines and greater directness. This desire to pursue paths that differ appreciably from those of their elders, while advancing still further in their harmonic achievements, is the most striking bond that unites these young people, whose personalities are otherwise quite dissimilar. Does this mean that all their works, from the beginning, give that impression of precision and clearness for which they strive? Certainly not; and it would be futile to be astonished at the fact. It is for the moment sufficient to see that a certain result has rewarded their efforts, and that it is possible to point here and there to traces of such qualities as will bear their fruit in the future.

The members of this conetrie—Georges Auric, Louis Durey, A. Honneger, Francis Poulenc, Germaine Tailleferre and Darius Milhaud—are now popularly known as "Les Six," and as such they have received liberal advertising from certain Parisian journals, and particularly from Jean Cocteau, the public champion of that strange apparition, Erik Satie, regarded by "The Six" as their artistic progenitor and guiding star. In contrast to M. Roussel's optimistic view of their achievements, it is interesting to re-read the comments of Mr. Edwin Evans in the London Outlook, reprinted in these columns a few weeks ago. Mr. Evans had paid a visit to Paris; heard the music of these six composers, observed the fulsome adulation in certain quarters showered upon them, and he regards the situation somewhat skeptically. After decrying the present inactivity of older composers, he proceeds to a discussion of their successors: "Into this temporarily deserted arena enter the group known as 'Les Six' who, whatever else they may create, certainly do create an impression of great activity. This has the effect of distorting the perspective for the observer, who is tempted to attach more importance to these manifestations than rightly belong to them." According to Mr. Evans, "The Six" feel that they are the victims of their friends, that they have been unduly exploited, and they are resentful of the publicity into which they have been thrust. But unless their heads are turned, no harm can come to them through outside encouragement—too many composers have suffered from the lack of it. In the opinion of Mr. Evans the real objection is that the tone of this journalistic campaign has narrowed. In place of the broad enthusiasm provoked by Debussy one detects a purely local exuberance.

In Particular, Milhaud

So much for The Six collectively. At present we in Boston have an especial interest in Milhaud, for, at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday Mr. Monteux will play, for the first times in America, his Second Suite for Orchestra. Milhaud was a pupil of André Gédalge and though he is still comparatively young—he was born at Aix in Provence, Sept. 4, 1892—the list of his compositions is long and imposing. Among his more important pieces may be mentioned an opera in three acts, "La Brebis Egarée," text by Francis Jammès; lyrical scenes from "La Porte Etroite" and "Le Retour de l'Enfant Prodigue" of Gidé, incidental music and choruses for the "Choephori" of Æschylus, in Claudel's translation, and a curious ballet done in collaboration with Cocteau, the title of which reads "Le Bœuf sur le Toit ou The Nothing-Doing Bar." Milhaud has also written two Suites for Orchestra, a Poem for Piano and Orchestra, four String Quartets, two Sonatas for Violin and one for two violins, besides a great quantity of pinao-music and songs.

To estimate the worth and character of Milhaud's music, it is advisable to survey his work chronologically, as his style has undergone marked changes in the few years in which he has been before the public. The earliest of his published compositions was a Sonata for Violin and Piano, written in 1911 and played two years later at a concert of the Independent Musical Society. As we now understand the term, there is little that is radical in this music, yet it bears the stamp of creative independence and, for a composer of nineteen, it is a singularly substantial piece of writing. Its vigor, its open-air quality and scorn of the purely sensuous were perhaps more notable a decade ago than they would be today. That discerning critic, Mr. Montagu-Nathan, wrote eloquently of the one of a series of articles on French violin sonatas which ap during the year 1914 in The Music Stu the London journal. To him in sonata Milhaud "combines the refine of Magnard and the simplicity and cha of Ravel with that glowing quality so spicuously absent from the work of th first-named lamented composer." Nathan lays much stress on Milhau partiality for the poets Paul Claudel and Francis Jammès, and finds in the law and order of the sonata a reflection of their spirit.

Chamber-Music and the Suite

In 1912 Milhaud wrote his First String Quartet, two movements of which have been played in Boston by "The Flonzaleys." There is already a greater boldness than in the sonata; there is also real profundity, a high degree of technical mastery, and there are pregnant musical ideas. In the Sonata for two Violins and Piano and in the Second String Quartet—the former dated 1914, the latter 1914-15—the more characteristic Milhaud begins to show himself. We find adumbrations of the poly-harmony so much used in his later music, the dissonances are harsher, the themes more angular, the whole style tending toward greater acridness and severity. In the second Sonata for Violin alone, written in 1917, the reader is immediately struck by the seeming simplicity and clearness of musical texture (the Sonata for two violins is often a contrapuntal labyrinth), but this simplicity is deceiving. Nothing could be more innocuous than the pastoral theme for the violin with which the piece begins and two chords suffice for the accompaniment, but on the second page Milhaud plunges without reserve into his poly-harmony. There are not many notes but those that there are make themselves conspicuous. In one passage the bass of the piano part stands in B-flat minor, the treble in D-major, while the violin plays "double stops"—mostly fifths—in the key of B-flat major! Yet such procedures are the merest commonplace in Milhaud's more recent music. Another and equally favored device which makes its appearance here is the prolonged repetition in one voice of a single figure that may occupy from one to three measures—a device that has become almost a hall-mark of Milhaud's style.

As the Suite to be played tomorrow was composed in 1919, it may be taken as fairly typical of his present methods. There are five movements—an Overture, Prelude and Fugue, Pastorale, Nocturne and Finale—and the entire suite occupies more than forty minutes. Again the music presents an outward clearness, but closer inspection reveals dissonances of the most acid variety and poly-harmony is much in evidence. In one singular passage the three trumpets play "first position" triads in the key of A minor against F-sharp major harmonies in the trombones, and in the Fugue there is a conspicuous instance of another favored procedure. Full forty times the double basses play, in even quarter notes, the tones G, A, B, C sharp, B, A while against and utterly at variance with this monotonous undulation, the brass perform contrapuntal evolutions. Milhaud's orchestral stipulations are exceedingly reasonable, even in the percussion section, though he does require the services of a "fouet" or whip. The Suite is dedicated to the memory of Albèric Magnard, who was killed in 1914 defending his house against the Germans.

Songs and Piano-Pieces

Turning to Milhaud's songs we find the same development that to some may signify retrogression. Between April, 1912, and April, 1913, he set to music six poems by Claudel, extracts from "La Connaissance de l'Est." One of them, "Dissolution," was sung here last season by Mr. Lawrence Haynes and made an immediate impression. Remarkable settings of remarkable poems, these songs are conspicuous for their sombre power and sober beauty. As the music of a youth of twenty they are notable, both for what they are and for what they are not. Debussy died a romanticist, Ravel and even d'Indy are romantics. But Milhaud seemingly was born a realist. But if these songs are stern, and impatient of sheer lusciousness, they are supremely moving, and devoid of musical perversities and extravagances. In the following year Milhaud composed the music to four exquisitely lyric poems of Léo Latil, the acid character of which is often strangely at variance with the nature of the verse. (No doubt some of this harshness would be softened in actual performance). In the eight "Poëmes Juifs," written in 1916, there is a breadth and often a noble simplicity in the setting that well matches the poems, translations from the Hebrew. With one or two exceptions they are not exacting of the singer and, with the six songs from Claudel, there is no good reason why they should not be heard hereabouts. A second set of Claudel's songs, to Claudel's verse, composed between 1915 and 1917, are far more drastic than their predecessors, but there is no denying them an equal forcefulness.

During the year 1917 Milhaud lived in South America and among the pieces which he wrote while there are the settings of Mallarmé's fantastic songs of labor, "Chansons Bas," many of them less than twenty measures long. They are amusing little skits, but hardly to be taken seriously. Amusing, but in a different way, are the later "Trois Poèmes de Jean Cocteau." The verses are devoid of punctuation, rhyme and reason and brevity is their only virtue. Though the music is entertaining it is of slight value. In the second song, "Fete de Bordeaux" the piano accompaniment runs in two voices—the upper is lower in the key of D flat, the C major, and the singer, to keep peace between them, intones alternately A flat and A. The twelve songs, "Les Saisons de Petrograde," poems by René Chalupt, are thumbnail sketches, pointed and grotesque and often very ugly. They are inscribed "Paris, Juin, 1919."

Among Milhaud's pieces for the is an admirable Suite, in five movem a product of his earlier years, wh pianist anxious to freshen his might seek out with profit. The free from the composer's later

[119]

ESTABLISHED 1881

FROM

Providence R. I.

APR

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Tschaikowsky Composition Features Final Concert.

FELIX FOX PIANO SOLOIST

Event Fitting Climax to Year's Series.—Large Audience Shows Enthusiasm Over Both Orchestra and Assisting Artists.—Monteux Commanding Figure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist. The concert proved a fitting climax to a series which, in some respects, has been the most successful in the history of the organization's visits here. In the matter of attendance this season's showing eclipses all records for previous years, and interest and enthusiasm have been correspondingly great. Mr. Monteux has accomplished much with his forces since the recent change in the orchestra's personnel. It is, indeed, a herculean task to mould into artistic ensemble such a great body of players, no matter how efficient individually each may be; and by his success as orchestral drill master, and his gifts as interpreter of the symphonic classics, he has become a commanding figure among our American orchestral conductors.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky....Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
  Andante.
  Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
  Valse (Allegro moderato).
  Finale (andante maestoso); Allegro vivace.
Beethoven....Concerto in G-major No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 58.
  Allegro moderato.
  Andante con moto.
  Rondo: Vivace.
Lalo................Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"

The feature number, Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, is one of his greatest symphonic writings. In it is foreshadowed the brooding melancholy which reaches complete expression in his sixth symphony, the "Pathetic." The first two movements of the E-minor are its best in creative thought. The solemn principal theme, recurring again and again in sombre tonal dress seems to suggest despairing effort, to solve the mystery of life, while the steady, rythmic beat of bass viol and percussion instruments stalks like inexorable fate through the dark hued but gorgeous harmonies. The third movement, a waltz, strikes the listener as a pathetic attempt to be gay and the finale an eager but futile effort to portray a triumphant solution of the great riddle.

Mr. Fox, who has many Providence friends, received very cordial recognition after his playing of the Beethoven concerto. This is a work in which the soloist is not required to battle with superior instrumental numbers. It is one that gives the solo instrument a decorative part in the ensemble.

Grace, lightness and the utterance of flowing phrase are qualities which enter largely into its most effective portrayal.

The performance was delightfully clear in the technical sense and Mr. Fox's musicianly and artistic qualities were strongly in evidence.

The Andante is a particularly delicate and attractive movement and the artist made much of its opportunities for tonal sweetness and deft finger work in ornamentation. It was an exhibition of artistry that brought a great and sincere burst of applause at the close and Mr. Fox was obliged to return several times in acknowledgment.

Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" is a brilliantly orchestrated piece. The brass is used effectively on many occasions and the overture is brought to a vigorous and stirring climax. Decided rythm and virtuosity in its playing were pleasing features in this closing number; after which both Mr. Monteux and his men were required to bow to the applause of an apparently well-satisfied audience.

A. F. P.

NEW YORK

STABLISHED 1881

ROM

Boston challenges the whole citizenship to back the Symphony Orchestra which has helped to make the city famous the world over. It misses Major Higginson, whose management and money meant so much to it in the past. This year's deficit, which music lovers are asked to make good, totals $150,000; and there is agitation to raise a fund of three millions to make the orchestra permanently a feature of the life of the city.

LISHED 1881 APR 21 1921 P

n Republican

Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT NORTHAMPTON

Large Audience Hears Substantial Orchestral Program—Miss Dale Pleases in Well-Chosen Solos

Northampton, April 20—One of the largest audiences of the season, and as large as the John M. Greene hall could well hold, heard this evening the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is always the star attraction of the excellent Smith college course. Several times its appearance has been given an added interest by the co-operation of members of the musical faculty, and tonight the soloist was Miss Esther Dale, soprano, who in addition to her teaching at Smith college has been a well known choir singer in Springfield, and has lately been giving increased attention to concert work. Her song recital in Boston at Jordan hall on March 31 received much praise.

A Northampton audience is, of course, familiar with her singing, but this was a welcome opportunity to hear her voice against an orchestral background such as its unusual amplitude warrants. She chose with excellent taste a song by Lalo and Lia's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigu," by Claude De Bussy, a strongly dramatic composition, which needs not only an unusual vocal equipment, but such a beautiful accompaniment as the Boston Symphony orchestra can give. It is exacting, and it would be too much to say that the singer's purpose always found perfect technical realization, but the effect was notable, and it was evidently one of the most popular numbers of the evening. Vocally more grateful, though it lies rather low for a soprano, is the splendid song "Marine," by Lalo, which has rich cantilene quality which marks nearly all the work of this highly talented composer. Miss Dale's lower notes are full for a soprano, yet the range of her voice lies up rather than down, and with a more precise focus her high notes would be telling even with a large orchestra. She had an enthusiastic reception.

ued From First Page

Orchestral Program Substantial

The orchestral program was of the substantial sort that best fits a concert for an audience of collegians who want a thorough acquaintance with the great musical classics. Among them must certainly be reckoned the Brahms Symphony No 2, in D major, which was the principal work of the evening. It is by far the most popular of the Brahms symphonies, and a preference for any of the others, such as a few devout Brahmsians affect, is a very esoteric taste indeed. When played as finely as was the case tonight under the baton of Mr Monteux it never fails to charm and interest the most indifferent audience. It was a more conservative reading than that given by the famous Italian conductor, Toscanini, on his tour in this country with the orchestra from La Scala, and put considerably less stress on the melodic character which the Italian players brought out with such fluent suavity, but it was very far from being dry or conventional, and the lively code of the first movement, as fine as anything which Brahms wrote, was given a haunting charm.

In fine contrast though equally classical, were the selections from the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" music in which the spontaneous freshness and gayety of the composer's genius appear at their best. When he tried to be deep Mendelssohn usually failed dismally; when he followed his bent he came as near as any composer to perfection. The disparagement which set in with the anti-Victorian revolt was due largely to uncritical praise of Mendelssohn for qualities which he did not possess. It has already begun to subside and such gems as are to be found in this amzingly precocious work are admired without stint. The scherzo it is always a thing of joy when the players and particularly the first violin have the indispensable crispness and clarity of touch. It would be too much today that they yet equal the extraordinary virtuosity in which the first violins of the Boston orchestra used to be incomparable, yet their playing was clear, delicate, and always charming. Mendelssohn gives some beautiful and difficult solo passages to players of wind instruments, and the horn player and flutist had to rise and receive well merited applause. The concert closed with a superb performance of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet."

Some fine attractions are announced for next season including besides the Boston orchestra and the New York Philharmonic society the Spanish contralto Mme J'Alvarez, the violinist Jescha Heifitz, the 'cellist Pablo Casals, and the pianist Gabrilowitsch.

hc',m..fiN,n..cmvf tao mw ew m

ARMS ON WAY

1921

From Republican

Springfield, Mas

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT NORTHAMPTON

Large Audience Hears Substantial Orchestral Program—Miss Dale Pleases in Well-Chosen Solos

Northampton, April 20—One of the largest audiences of the season, and as large as the John M. Greene hall could well hold, heard this evening the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is always the star attraction of the excellent Smith college course. Several times its appearance has been given an added interest by the co-operation of members of the musical faculty, and tonight the soloist was Miss Esther Dale, soprano, who in addition to her teaching at Smith college has been a well known choir singer in Springfield, and has lately been giving increased attention to concert work. Her song recital in Boston at Jordan hall on March 31 received much praise.

A Northampton audience is, of course, familiar with her singing, but this was a welcome opportunity to hear her voice against an orchestral background such as its unusual amplitude warrants. She chose with excellent taste a song by Lalo and Lia's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue," by Claude De Bussy, a strongly dramatic composition, which needs not only an unusual vocal equipment, but such a beautiful accompaniment as the Boston Symphony orchestra can give. It is exacting, and it would be too much to say that the singer's purpose always found perfect technical realization, but the effect was notable, and it was evidently one of the most popular numbers of the evening. Vocally more grateful, though it lies rather low for a soprano, is the splendid song "Marine," by Lalo, which has the rich cantilene quality which marks nearly all the work of this highly talented composer. Miss Dale's lower notes are full for a soprano, yet the range of her voice lies up rather than down, and with a more precise focus her high notes would be telling even with a large orchestra. She had an enthusiastic reception.

Orchestral Program Substantial

The orchestral program was of the substantial sort that best fits a concert for an audience of collegians who want a thorough acquaintance with the great musical classics. Among them must certainly be reckoned the Brahms Symphony No 2, in D major, which was the principal work of the evening. It is by far the most popular of the Brahms symphonies, and a preference for any of the others, such as a few devout Brahmsians affect, is a very esoteric taste indeed. When played as finely as was the case tonight under the baton of Mr Monteux it never fails to charm and interest the most indifferent audience. It was a more conservative reading than that given by the famous Italian conductor, Toscanini, on his tour in this country with the orchestra from La Scala, and put considerably less stress on the melodic character which the Italian players brought out with such fluent suavity, but it was very far from being dry or conventional, and the lively code of the first movement, as fine as anything which Brahms wrote, was given a haunting charm.

In fine contrast though equally classical, were the selections from the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" music in which the spontaneous freshness and gayety of the composer's genius appear at their best. When he tried to be deep Mendelssohn usually failed dismally; when he followed his bent he came as near as any composer to perfection. The disparagement which set in with the anti-Victorian revolt was due largely to uncritical praise of Mendelssohn for qualities which he did not possess. It has already begun to subside and such gems as are to be found in this amazingly precocious work are admired without stint. The scherzo it is always a thing of joy when the players and particularly the first violin have the indispensable crispness and clarity of touch. It would be too much today that they yet equal the extraordinary virtuosity in which the first violins of the Boston orchestra used to be incomparable, yet their playing was clear, delicate, and always charming. Mendelssohn gives some beautiful and difficult solo passages to players of wind instruments, and the horn player and flutist had to rise and receive well merited applause. The concert closed with a superb performance of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet."

Some fine attractions are announced for next season including besides the Boston orchestra and the New York Philharmonic society the Spanish contralto Mme J'Alvarez, the violinist Jascha Heifetz, the 'cellist Pablo Casals, and the pianist Gabrilowitsch.

FROM AND OF "THE SIX"

THE NEWEST PARISIAN MUSIC IN PROSPECT

A Much Debated Suite to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow for the First Time in America—Darius Milhaud, the Composer Who Wrote It—Antecedents and Characteristics as Brief Survey of His Work Discloses Them—His Fellow "Post-Impressionists"

IT is not without significance that Darius Milhaud's first quartet for strings, written in 1912, was dedicated to the memory of Paul Cézanne. For the group of younger French composers, of which Milhaud is at present the dominating figure, may be said to bear the same relation to the school of Debussy that the post-impressionist painters bore to Manet and his followers. Although of an earlier generation and of different musical tendencies, Albert Roussel, in an article contributed two years ago to The Chesterian, has admirably set forth what may be regarded as the common aim and ideal of these musicians. In part he says:

> They are bound by no clanship of origin; some of them have passed through the schools, others have more or less formed themselves. And similarly, the influences they have undergone and the preferences they have for such and such a master are of the most varied, and extend from Chabrier to Satie and Stravinsky. Come into the musical world at a period when impressionism was in full vogue, admiring Claude Debussy but fully aware of the danger that threatens music by an exaggeration of a system of tonal indistinctness, vague outline and blurred design, they strive for a more sober and clear expression with more sharply defined lines and greater directness. This desire to pursue paths that differ appreciably from those of their elders, while advancing still further in their harmonic achievements, is the most striking bond that unites these young people, whose personalities are otherwise quite dissimilar. Does this mean that all their works, from the beginning, give that impression of precision and clearness for which they strive? Certainly not; and it would be futile to be astonished at the fact. It is for the moment sufficient to see that a certain result has rewarded their efforts, and that it is possible to point here and there to traces of such qualities as will bear their fruit in the future.

The members of this conetrie—Georges Auric, Louis Durey, A. Honneger, Francis Poulenc, Germaine Tailleferre and Darius Milhaud—are now popularly known as "Les Six," and as such they have received liberal advertising from certain Parisian journals, and particularly from Jean Cocteau, the public champion of that strange apparition, Erik Satie, regarded by "The Six" as their artistic progenitor and guiding star. In contrast to M. Roussel's optimistic view of their achievements, it is interesting to re-read the comments of Mr. Edwin Evans in the London Outlook, reprinted in these columns a few weeks ago. Mr. Evans had paid a visit to Paris; and the music of these six composers, deserved the fulsome adulation in certain artists showered upon them, and he regards the situation somewhat skeptically. Deploring the present inactivity of these composers, he proceeds to a discussion of their successors: "Into this temporarily deserted arena enter the group known as 'Les Six' who, whatever else they may create, certainly do create an impression of great activity. This has the effect of distorting the perspective for the observer, who is tempted to attach more importance to these manifestations than really belong to them." According to Mr. Evans, "The Six" feel that they are the victims of their friends, that they have been unduly exploited, and they are resentful of the publicity into which they have been thrust. But unless their heads are turned, no harm can come to them through outside encouragement—too many composers have suffered from the lack of it. In the opinion of Mr. Evans the real objection is that the tone of this journalistic campaign has narrowed. In place of the broad enthusiasm provoked by Debussy one detects a purely local exuberance.

In Particular, Milhaud

So much for The Six collectively. At present we in Boston have an especial interest in Milhaud, for, at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday Mr. Monteux will play, for the first times in America, his Second Suite for Orchestra. Milhaud was a pupil of André Gédalge and though he is still comparatively young—he was born at Aix in Provence, Sept. 4, 1892—the list of his compositions is long and imposing. Among his more important pieces may be mentioned an opera in three acts, "La Brebis Egarée," text by Francis Jammès; lyrical scenes from "La Porte Etroite" and "Le Retour de l'Enfant Prodigue" of Gidé, incidental music and choruses for the "Choephori" of Æschylus, in Claudel's translation, and a curious ballet done in collaboration with Cocteau, the title of which reads "Le Bœuf sur le Toit ou The Nothing-Doing Bar." Milhaud has also written two Suites for Orchestra, a Poem for Piano and Orchestra, four String Quartets, two Sonatas for Violin and one for two violins, besides a great quantity of pinao-music and songs.

To estimate the worth and character of Milhaud's music, it is advisable to survey his work chronologically, as his style has undergone marked changes in the few years in which he has been before the public. The earliest of his published compositions was a Sonata for Violin and Piano, written in 1911 and played two years later at a concert of the Independent Musical Society. As we now understand the term, there is little that is radical in this music, yet it bears the stamp of creative independence and, for a composer of nineteen, it is a singularly substantial piece of writing. Its vigor, its open-air quality and scorn of the purely sensuous were perhaps more notable a decade ago than they would be today. That discerning critic, Mr. Montagu-Nathan, wrote eloquently of the [illegible] one of a series of articles on [illegible] French violin sonatas which appea[illegible] during the year 1914 in The Music Student the London journal. To him in this sonata Milhaud "combines the refinement of Magnard and the simplicity and clarity of Ravel with that glowing quality so conspicuously absent from the work of the first-named lamented composer." Mr. Nathan lays much stress on Milhaud's partiality for the poets Paul Claudel and Francis Jammès, and finds in the law and order of the sonata a reflection of their spirit.

Chamber-Music and the Suite

In 1912 Milhaud wrote his First String Quartet, two movements of which have been played in Boston by "The Flonzaleys." There is already a greater boldness than in the sonata; there is also real profundity, a high degree of technical mastery, and there are pregnant musical ideas. In the Sonata for two Violins and Piano and in the Second String Quartet—the former dated 1914, the latter 1914-15—the more characteristic Milhaud begins to show himself. We find adumbrations of the poly-harmony so much used in his later music, the dissonances are harsher, the themes more angular, the whole style tending toward greater acridness and severity. In the second Sonata for Violin alone, written in 1917, the reader is immediately struck by the seeming simplicity and clearness of the musical texture (the Sonata for two violins is often a contrapuntal labyrinth), but this simplicity is deceiving. Nothing could be more innocuous than the pastoral theme for the violin with which the piece begins and two chords suffice for the accompaniment, but on the second page Milhaud plunges without reserve into his poly-harmony. There are not many notes but those that there are make themselves conspicuous. In one passage the bass of the piano part stands in B-flat minor, the treble in D-major, while the violin plays "double stops"—mostly fifths—in the key of B-flat major! Yet such procedures are the merest commonplace in Milhaud's more recent music. Another and equally favored device which makes its appearance here is the prolonged repetition in one voice of a single figure that may occupy from one to three measures—a device that has become almost a hall-mark of Milhaud's style.

As the Suite to be played tomorrow was composed in 1919, it may be taken as fairly typical of his present methods. There are five movements—an Overture, Prélude and Fugue, Pastorale, Nocturne and Finale—and the entire suite occupies more than forty minutes. Again the music presents an outward clearness, but closer inspection reveals dissonances of the most acid variety and poly-harmony is much in evidence. In one singular passage the three trumpets play "first position" triads in the key of A minor against F-sharp major harmonies in the trombones, and in the Fugue there is a conspicuous instance of another favored procedure. Full forty times the double basses play, in even quarter notes, the tones G, A, B, C sharp, B, A while against and utterly at variance with this monotonous undulation, the brass perform contrapuntal evolutions. Milhaud's orchestral stipulations are exceedingly reasonable, even in the percussion section, though he does require the services of a "fouet" or whip. The Suite is dedicated to the memory of Albèric Magnard, who was killed in 1914 defending his house against the Germans.

Songs and Piano-Pieces

Turning to Milhaud's songs we find the same development that to some may signify retrogression. Between April, 1912, and April, 1913, he set to music six poems by Claudel, extracts from "La Connaissance de l'Est." One of them, "Dissolution," was sung here last season by Mr. Lawrence Haynes and made an immediate impression. Remarkable settings of remarkable poems, these songs are conspicuous for their sombre power and sober beauty. As the music of a youth of twenty they are notable, both for what they are and for what they are not. Debussy died a romanticist, Ravel and even d'Indy are romantics. But Milhaud seemingly was born a realist. But if these songs are stern, and impatient of sheer lusciousness, they are supremely moving, and devoid of musical perversities and extravagances. In the following year Milhaud composed the music to four exquisitely lyric poems of Léo Latil, the acid character of which is often strangely at variance with the nature of the verse. (No doubt some of this harshness would be softened in actual performance). In the eight "Poëmes Juifs," written in 1916, there is a breadth and often a noble simplicity in the setting that well matches the poems, translations from the Hebrew. With one or two exceptions they are not exacting of the singer and, with the six songs from Claudel, there is no good reason why they should not be heard hereabouts. A second set of Claudel's songs, to Claudel's verse, composed between 1915 and 1917, are far more drastic than their predecessors, but there is no denying them an equal forcefulness.

During the year 1917 Milhaud lived in South America and among the pieces which he wrote while there are the settings of Mallarmé's fantastic songs of labor, "Chansons Bas," many of them less than twenty measures long. They are amusing little skits, but hardly to be taken seriously. Amusing, but in a different way, are the later "Trois Poëmes de Jean Cocteau." The verses are devoid of punctuation, rhyme and reason and brevity is their only virtue. Though the music is entertaaining it is of slight value. In the second song, "Fete de Bordeaux" the piano accompaniment runs in two voices—the upper in the key of D flat, the lower in C major, and the singer, to keep peace between them, intones alternately A flat and A. The twelve songs, "Les Soirées de Petrograde," poems by René Chalupt, are thumbnail sketches, pointed and graphic and often very ugly. They are inscribed "Paris, Juin, 1919."

Among Milhaud's pieces for the piano is an admirable Suite, in five movements, which [illegible] a product of his earlier years, [illegible] pianist anxious to freshen his repertory might seek out with profit. The [illegible] free from the composer's later [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ne of a series of articles on mode French violin sonatas which appeared uring the year 1914 in The Music Student, he London journal. To him in this onata Milhaud "combines the refinement
f Magnard and the simplicity and clarity
f Ravel with that glowing quality so conpicuously absent from the work of the rst-named lamented composer." Mr.
athan lays much stress on Milhaud's rtiality for the poets Paul Claudel and rancis Jammes, and finds in the law and der of the sonata a reflection of their pirit.

amber-Music and the Suite

n 1912 Milhaud wrote his First String rtet, two movements of which have played in Boston by "The Flonza-
". There is already a greater bold-than in the sonata; there is also profundity, a high degree of tech-mastery, and there are pregnant al ideas. In the Sonata for two Vioand Piano and in the Second String t—the former dated 1914, the latter —the more characteristic Milhaud to show himself. We find adumof the poly-harmony so much his later music, the dissonances harsher, the themes more angular, whole style tending toward greater ness and severity. In the second for Violin alone, written in 1917, der is immediately struck by the simplicity and clearness of the texture (the Sonata for two Violins a contrapuntal labyrinth), but mplicity is deceiving. Nothing could ore innocuous than the pastoral theme he violin with which the piece begins two chords suffice for the accompani-
, but on the second page Milhaud without reserve into his poly-ony. There are not many notes but e that there are make themselves con-uous. In one passage the bass of piano part stands in B-flat minor, treble in D-major, while the violin s "double stops"—mostly fifths—in the of B-flat major! Yet such procedures the merest commonplace in Milhaud's recent music. Another and equally red device which makes its appearance is the prolonged repetition in one voice single figure that may occupy from to three measures—a device that has me almost a hall-mark of Milhaud's

the Suite to be played tomorrow was osed in 1919, it may be taken as fairly al of his present methods. There are movements—an Overture, Prelude and e, Pastorale, Nocturne and Finale—he entire suite occupies more than forty es. Again the music presents an out-clearness, but closer inspection redissonances of the most acid variety oly-harmony is much in evidence. In ingular passage the three trumpets
"first position" triads in the key of A against F-sharp major harmonies in ombones, and in the Fugue there is spicuous instance of another favored lure. Full forty times the double play, in even quarter notes, the G, A, B, C sharp, B, A while against [illegible] variance with this monotoundulation, the brass perform contral evolutions. Milhaud's orchestral ations are exceedingly reasonable, in the percussion section, though he require the services of a "fouet" or
The Suite is dedicated to the mem-Albéric Magnard, who was killed in efending his house against the Ger-

and Piano-Pieces

ing to Milhaud's songs we find the development that to some may signi-rogression. Between April, 1912, and 1913, he set to music six poems by l, extracts from "La Connaissance t." One of them, "Dissolution," was ere last season by Mr. Lawrence and made an immediate impres-Remarkable settings of remarkable these songs are conspicuous for mbre power and sober beauty. As sic of a youth of twenty they are , both for what they are and for ey are not. Debussy died a romanavel and even d'Indy are romantics.
seemingly was born a realist. But songs are stern, and impatient of usciousness, they are supremely and devoid of musical perversities ravagances. In the following year composed the music to four ex-lyric poems of Léo Latil, the acid r of which is often strangely at with the nature of the verse. (No ome of this harshness would be in actual performance). In the oèmes Juifs," written in 1916, there adth and often a noble simplicity etting that well matches the poems, ons from the Hebrew. With one xceptions they are not exacting of er and, with the six songs from there is no good reason why they ot be heard hereabouts. A second laudel's songs, to Claudel's verse, d between 1915 and 1917, are far astic than their predecessors, but no denying them an equal force-

the year 1917 Milhaud lived in America and among the pieces wrote while there are the set-Mallarmé's fantastic songs of hansons Bas," many of them less nty measures long. They are ittle skits, but hardly to be taken Amusing, but in a different the later "Trois Poèmes de Jean
The verses are devoid of punctyme and reason and brevity is virtue. Though the music is en-it is of slight value. In the "Fete de Bordeaux" the piano nt runs in two voices—the e key of D flat, the upper in and the singer, to keep peace
m, intones alternately A flat twelve songs, "Les Soirées de ems by René Chalupt, are ches, pointed and graphic gly. They are inscribed pieces for the piano
five movements, which any his repertor

yet it is wholly original and at times singularly impressive. A later Suite of three pieces, "Printemps," is both simpler and more daring, and also perceptibly slighter; and it, too, is well worth the playing.

To Conclude

As no other of Milhaud's stage pieces are readily obtainable, thus precluding a discussion of them in this brief survey, a word as to his "Le Boeuf sur le Toit" may here be inserted. The story is a broadly farcical episode in a bar-room and the music, which is scored for twenty-five instruments, runs almost continuously in the style and rhythm of the Spanish or South American Tango—in fact the composer has added to the score the sub-title, "Cinéma-Symphonie sur des Airs Sud-Américains." The obviousness of these tunes has been relieved by occasional poly-harmonic touches. This ballet was first seen at the Comédie des Champs-Elysées, Paris, on Feb. 21, 1920, and subsequently at the Coliseum in London.

So long as Mr. Evans and Monsieur Roussel's views on "Les Six" have been noted, it may be of interest to add, in conclusion, their specific comments on Milhaud. To the former he is "the possessor of an almost uncanny skill, with which he makes exuberant play, but which often seems to be in itself the end rather than the means of his music." But Roussel, more kindly disposed, finds his compositions "distinguished by a force of expression, a frankness and power, which make short work of the niceties of the impressionist school." And he adds: "His harshness, though occasionally excessive, never impairs the quality of his music, and I feel confident that his incontestable dramatic sense will lead him to give us, in due time, some works of the greatest interest."

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Into the very last pair of Symphony Concerts, on April 29 and 30, Mr. Monteux happily carries novel numbers. The particular item is Bloch's tone-poem, "Winter-Spring," the first of his symphonic pieces to be heard in Boston since the "Jewish Poems" of Dr. Muck's day. For a composer of such vivid individuality, too little of Bloch's music has been played or sung here, and it is good to find Mr. Monteux lending ear to him. At these final concerts, the conductor will also revive Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," for the first time since the end of the war restored living German masters to American concert-halls. The other chosen pieces are Franck's Symphony to begin the programme and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser" to end it.

The final Symphony Concert of the year in Cambridge will take place in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening of next week. Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for Piano and Orchestra fill the programme. In the Concerto, Mr. Félix Fox will play the solo part.

It is amusing to see upon the first of Mr. Jacchia's programmes for the Pop Concerts this item:

REVE AU CHAMPAGNE............Vollsted

In more senses than one, champagne is indeed dream-like nowadays, by the law of one, Volstead—man of quite another mind than, presumably, the composer unfortunate enough to bear such ill-omened name. Plainly Mr. Jacchia has a pretty sense of timely mockery.

TRANS. APR

FUND FOR THE SYMPHONY

Trustees Ask the Public for Fresh Guarantees

Private Subscriptions No Longer Adequate

Rising Salaries Main Item in Yearly Expenses

Pledges of $150,000 Annually Now Sought

Today the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have posted to the subscribers to its concerts a circular-letter, setting forth the income and the outgo of the band since they have controlled it, noting the deficits incurred each season, and asking contributions to meet the difference, approximately $150,000, between revenue and expenditure for the current year. They further propose that these contributions be continued from season to season until the orchestra is finally provided with an Endowment Fund. Thus $150,000 would be annually at the disposal of the trustees to meet a deficit, practically unescapable.

By the tables appended to the circular-letter, it appears that the deficit for the musical year 1918-19 was $93,000. It was paid by some hundred guarantors privately gathered. The deficit for the succeeding season, 1919-20, was $83,000. Again these guarantors paid it. For the current season, 1920-21, the deficit is estimated at $131,000—a sum exceeding by $50,000 the pledges of the guarantors. Hence the present appeal for additional subscriptions from the public of the concerts. Moreover, these private guarantees, made in 1919 for three seasons, have but one more year to run.

Past, Present, Future

The circular-letter notes the transfer of the control of the orchestra from the late Henry L. Higginson to the trustees, their assumption of the annual deficit and the pledging of a guarantee fund which covered the losses for the season of 1918-19 and provided "about $83,000" for like purpose through the seasons of 1919-20, 1920-21, 1921-22. The letter then proceeds:

"Last year the deficit fell below the amount of the guarantee fund, and the unused portions of the subscriptions for that year were returned to the subscribers. This year it is evident that the deficit will far exceed the guarantee fund. Substantial increases in the musicians' salaries and in nearly all the other necessary expenses are swelling the deficits in all orchestras; in other cities than Boston they are credibly reported to stand at $200,000 and $300,000.

"The trustees find themselves confronted with the necessity of securing approximately $50,000 beyond the fund guaranteed for this year's deficit, and a substantial increase in the amount pledged for next year. They must similarly obtain adequate provision for subsequent years, pending the establishment of the eventually needed endowment fund of at least $3,000,000. From time to time they have considered the organization of a definite campaign for the raising of this fund, but have not yet been convinced that the time is ripe for it. The foundations for the fund have nevertheless been laid, through subscriptions to the amount of about $150,000.

"The trustees believe that their efforts to continue the Orchestra have been amply justified, both through the satisfaction of lovers of music and through the preservation of a local institution of the highest significance and benefit to the whole community. They have faith that their belief is shared by many besides those who have been giving their financial support to the orchestra. They believe that in addition to the comparatively small number of the friends of music who, in an emergency, have been the annual guarantors, there are many persons who so value the concerts as vital elements in their own lives and in the life of the community that they will welcome the opportunity to contribute.

"To sustain the orchestra, contributions are necessary to make up an annual sum estimated to be $150,000. . . All those who make annual subscriptions will, so long as they continue to do so, be designated "Sustaining Subscribers." All those who subscribe $5000 or more specifically to be added to the permanent endowment fund, the income to be used in accordance with the terms of that fund for current expenses of the orchestra, will be designated as "Endowing Subscribers." If in any year the available subscriptions exceed the deficit, the over-subscriptions may, in the discretion of the trustees of the orchestra, be applied to any other annual deficit or be added to the permanent endowment fund, the growth of which will diminish the total amount needed for annual subscriptions.

"The permanence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a musical and civic institution must ultimately depend upon public support. The trustees now confidently appeal for tangible expression of this support. They invite all concert-goers to fill out the enclosed blank, as liberally as their several resources will permit, and mail it to the treasurer, Ernest B. Dane, 6 Beacon Street, Boston, and thereby assure the required sum of $150,0000 a year. Subscriptions to meet the deficit for this year will be particularly welcome."

From the Account Books

Appended tables for the three seasons in which the trustees have administered the affairs of the orchestra, set the gross receipts for the musical year 1918-19 at $414,707. The gross expenditures in that year, of which $194,828.76 was paid in salaries to the orchestra, were $508,029.99, leaving a deficit of $93,322.99. For the musical year 1919-20, the gross income was $522,600.70, and the total outgo $577,532.53, of which $229,748.14 was expended in salaries to the musicians. The resulting deficit was $54,931.83. For the musical year 1920-21, now ending, the receipts, partly estimated, are set down at $519,527.24 and the expenditures, again partly estimated, at $650,816.47. The item that materially swells this outgo is the increase in the salaries of the orchestra to $300,298.67. Thus, the present deficit rises to $131,289.23. Accordingly the trustees need $150,000 as the annual guarantee necessary to security in future.

TRANS. APR. 22.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MOZART, MILHAUD AND SHARP-SET CONTRASTS

The Parisian's Suite as a Discompose Audience Heard It — A Strange, Ne Speech in Tones, but One by Which th Composer Gains Imaginative and Impressive Ends—An Individual but Not Freakish Music — Mr. Monteux an Mozart—Dukas's Hackneyed Scherzo

MOZART and Milhaud were th poles of the Symphony Co cert yesterday afternoon—Moza with the "Jupiter" Symphony C major; Milhaud with an "Orchestr Suite," played for the first time in Ame ica. Upon both Mr. Monteux and th orchestra bestowed equal pains; but some respects the conductor was more for tunate with the music of his own time To Mozart the audience listened with easy complaisant pleasure. It was hearing a familiar piece; the band was playing it viv idly, animatedly; the music lacked neithe beauty nor zest. It was all, as the dow agers like to say, "so satisfying." No so much as a hair of their good gray coiffures was ruffled. The applaus seemed the smile of this happy content. A little later—and into this symphonic paradise of Friday afternoon, came the disturber of the peace, the intruder, this Darius Milhaud of Paris, indecently young and "wayward," impudently declining to write "respectable" music. Some would not listen to him at all, preferring the perusal of the programme-book; some heard disdainfully, not unwilling that neighbors should note their scorn; others—the saving remnant of every audience—sought to understand and feel with the composer and so gain the pleasure of new, stimulating ways with music; an appreciable company—as one thereof put it—"just wished that it was over." At the end of the Fugue the snickers of superiority mingled with hearty laughs at Milhaud's burletta. At the close of the Pastoral and the Nocturne came plaudits that acknowledged and rewarded beauty. Overture and Finale left most hearers quite cold.

Mr. Monteux could hardly have expected more for an adventure that again praises his openness of mind, his regard for the music of our own time, his encouragement to the innovation and experiment which are the ways of progress. Yet the orchestra deserved more, since the preparation of Milhaud's Suite had been arduous. . . . No doubt there were Viennese, who hearing the "Jupiter Symphony" in early days, believed Mozart young and impudent; who tilted scornful brows; who "wished that it was over." The chroniclers of the time hint as much. Not always did responsive audience answer to Mozart or to them who played him. And all this is not to say that Milhaud, a century and a quarter hence, will be a classic or that he will count for more in the course of music than do nowadays, some of Mozart's contemporaries. Even the dictionaries of music may ignore him. After all only the conservatives and the radicals in this amusing world are quite sure of men and things. The rest of us find the siftings of time much more entertaining than certainties.

In itself and for the information it yielded as to the new courses of Paris, Milhaud's Suite amply justified performance. Like or mislike, the music, there is no mistaking its vitality. By every outward sign, the composer writes not because he would, but because he must. He chooses his own matter, method, manner, because to him, for the time, there are no other. As plainly as music may say, the Suite is self-expression, and since Milhaud is much alive, life pulses through it. There are recognizable motivs, warm with beauty in the Pastoral and the Nocturne; springy and gamesome in the Overture and Finale; meet for broad humor in the Fugue. With élan Milhaud sets to his play with them. In the slower movements it takes course in a clear poetry of tones; at beginning and end, it is eager, graphic exercise of young powers and young zest; in the fugal travesty, it is the gusto of rough-and-ready humor.

From this élan, perhaps, proceeds the rhythmic life of the music. Not once does it plod; never is it merely static, waiting. Always there is motion in it, always stir upon the ear and the imagination. The quicker movements tingle upon the perceptive faculties, whipping them like the measures of Stravinsky in parts of "Petruschka," in the whole of "The Rite of the Spring." The slower divisions are equally vivid and insistent with the mood, the illusion they would convey. The beauty that Milhaud seeks, he feels deeply, would have his hearers receive as intensely. It is, moreover, an individual, a charactered beauty. There is aerial quality in the Pastoral and Nocturne. With all his insistence and reiteration, his use of the higher and more piercing timbres of the orchestra, Milhaud is clearly seeking—and sometimes gaining—a new luminosity, a new undulation of tones. Seemingly he would write a music so supple of motion, so vivid of color, so intense of sensation upon the hearer that it shall seem a more direct and penetrating speech than the older ways with tones often summoned. The mood of the Pastoral, the mood of the Nocturne are not far from the conventions of such music. The one is wistful, musing, fitful; the other broods more deeply. The matter, in a sense, is conventially appropriate to either. In both it is the treatment that intensifies substance and sensation. The ear hears as the eye sees that which is stark, aglow, with no veils between. Similarly with the grimacing rough and tumble of the Fugue. It is music to the tune of Rabelais's broad frank, deep-chested, hugely comic jesting.

With like vitality, in equal intensity Milhaud works upon and with his orchestra. Like most of the innovating composers of our time, he would make as salient as possible the individual quality of each instrument or group of instruments. His band is not an assembly of choirs to be used in unions, contrasts, complements. It is rather a company of individual voices, to be parted, isolated, joined, overlaid, aligned at will of the composer's imagination and desire, for the passing stroke he would make, for the illusion he would achieve. Hence in the Suite, single voices pierce again and again through the instrumental web; or grouped voices go their own way, seemingly regardless of their neighbors; or some stride bravely forward, while others do but make themselves into a repetitious background. With like intent and in like manner, Milhaud's music sometimes proceeds simultaneously in different keys—so far as it answers at all to such tests—moving in parallel lines as it were, upon the ear, each making distinct, different, yet, at bottom, ordered and studied impression upon it. Hence, sudden and reiterated chords, hence sustained strands of counterpoint, hence a horizontal rather than a vertical music, that indeed generate strange sounds and novel sensations.

In this "poly-toned" procedure, as the prophets of the new dispensation call it; in this cacophony, as it seemed yesterday to many years, lies Milhaud's reputed sin against the light—his youth, his waywardness, his impudence, all the other trite reproaches. It is a new, a strange speech in music, but it is not incomprehensible, as Schönberg's idiom seemed, for remembered example, when Dr. Muck hazarded the "Five Pieces" that provoked more irritation for a passing day than even did Milhaud's Suite. Moreover, the Parisian's speech of tones, even at a single hearing and upon ears only a little prepared, does perceptibly fulfill his purpose. For praise or blame, for mockery or for magic, Milhaud's ways are his own; but there was no mistaking yesterday, the vivid stir, the keen sensation of music in ardent motion, like stripped athlete in race, that rose out of Overture and Finale; the broad and hearty burlesquing of the Fugue, in a humor that music, too refined and too abstruse, superfluously disdains; the sharpened beauty piercing from Nocturne and Pastoral. Across the Common, these nights, cuts the sharp gleam of an electric sign advertising a singing-machine. In it the usual intensity of such blaze is many times multiplied. At first it repels the eye; then gradually fascinates it. Somewhat akin were the sensations from Milhaud's Suite.

In retrospect upon Milhaud, [illegible] in actual progress, the rest of the concert passed in relative routine; while in the final item, Dukas's hackneyed Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the routine became absolute. Sorely over-played was this trifle when it was a new and seemed an amusing piece. Now, it is paying the penalty of popularity and familiarity. The measures of mystery and spell at the beginning remain work of imagination. The complementary measures at the end keep like quality. But how obvious between, how rhythmically monotonous, how little varied and quickened by artful, impulsive detail, seems the tone-picturing of the galumphing broom, the frightened apprentice, the flooding water and the other impedimenta of the tale. After the manner of humans when they are pleased, we hearers made a "popular classic" out of a passing trifle—and now comes disillusion that even Mr. Monteux's high and graphic humor with the music could not avert.

The conductor was as zealous with Mozart's Symphony and to as eloquent outcome; but it is possible to regret the Olympian adjective that somehow, from somewhere, has long labelled it. Being a "Jupiter Symphony," it must be played—so runs the tradition—in big, broad, large-voiced fashion by the full forces—so far as Mozart's instruments go—of a twentieth-century orchestra. Yet did Mozart design for it any larger band than those for which he wrote many another symphony? True, he set within it many a large phrase and sounding period. [illegible] the symphony moves in a noble progress. Yet did he not also write therein with many a finely shaded line, many a darting figure and lightly twining arabesque? Full voiced as he was, he did not forget his suppleness, his fragrance of melody. Mr. Monteux took the big broad way with the Symphony in the first movement and finale, as it seemed to some ears with many a blur upon the Mozartean pattern. Better and truer was the lighter, more sensative hand, the gentler voiced orchestra he bestowed upon the manifold song of the Andante, the wistful grace of the Minuet.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS APR. 23

The Symphony Orchestra for the Last Times This Season—The Musical Association Also Takes Leave—A New Russian Pianist—Choral Music Variously—Minor Recitals

THE final pair of Symphony Concerts for the ending season falls on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Symphony Hall. For them, according to custom, Mr. Monteux has set a programme (with one exception) of familiar and well-liked pieces each of signal merit in kind. They are: Franck's upswelling, eloquent and finely touched Symphony, unheard for two seasons; Strauss's graphic and grandiose tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," for the first time since the end of the war restored living German composers to American concert-halls; and Wagner's sonorous overture to his opera, "Tannhäuser." The exception is Ernest Bloch's contrasting tone-pictures, designed to be played in sequence, "Winter-Spring." They are relatively early work of a composer who has too seldom gained hearing at the Symphony Concerts; but they do not lack his characteristic vigor of imagination and speech or his sharply colored and firmly set procedure. The contrast in matter and manner of the two pieces readily suggests itself.

On Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and with Félix Fox as assisting pianist, will play for the last time this season in Cambridge. The programme begins with Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony (in E minor) lately heard at a concert in Boston for the Pension Fund of the orchestra; proceeds with Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with the songful slow movement; and ends with Strauss's manifold and magniloquent tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

Monday evening, May 2, in Symphony Hall, the first of a new series of Pop Concerts, with a band eighty strong, drawn from the Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Jacchia for tireless and many-sided conductor; the usual pleasures of light ease, light "refreshments," tobacco and talk between pieces various, unexacting and well chosen. A Bostonian institution, annually renewed from May to July.

TRANS. APR. 2

The Symphony Orches

Boston has come to the partin ways in the matter of the mainte the Symphony Orchestra. Our been favored above all others in ord up to this time of this fame
The story of the public-spirited Major Henry L. Higginson is k everybody. Our city has greatly not only in high æsthetic enjoym in honor and general reputatio business reputation, from the con patronage of this great enterprise jor Higginson. Higginson is gone have worthily carried on his work a cost to themselves; but the expe the maintenance of the orchest risen enormously, and the time ha when the whole musical public mu
sider whether it will take up the duty and the honor and continue the record of our city, by meeting now a deficit of $150,000 incurred this season in the running of the orchestra—at the same time, let us say, that it faces the larger duty and opportunity of providing an endowment fund of $3,000,000 to make the work of the orchestra perpetual.

The appeal of the trustees for fresh guarantees for the orchestra goes forth not merely to men and women of wealth, but to all citizens who love music and who are proud of their city's reputation. It is possible that the literary sceptre has passed from us, but there is no reason why the artistic preëminence afforded by the fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should pass. That may well remain within our grasp, if our people appreciate the situation. On the other hand, if they do not, and if they fail to support the enterprise worthily, the consequence to our city's reputation may indeed be serious. The subject is worthy of every citizen's thought. The efforts of the trustees thus far to maintain the orchestra with full credit to the city have indeed been most creditable, and they have been justified from every point of view. The response to their appeal should convince them, and the whole world, that Boston's star is not waning.

HERALD APR. 23

[20]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

athan, wrote eloquently of the piece in one of a series of articles on modern French violin sonatas which appeared during the year 1914 in The Music Student, he London journal. To him in this onata Milhaud "combines the refinement f Magnard and the simplicity and clarity f Ravel with that glowing quality so con picuously absent from the work of the rst-named lamented composer." Mr. athan lays much stress on Milhaud's artiality for the poets Paul Claudel and rancis Jammes, and finds in the law and rder of the sonata a reflection of their pirit.

amber-Music and the Suite

n 1912 Milhaud wrote his First String rtet, two movements of which have played in Boston by "The Flonzaley". There is already a greater bold- than in the sonata; there is also profundity, a high degree of tech- mastery, and there are pregnant ical ideas. In the Sonata for two Vio- s and Piano and in the Second String artet—the former dated 1914, the latter 4-15—the more characteristic Milhaud to show himself. We find adum- tions of the poly-harmony so much d in his later music, the dissonances harsher, the themes more angular, whole style tending toward greater dness and severity. In the second a for Violin alone, written in 1917, reader is immediately struck by the ming simplicity and clearness of the ical texture (the Sonata for two violins offers a contrapuntal labyrinth), but simplicity is deceiving. Nothing could more innocuous than the pastoral theme the violin with which the piece begins two chords suffice for the accompani- nt, but on the second page Milhaud nges without reserve into his poly- mony. There are not many notes but se that there are make themselves con- cuous. In one passage the bass of piano part stands in B-flat minor, treble in D-major, while the violin s "double stops"—mostly fifths—in the of B-flat major! Yet such procedures the merest commonplace in Milhaud's e recent music. Another and equally red device which makes its appearance is the prolonged repetition in one voice single figure that may occupy from to three measures—a device that has me almost a hall-mark of Milhaud's the Suite to be played tomorrow was osed in 1919, it may be taken as fairly al of his present methods. There are movements—an Overture, Prélude and e, Pastorale, Nocturne and Finale—he entire suite occupies more than forty tes. Again the music presents an out- clearness, but closer inspection re- dissonances of the most acid variety oly-harmony is much in evidence. In singular passage the three trumpets "first position" triads in the key of A against F-sharp major harmonies in rombones, and in the Fugue there is spicuous instance of another favored dure. Full forty times the double play, in even quarter notes, the G, A, B, C sharp, B, A while against variance with this monoto- undulation, the brass perform contra- l evolutions. Milhaud's orchestral ations are exceedingly reasonable, in the percussion section, though he require the services of a "fouet" or The Suite is dedicated to the mem- Albèric Magnard, who was killed in defending his house against the Ger-

and Piano-Pieces

ing to Milhaud's songs we find the development that to some may signi- rogression. Between April, 1912, and 1913, he set to music six poems by l, extracts from "La Connaissance t." One of them, "Dissolution," was here last season by Mr. Lawrence and made an immediate impres- Remarkable settings of remarkable these songs are conspicuous for ombre power and sober beauty. As sic of a youth of twenty they are , both for what they are and for ey are not. Debussy died a roman- Ravel and even d'Indy are romantics. seemingly was born a realist. But songs are stern, and impatient of usciousness, they are supremely, and devoid of musical perversities ravagances. In the following year composed the music to four ex- lyric poems of Léo Latil, the acid er of which is often strangely at with the nature of the verse. (No ome of this harshness would be in actual performance). In the Poèmes Juifs," written in 1916, there eadth and often a noble simplicity etting that well matches the poems, ions from the Hebrew. With one exceptions they are not exacting of er and, with the six songs from there is no good reason why they ot be heard hereabouts. A second Claudel's songs, to Claudel's verse, d between 1915 and 1917, are far astic than their predecessors, but no denying them an equal forct-

the year 1917 Milhaud lived in America and among the pieces e wrote while there are the set- Mallarmé's fantastic songs of Chansons Bas," many of them less enty measures long. They are little skits, but hardly to be taken Amusing, but in a different the later "Trois Poèmes de Jean The verses are devoid of punct- hyme and reason and brevity is virtue. Though the music is en- it is of slight value. In the ng, "Fete de Bordeaux" the piano iment runs in two voices—the the key of D flat, the upper in and the singer, to keep peace hem, intones alternately A flat he twelve songs, "Les Soirées de e," poems by René Chalupt, are sketches, pointed and graphic very ugly. They are inscribed n, 1913." Milhaud's pieces for the piano rable Suite, in five movements, his earlier years, which any to freshen his repertory with profit. The music is [illegible]

yet it is wholly original and at times singularly impressive. A later Suite of three pieces, "Printemps," is both simpler and more daring, and also perceptibly slighter; and it, too, is well worth the playing.

To Conclude

As no other of Milhaud's stage pieces are readily obtainable, thus precluding a discussion of them in this brief survey, a word as to his "Le Boeuf sur le Toit" may here be inserted. The story is a broadly farcical episode in a bar-room and the music, which is scored for twenty-five instruments, runs almost continuously in the style and rhythm of the Spanish or South American Tango—in fact the composer has added to the score the sub-title, "Cinéma-Symphonie sur des Airs Sud-Américains." The obviousness of these tunes has been relieved by occasional poly-harmonic touches. This ballet was first seen at the Comédie des Champs-Elysées, Paris, on Feb. 21, 1920, and subsequently at the Coliseum in London.

So long as Mr. Evans and Monsieur Roussel's views on "Les Six" have been noted, it may be of interest to add, in conclusion, their specific comments on Milhaud. To the former he is "the possessor of an almost uncanny skill, with which he makes exuberant play, but which often seems to be in itself the end rather than the means of his music." But Roussel, more kindly disposed, finds his compositions "distinguished by a force of expression, a frankness and power, which make short work of the niceties of the impressionist school." And he adds: "His harshness, though occasionally excessive, never impairs the quality of his music, and I feel confident that his incontestable dramatic sense will lead him to give us, in due time, some works of the greatest interest."

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Into the very last pair of Symphony Concerts, on April 29 and 30, Mr. Monteux happily carries novel numbers. The particular item is Bloch's tone-poem, "Winter-Spring," the first of his symphonic pieces to be heard in Boston since the "Jewish Poems" of Dr. Muck's day. For a composer of such vivid individuality, too little of Bloch's music has been played or sung here, and it is good to find Mr. Monteux lending ear to him. At these final concerts, the conductor will also revive Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," for the first time since the end of the war restored living German masters to American concert-halls. The other chosen pieces are Franck's Symphony to begin the programme and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser" to end it.

The final Symphony Concert of the year in Cambridge will take place in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening of next week. Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for Piano and Orchestra fill the programme. In the Concerto, Mr. Félix Fox will play the solo part.

It is amusing to see upon the first of Mr Jacchia's programmes for the Pop Concert this item:

Reve au Champagne............Vollsted

In more senses than one, champagne, indeed dream-like nowadays, by the la of one, Volstead—man of quite anothe mind than, presumably, the composer u fortunate enough to bear such ill-omene name. Plainly Mr Jacchia has a prett sense of timely mockery.

RANS. APR

FUND FOR THE SYMPHONY

Trustees Ask the Public for Fresh Guarantees

Private Subscriptions No Longer Adequate

Rising Salaries Main Item in Yearly Expenses

Pledges of $150,000 Annually Now Sought

Today the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have posted to the subscribers to its concerts a circular-letter, setting forth the income and the outgo of the band since they have controlled it, noting the deficits incurred each season, and asking contributions to meet the difference, approximately $150,000, between revenue and expenditure for the current year. They further propose that these contributions be continued from season to season until the orchestra is finally provided with an Endowment Fund. Thus $150,000 would be annually at the disposal of the trustees to meet a deficit, practically unescapable.

By the tables appended to the circular-letter, it appears that the deficit for the musical year 1918-19 was $93,000. It was paid by some hundred guarantors privately gathered. The deficit for the succeeding season, 1919-20, was $83,000. Again these guarantors paid it. For the current season, 1920-21, the deficit is estimated at $131,000—a sum exceeding by $50,000 the pledges of the guarantors. Hence the present appeal for additional subscriptions from the public of the concerts. Moreover, these private guarantees, made in 1919 for three seasons, have but one more year to run.

Past, Present, Future

The circular-letter notes the transfer of the control of the orchestra from the late Henry L. Higginson to the trustees, their assumption of the annual deficit and the pledging of a guarantee fund which covered the losses for the season of 1918-19 and provided "about $83,000" for like purpose through the seasons of 1919-20, 1920-21, 1921-22. The letter then proceeds:

Last year the deficit fell below the amount of the guarantee fund, and the unused portions of the subscriptions for that year were returned to the subscribers. This year it is evident that the deficit will far exceed the guarantee fund. Substantial increases in the musicians' salaries and in nearly all the other necessary expenses are swelling the deficits in all orchestras; in other cities than Boston they are credibly reported to stand at $200,000 and $300,000.

The trustees find themselves confronted with the necessity of securing approximately $50,000 beyond the fund guaranteed for this year's deficit, and a substantial increase in the amount pledged for next year. They must similarly obtain adequate provision for subsequent years, pending the establishment of the eventually needed endowment fund of at least $3,000,000. From time to time they have considered the organization of a definite campaign for the raising of this fund, but have not yet been convinced that the time is ripe for it. The foundations for the fund have nevertheless been laid, through subscriptions to the amount of about $150,000.

The trustees believe that their efforts to continue the Orchestra have been amply justified, both through the satisfaction of lovers of music and through the preservation of a local institution of the highest significance and benefit to the whole community. They have faith that their belief is shared by many besides those who have been giving their financial support to the orchestra. They believe that in addition to the comparatively small number of the friends of music who, in an emergency, have been the annual guarantors, there are many persons who so value the concerts as vital elements in their own lives and in the life of the community that they will welcome the opportunity to contribute.

To sustain the orchestra, contributions are necessary to make up an annual sum estimated to be $150,000. . . All those who make annual subscriptions will, so long as they continue to do so, be designated "Sustaining Subscribers." All those who subscribe $5000 or more specifically to be added to the permanent endowment fund, the income to be used in accordance with the terms of that fund for current expenses of the orchestra, will be designated as "Endowing Subscribers." If in any year the available subscriptions exceed the deficit, the over-subscriptions may, in the discretion of the trustees of the orchestra, be applied to any other annual deficit or be added to the permanent endowment fund, the growth of which will diminish the total amount needed for annual subscriptions.

The permanence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a musical and civic institution must ultimately depend upon public support. The trustees now confidently appeal for tangible expression of this support. They invite all concert-goers to fill out the enclosed blank, as liberally as their several resources will permit, and mail it to the treasurer, Ernest B. Dane, 6 Beacon Street, Boston, and thereby assure the required sum of $150,0000 a year. Subscriptions to meet the deficit for this year will be particularly welcome.

From the Account Books

Appended tables for the three seasons in which the trustees have administered the affairs of the orchestra, set the gross receipts for the musical year 1918-19 at $414,707. The gross expenditures in that year, of which $194,828.76 was paid in salaries to the orchestra, were $508,029.99, leaving a deficit of $93,322,99. For the musical year 1919-20, the gross income was $522,600.70, and the total outgo $577,532.53, of which $229,748.14 was expended in salaries to the musicians. The resulting deficit was $54,931.83. For the musical year 1920-21, now ending, the receipts, partly estimated, are set down at $519,527.24 and the expenditures, again partly estimated, at $650,816.47. The item that materially swells this outgo is the increase in the salaries of the orchestra to $300,298.67. Thus, the present deficit rises to $131,289.23. Accordingly the trustees need $150,000 as the annual guarantee necessary to security in future.

TRANS. APR. 22.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MOZART, MILHAUD AND SHARP-SET CONTRASTS

The Parisian's Suite as a Discompose Audience Heard It — A Strange, Ne Speech in Tones, but One by Which th Composer Gains Imaginative and Im pressive Ends—An Individual but Not Freakish Music — Mr. Monteux an Mozart—Dukas's Hackneyed Scherzo

MOZART and Milhaud were th poles of the Symphony Con cert yesterday afternoon—Moza with the "Jupiter" Symphony C major; Milhaud with an "Orchestr Suite," played for the first time in Amer ica. Upon both Mr. Monteux and th orchestra bestowed equal pains; but i some respects the conductor was more for tunate with the music of his own time To Mozart the audience listened with easy complaisant pleasure. It was hearing a familiar piece; the band was playing it vividly, animatedly; the music lacked neither beauty nor zest. It was all, as the dowagers like to say, "so satisfying." Not so much as a hair of their good gray coiffures was ruffled. The applause seemed the smile of this happy content. A little later—and into this symphonic paradise of Friday afternoon, came the disturber of the peace, the intruder, this Darius Milhaud of Paris, indecently young and "wayward," impudently declining to write "respectable" music. Some would not listen to him at all, preferring the perusal of the programme-book; some heard disdainfully, not unwilling that neighbors should note their scorn; others—the saving remnant of every audience—sought to understand and feel with the composer and so gain the pleasure of new, stimulating ways with music; an appreciable company—as one thereof put it—"just wished that it was over." At the end of the Fugue the snickers of superiority mingled with hearty laughs at Milhaud's burletta. At the close of the Pastoral and the Nocturne came plaudits that acknowledged and rewarded beauty. Overture and Finale left most hearers quite cold.

Mr. Monteux could hardly have expected more for an adventure that again praises his openness of mind, his regard for the music of our own time, his encouragement to the innovation and experiment which are the ways of progress. Yet the orchestra deserved more, since the preparation of Milhaud's Suite had been arduous. . . . No doubt there were Viennese, who hearing the "Jupiter Symphony" in early days, believed Mozart young and impudent; who tilted scornful brows; who "wished that it was over." The chroniclers of the time hint as much. Not always did responsive audience answer to Mozart or to them who played him. And all this is not to say that Milhaud, a century and a quarter hence, will be a classic or that he will count for more in the course of music than do nowadays, some of Mozart's contemporaries. Even the dictionaries of music may ignore him. After all only the conservatives and the radicals in this amusing world are quite sure of men and things. The rest of us find the siftings of time much more entertaining than certainties.

In itself and for the information it yielded as to the new courses of Paris, Milhaud's Suite amply justified performance. Like or mislike, the music, there is no mistaking its vitality. By every outward sign, the composer writes not because he would, but because he must. He chooses his own matter, method, manner, because to him, for the time, there are no other. As plainly as music may say, the Suite is self-expression, and since Milhaud is much alive, life pulses through it. There are recognizable motives, warm with beauty in the Pastoral and the Nocturne; springy and gamesome in the Overture and Finale; meet for broad humor in the Fugue. With élan Milhaud sets to his play with them. In the slower movements it takes course in a clear poetry of tones; at beginning and end, it is eager, graphic exercise of young powers and young zest; in the fugal travesty, it is the gusto of rough-and-ready humor.

From this élan, perhaps, proceeds the rhythmic life of the music. Not once does it plod; never is it merely static, waiting. Always there is motion in it, always stir upon the ear and the imagination. The quicker movements tingle upon the perceptive faculties, whipping them like the measures of Stravinsky in parts of "Petruschka," in the whole of "The Rite of the Spring." The slower divisions are equally vivid and insistent with the mood, the illusion they would convey. The beauty that Milhaud seeks, he feels deeply, would have his hearers receive as intensely. It is, moreover, an individual, a charactered beauty. There is aerial quality in the Pastoral and Nocturne. With all his insistence and reiteration, his use of the higher and more piercing timbres of the orchestra, Milhaud is clearly seeking—and sometimes gaining—a new luminosity, a new undulation of tones. Seemingly he would write a music so supple of motion, so vivid of color, so intense of sensation upon the hearer that it shall seem a more direct and penetrating speech than the older ways with tones often summoned. The mood of the Pastoral, the mood of the Nocturne are not far from the conventions of such music. The one is wistful, musing, fitful; the other broods more deeply. The matter, in a sense, is conventially appropriate to either. In both it is the treatment that intensifies substance and sensation. The ear hears as the eye sees that which is stark, aglow, with no veils between. Similarly with the grimacing rough and tumble of the Fugue. It is music to the tune of Rabelais's broad, frank, deep-chested, hugely comic jesting.

With like vitality, in equal intensity Milhaud works upon and with his orchestra. Like most of the innovating composers of our time, he would make as salient as possible the individual quality of each instrument or group of instruments. His band is not an assembly of choirs to be used in unions, contrasts, complements. It is rather a company of individual voices, to be parted, isolated, joined, overlaid, aligned at will of the composer's imagination and desire, for the passing stroke he would make, for the illusion he would achieve. Hence in the Suite, single voices pierce again and again through the instrumental web; or grouped voices go their own way, seemingly regardless of their neighbors; or some stride bravely forward, while others do but make themselves into a repetitious background. With like intent and in like manner, Milhaud's music sometimes proceeds simultaneously in different keys—so far as it answers at all to such tests—moving in parallel lines as it were, upon the ear, each making distinct, different, yet, at bottom, ordered and studied impression upon it. Hence, sudden and reiterated chords, hence sustained strands of counterpoint, hence a horizontal rather than a vertical music, that indeed generate strange sounds and novel sensations.

In this "poly-toned" procedure, as the prophets of the new dispensation call it; in this cacophony, as it seemed yesterday to many years, lies Milhaud's reputed sin against the light—his youth, his waywardness, his impudence, all the other trite reproaches. It is a new, a strange speech in music, but it is not incomprehensible, as Schönberg's idiom seemed, for remembered example, when Dr. Muck hazarded the "Five Pieces" that provoked more irritation for a passing day than even did Milhaud's Suite. Moreover, the Parisian's speech of tones, even at a single hearing and upon ears only a little prepared, does perceptibly fulfill his purpose. For praise or blame, for mockery or for magic, Milhaud's ways are his own; but there was no mistaking yesterday, the vivid stir, the keen sensation of music in ardent motion, like stripped athlete in race, that rose out of Overture and Finale; the broad and hearty burlesquing of the Fugue, in a humor that music, too refined and too abstruse, superfluously disdains; the sharpened beauty piercing from Nocturne and Pastoral. Across the Common, these nights, cuts the sharp gleam of an electric sign advertising a singing-machine. In it the usual intensity of such blaze is many times multiplied. At first it repels the eye; then gradually fascinates it. Somewhat akin were the sensations from Milhaud's Suite.

In retrospect upon Milhaud, though not in actual progress, the rest of the concert passed in relative routine; while in the final item, Dukas's hackneyed Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the routine became absolute. Sorely over-played was this trifle when it was a new and seemed an amusing piece. Now, it is paying the penalty of popularity and familiarity. The measures of mystery and spell at the beginning remain work of imagination. The complementary measures at the end keep like quality. But how obvious between, how rhythmically monotonous, how little varied and quickened by artful, impulsive detail, seems the tone-picturing of the galumphing broom, the frightened apprentice, the flooding water and the other impedimenta of the tale. After the manner of humans when they are pleased, we hearers made a "popular classic" out of a passing trifle—and now comes disillusion that even Mr. Monteux's high and graphic humor with the music could not avert.

The conductor was as zealous with Mozart's Symphony and to as eloquent outcome; but it is possible to regret the Olympian adjective that somehow, from somewhere, has long labelled it. Being a "Jupiter Symphony," it must be played—so runs the tradition—in big, broad, large-voiced fashion by the full forces—so far as Mozart's instruments go—of a twentieth-century orchestra. Yet did Mozart design for it any larger band than those for which he wrote many another symphony? True, he set within it many a large phrase and sounding period. The symphony moves in a noble progress. Yet did he not also write therein with many a finely shaded line, many a darting figure and lightly twining arabesque? Full voiced as he was, he did not forget his suppleness, his fragrance of melody. Mr. Monteux took the big broad way with the Symphony in the first movement and and finale, as it seemed to some ears with many a blur upon the Mozartean pattern. Better and truer was the lighter, more sensative hand, the gentler voiced orchestra he bestowed upon the manifold song of the Andante, the wistful grace of the Minuet.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. APR. 23

The Symphony Orchestra for the Last Times This Season—The Musical Association Also Takes Leave—A New Russian Pianist—Choral Music Variously—Minor Recitals

THE final pair of Symphony Concerts for the ending season falls on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Symphony Hall. For them, according to custom, Mr. Monteux has set a programme (with one exception) of familiar and well-liked pieces each of signal merit in kind. They are: Franck's upswelling, eloquent and finely touched Symphony, unheard for two seasons; Strauss's graphic and grandiose tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," for the first time since the end of the war restored living German composers to American concert-halls; and Wagner's sonorous overture to his opera, "Tannhäuser." The exception is Ernest Bloch's contrasting tone-pictures, designed to be played in sequence, "Winter-Spring." They are relatively early work of a composer who has too seldom gained hearing at the Symphony Concerts; but they do not lack his characteristic vigor of imagination and speech or his sharply colored and firmly set procedure. The contrast in matter and manner of the two pieces readily suggests itself.

On Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and with Félix Fox as assisting pianist, will play for the last time this season in Cambridge. The programme begins with Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony (in E minor) lately heard at a concert in Boston for the Pension Fund of the orchestra; proceeds with Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with the songful slow movement; and ends with Strauss's manifold and magniloquent tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

in solo-pieces,

Monday evening, May 2, in Symphony Hall, the first of a new series of Pop Concerts, with a band eighty strong, drawn from the Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Jacchia for tireless and many-sided conductor; the usual pleasures of light ease, light "refreshments," tobacco and talk between pieces various, unexacting and well chosen. A Bostonian institution, annually renewed from May to July.

TRANS. APR. 21

The Symphony Orches

Boston has come to the partin ways in the matter of the mainte the Symphony Orchestra. Our been favored above all others in ord up to this time of this famo The story of the public-spirited Major Henry L. Higginson is k everybody. Our city has greatly not only in high æsthetic enjoym in honor and general reputatio business reputation, from the con patronage of this great enterprise jor Higginson. Higginson is gone have worthily carried on his work a cost to themselves; but the expe the maintenance of the orchestr risen enormously, and the time ha when the whole musical public mu sider whether it will take up the duty and the honor and continue the record of our city, by meeting now a deficit of $150,000 incurred this season in the running of the orchestra—at the same time, let us say, that it faces the larger duty and opportunity of providing an endowment fund of $3,000,000 to make the work of the orchestra perpetual.

The appeal of the trustees for fresh guarantees for the orchestra goes forth not merely to men and women of wealth, but to all citizens who love music and who are proud of their city's reputation. It is possible that the literary sceptre has passed from us, but there is no reason why the artistic preëminence afforded by the fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should pass. That may well remain within our grasp, if our people appreciate the situation. On the other hand, if they do not, and if they fail to support the enterprise worthily, the consequence to our city's reputation may indeed be serious. The subject is worthy of every citizen's thought. The efforts of the trustees thus far to maintain the orchestra with full credit to the city have indeed been most creditable, and they have been justified from every point of view. The response to their appeal should convince them, and the whole world, that Boston's star is not waning.

HERALD APR. 23

[120]

[121.]

The Disturber of the Peace

(Photograph by The Musical Courier)

Darius Milhaud, Parisian

Whose Bold and Brave Orchestral Suite Was Played for the First Time in America at the Symphony Concert Yesterday

---

TRANS. APR. 23.

23D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Delightful Performance of "Jupiter" Symphony Is Given

MILHAUD SUITE IS INTRODUCED

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, "Jupiter" symphony; Stuart Mason, Rhapsody on a Persian Air (first performance); Milhaud, orchestral Suite, No. 2 (first performance in America); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after Goethe).

There was a delightful performance of Mozart's Symphony. Especially noteworthy was the manner in which the Andante was sung, while the Finale, which still excites admiration for the marvellous skill shown in the construction, was played with inimitable clearness, sense of proportion in the treatment of the voices, and a brilliance that is now as characteristic of this orchestra as is its euphony.

Mr. Stuart Mason's marked ability was recognized some months ago when his composition for violoncellos was brought out at a concert of the Boston Musical Association. It is not extravagant to say that his Rhapsody on a Persian Air entrances by beauty that is inherent and not merely suggested by the exotic air, which serves as the theme for the many-colored improvisation. Mr. George Moore said in his arrogant, if not impudent, "Confessions of a Young Man," that Thomas Hardy chose country subjects to show how jolly country he could be. Mr. Mason does not attempt to be more Persian than the Persians, nor does he try to portray the Orient in a composition comparatively short. The air itself is certainly oriental, but he does not therefore endeavor to improvise as a Persian might be supposed to do; he improvises as a thoroughly-grounded musician, who, in addition to his technical equipment, is endowed with that rare gift, imagination. Nor does he rely on ear-tickling or surprising use of instruments in combination; his music has substance, as well as "atmosphere," a word abhorred by purists when employed in this connection. The Rhapsody was warmly received by the audience, and Mr. Mason, who played the obbligato piano part, was heartily applauded.

We remember that when Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was first performed at a Symphony concert in Boston, it shocked the hearers. A leading critic did not hesitate to characterize Strauss as a madman. We remember that when Cesar Franck's Symphony was first played at a Symphony concert in Boston, Mr. Gericke was reproached for putting it on a program, and the writer of one indignant letter described the symphony as "immoral." What will be the fate of Milhaud's Suite? Mr. Monteux was courageous in producing it, but we thank him for acquainting us with the work of a man who is the subject of hot discussion. The orchestra showed courage in playing the music. One might add that the audience showed courage in hearing it to the end. Many of the pages in three of the movements were undoubtedly cacophonic, as we all now understand cacophony, but there is method in the madness of Milhaud, if he is really the insane one, and not the hearer. Even in these defiant pages there are moments that compel respect. One of his admirers has said that he wished in one movement to parody the classic fugue. Parodies in music are usually dull, not humorous. This fugue seemed not only dull, but disagreeable. On the other hand, there is genuine beauty in the Pastorale and the Nocturne. The objection to the Suite, if the question of cacophony be waived, is that in its best estate it is characterized chiefly by cleverness, and cleverness in art is not the highest quality. The audience behaved remarkably well during the ordeal, and was the better prepared to enjoy the superb performance of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the season, is as follows: Franck, "Symphony in D minor;" Bloch, "Winter—Spring" (first time here); Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

HERALD APR. 23

SYMPHONY DEFICIT ABOUT $131,289

Trustees of the Orchestra Appeal for Fund

Guarantee Desired of $150,000 a Year for Three Years

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday to the subscribers to the concerts by means of a slip inserted in the programs that the deficit for the current season will exceed by no less than $50,000 the amount of the existing guarantee fund. They appeal to the public for subscriptions to meet this present deficit and to provide for the next three season a guarantee of $150,000 per annum.

They point out that when the late Maj Higginson, founder of the orchestra, announced at the close of the season of 1917-18 his inability to continue to support it, the burden was assumed privately by about 100 guarantors, who pledged $83,000 a year for three years, ending this season.

The deficit for 1918-19 was $93,322; for 1919-20, $54,931, and for the current sea-

---

MASON IN OWN PIECE AT THE SYMPHONY

Milhaud, Mozart and Dukas Complete the Concert

Large Gathering Follows Music at the Art Museum

Stuart Mason played the piano part in his own "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" at yesterday's Symphony concert. The composer-pianist was warmly applauded at the end of what proved to be an unusually imaginative and stimulating American composition. It is based on a Persian tune to be found in Woollett's "History of Music," a plaintive Oriental melody. Mr Mason has treated his theme sympathetically, with no display of contrapuntal erudition.

The other novelty was Milhaud's "Second Suite," which caused the police to be called in to quell a riot when it was first performed in Paris last Fall. The willful discords, the rather labored grotesqueness of the first two sections were doubtless intended to startle the ordinary listener. The composer and his fellow members of the much discussed group of "Six" have set out to be original at all costs. They say as much themselves.

Yet, behind all the freakishness of the music, one can feel a genuine, even powerful, creative imagination groping toward new means of expression. If Milhaud would only forget his juvenile posing and be contented to compose without caring whether his music was startling or not he might achieve great things. The audience chuckled, one or two earnest souls had the sense and courage to hiss, and a few applauded vehemently.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was given a spirited but never subtle interpretation. The strong accents were overemphasized, the nuances in dynamics were ignored. The performance would have been admirable for a Haydn symphony, but Mozart is too delicate, too refined to be suited to so forthright and heavy handed a method as Mr Monteux'.

Dukas' popular scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," brilliantly played, brought an unusually interesting concert to a close. Next week the Franck symphony, Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung," a new piece by Ernest Bloch and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture conclude the season.

GLOBE-APR. 23.

AMAZING MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Milhaud's Daring Suite and Mason's Rhapsody Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

The audience which attends the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, on Friday afternoons, is perhaps less demonstrative than a Paris crowd of long-haired musicians, and yet there was a hiss or two when Darius Milhaud's composition, bearing the harmless title, "Second Orchestral Suite" was played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In Paris, when it was first performed, Oct. 24, 1920, there was such an uproar in the galleries that they had to put the disturbers out, but perhaps one hiss in Boston equals many in Paris. Anyhow, there was audible hissing, dead silence by a majority, joyous applause by a minority, among them a critic or two.

DARING AND ADROIT

Darius Milhaud was thus heard for the first time at these Symphony concerts. Works by him for smaller aggregations of instruments than those of the orchestra have been heard in Boston, but they have not seemed so remarkable, so upsetting, at least, as the music heard yesterday. Milhaud is the ring leader of a group of some six in Paris, a group which includes Eric Satie, a group which looks on Debussy and Ravel apparently as masters of an already bygone era.

It was Milhaud who composed the music, based on Brazilian tango tunes, for the one-act farce by Jean Cocteau, "Le Beouf sur le Toit," a human marionette farce which burlesqued dry America, in which a policeman is beheaded with an electric fan, and all performers wear big head masks.

Every Part Significant

Provided with the above information the writer expected nonsense in the music of Milhaud. He must confess that he likes this music very much. No fool could write it. The definiteness and certainty of it is felt all the time. It is not, however, music for the nursery or the too respectably inclined. Its humor if often Rabelaisan. Its originality is engrossing, its daring intoxicating. The potency of every motive is amazing, and only equalled by the potency and significance of every part of the orchestra. For every part of the orchestra is in itself alive, self-engrossed, as it often seems antagonistic to or careless of the other instrument. Yet there is relation. There is basic bombogeneity. Things go sailing along in several keys at the same time. These several keys keep each their parallel distance to each other, the various instrumental groups retaining, as it were, each an individual orbit of its own, while preserving its tonal distance from each of the other groups.

This sounds fantastical, nevertheless it is true. And Milhaud's humor is enough to make the tears roll down your cheeks. Elsewhere a sigh or a howl turns into a laugh. There is often the sensation felt in reading cerain tales of de Maupassant or the Russians, reading which tales you choke, not knowing whether to collapse in laughter or dissolve in grief.

Mr. Mason's Rhapsody

Another work was heard for the first time at this concert, and it did not lose interest even in the shadow of the sardonic, revolutionary genius of Milhaud. This was the "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" for orchestra, with pianoforte abbligato by Frank Stuart Mason of this city. He has been intrigued by Persian themes in a collection of Woollett themes which have served Mr. Mason as suggestions for other compositions. He has taken one of these as basis for his Rhapsody, which really smells of the East. At least the East of incense and legends.

This composer has a very keen and exotic sense of color. His music is positively sensorial, as some one once remarked of the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, saying that one tasted it on his tongue. The old Persian theme suggests to Mr. Mason sounds not explained in the text books. It sets his orchestra quivering with 100 old rhythms and haunting sonorities.

Composer at Piano

Some will say that the piece is too kaleisdoscopic, that it lacks sufficiency of outline, that occasionally a phrase creeps in not wholly congruous with the prevailing Orientalism of the work, and that there is modern French influence. With the last reservations we partially agree. For the rest—allowing for the fact that Mr. Mason is a young man yet to wholly reveal himself—is it not time that a composer confidently follow his fancy? Does a Persian melody ask for a form after accepted models? We would not have it so. We think the fantastic color and design of this score delightful. It shows, too, Mr. Mason's admirable technical grounding in his art, his intinct for orchestral timbres, his fancy which carries him far from the junction of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues.

The composer played the piano part and was called from the orchestra to acknowledge the applause. Let us be thankful for an American and a Bostonian whose imagination is not confined to his village square.

These compositions made the middle of an exhilarating programme. But the opening performance of Mozart's C-major symphony—of all works to precede such music as that of Mason and Milhaud—cannot be forgotten. It was one of the finest we ever heard. The justness of the tempi, the tonal beauty of the orchestra, the Mozart feeling, could hardly have been excelled, though they were fully equalled in technical brilliance by the wonderful interpretation of Milhaud's music and the fantasy of Mr. Mason.

The concluding performance of Dukas' crackling scherzo, composed only yesterday, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after Goethe's poem, was also a triumph for Mr Monteux and his men. But how old and commonplace was this music, too, by the side of Milhaud!

SYMPHONY FINANCES

Deficit This Season $131,000 or $50,000 Above Sum Guaranteed—Need of $3,000,000 Fund Set Forth

Owing to raises in the cost of the players' salaries, to [illegible] in travelling expenses, and [illegible] affecting the existence and [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is this season a deficit of [illegible] above the sum guaranteed to [illegible] deficits of the orchestra, which [illegible] be met. Nor will the existence of [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra be [illegible] until it has a guarantee fund of [illegible]000,000, of which it has now abo[illegible] $150,000 subscribed.

These and other things are explained in the trustees' report delivered in the form of a circular letter sent to Symphony subscribers yesterday. This report sets forth the finances of the Boston Symphony since Major Higginson relinquished control of its destines at the end of the season of 1917-18, and the future problems confronting the musical organization which Pierre Monteux, the present conductor, has brought back to the state of phenomenal efficiency which existed prior to the war.

It is shown in this report that the deficit for the season of 1918-19 was $93,000. This was paid by about 100 guarantors. The deficit for the following season was $83,000, paid by the same guarantors. For the current season the deficit is $131,000, this sum exceeding by a round $50,000 the pledges of the guarantors. Their private guarantees, moreover, have but one year more to run. The trustees, who wisely refrained from asking general public assistance during the period of the war, have now come forward and put the case squarely before the people of Boston, who are asked to contribute in greater numbers and greater amounts to the maintainence of the Boston Symphony.

[illegible] to be $131,289. The latter amount, large as it is, is less than the deficits commonly said to exist in the three symphony orchestras in New York, each of which is supposed to run from $200,000 to $300,000 behind receipts each season.

Increases in salaries, amounting to over $80,000, are chiefly responsible for the great increase in the deficit this year. The following financial statement gives for the first time full information about the finances of the orchestra.

RECEIPTS

	1919-20	*1920-21
Boston concerts	$252,214.16	$291,432.69
All other concerts	149,312.02	113,385.00
Programs	36,471.81	36,159.55
Miscellaneous	1,452.07	350.00
	439,450.06	441,527.24
Symphony Hall rentals	83,150.64	78,000.00
	522,600.70	519,527.24
Deficit	54,931.83	131,289.23
	577,532.53	650,816.47

EXPENSES

	1919-20	*1920-21
Orchestra salaries	$229,748.14	$300.298.67
General salaries	26,140.00	37.405.11
Programs	36,583.52	30,339.30
Rentals and other expenses, Boston Symphony and Pop concerts	78,374.62	87,033.84
Expenses, all other concerts	109,940.56	97,550.01
New music, insurance, miscellaneous	8,293.88	18,846.61
	489,080.72	571,473.54
Symphony Hall—Heat, light, maintenance, interest, etc.	88,451.81	79,342.93
	577,532.53	650,816.47

*Partly estimated.

The receipts totals for 1918-19 were: Concerts, programs and miscellaneous, $341,208.18; hall rentals, $73,498.82. The expenses for that season totaled $508,029.99 of which $194,828.76 (the largest item) went for salaries. The deficit for 1918-19 was $93,322.99.

[illegible] APR. 23

SYMPHONY HAS BIG DEFICIT

Orchestra in Arrears for $131,289 Despite $39,000 Increase in Receipts

By FRED J. McISAAC,
Dramatic Editor.

With Commendable candor the trustees of the Boston Symphony have opened the books of the orchestra and informed the public just what it costs to operate that institution, and how much the costs have exceeded the deficit during the past three years.

These figures are startling in some respects, and in others rather to be expected. The salaries of the orchestra have increased 50 per cent. in two seasons. The receipts from concerts and other sources have increased about 25 per cent. There is a deficit this year of $131,289.23. This is fifty thousand more than the guarantee fund provided for such occasions, and somebody has to dig up the balance.

RECEIPTS SHOW INCREASE.

The receipts from the concerts in Boston show an increase of about $39,000 over last year, due largely to the increase in the price of seats in this city. Receipts in other cities show a sharp falling off from last season of $35,000, this, I presume, despite an increase in the price of seats.

The trustees themselves are considerably to blame for the big falling off in receipts from concerts on tour. They bungled the strike of musicians last Spring, got the orchestra about a million dollars' worth of undesirable publicity, and finally increased musicians' salaries about as much as the musicians asked in the first place.

The Boston Orchestra has always been successful on tour, but the departure of about thirty men in a body from the organization, and its going to New York, Philadelphia and other cities with only sixty-five players gave its prestige outside Boston a body blow from which it has not yet recovered.

NEED GREAT CONDUCTOR.

Their retention of Mr. Monteux as conductor, despite the fact that he had no standing anywhere outside this city, and was not even considered a good conductor in many quarters, had an awful lot to do with the decline of the orchestra's popularity abroad.

Mr. Monteux is a good conductor, no doubt of that, but not a great one, and when such men as Toscanini, Mendelberg, Stokowsky, Bodansky and Stock are conducting orchestras in other cities, the Boston Symphony is simply outweighed.

However, we are in this pickle, and there is only one way to get out of it. The trustees are courageously going into their own pockets to support music in Boston. Their public spirit is beyond question, and they must have learned a lesson as a result of the catastrophe of last season.

Fortunately in William J. Brennan they have a first-class manager who understands the music business, who has three times saved the orchestra since the war first disrupted it, and who can still restore it to its former prestige with proper support and authority.

Boston must retain its orchestra, if by no other way then by the pennies of the school children.

COULD AVOID DEFICIT.

The trustees must learn the first principle of showmanship; that when you begin to economize upon a show you are lost. The greatest and most expensive conductor in the world [illegible] the cheapest conductor they can engage. The finest and most expensive instrumentalists are the ones [illegible] will vanquish the annual deficit. [illegible] trustees must realize that what [illegible] Boston may not suit other [illegible]

[121.]

The Disturber of the Peace

(Photograph by The Musical Courier)

Darius Milhaud, Parisian

Whose Bold and Brave Orchestral Suite Was Played for the First Time in America at the Symphony Concert Yesterday

TRANS. APR. 23.

23D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Delightful Performance of "Jupiter" Symphony Is Given

MILHAUD SUITE IS INTRODUCED

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, "Jupiter" symphony; Stuart Mason, Rhapsody on a Persian Air (first performance); Milhaud, orchestral Suite, No. 2 (first performance in America); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after Goethe).

There was a delightful performance of Mozart's Symphony. Especially noteworthy was the manner in which the Andante was sung, while the Finale, which still excites admiration for the marvellous skill shown in the construction, was played with inimitable clearness, sense of proportion in the treatment of the voices, and a brilliance that is now as characteristic of this orchestra as is its euphony.

Mr. Stuart Mason's marked ability was recognized some months ago when his composition for violoncellos was brought out at a concert of the Boston Musical Association. It is not extravagant to say that his Rhapsody on a Persian Air entrances by beauty that is inherent and not merely suggested by the exotic air, which serves as the theme for the many-colored improvisation. Mr. George Moore said in his arrogant, if not impudent, "Confessions of a Young Man," that Thomas Hardy chose country subjects to show how jolly country he could be. Mr. Mason does not attempt to be more Persian than the Persians, nor does he try to portray the Orient in a composition comparatively short. The air itself is certainly oriental, but he does not therefore endeavor to improvise as a Persian might be supposed to do; he improvises as a thoroughly-grounded musician, who, in addition to his technical equipment, is endowed with that rare gift, imagination. Nor does he rely on ear-tickling or surprising use of instruments in combination; his music has substance, as well as "atmosphere," a word abhorred by purists when employed in this connection. The Rhapsody was warmly received by the audience, and Mr. Mason, who played the obbligato piano part, was heartily applauded.

We remember that when Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was first performed at a Symphony concert in Boston, it shocked the hearers. A leading critic did not hesitate to characterize Strauss as a madman. We remember that when Cesar Franck's Symphony was first played at a Symphony concert in Boston, Mr. Gericke was reproached for putting it on a program, and the writer of one indignant letter described the symphony as "immoral." What will be the fate of Milhaud's Suite? Mr. Monteux was courageous in producing it, but we thank him for acquainting us with the work of a man who is the subject of hot discussion. The orchestra showed courage in playing the music. One might add that the audience showed courage in hearing it to the end. Many of the pages in three of the movements were undoubtedly cacophonic, as we all now understand cacophony, but there is method in the madness of Milhaud, if he is really the insane one, and not the hearer. Even in these defiant pages there are moments that compel respect. One of his admirers has said that he wished in one movement to parody the classic fugue. Parodies in music are usually dull, not humorous. This fugue seemed not only dull, but disagreeable. On the other hand, there is genuine beauty in the Pastorale and the Nocturne. The objection to the Suite, if the question of cacophony be waived, is that in its best estate it is characterized chiefly by cleverness, and cleverness in art is not the highest quality. The audience behaved remarkably well during the ordeal, and was the better prepared to enjoy the superb performance of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the season, is as follows: Franck, "Symphony in D minor;" Bloch, "Winter—Spring" (first time here); Strauss, 'Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

HERALD - APR. 23

SYMPHONY DEFICIT ABOUT $131,289

Trustees of the Orchestra Appeal for Fund

Guarantee Desired of $150,000 a Year for Three Years

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday to the subscribers to the concerts by means of a slip inserted in the programs that the deficit for the current season will exceed by no less than $50,000 the amount of the existing guarantee fund. They appeal to the public for subscriptions to meet this present deficit and to provide for the next three season a guarantee of $150,000 per annum.

They point out that when the late Maj Higginson, founder of the orchestra, announced at the close of the season of 1917-18 his inability to continue to support it, the burden was assumed privately by about 100 guarantors, who pledged $83,000 a year for three years, ending this season.

The deficit for 1918-19 was $93,322; for 1919-20, $54,931, and for the current season it is expected to be $131,289. The latter amount, large as it is, is less than the deficits commonly said to exist in the three symphony orchestras in New York, each of which is supposed to run from $200,000 to $300,000 behind receipts each season.

Increases in salaries, amounting to over $80,000, are chiefly responsible for the great increase in the deficit this year. The following financial statement gives for the first time full information about the finances of the orchestra.

RECEIPTS

	1919-20	*1920-21
Boston concerts	$252,214.16	$291,432.69
All other concerts	149,312.02	113,385.00
Programs	36,471.81	36,159.55
Miscellaneous	1,452.07	550.00
	439,450.06	441,527.24
Symphony Hall rentals	83,150.64	78,000.00
	522,600.70	519,527.24
Deficit	54,931.83	131,289.23
	577,532.53	650,816.47

EXPENSES

	1919-20	*1920-21
Orchestra salaries	$229,748.14	$300.298.67
General salaries	26,140.00	37.405.11
Programs	36,583.52	30,339.30
Rentals and other expenses, Boston Symphony and Pop concerts	78,374.62	87,033.84
Expenses, all other concerts	109,940.56	97,550.01
New music, insurance, miscellaneous	8.293.88	18,846.61
	489,080.72	571,473.54
Symphony Hall—Heat, light, maintenance, interest, etc	88,451.81	79,342.93
	577,532.53	650,816.47

*Partly estimated.

The receipts totals for 1918-19 were: Concerts, programs and miscellaneous, $341,208.18; hall rentals, $73,498.82. The expenses for that season totaled $508,029.99 of which $194,828.76 (the largest item) went for salaries. The deficit for 1918-19 was $93,322.99.

MASON IN OWN PIECE AT THE SYMPHONY

Milhaud, Mozart and Dukas Complete the Concert

Large Gathering Follows Music at the Art Museum

Stuart Mason played the piano part in his own "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" at yesterday's Symphony concert. The composer-pianist was warmly applauded at the end of what proved to be an unusually imaginative and stimulating American composition. It is based on a Persian tune to be found in Woollett's "History of Music," a plaintive Oriental melody. Mr Mason has treated his theme sympathetically, with no display of contrapuntal erudition.

The other novelty was Milhaud's "Second Suite," which caused the police to be called in to quell a riot when it was first performed in Paris last Fall. The willful discords, the rather labored grotesqueness of the first two sections were doubtless intended to startle the ordinary listener. The composer and his fellow members of the much discussed group of "Six" have set out to be original at all costs. They say as much themselves.

Yet, behind all the freakishness of the music, one can feel a genuine, even powerful, creative imagination groping toward new means of expression. If Milhaud would only forget his juvenile posing and be contented to compose without caring whether his music was startling or not he might achieve great things. The audience chuckled, one or two earnest souls had the sense and courage to hiss, and a few applauded vehemently.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was given a spirited but never subtle interpretation. The strong accents were overemphasized, the nuances in dynamics were ignored. The performance would have been admirable for a Haydn symphony, but Mozart is too delicate, too refined to be suited to so forthright and heavy handed a method as Mr Monteux'.

Dukas' popular scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," brilliantly played, brought an unusually interesting concert to a close. Next week the Franck symphony, Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung," a new piece by Ernest Bloch and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture conclude the season.

GLOBE - APR. 23.

AMAZING MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Milhaud's Daring Suite and Mason's Rhapsody Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

The audience which attends the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, on Friday afternoons, is perhaps less demonstrative than a Paris crowd of long-haired musicians, and yet there was a hiss or two when Darius Milhaud's composition, bearing the harmless title, "Second Orchestral Suite" was played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In Paris, when it was first performed, Oct. 24, 1920, there was such an uproar in the galleries that they had to put the disturbers out, but perhaps one hiss in Boston equals many in Paris. Anyhow, there was audible hissing, dead silence by a majority, joyous applause by a minority, among them a critic or two.

DARING AND ADROIT

Darius Milhaud was thus heard for the first time at these Symphony concerts. Works by him for smaller aggregations of instruments than those of the orchestra have been heard in Boston, but they have not seemed so remarkable, so upsetting, at least, as the music heard yesterday. Milhaud is the ring leader of a group of some six in Paris, a group which includes Eric Satie, a group which looks on Debussy and Ravel apparently as masters of an already bygone era.

It was Milhaud who composed the music, based on Brazilian tango tunes, for the one-act farce by Jean Cocteau, "Le Beouf sur le Toit," a human marionette farce which burlesqued dry America, in which a policeman is beheaded with an electric fan, and all performers wear big head masks.

Every Part Significant

Provided with the above information the writer expected nonsense in the music of Milhaud. He must confess that he likes this music very much. No fool could write it. The definiteness and certainty of it is felt all the time. It is not, however, music for the nursery or the too respectably inclined. Its humor if often Rabelaisan. Its originality is engrossing, its daring intoxicating. The potency of every motive is amazing, and only equalled by the potency and significance of every part of the orchestra. For every part of the orchestra is in itself alive, self-engrossed, as it often seems antagonistic to or careless of the other instrument. Yet there is relation. There is basic bombogeneity. Things go sailing along in several keys at the same time. These several keys keep each their parallel distance to each other, the various instrumental groups retaining, as it were, each an individual orbit of its own, while preserving its tonal distance from each of the other groups.

This sounds fantastical, nevertheless it is true. And Milhaud's humor is enough to make the tears roll down your cheeks. Elsewhere a sigh or a howl turns into a laugh. There is often the sensation felt in reading cerain tales of de Maupassant or the Russians, reading which tales you choke, not knowing whether to collapse in laughter or dissolve in grief.

Mr. Mason's Rhapsody

Another work was heard for the first time at this concert, and it did not lose interest even in the shadow of the sardonic, revolutionary genius of Milhaud. This was the "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" for orchestra, with pianoforte abbligato by Frank Stuart Mason of this city. He has been intrigued by Persian themes in a collection of Woollett themes which have served Mr. Mason as suggestions for other compositions. He has taken one of these as basis for his Rhapsody, which really smells of the East. At least the East of incense and legends.

This composer has a very keen and exotic sense of color. His music is positively sensorial, as some one once remarked of the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, saying that one tasted it on his tongue. The old Persian theme suggests to Mr. Mason sounds not explained in the text books. It sets his orchestra quivering with 100 old rhythms and haunting sonorities.

Composer at Piano

Some will say that the piece is too kaleisdoscopic, that it lacks sufficiency of outline, that occasionally a phrase creeps in not wholly congruous with the prevailing Orientalism of the work, and that there is modern French influence. With the last reservations we partially agree. For the rest—allowing for the fact that Mr. Mason is a young man yet to wholly reveal himself—is it not time that a composer confidently follow his fancy? Does a Persian melody ask for a form after accepted models? We would not have it so. We think the fantastic color and design of this score delightful. It shows, too, Mr. Mason's admirable technical grounding in his art, his intinct for orchestral timbres, his fancy which carries him far from the junction of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues.

The composer played the piano part and was called from the orchestra to acknowledge the applause. Let us be thankful for an American and a Bostonian whose imagination is not confined to his village square.

These compositions made the middle of an exhilarating programme. But the opening performance of Mozart's C-major symphony—of all works to precede such music as that of Mason and Milhaud—cannot be forgotten. It was one of the finest we ever heard. The justness of the tempi, the tonal beauty of the orchestra, the Mozart feeling, could hardly have been excelled, though they were fully equalled in technical brilliance by the wonderful interpretation of Milhaud's music and the fantasy of Mr. Mason.

The concluding performance of Dukas' crackling scherzo, composed only yesterday, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after Goethe's poem, was also a triumph for Mr Monteux and his men. But how old and commonplace was this music, too, by the side of Milhaud!

SYMPHONY FINANCES

Deficit This Season $131,000 or $50,000 Above Sum Guaranteed—Need of $3,000,000 Fund Set Forth

Owing to raises in the cost of the players' salaries, to increases in travelling expenses and other affecting the existence and acti of the Boston Symphony Orche there is this season a deficit of $50,0 above the sum guaranteed to me deficits of the orchestra, which mu be met. Nor will the existence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra be secure until it has a guarantee fund of $3,-000,000, of which it has now about $150,000 subscribed.

These and other things are explained in the trustees' report delivered in the form of a circular letter sent to Symphony subscribers yesterday. This report sets forth the finances of the Boston Symphony since Major Higginson relinquished control of its destines at the end of the season of 1917-18, and the future problems confronting the musical organization which Pierre Monteux, the present conductor, has brought back to the state of phenomenal efficiency which existed prior to the war.

It is shown in this report that the deficit for the season of 1918-19 was $93,000. This was paid by about 100 guarantors. The deficit for the following season was $83,000, paid by the same guarantors. For the current season the deficit is $131,000, this sum exceeding by a round $50,000, the pledges of the guarantors. Their private guarantees, moreover, have but one year more to run. The trustees, who wisely refrained from asking general public assistance during the period of the war, have now come forward and put the case squarely before the people of Boston, who are asked to contribute in greater numbers and greater amounts to the maintainence of the Boston Symphony.

APR. 23

SYMPHONY HAS BIG DEFICIT

Orchestra in Arrears for $131,289 Despite $39,000 Increase in Receipts

By FRED J. McISAAC,
Dramatic Editor.

With Commendable candor the trustees of the Boston Symphony have opened the books of the orchestra and informed the public just what it costs to operate that institution, and how much the costs have exceeded the deficit during the past three years.

These figures are startling in some respects, and in others rather to be expected. The salaries of the orchestra have increased 50 per cent. in two seasons. The receipts from concerts and other sources have increased about 25 per cent. There is a deficit this year of $131,289.23. This is fifty thousand more than the guarantee fund provided for such occasions, and somebody has to dig up the balance.

RECEIPTS SHOW INCREASE.

The receipts from the concerts in Boston show an increase of about $39,000 over last year, due largely to the increase in the price of seats in this city. Receipts in other cities show a sharp falling off from last season of $35,000, this, I presume, despite an increase in the price of seats.

The trustees themselves are considerably to blame for the big falling off in receipts from concerts on tour. They bungled the strike of musicians last Spring, got the orchestra about a million dollars' worth of undesirable publicity, and finally increased musicians' salaries about as much as the musicians asked in the first place.

The Boston Orchestra has always been successful on tour, but the departure of about thirty men in a body from the organization, and its going to New York, Philadelphia and other cities with only sixty-five players gave its prestige outside Boston a body blow from which it has not yet recovered.

NEED GREAT CONDUCTOR.

Their retention of Mr. Monteux as conductor, despite the fact that he had no standing anywhere outside this city, and was not even considered a good conductor in many quarters, had an awful lot to do with the decline of the orchestra's popularity abroad.

Mr. Monteux is a good conductor, no doubt of that, but not a great one, and when such men as Toscanini, Mendelberg, Stokowsky, Bodansky and Stock are conducting orchestras in other cities, the Boston Symphony is simply outweighed.

However, we are in this pickle, and there is only one way to get out of it. The trustees are courageously going into their own pockets to support music in Boston. Their public spirit is beyond question, and they must have learned a lesson as a result of the catastrophe of last season.

Fortunately in William J. Brennan they have a first-class manager who understands the music business, who has three times saved the orchestra since the war first disrupted it, and who can still restore it to its former prestige with proper support and authority.

Boston must retain its orchestra, if by no other way then by the pennies of the school children.

COULD AVOID DEFICIT.

The trustees must learn the first principle of showmanship; that when you begin to economize upon a show you are lost. The greatest and most expensive conductor in the world is the cheapest conductor they can engage. The finest and most expensive instrumentalists are the ones who will vanquish the annual defict. The trustees must realize that what suits other cities Boston may not suit deficit of $60,0 ssed to meet tra, which must

the existence of the Orchestra be secure guarantee fund of $3.- h it has now about ted.
other things are ex-
the trustees' report delivform of a circular letter symphony subscribers yesterreport sets forth the
the Boston Symphony
Higginson relinquished its destines at the end of of 1817-18, and the future confronting the musical or-which Pierre Monteux, the nductor, has brought back te of phenomenal efficiency
isted prior to the war.
own in this report that the
the season of 1918-19 was
This was paid by about 100
rs. The deficit for the fol-season was $83,000, paid by guarantors. For the curn the deficit is $131,000, this eding by a round $50,000, the f the guarantors. Their pri-rantees, moreover, have but more to run. The trustees, ly refrained from asking public assistance during the
the war, have now come for-put the case squarely before e of Boston, who are asked bute in greater numbers and amounts to the maintainence
oston Symphony.

APR. 23

PHONY HAS
IG DEFICIT

tra in Arrears for $131,- espite $39,000 Increase in Receipts

y FRED J. McISAAC,
Dramatic Editor.

ommendable candor the trusthe Boston Symphony have the books of the orchestra
rmed the public just what it operate that institution, and ch the costs have exceeded cit during the past three figures are startling in some

, and in others rather to be
t. The salaries of the or-have increased 50 per cent. in sons. The receipts from con-nd other sources have in-about 25 per cent. There is this year of $131,289.23. This thousand more than the ee fund provided for such oc-and somebody has to dig up ance.

PTS SHOW INCREASE.

eceipts from the concerts in show an increase of about over last year, due largely ncrease in the price of seats city. Receipts in other cities sharp falling off from last of $35,000, this, I presume, an increase in the price of rustees themselves are consido blame for the big falling ceipts from concerts on tour.

ngled the strike of musicians ing, got the orchestra about a dollars' worth of undesirable
y, and finally increased musialaries about as much as the s asked in the first place.
oston Orchestra has always ccessful on tour, but the deof about thirty men in a body
e organization, and its going York, Philadelphia and other with only sixty-five players s prestige outside Boston a w from which it has not yet
d.

REAT CONDUCTOR.

retention of Mr. Monteux as or, despite the fact that he standing anywhere outside
, and was not even considered conductor in many quarters, awful lot to do with the de-
the orchestra's popularity

Monteux is a good conductor,
t of that, but not a great one,
en such men as Toscanini,
erg, Stokowsky, Bodansky ck are conducting orchestras cities, the Boston Symphony
y outweighed.
ver, we are in this pickle, and only one way to get out of it.
stees are courageously going eir own pockets to support n Boston. Their public spirit d question, and they must rned a lesson as a result of strophe of last season.
ately in William J. Brennan e a first-class manager who nds the music business, who e times saved the orchestra war first disrupted it, and still restore it to its former with proper support and au-must retain its orchestra,

other way than by the penschool children.

G DEFICIT.

must learn the first showmanship; that when conomize upon a show
The greatest and most or in the world is conductor they can end most expensive
the ones who deficit. Th

---

l if it is necessary to ies than Boston during the season ese cities must be carefully condered.

A first-class advertising man with a free hand could put the Boston Symphony Orchestra forever beyond the fear of a deficit, for its name is still a trademark of excellence, and its decline could be easily checked.

AMER. APR. 22.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Massachusetts — At the twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the following program was presented on Friday afternoon: Mozart, symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Stuart Mason, rhapsody on a Persian air for orchestra with pianoforte obbligato; Milhaud, Second Orchestral Suite; Dukas, Scherzo from "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Mr. Monteux, as conductor, brought all the skill and taste of his mastery of French music to the preparation of the Mozart symphony, with an exquisite performance as the result. The Scherzo from "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" glowed with new fires at this performance, so thoroughgoing had been Mr. Monteux's evident restudying of the piece. One is tempted to call the unified shimmering evocation in the first violins of the sound of a rising and falling wind nothing short of marvelous.

The Milhaud suite was at least amusing, but cannot fairly be considered as orchestral music. It is obviously designed to interpret the action of a play, Claudel's "Protée," and, heard apart from the grotesque-pathetic fable on which it is based, it often is unintelligible cacophony, reminding one of Ophelia's "Sweet bells jangled out of tune." The first three movements might be labeled "the authentic cadence stubbornly avoided." But beyond the statement of the obvious in terms of the unexpected, one can discover little in its design or execution from a mere hearing, though it was intermittently possible to imagine action that might go with the music, as a sort of substitute for a detailed program.

Mr. Mason's composition, played at these concerts for the first time, helped give the afternoon an element of sane musical delight to balance the distressing sounds Milhaud asked for in all but the conventional nocturne section of his suite. Not that Mr. Mason's music is a dry, academic product. But, for all its fine fervor, and it is truly a rhapsody, it has firmness of form throughout its six short movements. Within this clear structure the composer exercises the freedom of thematic improvisation in the piano part. Mr. Mason is no mere imitator or adapter in his use of oriental tone color; rather does one feel that he has assimilated typical musical idioms of the East and has given them forth again in terms of self-expression. He played the piano part in the true musicianly spirit of inspired impromptu, and at the end was again and again recalled by the applause.

MONITOR APR. 23

SYMPHONY'S DEFICIT FOR YEAR $131,289.23

A deficit of $131,289.23, exceeding by more than $75,000 that of last year, is shown in the financial report for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1920-21 season. It cost $650,816.47 to run the orchestra, and receipts totalled only $519,527.24.

The trustees of the orchestra attach to the report an appeal for public contributions to make up the deficit, and suggest that 1500 friends of the orchestra pledge annual subscriptions of $100 each to provide a fund which may be counted on regularly.

HERALD-APR. 23

It is interesting to note that at the first concert of the Pops in Symphony Hall on May 2, a waltz, "Reve au Champagne," by one Vollstedt, will be played: A truly seasonable selection. "Let me dream again: waking would be pain."

HERALD APR. 26

The Pops

Immediately after the last "serious" concert of the season in Symphony Hall, one week from tomorrow, the black seats will be removed from the floor and the more festive tables installed for the opening of the famous Pop concerts the following night, Monday, May 2. This night, and, in fact, the whole 36th season of the Pops, promise to be popular to an unprecedented degree.

The large symphony orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia, the most favored of all Pops leaders. The programs will combine high quality with genial popularity in such a way as to appeal to all tastes. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The program of the opening night follows: March from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture, "Tantalusqualen," Suppe; By Moonlight, Bendel; fantasia, "Eugene Onegin," Tschaikowsky; from the Petite Suite, En Bateau, Cortege, Debussy, Slavonic Dance No. 3, Dvorak; Spring, Grieg; finale, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; fantasia, "Mai Lescaut," Puccini; waltz, "Reve au Champagne," Vollstedt; "Procescession of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanoff.

---

Cesar Franck's great symphony in D minor will figure on the closing program of the present season of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Pierre Monteux will also conduct for the first time in Boston Ernest Bloch's "L'Hiver-Printempe" ("Winter-Spring"), by Ernest Bloch, the celebrated composer who, residing in New York, has found an enthusiastic reception for his latest works there this season. The closing numbers will be Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

REBORD-APR. 23

Unique Program by Symphony

Only three more Symphony concerts remain, that of tonight and the two next week. Yesterday afternoon the program presented by the orchestra was a unique one to say the least. The opening number was a treat. It was Mozart's C major Symphony "Jupiter" in four movements. This is one of Mozart's greatest achievements and as played yesterday was a delight.

The next number on the program was by Stuart Mason, well known in Boston as a musician of merit. This composition was a "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" for orchestra with piano obbligato. Of truly oriental flavor both in theme and rhythm, odd in orchestral design, it proved itself a work well worth hearing again. Enthusiastically accepted by the audience the applause, which Mr. Mason received, showed the warmth of appreciation felt for his efforts. He himself played the piano part.

Milhaud's "Second Suite for Orchestra" was given its first American presentation. This work is one of the oddest musical works heard in Boston for many a day. The composer was asked to write some music "nouveau-cirque" (new-circus) and that he accomplished this is most apparent.

The last number on the program was a Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas.

TRAV. APR. 23.

POP CONCERTS

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will begin a week from tomorrow. The orchestra of eighty players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. At tables and bar refreshments will be served as usual. The program of the opening night follows:

March from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen"	Suppe
By Moonlight	Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Onegin"	Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"	Debussy
a. En Rateau, b. Cortege;
Slavonic Dance No. 3	Dvorak
Spring	Grieg
Finale, "Scheher azade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne"	Vollstedt
procession of the Sardar	Ippolito-Ivanoff

ADVERTISER APR 2

The Perennial Pops

One of the most venerable institutions of Boston, and yet one of the freshest and most cheerful signs of spring in this city is the season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall which, following close upon the end of the regular concert season, will begin a week from tomorrow, May 2. Preparations now under way indicate a festive opening night and a season popular in every respect. The large Symphony Orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia, the most favored of all Pops leaders. The programmes will combine high quality with genial popularity in such a way as to appeal to all tastes. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The programme of the opening night follows:

March from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen"	Suppe
By Moonlight	Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Onegin"	Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"—a. En Bateau.
b. Cortege	Debussy
Slavonic Dance No. 3	Dvorak
Spring	Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lascaut"	Puccini
Waltz, "Revue au Champagne"	Vollstedt
Procession of the Sardar	Ippolito-Ivanoff

Closing Symphony Concerts

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given. Pierre Monteux has prepared a notable closing programme on which the principal work will be Cesar Franck's great symphony in D minor, "L'Hiver - Printemps" ("Winter-Spring"), by Ernest Bloch, the highly talented composer, whose latest works have been received in New York this season with much enthusiasm, will have its first performance in Boston. The closing numbers will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

POST-APR 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given. Mr. Monteaux has prepared a noteworthy closing program. The principal work will be Franck's great symphony in D minor, "L'Hiver-Printemps" ("Winter-Spring") by Ernest Bloch, the highly talented composer, whose latest works have been received in New York this season with much enthusiasm, will have its first performance in Boston. The closing numbers will be Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

THE PERENNIAL POPS

One of the most venerable institutions of Boston, yet one of the freshest and most cheerful signs of spring in this city, is the season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, which, following close upon the end of the regular concert season, will begin a week from tomorrow, May 2. Preparations now underway indicate a festive opening night and a season popular in every respect. The large Symphony orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Mr. Jacchia, the most favored of all Pops leaders. The programs will combine high quality with genial popularity in a way to appeal to all. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The program of the opening night follows:

March, from "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Overture "Tantalusqualen"	Suppe
By Moonlight	Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Oneigin"	Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"	Debussy
a. En Bateau b. Cortege
Slavonic Dance No. 3	Dvorak
Spring	Grieg
Finale "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne"	Vollsterd
Procession of the Sardar	Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

HERALD-APR. 24

The Perennial Pops

The season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall following close upon the end of the regular season, will begin a week from tomorrow, May 2. Preparations now under way indicate a festive opening night and a season popular in every respect. The orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. The programs will combine high quality with genial popularity in such a way as to appeal to all tastes. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The program of the opening night follows: March from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture "Tantalusqualen," Suppe; By Moonlight, Bendel; fantasia, "Eugene Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "Petite Suite," (a) En Bateau, (b) Cortege, Debussy; Slavonic Dance No. 3, Dvorak; Spring, Grieg; finale, "Scheher azade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; waltz, "Revue au Champagne," Vollstedt; Procession of the Sardar, Ippoltov Ivanoff.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 24th and last program. Symphony in D minor, Franck; "L'Hiver-Printemps," Bloch (first time in Boston); "Tod und Verklaerung," Strauss; and Overture to "Tannhaeuser," Wagner. There is no soloist.

Mr Monteux has wisely included a piece of Ernest Bloch, the original and interesting Swiss composer now resident in Cleveland, on this week's Symphony program.

GLOBE-APR. 24

The Symphony's Finances

The Symphony Orchestra is one of Boston's most highly valued institutions. It has contributed in no small measure to the reputation which this city enjoys, both at home and abroad, as a place where good music is known and appreciated. Throughout its long history this orchestra has maintained a standard which no other organization of its kind in this country was able to surpass, and, indeed, there were competent authorities who believed the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be unexcelled by even the best of those abroad. For this notable addition to the aesthetic resources of the community we were indebted to the good judgment and generosity of Maj. Henry L. Higginson. But now he is gone; the organization is under the necessity of either earning its own way or procuring an endowment; and the responsibility for its continuance falls directly upon our people as a whole.

The maintenance of the orchestra costs a great deal more than it did a few years ago. The trustees who are now in charge of the organization have striven to be economical, but the expenditures have outrun the receipts by a large margin. This is due, in the main, to the increased remuneration of the players, although other items of expense have also grown substantially. So the trustees are faced with the problem of not only providing for the deficit of the last year, but of securing a larger income for the future. Unless they are successful in this quest, the orchestra cannot be maintained at its present standard and Boston's pre-eminence as a musical centre will soon become a memory.

If lovers of music throughout the metropolitan district of Boston can be duly impressed with the gravity of the problem which now confronts the trustees of the orchestra we believe that they will respond with adequate generosity to the appeals which are now being made for an endowment. An institution so worthy and so intimately interwoven with the cultural interests of the community should not be thrown upon a precarious livelihood derived from box office receipts and annual subscriptions. It ought to be set on a solid financial basis and its perpetual excellence assured.

HERALD-APR 25

MILHAUD, MASON, MIROVITCH AND MISCELLANY

The Persian Rhapsody of a Bostonian Composer — Mme. Gauthier in Opulence of Voice and Also Aspect—Mr. Schmitz as Conquering Virtuoso—A Sonato of Mehul and an Interesting Russian—Dohnanyi Conducts — A New York Orchestra for Worcester

WITH the audience, Milhaud and his Orchestral Suite fared rather better at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening then they had on Friday afternoon. One or two movements again left hearers blank and dumb, but after others and at end of the whole piece, the applause was hearty enough to recompense, in degree, Mr. Monteux's courage and pains. It sufficed also, as on Friday, to drown scattered hisses reported from one or another quarter of the hall, but inaudible to all but neighboring ears. An American audience—the company at the Symphony Concerts is largely such—"manifesting" for and against a piece of music, as Parisians did over Milhaud's Suite, as they have done over many another debateable venture, is, of course, unthinkable. For better or for worse, we take calmer temperaments and serener manners into the concert-hall, accepting patiently and courteously whatever may be our lot there. Besides, exceeding few of us take music or the performance of music so seriously as to be vociferous—unless there are "extras" in prospect from favorite singer or virtuouso. After all, music is only one item in that elastic category in which we set everything that comes to public performance—from poetic tragedy to haymow farce—and call it with one of our pet words, a "show." And who takes a "show" seriously—or why? To do so hereabouts is almost "un-American."

To those who with favoring or unfavoring ear were hearing the Suite a second time, it brought surprisingly few new impressions. The more accustomed ear noted the ingenuity or the piquancy or both in some of Milhaud's instrumental details found, possibly, less hearty humor and more freakishness in the travestied Fugue; responded with fresh pleasure to the moodiness of the Pastoral, now gay as with rustic merry-making, then curiously, wistfully shadowed. Once and again, too, in the course of the Suite came hint of a temperamental freakishness in the composer—as of one who would snap out this or that modulation, throw in this or that jet of color for the sheer pleasure of tossing artistic heels in air. Most of us unless we were born incorrigibly "right thinking," know—and like—the impulse.

At both the concerts, the other novel piece upon the programme—Mr. Stuart Mason's Rhapsody on a Persian Theme—won the warmer plaudits. No doubt the presence of the composer, playing the piano-part and well within the good will of the audience as resident teacher and writer, swelled the clapping; but as evidently the music pleased all that heard. Mr. Mason found his theme in so unpromising a place as a history-book; perceived its pungent Oriental savor, its pleasing and fruitful quality; forthwith led it through six short divisions, like to free fanciful and expert improvisation. Each has distinct and well maintained character; each is aptly written alike for playing orchestra and listening audience. Every one falls into just place in the design of the whole; while throughout the composer diversifies conventional oriental rhythms, harmonies, timbres with agreeable little inventions of his own or with piquant detail more Parisian, perhaps, than Persian, but none the worse for that. Mr. Mason does not use a form—the rhapsody—until he can handle it plastically; does not choose a medium—the orchestra—until he is versed in it; does not write until he has something to say both prepared and pleasing. By so much he excels not a few of his brethren in the middle generation of American composers. Dr. Muck—and his audiences—were often the victims of German mediocrity. M. Rabaud and his were sometimes in like case with French. After the handiwork of Messrs. Bingham and Shepherd, Mr. Monteux's pitfall seemed to be American pieces of like quality. Now the opportune Mr. Mason saves the day.

Again, too—for the concert did not flag until it reached Dukas's threadbare "Sorcerer's Apprentice"—Mr. Monteux's Mozart provoked both agreement and dissent. The slow movement of the Jupiter Symphony might hardly be better played. The conductor's pace was at one with the beauty of the interwoven melody; he was elastic of progress, fine-fingered with ornament; while the orchestra—as though to seal its progress with eighteenth-century music—gave him a tone as transparent, euphonious and lightly running as the music itself. Here and there in the first Allegro and in the Minuet, these virtues in the conductor returned; but quite as often he kept the band in too full voice; cut periods too squarely; over-emphasized contrasts; laid too heavy a hand upon a light-paced and flowing music. Especially did this excess of sonority and mass overtake the Finale. The hearer may have it as "noble" a music as all the eulogists rolled together have called it; but it is also an exceedingly plastic music, almost flashing in and out of itself. It is at once full voiced and transparent, ardent yet fluid, and it was this changeful quality that the conductor missed. Half the fascination of Mozart is the intrinsic beauty of his melodies, and no conductor can much dim it. The other half is his incessant play upon them of light and shade. Therewith, for the conductor, suppleness is virtue.

H. T. P.

TRANS. APR. 25.

We are obliged to read the New York newspapers to find out the goings on in Boston. The Morning Telegraph of the 25th informed us that Mme. Nina Koshetz, "celebrated prima-donna," etc., "has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Co. to sing during their May festival."

As is well known, "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Co." has a strawberry festival every year, but it usually comes later than in May.

HERALD - APR. 28.

Strauss, Chaikovsky and Beethoven from the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge—Ruth Bernard for New and Well-Schooled Pianist

THOSE who attended the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening heard two pieces that have not been given at the regular subscription concerts in Boston since the days of Dr. Muck—the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The former was, of course, played at a recent concert for the Pension Fund, and Strauss's piece stands on Mr. Monteux's programme for this afternoon and tomorrow evening. It is an interesting, profitable and ofttimes disappointing experience to come back after a few years to music that when last heard powerfully stirred and affected. Through the first movement this Fifth Symphony still grips; the themes are salient, the treatment truly symphonic and the music has a propulsive power not too often encountered. But as for the once-famed Andante, it is only necessary to know that the opening theme has been fitted to religious words and included in a "community" song-book to realize where the music stands. The melody that follows is more truly expressive and when it holds sway the music is still eloquent. After that, what is there? The Waltz is trivial and there are odious things in the Finale—the "oom-pah," "oom-pah" of the trombones and tympani, and the reiterated scale passage so suggestive of the "wedding bells" refrain, cherished by the writers of popular songs. Of course there is no denying the power, fervor and passion of much of the Symphony, but how often it is marred by the triteness and vulgarity of the material.

After Chaikovsky's coarseness it was refreshing to hear the opening measures of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for the piano, which was placed between the symphony and the tone-poem. The classic restraint and temperate orchestration soothed—but only for a time. For this Concerto has aged—not from inherent banality but from inherent dryness. Yet it has its moments of charm, and the Andante of dialogue between the piano and orchestra is one of the most original and poetic of Beethoven's inspirations. Some day, perhaps, we are to be relieved of Beethoven's concertos, but for the present they are much with us. The solo part last evening was played—and beautifully—by Mr. Felix Fox. His performance characterized by technical finesse, tonal charm and musicianly insight.

Then came the long-awaited "Tod und Verklärung." For the most part it is still a mighty thing, nor should the composer bear all the blame for those moments when the music seemed to fall a little flat. Eloquent as was the performance as a whole there were times when a greater forcefulness, even brutality, was needed. Perhaps today with ampler space and greater confidence in music presumably new to him, Mr. Monteux will gain them. But the glorious unfolding and upbuilding of the motive of transfiguration was beautifully done, as was the lovely episode of childhood reminiscence. After all, but two composers, Wagner and Strauss, have realized the full scope and possibilities of the orchestra. Where else but in the music-dramas of the one and the tone-poems of the other is to be found such tonal might and splendor, and for the hearer an equal intoxication and excitement?

W. S. S.

TRANS. APR. 29

... and other ... ance and activ... Symphony Orchestra, ... on a deficit of $50,000 ... n guaranteed to meet ... the orchestra, which must ... or will the existence of the ... mphony Orchestra be secure ... s a guarantee fund of $3,- ... t which it has now about ... ubscribed.

... and other things are ex- ... n the trustees' report deliv- ... he form of a circular letter ... ymphony subscribers yester- ... his report sets forth the ... of the Boston Symphony ... jor Higginson relinquished ... f its destines at the end of ... on of 1917-18, and the future ... confronting the musical or- ... n which Pierre Monteux, the ... conductor, has brought back ... ate of phenomenal efficiency ... xisted prior to the war.

... hown in this report that the ... y the season of 1918-19 was ... This was paid by about 100 ... ors. The deficit for the fol- ... season was $83,000, paid by ... e guarantors. For the cur- ... son the deficit is $131,000, this ... eeding by a round $50,000, the ... of the guarantors. Their pri- ... arantees, moreover, have but ... more to run. The trustees, ... sely refrained from asking ... public assistance during the ... f the war, have now come for- ... d put the case squarely before ... ple of Boston, who are asked ... ibute in greater numbers and ... amounts to the maintainence ... Boston Symphony.

T. APR. 23

MPHONY HAS
IG DEFICIT

tra in Arrears for $131,- espite $39,000 Increase in Receipts

By FRED J. McISAAC,
Dramatic Editor.

Commendable candor the trus- ... the Boston Symphony have ... the books of the orchestra ... rmed the public just what it ... operate that institution, and ... ch the costs have exceeded ... icit during the past three

... figures are startling in some ... , and in others rather to be ... d. The salaries of the or- ... have increased 50 per cent. in ... sons. The receipts from con- ... nd other sources have in- ... about 25 per cent. There is ... this year of $131,289.23. This ... thousand more than the ... ee fund provided for such oc- ... and somebody has to dig up ... ance.

PTS SHOW INCREASE.

... eceipts from the concerts in ... show an increase of about ... over last year, due largely ... increase in the price of seats ... city. Receipts in other cities ... sharp falling off from last ... of $35,000, this, I presume, ... an increase in the price of

... ustees themselves are consid- ... to blame for the big falling ... eceipts from concerts on tour. ... ngled the strike of musicians ... ing, got the orchestra about a ... dollars' worth of undesirable ... y, and finally increased musi- ... alaries about as much as the ... ns asked in the first place. ... Boston Orchestra has always ... ccessful on tour, but the de- ... of about thirty men in a body ... e organization, and its going ... York, Philadelphia and other ... ith only sixty-five players ... s prestige outside Boston a ... w from which it has not yet ... d.

REAT CONDUCTOR.

... retention of Mr. Monteux as ... r, despite the fact that he ... standing anywhere outside ... , and was not even considered ... conductor in many quarters, ... awful lot to do with the de- ... the orchestra's popularity

... Monteux is a good conductor, ... t of that, but not a great one, ... hen such men as Toscanini, ... berg, Stokowsky, Bodansky ... ck are conducting orchestras ... r cities, the Boston Symphony ... ly outweighed.

... ver, we are in this pickle, and ... only one way to get out of it. ... stees are courageously going ... eir own pockets to support ... n Boston. Their public spirit ... nd question, and they must ... arned a lesson as a result of ... astrophe of last season. ... nately in William J. Brennan ... ve a first-class manager who ... ands the music business, who ... ee times saved the orchestra ... e war first disrupted it, and ... n still restore it to its former ... with proper support and au-

... n must retain its orchestra, ... o other way then by the pen- ... the school children.

AVOID DEFICIT.

... rustees must learn the first ... of showmanship; that when ... in to economize upon a show ... lost. The greatest and most ... e conductor in the world is ... uest conductor they can en- ... e finest and most expensive ... are the ones who ... annual deficit. The ... that what suits

... d if it is necessary to visit other ... ities than Boston during the season ... hese cities must be carefully con- ... idered.

A first-class advertising man with ... free hand could put the Boston ... Symphony Orchestra forever beyond ... the fear of a deficit, for its name is ... still a trademark of excellence, and ... its decline could be easily checked.

R. APR. 23.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Massachusetts — At the twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the following program was presented on Friday afternoon: Mozart, symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Stuart Mason, rhapsody on a Persian air for orchestra with pianoforte obbligato; Milhaud, Second Orchestral Suite; Dukas, scherzo from "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Mr. Monteux, as conductor, brought all the skill and taste of his mastery of French music to the preparation of the Mozart symphony, with an exquisite performance as the result. The scherzo from "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" glowed with new fires at this performance, so thoroughgoing had been Mr. Monteux's evident restudying of the piece. One is tempted to call the unified shimmering evocation in the first violins of the sound of a rising and falling wind nothing short of marvelous.

The Milhaud suite was at least amusing, but cannot fairly be considered as orchestral music. It is obviously designed to interpret the action of a play, Claudel's "Protée," and, heard apart from the grotesque-pathetic fable on which it is based, it often is unintelligible cacophony, reminding one of Ophelia's "Sweet bells jangled out of tune." The first three movements might be labeled "the authentic cadence stubbornly avoided." But beyond the statement of the obvious in terms of the unexpected, one can discover little in its design or execution from a mere hearing, though it was intermittently possible to imagine action that might go with the music, as a sort of substitute for a detailed program.

Mr. Mason's composition, played at these concerts for the first time, helped give the afternoon an element of sane musical delight to balance the distressing sounds Milhaud asked for in all but the conventional nocturne section of his suite. Not that Mr. Mason's music is a dry, academic product. But, for all its fine fervor, and it is truly a rhapsody, it has firmness of form throughout its six short movements. Within this clear structure the composer exercises the freedom of thematic improvisation in the piano part. Mr. Mason is no mere imitator or adapter in his use of oriental tone color; rather does one feel that he has assimilated typical musical idioms of the East and has given them forth again in terms of self-expression. He played the piano part in the true musicianly spirit of inspired impromptu, and at the end was again and again recalled by the applause.

MONITOR APR 23

SYMPHONY'S DEFICIT FOR YEAR $131,289.23

A deficit of $131,289.23, exceeding by more than $75,000 that of last year, is shown in the financial report for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1920-21 season. It cost $650,816.47 to run the orchestra, and receipts totalled only $519,527.24.

The trustees of the orchestra attach to the report an appeal for public contributions to make up the deficit, and suggest that 1500 friends of the orchestra pledge annual subscriptions of $100 each to provide a fund which may be counted on regularly.

HERALD-A

It is interesting to note that at the first concert of the Pops in Symphony Hall on May 2, a waltz, "Reve au Champagne," by one Vollstedt, will be played: A truly seasonable selection. "Let me dream again: waking would be pain."

HERALD APR

The Pops

Immediately after the last "serious" concert of the season in Symphony Hall, one week from tomorrow, the black seats will be removed from the floor and the more festive tables installed for the opening of the famous Pop concerts the following night, Monday, May 2. This night, and, in fact, the whole 36th season of the Pops, promise to be popular to an unprecedented degree.

The large symphony orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia, the most favored of all Pops leaders. The programs will combine high quality with genial popularity in such a way as to appeal to all tastes. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The program of the opening night follows: March from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture, "Tantalusqualen," Suppe; By Moonlight, Bendel; fantasia, "Eugene Onegin," Tschaikowsky; from the Petite Suite, En Bateau, Cortege, Debussy; Slavonic Dance No. 3, Dvorak; Spring, Grieg; finale, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; waltz, "Reve au Champagne," Vollstedt; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanoff.

Cesar Franck's great symphony in D minor will figure on the closing program of the present season of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Pierre Monteux will also conduct for the first time in Boston Ernest Bloch's "L'Hiver-Printempe" ("Winter-Spring"), by Ernest Bloch, the celebrated composer who, residing in New York, has found an enthusiastic reception for his latest works there this season. The closing numbers will be Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

RECORD APR. 23

Unique Program by Symphony

Only three more Symphony concerts remain, that of tonight and the two next week. Yesterday afternoon the program presented by the orchestra was a unique one to say the least. The opening number was a treat. It was Mozart's C major Symphony "Jupiter" in four movements. This is one of Mozart's greatest achievements and as played yesterday was a delight.

The next number on the program was by Stuart Mason, well known in Boston as a musician of merit. This composition was a "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" for orchestra with piano obbligato. Of truly oriental flavor both in theme and rhythm, odd in orchestral design, it proved itself a work well worth hearing again. Enthusiastically accepted by the audience the applause, which Mr. Mason received, showed the warmth of appreciation felt for his efforts. He himself played the piano part.

Milhaud's "Second Suite for Orchestra" was given its first American presentation. This work is one of the oddest musical works heard in Boston for many a day. The composer was asked to write some music "nouveau-cirque" (new-circus) and that he accomplished this is most apparent.

The last number on the program was a Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas.

TRAV. APR. 23.

POP CONCERTS

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will begin a week from tomorrow. The orchestra of eighty players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. At tables and bar refreshments will be served as usual. The program of the opening night follows:

March from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen"	Suppe
By Moonlight	Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Onegin"	Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"	Debussy
a. En Rateau, b, Cortege;
Slavonic Dance No. 3	Dvorak
Spring	Grieg
Finale, "Scheher azade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne"	Vollstedt
procession of the Sardar	Ippolito-Ivanoff

ADVERTISER APR 24

The Perennial Pops

One of the most venerable institutions of Boston, and yet one of the freshest and most cheerful signs of spring in this city is the season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall which, following close upon the end of the regular concert season, will begin a week from tomorrow, May 2. Preparations now under way indicate a festive opening night and a season popular in every respect. The large Symphony Orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia, the most favored of all Pops leaders. The programmes will combine high quality with genial popularity in such a way as to appeal to all tastes. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The programme of the opening night follows:

March from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen"	Suppe
By Moonlight	Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Onegin"	Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"—a. En Bateau. b. Cortege	Debussy
Slavonic Dance No. 3	Dvorak
Spring	Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lascaut"	Puccini
Waltz, "Revue au Champagne"	Vollstedt
Procession of the Sardar	Ippolito-Ivanoff

Closing Symphony Concerts

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given. Pierre Monteux has prepared a notable closing programme on which the principal work will be Cesar Franck's great symphony in D minor, "L'Hiver - Printemps" ("Winter-Spring"), by Ernest Bloch, the highly talented composer, whose latest works have been received in New York this season with much enthusiasm, will have its first performance in Boston. The closing numbers will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

POST-APR 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given. Mr. Monteux has prepared a noteworthy closing program. The principal work will be Franck's great symphony in D minor, "L'Hiver-Printemps" ("Winter-Spring") by Ernest Bloch, the highly talented composer, whose latest works have been received in New York this season with much enthusiasm, will have its first performance in Boston. The closing numbers will be Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

THE PERENNIAL POPS

One of the most venerable institutions of Boston, yet one of the freshest and most cheerful signs of spring in this city, is the season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, which, following close upon the end of the regular concert season, will begin a week from tomorrow, May 2. Preparations now underway indicate a festive opening night and a season popular in every respect. The largo Symphony orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Mr. Jacchia, the most favored of all Pops leaders. The programs will combine high quality with genial popularity in a way to appeal to all. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The program of the opening night follows:

March, from "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Overture "Tantalusqualen"	Suppe
By Moonlight	Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Oneigin"	Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"	Debussy
a. En Bateau b. Cortege
Slavonic Dance No. 3	Dvorak
Spring	Grieg
Finale "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne"	Vollsterd
Procession of the Sardar	Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

HERALD-APR 24

The Perennial Pops

The season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall following close upon the end of the regular season, will begin a week from tomorrow, May 2. Preparations now under way indicate a festive opening night and a season popular in every respect. The orchestra of 80 players will be conducted by Agide Jacchia. The programs will combine high quality with genial popularity in such a way as to appeal to all tastes. At the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony refreshments will be served as usual.

The program of the opening night follows: March from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture "Tantalusqualen," Suppe; By Moonlight, Bendel; fantasia, "Eugene Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "Petite Suite," (a) En Bateau, (b) Cortege, Debussy; Slavonic Dance No. 3, Dvorak; Spring, Grieg; finale, "Scheher azade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; waltz, "Revue au Champagne," Vollstedt; Procession of the Sardar, Ippoltov Ivanoff.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 24th and last program. Symphony in D minor, Franck: "L'Hiver-Printemps," Bloch (first time in Boston); "Tod und Verklaerung," Strauss; and Overture to "Tannhaeuser," Wagner. There is no soloist.

Mr Monteux has wisely included a piece of Ernest Bloch, the original and interesting Swiss composer now resident in Cleveland, on this week's Symphony program.

GLOBE-APR 24

The Symphony's Finances

The Symphony Orchestra is one of Boston's most highly valued institutions. It has contributed in no small measure to the reputation which this city enjoys, both at home and abroad, as a place where good music is known and appreciated. Throughout its long history this orchestra has maintained a standard which no other organization of its kind in this country was able to surpass, and, indeed, there were competent authorities who believed the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be unexcelled by even the best of those abroad. For this notable addition to the aesthetic resources of the community we were indebted to the good judgment and generosity of Maj. Henry L. Higginson. But now he is gone; the organization is under the necessity of either earning its own way or procuring an endowment; and the responsibility for its continuance falls directly upon our people as a whole.

The maintenance of the orchestra costs a great deal more than it did a few years ago. The trustees who are now in charge of the organization have striven to be economical, but the expenditures have outrun the receipts by a large margin. This is due, in the main, to the increased remuneration of the players, although other items of expense have also grown substantially. So the trustees are faced with the problem of not only providing for the deficit of the last year, but of securing a larger income for the future. Unless they are successful in this quest, the orchestra cannot be maintained at its present standard and Boston's pre-eminence as a musical centre will soon become a memory.

If lovers of music throughout the metropolitan district of Boston can be duly impressed with the gravity of the problem which now confronts the trustees of the orchestra we believe that they will respond with adequate generosity to the appeals which are now being made for an endowment. An institution so worthy and so intimately interwoven with the cultural interests of the community should not be thrown upon a precarious livelihood derived from box office receipts and annual subscriptions. It ought to be set on a solid financial basis and its perpetual excellence assured.

HERALD-APR 25

MILHAUD, MASON, MIROVITCH AND MISCELLANY

The Persian Rhapsody of a Bostonian Composer — Mme. Gauthier in Opulence of Voice and Also Aspect—Mr. Schmitz as Conquering Virtuoso—A Sonato of Mehul and an Interesting Russian—Dohnanyi Conducts — A New York Orchestra for Worcester

WITH the audience, Milhaud and his Orchestral Suite fared rather better at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening then they had on Friday afternoon. One or two movements again left hearers blank and dumb, but after others and at end of the whole piece, the applause was hearty enough to recompense, in degree, Mr. Monteux's courage and pains. It sufficed also, as on Friday, to drown scattered hisses reported from one or another quarter of the hall, but inaudible to all but neighboring ears. An American audience—the company at the Symphony Concerts is largely such—"manifesting" for and against a piece of music, as Parisians did over Milhaud's Suite, as they have done over many another debateable venture, is, of course, unthinkable. For better or for worse, we take calmer temperaments and serener manners into the concert-hall, accepting patiently and courteously whatever may be our lot there. Besides, exceeding few of us take music or the performance of music so seriously as to be vociferous—unless there are "extras" in prospect from favorite singer or virtuouso. After all, music is only one item in that elastic category in which we set everything that comes to public performance—from poetic tragedy to haymow farce—and call it with one of our pet words, a "show." And who takes a "show" seriously—or why? To do so hereabouts is almost "un-American."

To those who with favoring or unfavoring ear were hearing the Suite a second time, it brought surprisingly few new impressions. The more accustomed ear noted the ingenuity or the piquancy or both in some of Milhaud's instrumental details found, possibly, less hearty humor and more freakishness in the travestied Fugue; responded with fresh pleasure to the moodiness of the Pastoral, now gay as with rustic merry-making, then curiously, wistfully shadowed. Once and again, too, in the course of the Suite came hint of a temperamental freakishness in the composer—as of one who would snap out this or that modulation, throw in this or that jet of color for the sheer pleasure of tossing artistic heels in air. Most of us unless we were born incorrigibly "right thinking," know—and like—the impulse.

At both the concerts, the other novel piece upon the programme—Mr. Stuart Mason's Rhapsody on a Persian Theme—won the warmer plaudits. No doubt the presence of the composer, playing the piano-part and well within the good will of the audience as resident teacher and writer, swelled the clapping; but as evidently the music pleased all that heard. Mr. Mason found his theme in so unpromising a place as a history-book; perceived its pungent Oriental savor, its pleasing and fruitful quality; forthwith led it through six short divisions, like to fresh, fanciful and expert improvisation. Each has distinct and well maintained character; each is aptly written alike for playing orchestra and listening audience. Every one falls into just place in the design of the whole; while throughout the composer diversifies conventional oriental rhythms, harmonies, timbres with agreeable little inventions of his own or with piquant detail more Parisian, perhaps, than Persian, but none the worse for that. Mr. Mason does not use a form—the rhapsody—until he can handle it plastically; does not choose a medium—the orchestra—until he is versed in it; does not write until he has something to say both prepared and pleasing. By so much he excels not a few of his brethren in the middle generation of American composers. Dr. Muck—and his audiences—were often the victims of German mediocrity. Mr. Rabaud and his were sometimes in like case with French. After the handiwork of Messrs. Bingham and Shepherd, Mr. Monteux's pitfall seemed to be American pieces of like quality. Now the opportune Mr. Mason saves the day.

Again, too—for the concert did not flag until it reached Dukas's threadbare "Sorcerer's Apprentice"—Mr. Monteux's Mozart provoked both agreement and dissent. The slow movement of the Jupiter Symphony might hardly be better played. The conductor's pace was at one with the beauty of the interwoven melody; he was elastic of progress, fine-fingered with ornament; while the orchestra—as though to seal its progress with eighteenth-century music—gave him a tone as transparent, euphonious and lightly running as the music itself. Here and there in the first Allegro and in the Minuet, these virtues in the conductor returned; but quite as often he kept the band in too full voice; cut periods too squarely; over-emphasized contrasts; laid too heavy a hand upon a light-paced and flowing music. Especially did this excess of sonority and mass overtake the Finale. The hearer may have it as "noble" a music as all the eulogists rolled together have called it; but it is also an exceedingly plastic music, almost flashing in and out of itself. It is at once full voiced and transparent, ardent yet fluid, and it was this changeful quality that the conductor missed. Half the fascination of Mozart is the intrinsic beauty of his melodies, and no conductor can much dim it. The other half is his incessant play upon them of light and shade. Therewith, for the conductor, suppleness is virtue.

H. T. P.

TRANS APR 25.

We are obliged to read the New York newspapers to find out the goings on in Boston. The Morning Telegraph of the 25th informed us that Mme. Nina Koshetz, "celebrated prima-donna," etc., "has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Co. to sing during their May festival."

As is well known, "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Co." has a strawberry festival every year, but it usually comes later than in May.

HERALD - APR. 28.

Strauss, Chaikovsky and Beethoven from the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge—Ruth Bernard for New and Well-Schooled Pianist

THOSE who attended the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening heard two pieces that have not been given at the regular subscription concerts in Boston since the days of Dr. Muck—the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The former was, of course, played at a recent concert for the Pension Fund, and Strauss's piece stands on Mr. Monteux's programme for this afternoon and tomorrow evening. It is an interesting, profitable and ofttimes disappointing experience to come back after a few years to music that when last heard powerfully stirred and affected. Through the first movement this Fifth Symphony still grips; the themes are salient, the treatment truly symphonic and the music has a propulsive power not too often encountered. But as for the once-famed Andante, it is only necessary to know that the opening theme has been fitted to religious words and included in a "community" song-book to realize where the music stands. The melody that follows is more truly expressive and when it holds sway the music is still eloquent. After that, what is there? The Waltz is trivial and there are odious things in the Finale—the "oom-pah," "oom-pah" of the trombones and tympani, and the reiterated scale passage so suggestive of the "wedding bells" refrain, cherished by the writers of popular songs. Of course there is no denying the power, fervor and passion of much of the Symphony, but how often it is marred by the triteness and vulgarity of the material.

After Chaikovsky's coarseness it was refreshing to hear the opening measures of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for the piano, which was placed between the symphony and the tone-poem. The classic restraint and temperate orchestration soothed—but only for a time. For this Concerto has aged—not from inherent banality but from inherent dryness. Yet it has its moments of charm, and the Andante of dialogue between the piano and orchestra is one of the most original and poetic of Beethoven's inspirations. Some day, perhaps, we are to be relieved of Beethoven's concertos, but for the present they are much with us. The solo-part last evening was played—and beautifully—by Mr. Felix Fox. His performance characterized by technical finesse, tonal charm and musicianly insight.

Then came the long-awaited "Tod und Verklärung." For the most part it is still a mighty thing, nor should the composer bear all the blame for those moments when the music seemed to fall a little flat. Eloquent as was the performance as a whole there were times when a greater forcefulness, even brutality, was needed. Perhaps today with ampler space and greater confidence in music presumably new to him, Mr. Monteux will gain them. But the glorious unfolding and upbuilding of the motive of transfiguration was beautifully done, as was the lovely episode of childhood reminiscence. After all, but two composers, Wagner and Strauss, have realized the full scope and possibilities of the orchestra. Where else but in the music-dramas of the one and the tone-poems of the other is to be found such tonal might and splendor, and for the hearer an equal intoxication and excitement?

W. S. S.

TRANS APR. 29.

SYMPHONY ENDS ITS 40TH SEASON

Bloch's Tone Poems Played for the First Time in Boston

AUDIENCE SHOWED MARKED ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 40th season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Bloch, Two Poems for Orchestra, "Winter—Spring." Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Mr. Bloch's tone-poems were played for the first time in Boston. When they were performed last season in New York at a concert of the New Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Bloch gave the best possible description of them: "The title is sufficient, I think, to suggest to the audience the atmosphere I intended to create—so far as musical titles are able to represent the content of that language, inexpressible by words. 'Hiver' is sad and hopeless; 'Printenyss' is full of joy and hope. I was 24 when I wrote them." Mr. Bloch was born at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1880.) "They are a small part of my personality and of my youth. That is already far away in a past that will not come again. . . . They are neither 'Classical' nor 'Ultra-modern.' The only thing I can tell about them is that they were sincerely written and are the expression of an inward necessity." In other words these pieces were written before Mr. Bloch devoted his indisputable talent to expressing in music the longings, woes and aspirations, the fanatical zeal and the religious fervor of his race.

He certainly succeeded in creating the atmosphere of winter and that of spring in these two poems. They are written in a comparatively simple manner, and for this reason are the more effective. The melancholy mood and the dreariness of a winter landscape and winter's chill and nipping air are at once brought home to the hearer. The mood is maintained ingeniously, without undue elaboration. There is no vain attempt at photographic realism, the hearer looks out of the window; he is not plodding his way through snow and slush. The poem is short, but the impression made by it, by its simplicity and directness is durable. In admirable contrast is the suggestion of Spring, its fresh breezes, its awakening of life in Nature, its joy of birds, beasts and man. In this poem there is no attempt to portray a tumultuous spring, as one might strive to do with a great orchestra furnished with a battalion of percussion instruments. There is the Spring of the Elizabethan lyricists and of William Blake.

The other compositions were all familiar. How gloriously they were played! No wonder that the audience was enthusiastic to a degree seldom observed at an orchestral concert.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" does not wear so well as his "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan." The introduction now seems rather tedious, so that one is impatient for the music of fever and delirium, nor does Srtuass allow his hero to apologize gracefully in the manner of Charles II for being so long in dying. The most vital part of the tone poem is the preparation of the grand climax, the transfiguration, and this climax was so superbly reached by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra that the effect was overwhelming.

There are works and there are performances of them that are not to be described in words, nor should one toil in purple phrases to convey to him that did not hear the passion, the nobility, the grandeur of the work itself, or the splendor of the performance. Cesar Franck's symphony is one of the greatest achievements in the history of music since the first pipe was rudely fashioned, since the first man beat upon a drum. Never was the glory of this symphony, with its expression of restless foreboding, its questionings in doubt, its message of reassurance and consolation, its triumphant conclusion, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, the Alleluia of a great multitude, so fully revealed in Boston as it was in the concert of yesterday.

After the spirited and sonorous performance of the "Tanhaeuser" overture, there was a long-continued demonstration of enthusiasm.

The concert will be repeated tonight. A short review of the season with a few remarks about Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will be published in the Herald of tomorrow.

HERALD-APR.30.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

WARM LEAVE-TAKING ENDS THE SEASON

Conductor and Orchestra as the Work of the Year Has Developed Them—A Ripened Monteux and a Newly Risen Band Well on the Way to Old Perfections—Franck, Strauss and Wagner for the Afternoon in Music of Perennial Glories

ABOVE the usual yesterday, the final concert of the Symphony Orchestra in the current afternoon series was festal. As almost always [illegible] filled every seat in Symphony Hall; while, contrary to frequent custom, nearly every one remained to the end of the programme, even lingered thereafter. The applause that welcomed Mr. Monteux to his place, pitched the tune of the day. It was uncommonly hearty and sustained; it waxed longer and louder at the close of Franck's Symphony; it diminished not at all when the concert was done. Then, indeed, the listening company gave the conductor sincerest and warmest token of its regard. If ever an audience hastened homeward, it is the customary audience of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts. The mother (with daughters), who in the Harvard ballad of Class Day passionately seeks the "Pudding Spread," made not more speed than usually do the elect matrons, the attendant demoiselles, toward motor cars, tea-tables, engagements and pastimes. Yesterday, however, they lingered—stayed even until they had twice and thrice recalled the conductor and finally set him within his standing orchestra.

In moments of irritation over the reception of novel and highly individualized music, it is possible to believe this assembly of Friday afternoons timid and close-minded. Yet it has long perceived and yesterday it warmly appreciated the qualities that shine out of Mr. Monteux—his single-minded, single-hearted devotion to his work, and for the work's sake; his zeal for the broadest and the finest standards of the orchestra; his quickness and openness of mind; his catholic sympathies over the whole range of symphonic music and for the music of his own time most of all; his manifold eloquence in manifold performance, never declining into mediocrity, almost never falling into routine, usually revelation of piece in hand, time and again touching beauty, gaining power. Probably, too, at the back of the heads of this applauding company went the notion that at the end of the season of 1921, Mr. Monteux is an abler, more sensitive, more versatile conductor than he was at the beginning of the season of 1919. He is—by clear proof in his work; by clear impression, deepening the winter through, upon his hearers. No conductor may serve the Symphony Concerts and keep to the standards thereof and not deepen, broaden, refine in the process. It was the Monteux so amplified, so sensitized that the audience saluted yesterday.

No less good to hear was the warmth of this applauding company toward the orchestra itself. The clapping appreciably swelled when, at the close of Franck's Symphony, the conductor bade the players to their feet. When he did likewise, after the concert had ended with the Overture to "Tannhäuser," even cries and cheers arose—rarest of sounds within the sober precincts of the Symphony Concerts and from such a Bostonian audience. Seldom have there been like zest, like frank release of honest impulse in a usually prim self-conscious public—or with more reason. The orchestra is not yet the orchestra of the days when neither Europe nor America could match it; nor is it again the almost ideal orchestra that it then was—the more essential standard. As Mr. Monteux said himself the other day: "There is still much to be done." None the less from last October through the present April, progress toward the goal has never flagged. Again the band is a highly responsive instrument, collectively to the conductor and the music in hand, severally choir to choir and man to man. Again a hearty esprit du corps keeps it on edge to its work. Little by little it is re-achieving the gamut of tone that of old ran from force to finesse and knew every gradation between; regaining the old range of expression that answered to every composer, charactered each piece, summoned brightness or beauty or power or splendor at the conductor's will. The large, warm vigors, the fine precisions of the re-constituted band do not coarsen; while to them the work of the year has added plasticity, transparency, euphony of many-colored voice.

The strings, notably among the second violins, have regained sensitive and unified voice, smooth and shimmering, ardent and incisive, as many-toned as the music it would speak. Yet an additional violoncello or two would better balance the choir; while there is still need of a first viola to companion in quality Mr. Burgin of the violins and Mr. Bedetti of the violoncellos. The wind-choir is unexcelled in any American orchestra—even Mr. Stock's—and probably in any European. Mr. Laurent is master-flutist beyond any of his predecessors; Mr. Speyer at the English horn and too infrequently at the oboe, has added a signal talent to the orchestra; Mr. Laus with the bassoon, is peer to both. The clarinets are more debatable and upon their quality in the leisure of summer Mr. Monteux may advisedly ponder. Often he seeks the riches of tone that his six horn-players may yield the music. Once and again, the expert listener suspects that the first and the third among them have quite as much to do as is good for their mettle. Agreed that, in cost, able horn-players are articles of luxury and vertu. Yet why not add the two that have been missing from the desirable octet since the Higginsonian days ended? For the rest, Mr. Neumann at the kettle-drums and Mr. Holy and Mme. Delcourt at the harps speak weekly for themselves; Mr. Mager and the trumpets, Mr. Hampe and the trombones know the secrets both of mellowness and flare. A virtuoso of the tuba—for there can be and there has been in the orchestra such a player—it still lacks and again Mr. Monteux may advisedly consider betterment. It is a pity, too, for mere appearance's sake that another player should oscillate between the violas and the instruments of percussion. As for them they have deserved the opportunity that the conductor's fondness for ultra-modern music bestows upon them.

So man by man, choir by choir does the whole orchestra gradually renew the mettle of the old. A little more lightness and pliency and sensibility of shading when the elder music is in hand, a little more openness and suavity of tone when the voices are yet moving in mass, a little less muscularity and a deeper richness of tone in broad spread and upswelling climax and the end will be nearly gained. Already resiliency to rhythm, alertness to modulation and transition, color-sense in harmonic background have been reconquered. To these glories regained the new orchestra adds now a new and signal distinction of its own. For the first time in years, and especially in the string choir, it is a young orchestra. And youth or the spirit of youth is the strongest safeguard against routine and formula. It is only the truth to say that Mr. Monteux with the players working with him have so restored the band—not so much in his own image as in the image of its standards. Thank Heaven, they are not a "tradition." For they are still alive and quickening.

As usual at these final concerts, the programme for the most part traversed familiar pieces—Franck's Symphony; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration" Wagner's overture to his opera, "Tannhäuser." Fortunately for music, composer and hearers, Mr. Monteux had p by for two seasons this over-played Symphony in the days of Rabaud and Muc Again it came relatively fresh to co ductor, orchestra and hearers; and aga it stimulated all three by what now se transparent qualities. If ever there was a mystery in human understanding and appreciation of music, it is the obscurity, the abstruseness, the general "irregularity" with which this Symphony of Franck was of old reproached. The motivs whence it springs come clear to the ear; by unmistakable quality they touch and hold the imagination; again and again they recur to renew character and deepen impression. The form and progress of the music are as vivid and transparent—the long ascent, with occasional recession and recurring striving along the way—from shadow into radiance, out of brooding into gladness. At every turn, through each contrast, up and down gradation and modulation, musical structure and emotional content are as one; while harmonic and instrumental color seem as natural, inevitable vesture. Above all, the passion, the moods, the voice of the music are deeply and immediately human, almost universal. The wonder remains that any hearer could have wilfully misunderstood, obstinately resisted such music. For Franck's Symphony is like to Matthew Arnold's definition of poetry. In it are simplicity and strength, beauty and nobility.

Similarly, heard anew after superfluous war-time banishment Strauss's tone-poem remains a masterpiece in kind. Thus far the power that germinates, expands, intensifies and culminates into the uttermost splendors of tone, the measures of transfiguration abides the years. Again at their bidding come majesty and might and heavens opened. Still the measures wherein man fights for his faiths and ideals, his life according to his own living, ring with a knightly note unmatched outside the chivalric motiv in "Parsifal." Once more the misty passage of childhood memories flickering across the dying mind, wets the eyes with an ineffable beauty. Still do the stark drum-beats of Death the Merciless beat also upon the imagination. Throughout the tone-poem, indeed, goes for some of us and unflagging "the greater Strauss"—not merely the Strauss who is master of delineation in tones, who can mate inextricably and evenly formal progress with emotional and pictorial content, and still walk at ease and eloquently, whose palette glows with every harmonic and instrumental color, mixed with imagination; but the Strauss who for once has searched and known the heart and the will of man; who for once has quested toward the Divine Justice, who has penetrated deep into the strivings the faiths, the glories of man's living and who has charged a universal music as deeply with them. Few as yet may hear "Death and Transfiguration" unstirred.

But, but, whispers the neighboring youngster as Mr. Monteux, at the overture to "Tannhäuser," lifts his stick: "Here is 'old hat' indeed. Give the populace—and the horns—their fling." It is possible to be not so sure. For double and the lengthening years that Strauss's tone-poem has bided, Wagner's overture has endured the teeth of time; and after them all and through the thick accretions of popularity upon the pages, Mr. Lawrence Gilman may still write well and truly in the programme-book of the National Symphony Orchestra: "How much of the thrice-familiar music remains unstated. The wonderful opening measures; the exciting entrance of the Venusberg theme in the violas; the superb and passionate subject for the violins against which the 'cellos surge in mounting chromatic waves; the enticing song of the clarinet heard through tremolos of the muted strings; the magnificent and thrilling close—which, as Wagner blandly observed in his notes on the performing of 'Tannhäuser,' can make its intended effect only if the conductor and band expend upon it the utmost energy and force." Both yesterday lavished them.

H. T. PARKE

Spring, Summer and the Pops — Mme. Tetrazzini to Take Leave — A Huge Music-Festival in Prospect—Record and Announcements

FOR a thirty-sixth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall to continue there, every evening except Sunday, through Saturday, July 0. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats and tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music, a bar—as bars go nowadays—has been set up at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take the pleasure of the music as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, seventy or eighty strong, as need may require, will provide that music; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with band and music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make more various and interesting programmes than have any of his predecessors. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. Thus the list for Monday includes the Finale of Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite, "Scheherazade"; the list for Tuesday, Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Chaikovsky's "Nutcracker" dances, Chabrier's "España"; the list for Wednesday, an orchestral arrangement of the songful slow movement of Beethoven's "Pathetic Sonata"; the list for Thursday, Casella's rhapsody, "Italia," and a Fantasia from Puccini's half-forgotten opera, "The Girl of the Golden West." On Friday a chorus from the convention of Eastern Music Supervisors will sing; while on Saturday, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Largo from Dvorák's "New World" Symphony and three numbers from Bizet's music to the play, "L'Arlesienne" will be heard. According to custom The Transcript will print each day the programm of the evening.

TRANS-APR.30.

POPS OPEN MONDAY

The 36th season of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall will open Monday night. One of Boston's oldest and most popular institutions which provides music of direct appeal in the finest performance by a large symphony orchestra, with refreshments at the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony to enliven the evenings, annual affords immense delight to all lovers of music in the spring and summer seasons. Agide Jacchia, one of the most notable leaders the Pops orchestra has had, and one of the best makers of programs, according to the general verdict, will continue at the conductor's post. The program for the opening night, which follows, is typical of the musical treat for the educated and uneducated alike which the Pop concerts afford.

1. March from Tannhauser, Wagner
2.—Overture, "Tantalusqualen," Suppe
3. Fantasia, "Eugen Onagin," Tachaikowsky
4. By Moonlight..........Bendel
5. From the "Petite Suite," Debussy
   a. En Bateau b. Cortege
6. Slavonic Dance No. 3...Dvorak
7. Spring................Grieg
8. Finale, "Scheher azade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
9. Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini
10. Waltz, "Reve au Champagne," Vollstedt
11. Procession of the Sardar, Ippolito-Ivanoff

TELEGRAM-APR

CLUB NIGHT AT POPS

Tuesday evening, May 3, will be Women's City club night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The entire floor and first balcony are reserved for the use of members. Tickets are on sale at the secretary's office.

RECORD-APR.30

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE EFFUSIVE

Prolonged Ovation to Monteux at Last Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

When Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct the last Friday afternoon concert of the season, he was given a prolonged and enthusiastic greeting which must have pleased him. At the same time, this was out of all proportion to the applause which followed the last chord of the opening symphony—that of Cesar Franck. Then the audience let itself go in an ovation which has only been accorded this season to one other orchestral leader—Arturo Toscanini.

SIMPLE AND ELOQUENT

The symphony in itself was partly responsible for this, for it is today well understood, as it was not understood when first played in Boston in 1904, and it is perceived to be one of the simplest, one of the most noble and eloquent works in the orchestra repertory.

Mr. Monteux's performance, particularly of the opening movement, was uncommonly effective. It bore testimony to his abilities and it was a reminder as well of the wonderful accomplishment that is his in Boston, where, despite the troubles incidental to the war and a strike, he has successfully reassembled and remade the Symphony Orchestra three times and restored to its tradition tistic excellence the organization Major Higginson founded and w world-famous.

Two Bloch Pieces

Franck's symphony was follo by two pieces of Ernest Bloch, heard here before, "Winter" "Spring-time." Composed in 190 the composer's 25th year, this mu is not of the mature Bloch, who today one of the most representa figures in the modern field. But it music conspicuous for its sense of nature, for its impressionability, the naturalness and spontaneity wi which, at least in "Winter," the composer finds a tonal language to express himself. So expressing himself Bloch is much more convincing in his first piece than in his second. Sadness—the thoughts that a gray and wintry day may occasion—these emotions are native to the composer. He is less convincing to us, as he is less convincing to himself, when he tries to forget melancholy in the thought of laughing spring.

Strauss' Masterpiece

Then the heroic and tragic spirit of the youthful Strauss swept like a fiery wind over the orchestra. Then, hearing his masterpiece, "Death and Transfiguration," perhaps for the 10th or 11th time, the entire audience was confounded by its eloquence. It is always new and always confounding the manner in which this Strauss dares to write of the flesh riven in twain, and of the spirit, rising, shaking out its wings, in the final ascension. The incredible thing is that he accomplishes so much of what he sets out to do. No wonder the audience was so deeply moved.

By the side of this music, how ineffably bourgeois, theatrical, noisy and cheap sounded the "Tannhaeuser" overture. But how well made is this overture, what complete and irresistible mystery in the shaping of the ideas, the welding of the form. Confound this Wagner! Even when he is a cheap, affected player to the gallery he is a genius.

POST-APR30.

ELOQUENT CLOSE TO SYMPHONY SERIES

Orchestra Gives a Vital Interpretation of Franck

Bloch, Strauss and Wagner Fill an Interesting Program

An exceptionally eloquent performance of an unusually interesting program brought the Symphony concert season to a triumphant close yesterday afternoon. The audience applauded Mr Monteux and the players with genuine enthusiasm at every break in the program, which, in view of the rather lukewarm appreciation shown at the opening concert last October, is an encouraging sign that the subscribers admire the reconstituted orchestra, now that they have found it capable of good work.

Instead of the Beethoven symphony which of old was played at most last concerts, Mr Monteux gave an individual and vital interpretation of the Franck symphony. One wondered a little at his disregarding the injunction "non troppo" in the last allegro. He not infrequently confuses "crescendo" with "accelerando," hurrying the tempo unduly at climaxes. Otherwise there was no flaw worth picking in the performance.

It is the fashion to speak of the "mysticism" in Franck's music. Yet this symphony strikes one as the expression of an unworldly but not ascetic or austere nature, boisterously gay and quietly thoughtful by turns. It is essentially human rather than other worldly music.

Bloch's "Hiver-Printemps," a work of his youth heard here for the first time yesterday, set one wondering again how far the composer's difference from other musicians is due to spontaneous originality and how far it is a mere labored avoidance of triviality. Much of this "Spring" smacks more of the salon than of the soil. Yet "Winter" has a plaintive melancholy in it which touches the listener's imagination. The performance seemed sympathetic.

"Tod und Verklaerung," played for the first time since the war, used to be one of Dr Muck's best efforts. Yesterday's performance was magnificent as were the well remembered ones in former years. But Mr Monteux and his men seemed to be straining every nerve to make it so. Muck did it without apparent effort. The climaxes yesterday were not gradual and not balanced enough.

The present orchestra has never played anything better than it did the "Tannhauser Overture" yesterday. The "Venusberg" music in particular, which is usually given rather perfunctory treatment in the performance of the middle section of the overture, was made to sound like new, instinct with unexpected imaginative energy. No other composer has even been able to do what Scott would have called the "big bow-wow" style of music as well as Wagner. The Strauss of "Tod und Verklaerung" is his closest rival in it.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Present subscribers who wish to secure their seats for next year must do so by Monday. Those not taken will go on public sale Tuesday.

GLOBE-APR.30

7.123

SYMPHONY ENDS ITS 40TH SEASON

Bloch's Tone Poems Played for the First Time in Boston

AUDIENCE SHOWED MARKED ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 40th season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Bloch, Two Poems for Orchestra, "Winter—Spring." Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Mr. Bloch's tone-poems were played for the first time in Boston. When they were performed last season in New York at a concert of the New Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Bloch gave the best possible description of them: "The title is sufficient, I think, to suggest to the audience the atmosphere I intended to create—so far as musical titles are able to represent the content of that language, inexpressible by words. 'Hiver' is sad and hopeless; 'Printenyss' is full of joy and hope. I was 24 when I wrote them." Mr. Bloch was born at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1880.) "They are a small part of my personality and of my youth. That is already far away in a past that will not come again. . . . They are neither 'Classical' nor 'Ultra-modern.' The only thing I can tell about them is that they were sincerely written and are the expression of an inward necessity." In other words these pieces were written before Mr. Bloch devoted his indisputable talent to expressing in music the longings, woes and aspirations, the fanatical zeal and the religious fervor of his race.

He certainly succeeded in creating the atmosphere of winter and that of spring in these two poems. They are written in a comparatively simple manner, and for this reason are the more effective.

The melancholy mood and the dreariness of a winter landscape and winter's chill and nipping air are at once brought home to the hearer. The mood is maintained ingeniously, without undue elaboration. There is no vain attempt at photographic realism, the hearer looks out of the window; he is not plodding his way through snow and slush. The poem is short, but the impression made by it, by its simplicity and directness is durable. In admirable contrast is the suggestion of Spring, its fresh breezes, its awakening of life in Nature, its joy of birds, beasts and man. In this poem there is no attempt to portray a tumultuous spring, as one might strive to do with a great orchestra furnished with a battalion of percussion instruments. There is the Spring of the Elizabethan lyricists and of William Blake.

,The other compositions were all familiar. How gloriously they were played! No wonder that the audience was enthusiastic to a degree seldom observed at an orchestral concert.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" does not wear so well as his "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan." The introduction now seems rather tedious, so that one is impatient for the music of fever and delirium, nor does Srtuass allow his hero to apologize gracefully in the manner of Charles II for being so long in dying. The most vital part of the tone poem is the preparation of the grand climax, the transfiguration, and this climax was so superbly reached by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra that the effect was overwhelming.

There are works and there are performances of them that are not to be described in words, nor should one toil in purple phrases to convey to him that did not hear the passion, the nobility, the grandeur of the work itself, or the splendor of the performance. Cesar Franck's symphony is one of the greatest achievements in the history of music since the first pipe was rudely fashioned, since the first man beat upon a drum. Never was the glory of this symphony, with its expression of restless foreboding, its questionings in doubt, its message of reassurance and consolation, its triumphant conclusion, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, the Alleluia of a great multitude, so fully revealed in Boston as it was in the concert of yesterday.

After the spirited and sonorous performance of the "Tanhaeuser" overture, there was a long-continued demonstration of enthusiasm.

The concert will be repeated tonight. A short review of the season with a few remarks about Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will be published in the Herald of tomorrow.

HERALD-APR. 30.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

WARM LEAVE-TAKING ENDS THE SEASON

Conductor and Orchestra as the Work of the Year Has Developed Them—A Ripened Monteux and a Newly Risen Band Well on the Way to Old Perfections—Franck, Strauss and Wagner for the Afternoon in Music of Perennial Glories

ABOVE the usual yesterday, the final concert of the Symphony Orchestra in the current afternoon series was festal. As almost always the audience filled every seat in Symphony Hall; while, contrary to frequent custom, nearly every one remained to the end of the programme, even lingered thereafter. The applause that welcomed Mr. Monteux to his place, pitched the tune of the day. It was uncommonly hearty and sustained; it waxed longer and louder at the close of Franck's Symphony; it diminished not at all when the concert was done. Then, indeed, the listening company gave the conductor sincerest and warmest token of its regard. If ever an audience hastened homeward, it is the customary audience of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts. The mother (with daughters), who in the Harvard ballad of Class Day passionately seeks the "Pudding Spread," made not more speed than usually do the elect matrons, the attendant demoiselles, toward motor cars, tea-tables, engagements and pastimes. Yesterday, however, they lingered—stayed even until they had twice and thrice recalled the conductor and finally set him within his standing orchestra.

In moments of irritation over the reception of novel and highly individualized music, it is possible to believe this assembly of Friday afternoons timid and close-minded. Yet it has long perceived and yesterday it warmly appreciated the qualities that shine out of Mr. Monteux—his single-minded, single-hearted devotion to his work, and for the work's sake; his zeal for the broadest and the finest standards of the orchestra; his quickness and openness of mind; his catholic sympathies over the whole range of symphonic music and for the music of his own time most of all; his manifold eloquence in manifold performance, never declining into mediocrity, almost never falling into routine, usually revelation of piece in hand, time and again touching beauty, gaining power. Probably, too, at the back of the heads of this applauding company went the notion that at the end of the season of 1921, Mr. Monteux is an abler, more sensitive, more versatile conductor than he was at the beginning of the season of 1919. He is—by clear proof in his work; by clear impression, deepening the winter through, upon his hearers. No conductor may serve the Symphony Concerts and keep to the standards thereof and not deepen, broaden, refine in the process. It was the Monteux so amplified, so sensitized that the audience saluted yesterday.

No less good to hear was the warmth of this applauding company toward the orchestra itself. The clapping appreciably swelled when, at the close of Franck's Symphony, the conductor bade the players to their feet. When he did likewise, after the concert had ended with the Overture to "Tannhäuser," even cries and cheers arose—rarest of sounds within the sober precincts of the Symphony Concerts and from such a Bostonian audience. Seldom have there been like zest, like frank release of honest impulse in a usually prim self-conscious public—or with more reason. The orchestra is not yet the orchestra of the days when neither Europe nor America could match it; nor is it again the almost ideal orchestra that it then was—the more essential standard. As Mr. Monteux said himself the other day: "There is still much to be done." None the less from last October through the present April, progress toward the goal has never flagged. Again the band is a highly responsive instrument, collectively to the conductor and the music in hand, severally choir to choir and man to man. Again a hearty esprit du corps keeps it on edge to its work. Little by little it is re-achieving the gamut of tone that of old ran from force to finesse and knew every gradation between; regaining the old range of expression that answered to every composer, charactered each piece, summoned brightness or beauty or power or splendor at the conductor's will. The large, warm vigors, the fine precisions of the re-constituted band do not coarsen; while to them the work of the year has added plasticity, transparency, euphony of many-colored voice.

The strings, notably among the second violins, have regained sensitive and unified voice, smooth and shimmering, ardent and incisive, as many-toned as the music it would speak. Yet an additional violoncello or two would better balance the choir; while there is still need of a first viola to companion in quality Mr. Burgin of the violins and Mr. Bedetti of the violoncellos. The wind-choir is unexcelled in any American orchestra—even Mr. Stock's—and probably in any European. Mr. Laurent is master-flutist beyond any of his predecessors; Mr. Speyer at the English horn and too infrequently at the oboe, has added a signal talent to the orchestra; Mr. Laus with the bassoon, is peer to both. The clarinets are more debatable and upon their quality in the leisure of summer Mr. Monteux may advisedly ponder. Often he seeks the riches of tone that his six horn-players may yield the music. Once and again, the expert listener suspects that the first and the third among them have quite as much to do as is good for their mettle. Agreed that, in cost, able horn-players are articles of luxury and vertu. Yet why not add the two that have been missing from the desirable octet since the Higginsonian days ended? For the rest, Mr. Neumann at the kettle-drums and Mr. Holy and Mme. Delcourt at the harps speak weekly for themselves; Mr. Mager and the trumpets, Mr. Hampe and the trombones know the secrets both of mellowness and flare. A virtuoso of the tuba—for there can be and there has been in the orchestra such a player—it still lacks and again Mr. Monteux may advisedly consider betterment. It is a pity, too, for mere appearance's sake that another player should oscillate between the violas and the instruments of percussion. As for them they have deserved the opportunity that the conductor's fondness for ultra-modern music bestows upon them.

So man by man, choir by choir does the whole orchestra gradually renew the mettle of the old. A little more lightness and pliency and sensibility of shading when the elder music is in hand, a little more openness and suavity of tone when the voices are yet moving in mass, a little less muscularity and a deeper richness of tone in broad spread and upswelling climax and the end will be nearly gained. Already resiliency to rhythm, alertness to modulation and transition, color-sense in harmonic background have been reconquered. To these glories regained the new orchestra adds now a new and signal distinction of its own. For the first time in years, and especially in the string choir, it is a young orchestra. And youth or the spirit of youth is the strongest safeguard against routine and formula. It is only the truth to say that Mr. Monteux with the players working with him have so restored the band—not so much in his own image as in the image of its standards. Thank Heaven, they are not a "tradition." For they are still alive and quickening.

As usual at these final concerts, the programme for the most part traversed familiar pieces—Franck's Symphony; Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration" Wagner's overture to his opera, "Tannhäuser." Fortunately for music, composer and hearers, Mr. Monteux had pu by for two seasons this over-played Symphony in the days of Rabaud and Muc Again it came relatively fresh to co ductor, orchestra and hearers; and aga it stimulated all three by what now se transparent qualities. If ever there was a mystery in human understanding and appreciation of music, it is the obscurity, the abstruseness, the general "irregularity" with which this Symphony of Franck was of old reproached. The motivs whence it springs come clear to the ear; by unmistakable quality they touch and hold the imagination; again and again they recur to renew character and deepen impression. The form and progress of the music are as vivid and transparent—the long ascent, with occasional recession and recurring striving along the way—from shadow into radiance, out of brooding into gladness. At every turn, through each contrast, up and down gradation and modulation, musical structure and emotional content are as one; while harmonic and instrumental color seem as natural, inevitable vesture. Above all, the passion, the moods, the voice of the music are deeply and immediately human, almost universal. The wonder remains that any hearer could have wilfully misunderstood, obstinately resisted such music. For Franck's Symphony is like to Matthew Arnold's definition of poetry. In it are simplicity and strength, beauty and nobility.

Similarly, heard anew after superfluous war-time banishment Strauss's tone-poem remains a masterpiece in kind. Thus far the power that germinates, expands, intensifies and culminates into the uttermost splendors of tone, the measures of transfiguration abides the years. Again at their bidding come majesty and might and heavens opened. Still the measures wherein man fights for his faiths and ideals, his life according to his own living, ring with a knightly note unmatched outside the chivalric motiv in "Parsifal." Once more the misty passage of childhood memories flickering across the dying mind, wets the eyes with an ineffable beauty. Still do the stark drum-beats of Death the Merciless beat also upon the imagination. Throughout the tone-poem, indeed, goes for some of us and unflagging "the greater Strauss"—not merely the Strauss who is master of delineation in tones, who can mate inextricably and evenly formal progress with emotional and pictorial content, and still walk at ease and eloquently, whose palette glows with every harmonic and instrumental color, mixed with imagination; but the Strauss who for once has searched and known the heart and the will of man; who for once has quested toward the Divine Justice, who has penetrated deep into the strivings the faiths, the glories of man's living and who has charged a universal music as deeply with them. Few as yet may hear "Death and Transfiguration" unstirred.

But, but, whispers the neighboring youngster as Mr. Monteux, at the overture to "Tannhäuser," lifts his stick: "Here is 'old hat' indeed. Give the populace—and the horns—their fling." It is possible to be not so sure. For double and the lengthening years that Strauss's tone-poem has bided, Wagner's overture has endured the teeth of time; and after them all and through the thick accretions of popularity upon the pages, Mr. Lawrence Gilman may still write well and truly in the programme-book of the National Symphony Orchestra: "How much of the thrice-familiar music remains unstated. The wonderful opening measures; the exciting entrance of the Venusberg theme in the violas; the superb and passionate subject for the violins against which the 'cellos surge in mounting chromatic waves; the enticing song of the clarinet heard through tremolos of the muted strings; the magnificent and thrilling close—which, as Wagner blandly observed in his notes on the performing of 'Tannhäuser,' can make its intended effect only if the conductor and band expend upon it the utmost energy and force." Both yesterday lavished them.

H. T. PARKE

Spring, Summer and the Pops — Mme. Tetrazzini to Take Leave — A Huge Music-Festival in Prospect—Record and Announcements

FOR a thirty-sixth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall to continue there, every evening except Sunday, through Saturday, July 9. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats and tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music, a bar—as bars go nowadays—has been set up at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take the pleasure of the music as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, seventy or eighty strong, as need may require, will provide that music; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with band and music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make more various and interesting programmes than have any of his predecessors. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. Thus the list for Monday includes the Finale of Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite, "Scheherazade"; the list for Tuesday, Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Chaikovsky's "Nutcracker" dances, Chabrier's "España"; the list for Wednesday, an orchestral arrangement of the songful slow movement of Beethoven's "Pathetic Sonata"; the list for Thursday, Casella's rhapsody, "Italia," and a Fantasia from Puccini's half-forgotten opera, "The Girl of the Golden West." On Friday a chorus from the convention of Eastern Music Supervisors will sing; while on Saturday, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Largo from Dvoràk's "New World" Symphony and three numbers from Bizet's music to the play, "L'Arlesienne" will be heard. According to custom The Transcript will print each day the programme of the evening.

TRANS. APR. 30.

POPS OPEN MONDAY

The 36th season of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall will open Monday night. One of Boston's oldest and most popular institutions which provides music of direct appeal in the finest performance by a large symphony orchestra, with refreshments at the tables and at the bar behind the first balcony to enliven the evenings, annual affords immense delight to all lovers of music in the spring and summer seasons. Agide Jacchia, one of the most notable leaders the Pops orchestra has had, and one of the best makers of programs, according to the general verdict, will continue at the conductor's post. The program for the opening night, which follows, is typical of the musical treat for the educated and uneducated alike which the Pop concerts afford.

1. March from Tannhauser, Wagner
2. —Overture, "Tantalusqualen," Suppe
3. Fantasia, "Eugen Onagin," Tachaikowsky
4. By Moonlight..........Bendel
5. From the "Petite Suite," Debussy
   a. En Bateau b. Cortege
6. Slavonic Dance No. 3...Dvorak
7. Spring...................Grieg
8. Finale, "Scheher azade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
9. Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini
10. Waltz, "Reve au Champagne," Vollstedt
11. Procession of the Sardar, Ippolito-Ivanoff

TELEGRAM-APR

CLUB NIGHT AT POPS

Tuesday evening, May 3, will be Women's City club night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The entire floor and first balcony are reserved for the use of members. Tickets are on sale at the secretary's office.

RECORD-APR. 30

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE EFFUSIVE

Prolonged Ovation to Monteux at Last Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

When Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct the last Friday afternoon concert of the season, he was given a prolonged and enthusiastic greeting which must have pleased him. At the same time, this was out of all proportion to the applause which followed the last chord of the opening symphony—that of Cesar Franck. Then the audience let itself go in an ovation which has only been accorded this season to one other orchestral leader—Arturo Toscanini.

SIMPLE AND ELOQUENT

The symphony in itself was partly responsible for this, for it is today well understood, as it was not understood when first played in Boston in 1904, and it is perceived to be one of the simplest, one of the most noble and eloquent works in the orchestra repertory.

Mr. Monteux's performance, particularly of the opening movement, was uncommonly effective. It bore testimony to his abilities and it was a reminder as well of the wonderful accomplishment that is his in Boston, where, despite the troubles incidental to the war and a strike, he has successfully reassembled and remade the Symphony Orchestra three succes times and restored to its traditional tistic excellence the organization Major Higginson founded and which world-famous.

Two Bloch Pieces

Franck's symphony was followe by two pieces of Ernest Bloch, heard here before, "Winter" "Spring-time." Composed in 19 the composer's 25th year, this mu is not of the mature Bloch, who is today one of the most representative figures in the modern field. But it is music conspicuous for its sense of nature, for its impressionability, for the naturalness and spontaneity with which, at least in "Winter," the composer finds a tonal language to express himself. So expressing himself, Bloch is much more convincing in his first piece than in his second. Sadness—the thoughts that a gray and wintry day may occasion—these emotions are native to the composer. He is less convincing to us, as he is less convincing to himself, when he tries to forget melancholy in the thought of laughing spring.

Strauss' Masterpiece

Then the heroic and tragic spirit of the youthful Strauss swept like a fiery wind over the orchestra. Then, hearing his masterpiece, "Death and Transfiguration," perhaps for the 10th or time, the entire audience was confounded by its eloquence. It is always new and always confounding—the manner in which this Strauss dares to write of the flesh riven in twain, and of the spirit, rising, shaking out its wings, to the final ascension. The incredible thing is that he accomplishes so much of what he sets out to do. No wonder the audience was so deeply moved.

By the side of this music, how ineffably bourgeois, theatrical, noisy and cheap sounded the "Tannhauser" overture. But how well made is this overture, what complete and irresistible mystery in the shaping of the ideas, the welding of the form. Confound this Wagner! Even when he is a cheap affected player to the gallery he is a genius.

APR30.

ELOQUENT CLOSE TO SYMPHONY SERIES

Orchestra Gives a Vital Interpretation of Franck

Bloch, Strauss and Wagner Fill an Interesting Program

An exceptionally eloquent performance of an unusually interesting program brought the Symphony concert season to a triumphant close yesterday afternoon. The audience applauded Mr Monteux and the players with genuine enthusiasm at every break in the program, which, in view of the rather lukewarm appreciation shown at the opening concert last October, is an encouraging sign that the subscribers admire the reconstituted orchestra, now that they have found it capable of good work.

Instead of the Beethoven symphony which of old was played at most last concerts, Mr Monteux gave an individual and vital interpretation of the Franck symphony. One wondered a little at his disregarding the injunction "non treppo" in the last allegro. He not infrequently confuses "crescendo" with "accelerando," hurrying the tempo unduly at climaxes. Otherwise there was no flaw worth picking in the performance.

It is the fashion to speak of the "mysticism" in Franck's music. Yet this symphony strikes one as the expression of an unworldly but not ascetic or austere nature, boisterously gay and quietly thoughtful by turns. It is essentially human rather than other worldly music.

Bloch's "Hiver-Printemps," a work of his youth heard here for the first time yesterday, set one wondering again how far the composer's difference from other musicians is due to spontaneous originality and how far it is a mere labored avoidance of triviality. Much of this "Spring" smacks more of the salon than of the soil. Yet "Winter" has a plaintive melancholy in it which touches the listener's imagination. The performance seemed sympathetic.

"Tod und Verklaerung," played for the first time since the war, used to be one of Dr Muck's best efforts. Yesterday's performance was magnificent as were the well remembered ones in former years. But Mr Monteux and his men seemed to be straining every nerve to make it so. Muck did it without apparent effort. The climaxes yesterday were not gradual and not balanced enough.

The present orchestra has never played anything better than it did the "Tannhauser Overture" yesterday. The "Venusberg" music in particular, which is usually given rather perfunctory treatment in the performance of the middle section of the overture, was made to sound like new, instinct with unsuspected imaginative energy. No other composer has even been able to do what Scott would have called the "big bow-wow" style of music as well as Wagner. The Strauss of "Tod und Verklaerung" is his closest rival in it.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Present subscribers who wish to secure their seats for next year must do so by Monday. Those not taken will go on public sale Tuesday.

GLOBE-APR. 30

[illegible]

Two Bloch Pieces

Franck's symphony was followed by two pieces of Ernest Bloch, not heard here before, "Winter" and "Spring-time." Composed in 1905, in the composer's 25th year, this music is not of the mature Bloch, who is today one of the most representative figures in the modern field. But it is music conspicuous for its sense of nature, for its impressionability, for the naturalness and spontaneity with which, at least in "Winter," the composer finds a tonal language to express himself. So expressing himself, Bloch is much more convincing in his first piece than in his second. Sadness—the thoughts that a gray and wintry day may occasion—these emotions are native to the composer. He is less convincing to us, as he is less convincing to himself, when he tries to forget melancholy in the thought of laughing spring.

Strauss' Masterpiece

Then the heroic and tragic spirit of the youthful Strauss swept like a fiery wind over the orchestra. Then, hearing his masterpiece, "Death and Transfiguration," perhaps for the 10th or 15th time, the entire audience was confounded by its eloquence. It is always new and always confounding—the manner in which this Strauss dares to write of the flesh riven in twain, and of the spirit rising, shaking out its wings, in the final ascension. The incredible thing is that he accomplishes so much of what he sets out to do. No wonder the audience was so deeply moved.

By the side of this music, how ineffably bourgeois, theatrical, noisy and cheap sounded the "Tannhauser" overture. But how well made is this overture, what complete and irresistible mystery in the shaping of the ideas, the welding of the form. Confound this Wagner! Even when he is a cheap, affected player to the gallery he is a genius.

POST. APR 30.

ELOQUENT CLOSE TO SYMPHONY SERIES

Orchestra Gives a Vital Interpretation of Franck

Bloch, Strauss and Wagner Fill an Interesting Program

An exceptionally eloquent performance of an unusually interesting program brought the Symphony concert season to a triumphant close yesterday afternoon. The audience applauded Mr Monteux and the players with genuine enthusiasm at every break in the program, which, in view of the rather lukewarm appreciation shown at the opening concert last October, is an encouraging sign that the subscribers admire the reconstituted orchestra, now that they have found it capable of good work.

Instead of the Beethoven symphony which of old was played at most last concerts, Mr Monteux gave an individual and vital interpretation of the Franck symphony. One wondered a little at his disregarding the injunction "non treppo" in the last allegro. He not infrequently confuses "crescendo" with "accelerando," hurrying the tempo unduly at climaxes. Otherwise there was no flaw worth picking in the performance.

It is the fashion to speak of the "mysticism" in Franck's music. Yet this symphony strikes one as the expression of an unworldly but not ascetic or austere nature, boisterously gay and quietly thoughtful by turns. It is essentially human rather than other worldly music.

Bloch's "Hiver-Printemps," a work of his youth heard here for the first time yesterday, set one wondering again how far the composer's difference from other musicians is due to spontaneous originality and how far it is a mere labored avoidance of triviality. Much of this "Spring" smacks more of the salon than of the soil. Yet "Winter" has a plaintive melancholy in it which touches the listener's imagination. The performance seemed sympathetic.

"Tod und Verklaerung," played for the first time since the war, used to be one of Dr Muck's best efforts. Yesterday's performance was magnificent as are the well-remembered ones in former years. But Mr Monteux did it without apparent effort. The climaxes [illegible] not gradual and not [illegible] enough.

The present orchestra has never played anything better than it did the "Tannhauser" overture yesterday. The "Venusberg" music in particular, which is usually given rather perfunctory treatment in the performance of the middle section of the overture, was made to sound like new, instinct with unusual imaginative energy. No other composer has even been able to do what Wagner would have called the "big bow-wow" style of music as well as [illegible]. The Strauss of "Tod und Verklaerung" is his closest rival in it.

[illegible] this program will be repeated tonight. Present subscribers [illegible] their seats for next year must do so by Monday. Those not taken will be on public sale Tuesday.

GLOBE APR 30

[illegible] handicap. Ten or fifteen years ago the Pops were considered a bit Bohemian, and many merry parties went up there to enjoy the Viennese waltzes and Munich brew. Nowadays the old ladies from the Friday afternoon rehearsals have courage enough to take tables on the floor alone. From the point of view of attendance the Pops were never so prosperous.

AMER. APR 30

MUSIC

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on April 29, was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Bloch, "Hiver-Printemps"—two poems for orchestra; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser."

This last program of the present season brought to light nothing new with the exception of Bloch's two poems. They are the expression of two contrasted moods, gracefully written and skillfully orchestrated, the music of an imaginative, sincere musician. They are perhaps too subjectively conceived to attract the attention of the sensation-loving crowd, yet they are all the better for that. The remaining numbers on the program are well known. Mr. Monteux's readings of Franck's symphony and the "Tannhäuser" overture are familiar. That of Strauss' symphonic poem was sympathetic.

The past season has been one of great artistic merit. Many worth novelties have had a hearing, many unfamiliar classics have been brought to renewed attention while the more familiar classics have not been neglected. Mr. Monteux's programs have contained the music of all schools. The orchestra, too, has made marked progress, both technically and musically. The musical public of this city has indeed been fortunate in having Mr. Monteux at the head of its most important musical institution. His sincere artistry has been of untold benefit to the musical life of the community.

MONITOR APR 30.

Pops to Begin Tomorrow Evening

The Pop concerts will open their thirty-sixth season at Symphony Hall tomorrow night. Symphony Hall will cast off for this gala occasion the formalities of the regular concert season. And yet, with the Pops, many qualities of the finest concerts still remain. The large orchestra of Symphony players is more than adequate for the most brilliant symphonic scores. Further zest is added to the playing of the Pops by the authoritative leadership of Agide Jacchia, a conductor well versed in popular as well as classic music. Since there is no statute against intoxicating music, Maestro Jacchia is able to charm all Pop-goers with the alternately lively and soulful qualities of his skillfully planned programs. All nights of the week will be open to the public. The program [illegible]:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite," a. En Bateau, b. Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" .... Vollstedt
"Procession of the Sardar" .... Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

ADVERTISER APR 30

12

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last night. It has been a brilliant one, one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra, which was never in a higher state than it is today. Mr. Monteux once said: "An orchestra is what the conductor makes it." Mr. Monteux, having fine material to work with, virtuosos who were willing, yes, eager, to unite in ensemble without undue thought of their own individuality, has now an orchestra that for euphony, plasticity and brilliance, is unsurpassed. As James Huneker said in the last review he wrote for the New York World: "After all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Not only has Mr. Monteux brought the orchestra to its high state by means of his technical skill as a disciplinarian, he has revealed himself as an interpreter to whom no school, ancient or modern, is foreign. His reading of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Brahm's second symphony, Liszt's "Orpheus," Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, will long be remembered. We mention these readings in particular, for there are a few moss-backed conservatives who still think that only a German can interpret "German" music; as if music were parochial, and could not make a universal appeal. They might as well say that only a German audience can understand and appreciate the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart. No, the compositions of the Englishmen, Bax and Vaughan Williams, of the French and the Russians, of the Italians and the Americans are not to Mr. Monteux written in an unknown tongue.

What a pleasure it is to see a conductor at the head of this orchestra who is modest in his bearing, yet courageous in bringing out music in an unfamiliar idiom, without thought of immediate popular favor, believing it his duty to acquaint the audience with even the most extreme modern tendencies, a conductor who respects his audience and his orchestra; a conductor who is courteous to soloists and rejoices in their individual success.

And in his arduous work he has been loyally and intelligently supported by the sound advice and encouragement of the experienced manager, Mr. William H. Brennan, assisted by Mr. G. E. Judd.

The programs of the 40th season were conspicuous for their interest and catholicity. Many unfamiliar compositions were heard, while the classics were not neglected.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME

Bingham: Passacaglia for orchestra, Jan. 21, 1921.
Gilbert: Indian Sketches, March 4, 1921.
Hill: Poem: "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after Poe), Oct. 29, 1920.
Mason, Stuart: Rhapsody on a Persian Air, April 22, 1921.
Strube: Four Preludes, Nov. 12, 1920.

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN AMERICA*

Bax: "In the Faery Hills," symphonic poem, Dec. 17, 1920.
Malipiero: "Impressioni dal Vero," Suite No. 1, Dec. 23, 1920.
Milhaud: Suite No. 2, April 22, 1921.
Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Nov. 19, 1920.
Ropartz: Divertissement, Oct. 22, 1920.
Strauss: Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," Feb. 11, 1921.

*Had Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" been played in the United States before April 8, 1921?

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Balakireff: "Islamey" (orchestrated by Casella), Dec. 17, 1920.
Bloch: "Hiver" and "Printemps," April 29, 1921.
Carpenter: Suite from the Ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta," Feb. 25, 1921.
Franck: Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue (orchestrated by Pierne), Oct. 8, 1920.
d'Indy: "La Queste de Dieu," from "La Legende de Saint-Christophe," Dec. 23, 1920.
Kalinnikoff: Symphony No. 1, G minor, April 1, 1921.
Lekeu: Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-songs of Anjou, Oct. 8, 1920.
Ravel: Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, March 11, 1921.
Respighi: "Fontane di Roma," Nov. 12, 1920.
Schubert: "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4, C minor (as a whole), April 8, 1921.
Scott: Two Passacaglias, Jan. 28, 1921.
Vassilenko: Epic Poem, April 18, 1921.
Williams: A London Symphony, Feb. 18, 1921.

SONGS

Mason, D. G.: "Russians," Op. 18 (Reinald Werrenrath, baritone), Nov. 19, 1920.

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS

Franck: "Les Djinns," symphonic poem for piano and orchestra, after Hugo, E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, Jan. 21, 1921.
Mozart: Air of Pamina from "The Magic Flute" (Mme. Hulda Lashanska), Jan. 28, 1921.
Concerto in E flat major for violin (Jacques Thibaud), Feb. 18, 1921.
Shepherd: Fantasy for piano and orchestra (Heinrich Gebhard, pianist), April 15, 1921.
Wagner: Transformation Music and closing scene of Act. I, "Parsifal," March 25, 1921.

A glance at the list of composers whose works were played will give an idea of Mr. Monteux's catholicity, to which we have referred.

Summary

The following composers were represented at these concerts for the first time: Bax, Bingham, Kalinnikoff, Lekeu, Mason, D. G., Mason, S., Milhaud, Respighi, Scott, Shepherd, Vassilenko, Williams.

Balakireff	1	Loeffler	1
Bax	1	Malipiero	1
Beethoven	7	Mason, D. G.	1
Berlioz	2	Mason, S.	1
Bingham	1	Mendelssohn	2
Bloch	1	Milhaud	1
Brahms	4	Mozart	[illegible]
Bruch	1	Ravel	2
Carpenter	1	Respighi	2
Chabrier	1	Roger-Ducasse	1
Chadwick	1	Ropartz	1
Charpentier	1	Saint-Saens	[illegible]
Debussy	1	Schubert	[illegible]
Delius	1	Schumann	[illegible]
Dukas	1	Scott	1
Dvorak	1	Scriabin	1
Enesco	2	Shepherd	1
Foote	1	Sibelius	1
Franck	3	Strauss	[illegible]
Gilbert	1	Stravinsky	1
Griffes	1	Strube	1
Haydn	2	Tschaikowsky	[illegible]
Hill	1	Vassilenko	[illegible]
D'Indy	1	Wagner	[illegible]
Kalinnikoff	1	Weber	[illegible]
Lalo	1	Williams	[illegible]
Lekeu	1
Liszt	1	Total	91

*Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" was played twice.

†Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" was played twice.

Of these composers, Bingham, Carpenter, Chadwick, Foote, Gilbert, Griffes, Hill, D. G. Mason, S. Mason, Shepherd [illegible] Loeffler and Strube, Americans by their long residence and musical activity in this country—12 in all.

Fifty-four composers were represented. There has been trifling, foolish talk about French propaganda. Of these composers only 12 were French by birth. Franck, a Belgian, was a naturalized Frenchman; Lekeu was a Belgian; Enesco was a Roumanian.

The soloists were as follows:

Sopranos: Mmes. Lashanska and Nielsen	2
Baritone: Mr. Werrenrath	1
Pianists: Messrs. Bauer, Gebhard, Grainger, Levitzki, Maier, Moiseiwitsch, Pattison, Rubinstein	8
Violinists: Messrs. Burgin and Thibaud and Miss Menges	3
Violoncellists: Messrs. Bedetti and Schroeder	2
	16

Mmes. Lashanska and Menges appeared for the first time in Boston.

Messrs. Maier, Moisewitsch, Pattison and Rubinstein played for the first time at these concerts. Miss Nielsen and Mr. Werrenrath sang for the first time at these concerts.

POPS OPEN TOMORROW

A principal event of the spring will be the opening night of the 36th season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, May 2. Festive with new decorations, tables, food and drink, Symphony Hall will cast off for this occasion the formalities of the regular concert season. And yet, with the Pops, many qualities of the finest concerts still remain. The large and splendid orchestra of symphony players is more than adequate for the most brilliant and exacting symphonic scores. Further zest is added to their playing by the inspired leadership of Agide Jacchia, conductor of opera in past years and of the Pop concerts in recent seasons. Since there is no statute against intoxicating music, Maestro Jacchia is able to charm all Pop goers with the alternately lively and soulful qualities of his skilfully planned programs.

Although the Women' City Club, Durant, Inc., the Boston Athletic Association and the Music Supervisors' convention have taken parts of the house for their own amusement on the nights of Tuesday, Wedneday, Thursday and Friday, these nights and all nights of the week will be open to the public. The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 2

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Oneigin" .... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite" a. En Bateau;
b. Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" .... Vollstedt
"Procession of the Sardar" .... Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

TUESDAY, MAY 3

Introduction of Act III, "Lohengrin" .. Wagner
Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman" .. Offenbach
Fantasia "Madama Butterfly" .... Puccini
Suite "Nutcracker" .... Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
"La Boheme" .... Puccini
"Reve Angelique" .... Rubinstein
Waltz "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ... Strauss

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Tempest Scene from "Othello," Act 1 .. Verdi
Adagio Cantabile from the Sonata "Pathetique" .... Beethoven
Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps .... Berlioz
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda"
Ouverture "1812" .... Ponchielli
Giga (arr by Agide Jacchia) .... Tschaikowsky Cortege de Bacchus .... van Westerhout
THURSDAY, MAY 5 .... Delibes
Coronation March, from "Le Prophete"
Overture to "Mignon" .... Meyerbeer Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .... Thomas
Fantasia, "The Girl of the Golden West" .... Tschaikowsky Overture to "Il Guarany" .... Puccini
"Waltz of the Hours," from "Coppelia" .... Gomes
"Aurora" .... Delibes
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... H. Dunham
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffman" .... Casella
Prelude .... Offenbach
Dance of the Cammorrists .... Rachmaninoff
FRIDAY, MAY 6 .... Wolf-Ferrari
"Rakoczy" March .... Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" .... Nicolai
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... R. Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Liszt
Dream of Love .... Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" .... Blon
Songs by Chorus of the Eastern Music Supervisors (with organ), Albert Edmund Brown, conductor .... Bizet
Fantasia "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Hindu Song .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

SATURDAY, MAY 7

Cortege, from "The Queen of Sheba" ... Gounod
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" .... Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Suite No. 2 "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony. Dvorak
Capriccio .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ...
Saint-Saens

HERALD MAY 1.

Pop Concerts Begin Tomorrow Night

The Pop Concerts begin their 26th season at Symphony Hall tomorrow night. Agide Jacchia will again conduct the orchestra of 80 Boston Symphony Orchestra members in programs of popular and standard music on every week day evening from 8 to 11. Tables fill the floor, at which soft drinks and light refreshments may be ordered. Those who sit in the balconies can obtain refreshments in the usual room at the end of the corridor. Smoking is permitted on the floor.

These details are familiar enough to most Bostonians, but newcomers to the city need to be told about the "Pops" since they are an institution not found elsewhere in the United States. Among the composers represented on the programs for the opening week are Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Debussy, Dvorak, Grieg, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Weber, Chabrier, Richard Strauss, Verdi, Beethoven, Berlioz, Saint-Saens, Casella, Liszt, Bizet and Scarlatti. Yet there are popular concerts in fact as well as in name, as the experience of past seasons has proved. Most permanently popular music is also great music.

[illegible] recovering their former remarkable excellence. Mr Monteux, who is to conduct them again next year, has shown admirable patience, good humor, and a high order of musicianship. His remolding of the twice shattered orchestra into a sensitive and pliable instrument is a great achievement. The programs have been unusually attractive, the performances have averaged better thn one hoped for. At best they have been equal to the best work done before the war, but there have been more flaws than of old, as was invitable under the circumstances.

GLOBE MAY 1

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

An important and highly festive event will be the opening of the 36th season of Pop Concerts tonight in Symphony Hall at 8:15.

According to the custom of the Pops, refreshments will be served at the tables, while ravishing music is being performed by the splendid orchestra of 80 symphony players. Agide Jacchia, continuing at the conductor's post, will present the following eventful programme:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"—
(a) En Bateau. (b) Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" .... Vollstedt
"Processor of the Sardar" ... Ippolito-Ivanoff

POST MAY 2

POP CONCERT SERIES WILL OPEN TONIGHT

Orchestra of 80 Symphony Musicians Will Play Under Jacchia

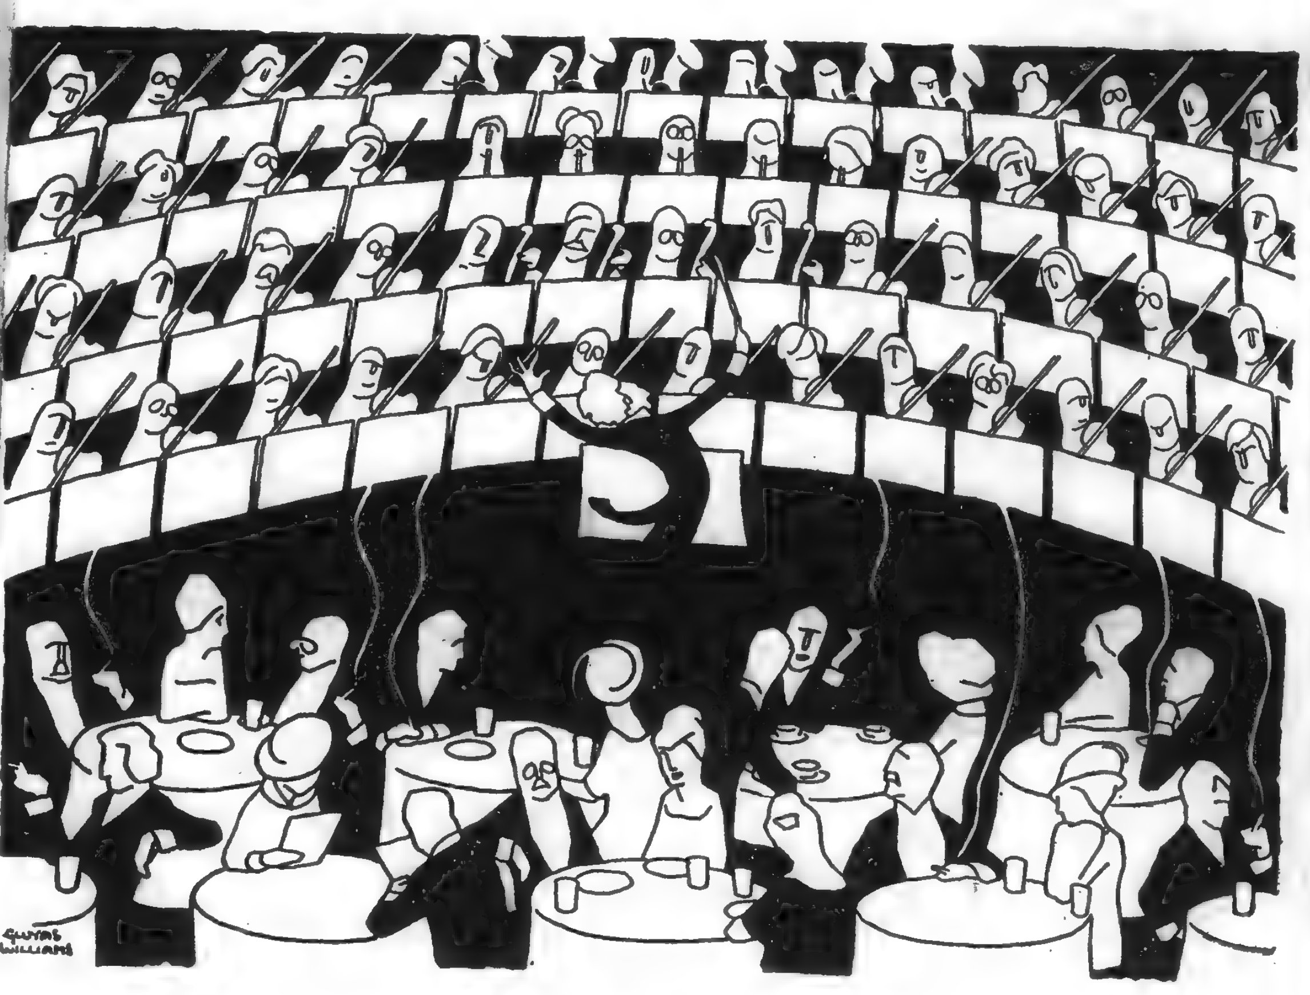
The 26th season of Pop Concerts opens tonight in Symphony Hall at 8:15. According to the custom of the Popo, refreshments will be served at the tables, while the spledid orchestra of 80 symphony players entertains from the platform Agide Jacchia, continuing at the conductor's post, will present the following program:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Ovesture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite," a. En Bateau,
b. Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheheazade" .. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" ... Vollstedt
"Procession of the Sardar"
Ippolito-Ivanoff

HERALD. MAY 2

Chamber's Second Annual Pop Concert, Monday, May 9

JUDGING from the increasing sale of tickets at the Chamber's offices for the Second Annual "Pop of Pops" those members who have not already secured reservations will do well to clip immediately the coupon at the bottom of this page. The best seats are going fast and applications are being filled in the order received.



The "Pop of Pops"

A well-chosen program has been arranged for this event by Conductor Agide Jacchia of Symphony's eighty piece orchestra. The program is as follows:

1. Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) .... Elgar
2. Waltz "The Skaters" .... Waldteufel
3. Ride of the Valkyrie .... Wagner
4. Fantasia "Tosca" .... Puccini
5. Suite from the Ballet, "Sylvia" .... Delibes
   1. Les Chasseresses. 2. Pizzicato. 3. Cortege de Bacchus.
6. Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
7. Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmjs
   Solo violin, harp, organ and strings
8. Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
9. Rhapsody "Espana" .... Chabrier
10. Selection "Apple Blossoms" .... Kreisler-Jacobi
11. March from "Aida" .... Verdi

The Chamber's "Pop of Pops" as a function was inaugurated last year; the initial success was so marked that the Committee was convinced that it should have a regular place on the program of Chamber events. Purely a social and "get together" function, members welcome the opportunity to bring their wives and guests.

Tickets may be secured only at the Chamber offices. Regular Pop Concert prices prevail at the Chamber's "Pop of Pops." Reservations for seats at the tables on the floor may be made for $1.00 each. First balcony seats are $1.00, 75c and 50c. Entire tables of five, six or eight seats may be reserved.

Coupon For "Pop of Pops"

Boston Chamber of Commerce, 177 Milk Street,
Boston (9), Mass.

RESERVATION FOR TICKETS

Please reserve for me
.... Table seats at $1.00
.... Balcony seats at ($1.00) (75c) (50c) for the "Pop of Pops" to be held at Symphony Hall Monday, May 9th
at 8:00 p.m.
Enclosed find $..........
Signature ....
Address ....
Date..........

assembled and remade the Bos Symphony Orchestra three successiv times and restored to its traditional a tistic excellence the organization which Major Higginson founded and which is world-famous.

Two Bloch Pieces

Franck's symphony was followed by two pieces of Ernest Bloch, not heard here before, "Winter" and "Spring-time." Composed in 1905, in the composer's 25th year, this music is not of the mature Bloch, who is today one of the most representative figures in the modern field. But it is music conspicuous for its sense of nature, for its impressionability, for the naturalness and spontaneity with which, at least in "Winter," the composer finds a tonal language to express himself. So expressing himself, Bloch is much more convincing in his first piece than in his second. Sadness—the thoughts that a gray and wintry day may occasion—these emotions are native to the composer. He is less convincing to us, as he is less convincing to himself, when he tries to forget melancholy in the thought of laughing spring.

Strauss' Masterpiece

Then the heroic and tragic spirit of the youthful Strauss swept like a fiery wind over the orchestra. Then, hearing his masterpiece, "Death and Transfiguration," perhaps for the 10th or 15th time, the entire audience was confounded by its eloquence. It is always new and always confounding—the manner in which this Strauss dares to write of the flesh riven in twain, and of the spirit, rising, shaking out its wings, in the final ascension. The incredible thing is that he accomplishes so much of what he sets out to do. No wonder the audience was so deeply moved.

By the side of this music, how ineffably bourgeois, theatrical, noisy and cheap sounded the "Tannhauser" overture. But how well made is this overture, what complete and irresistible mystery in the shaping of the ideas, the welding of the form. Confound this Wagner! Even when he is a cheap, affected player to the gallery he is a genius.

POST-APR.30.

ELOQUENT CLOSE TO SYMPHONY SERIES

Orchestra Gives a Vital Interpretation of Franck

Bloch, Strauss and Wagner Fill an Interesting Program

An exceptionally eloquent performance of an unusually interesting program brought the Symphony concert season to a triumphant close yesterday afternoon. The audience applauded Mr Monteux and the players with genuine enthusiasm at every break in the program, which, in view of the rather lukewarm appreciation shown at the opening concert last October, is an encouraging sign that the subscribers admire the reconstituted orchestra, now that they have found it capable of good work.

Instead of the Beethoven symphony which of old was played at most last concerts, Mr Monteux gave an individual and vital interpretation of the Franck symphony. One wondered a little at his disregarding the injunction "non treppo" in the last allegro. He not infrequently confuses "crescendo" with "accelerando," hurrying the tempo unduly at climaxes. Otherwise there was no flaw worth picking in the performance.

It is the fashion to speak of the "mysticism" in Franck's music. Yet this symphony strikes one as the expression of an unworldly but not ascetic or austere nature, boisterously gay and quietly thoughtful by turns. It is essentially human rather than other worldly music.

Bloch's "Hiver-Printemps," a work of his youth heard here for the first time yesterday, set one wondering again how far the composer's difference from other musicians is due to spontaneous originality and how far it is a mere labored avoidance of triviality. Much of this "Spring" smacks more of the salon than of the soil. Yet "Winter" has a plaintive melancholy in it which touches the listener's imagination. The performance seemed sympathetic.

"Tod und Verklaerung," played for the first time since the war, used to be one of Dr Muck's best efforts. Yesterday's performance was magnificent as were the well remembered ones in former years. But Mr Monteux and his men seemed to be straining every nerve to make it so. Muck did it without apparent effort. The climaxes yesterday were not gradual and not balanced enough.

The present orchestra has never played anything better than it did the "Tannhauser Overture" yesterday. The "Venusberg" music in particular, which is usually given rather perfunctory treatment in the performance of the middle section of the overture, was made to sound like new, instinct with unsuspected imaginative energy. No other composer has even been able to do what Scott would have called the "big bowwow" style of music as well as Wagner. The Strauss of "Tod und Verklaerung" is his closest rival in it.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Present subscribers who wish to secure their seats for next year must do so by Monday. Those not taken will go on public sale Tuesday.

GLOBE-A 0

Again the Pops.

The "Pops" orchestra grows every eason. Now Conductor Jacchia will ave no less than eighty men under is baton when the ice cream musiales begin next Monday night. The oston Symphony concludes its regur season tonight. Great difficulties ave been overcome, a number of and the band has become welded so well that its tone is more like the old Boston Symphony than it has been for several seasons.

The "Pops" are unique. No other American city has ever been able to manage them on so grand a scale. To be sure nothing but near-beer can now be purchased with your music, but as you can't buy anything stronger anywhere else, that is nc handicap. Ten or fifteen years ag the Pops were considered a bi Bohemian, and many merry partie went up there to enjoy the Viennes waltzes and Munich brew. Nowaday the old ladies from the Friday after noon rehearsals have courage enoug to take tables on the floor alon From the point of view of attendanc the Pops were never so prosperous.

MUSIC

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monito

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on April 2 was as follows: Franck, Symphony i D minor; Bloch, "Hiver-Printemps"— two poems for orchestra; Strauss "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagne overture to "Tannhäuser."

This last program of the presen season brought to light nothing ne with the exception of Bloch's tw poems. They are the expression c two contrasted moods, gracefull written and skillfully orchestrated, th music of an imaginative, sincere musician. They are perhaps too subjectively conceived to attract the atter tion of the sensation-loving crowc yet they are all the better for tha The remaining numbers on the program are well known. Mr. Monteux' readings of Franck's symphony an the "Tannhäuser" overture are familiar. That of Strauss' symphonic poe was sympathetic.

The past season has been one c great artistic merit. Many worth novelties have had a hearing, man unfamiliar classics have been brought to renewed attention while the more familiar classics have not been neglected. Mr. Monteux's programs have contained the music of all schools. The orchestra, too, has made marked progress, both technically and musically. The musical public of this city has indeed been fortunate in having Mr. Monteux at the head of its most important musical institution. His sincere artistry has been of untold benefit to the musical life of the community.

MONITOR APR

Pops to Begin Tomorrow Evening

The Pop concerts will open thei thirty-sixth season at Symphony Hal tomorrow night. Symphony Hall wil cast off for this gala occasion the formalities of the regular concer season. And yet, with the Pops, many qualities of the finest concerts still remain. The large orchestra of Symphony players is more than adequate for the most brilliant symphonic scores. Further zest is added to the Pops by the authoritative leadership of Agide Jacchia, a conductor well versed in popular as well as classic music. Since there is no statute against intoxicating music, Maestro Jacchia is able to charm all Pop-goers with the alternately lively and soulful qualities of his skilfully planned programs. All nights of the week will be open to the public. The program for the opening follow:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite," a. En Bateau
b. Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" .... Vollstedt
"Procession of the Sardar" .... Ippolito-Ivanoff

ADVERTISER MA

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last night. It has been a brilliant one, one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra, which was never in a higher state than it is today. Mr. Monteux once said: "An orchestra is what the conductor makes it." Mr. Monteux, having fine material to work with, virtuosos who were willing, yea, eager, to unite in ensemble without undue thought of their own individuality, has now an orchestra that for euphony, plasticity and brilliance, is unsurpassed. As James Huneker said in the last review he wrote for the New York World: "After all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Not only has Mr. Monteux brought the orchestra to its high state by means of his technical skill as a disciplinarian, he has revealed himself as an interpreter to whom no school, ancient or modern, is foreign. His reading of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Brahm's second symphony, Liszt's "Orpheus," Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, will long be remembered. We mention these readings in particular, for there are a few moss-backed conservatives who still think that only a German can interpret "German" music; as if music were parochial, and could not make a universal appeal. They might as well say that only a German audience can understand and appreciate the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart. No, the compositions of the Englishmen, Bax and Vaughan Williams, of the French and the Russians, of the Italians and the Americans are not to Mr. Monteux written in an unknown tongue.

What a pleasure it is to see a conductor at the head of this orchestra who is modest in his bearing, yet courageous in bringing out music in an unfamiliar idiom, without thought of immediate popular favor, believing it his duty to acquaint the audience with even the most extreme modern tendencies, a conductor who respects his audience and his orchestra; a conductor who is courteous to soloists and rejoices in their individual success.

And in his arduous work he has been loyally and intelligently supported by the sound advice and encouragement of the experienced manager, Mr. William H. Brennan, assisted by Mr. G. E. Judd.

The programs of the 40th season were conspicuous for their interest and catholicity. Many unfamiliar compositions were heard, while the classics were not neglected.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME

Bingham: Passacaglia for orchestra, Jan. 21, 1921.
Gilbert: Indian Sketches, March 4, 1921.
Hill: Poem: "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after Poe), Oct. 29, 1920.
Mason, Stuart: Rhapsody on a Persian Air, April 22, 1921.
Strube: Four Preludes, Nov. 12, 1920.

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN AMERICA*

Bax: "In the Faery Hills," symphonic poem, Dec. 17, 1920.
Malipiero: "Impressioni dal Vero," Suite No. 1, Dec. 23, 1920.
Milhaud: Suite No. 2, April 22, 1921.
Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Nov. 19, 1920.
Ropartz: Divertissement, Oct. 22, 1920.
Strauss: Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," Feb. 11, 1921.

*Had Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" been played in the United States before April 8, 1921?

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Balakireff: "Islamey" (orchestrated by Casella), Dec. 17, 1920.
Bloch: "Hiver" and "Printemps," April 29, 1921.
Carpenter: Suite from the Ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta," Feb. 25, 1921.
Franck: Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue (orchestrated by Pierne), Oct. 8, 1920.
d'Indy: "La Queste de Dieu," from "La Legende de Saint-Christophe," Dec. 23, 1920.
Kalinnikoff: Symphony No. 1, G minor, April 1, 1921.
Lekeu: Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folksongs of Anjou, Oct. 8, 1920.
Ravel: Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, March 11, 1921.
Respighi: "Fontane di Roma," Nov. 12, 1920.
Schubert: "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4, C minor (as a whole), April 8, 1921.
Scott: Two Passacaglias, Jan. 28, 1921.
Vassilenko: Epic Poem, April 18, 1921.
Williams: A London Symphony, Feb. 18, 1921.

SONGS

Mason, D. G.: "Russians," Op. 18 (Reinald Werrenrath, baritone), Nov. 19, 1920.

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS

Franck: "Les Djinns," symphonic poem for piano and orchestra, after Hugo, E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, Jan. 21, 1921.
Mozart: Air of Pamina from "The Magic Flute" (Mme. Hulda Lashanska), Jan. 28, 1921.
Concerto in E flat major for violin (Jacques Thibaud), Feb. 18, 1921.
Shepherd: Fantasy for piano and orchestra (Heinrich Gebhard, pianist), April 15, 1921.
Wagner: Transformation Music and closing scene of Act. I, "Parsifal," March 25, 1921.

A glance at the list of composers whose works were played will give an idea of Mr. Monteux's catholicity, to which we have referred.

Summary

The following composers were represented at these concerts for the first time: Bax, Bingham, Kalinnikoff, Lekeu, Mason, D. G., Mason, S., Milhaud, Respighi, Scott, Shepherd, Vassilenko, Williams.

Balakireff	1	Loeffler	1
Bax	1	Malipiero	1
Beethoven	7	Mason, D. G.	1
Berlioz	2	Mason, S.	1
Bingham	1	Mendelssohn	2
Bloch	1	Milhaud	1
Brahms	4	Mozart	9
Bruch	1	Ravel	2
Carpenter	1	Respighi	*2
Chabrier	1	Roger-Ducasse	1
Chadwick	1	Ropartz	1
Charpentier	1	Saint-Saens	2
Debussy	1	Schubert	2
Delius	1	Schumann	3
Dukas	1	Scott	1
Dvorak	1	Scriabin	1
Enesco	2	Shepherd	1
Foote	1	Sibelius	1
Franck	3	Strauss	3
Gilbert	1	Stravinsky	1
Griffes	1	Strube	1
Haydn	2	Tschaikowsky	2
Hill	1	Vassilenko	1
D'Indy	1	Wagner	4
Kalinnikoff	1	Weber	1
Lalo	1	Williams	†2
Lekeu	1
Liszt	2	Total	91

*Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" was played twice.

†Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" was played twice.

Of these composers, Bingham, Carpenter, Chadwick, Foote, Gilbert, Griffes, Hill, D. G. Mason, S. Mason, Shepherd were born in this country. Add to the list Messrs. Loeffler and Strube, Americans by their long residence and musical activity in this country—12 in all.

Fifty-four composers were represented. There has been trifling, foolish talk about French propaganda. Of these composers only 12 were French by birth. Franck, a Belgian, was a naturalized Frenchman; Lekeu was a Belgian; Enesco was a Roumanian.

The soloists were as follows:

Sopranos: Mmes. Lashanska and Nielsen 2
Baritone: Mr. Werrenrath 1
Pianists: Messrs. Bauer, Gebhard, Grainger Levitzki, Maier, Moiseiwitsch, Pattison, Rubinstein 8
Violinists: Messrs. Burgin and Thibaud and Miss Menges 3
Violoncellists: Messrs. Bedetti and Schroeder 2
16

Mmes. Lashanska and Menges appeared for the first time in Boston.

Messrs. Maier, Moisewitsch, Pattison and Rubinstein played for the first time at these concerts. Miss Nielsen and Mr. Werrenrath sang for the first time at these concerts.

POPS OPEN TOMORROW

A principal event of the spring will be the opening night of the 36th season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, May 2. Festive with new decorations, tables, food and drink, Symphony Hall will cast off for this occasion the formalities of the regular concert season. And yet, with the Pops, many qualities of the finest concerts still remain. The large and splendid orchestra of symphony players is more than adequate for the most brilliant and exacting symphonic scores. Further zest is added to their playing by the inspired leadership of Agide Jacchia, conductor of opera in past years and of the Pop concerts in recent seasons. Since there is no statute against intoxicating music, Maestro Jacchia is able to charm all Pop goers with the alternately lively and soulful qualities of his skilfully planned programs.

Although the Women' City Club, Durant, Inc., the Boston Athletic Association and the Music Supervisors' convention have taken parts of the house for their own amusement on the nights of Tuesday, Wedneday, Thursday and Friday, these nights and all nights of the week will be open to the public. The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 2

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugene Oneigin" .... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite" a, En Bateau;
b, Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" .... Vollstedt
"Procession of the Sardar" .... Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

TUESDAY, MAY 3

Introduction of Act III, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Fantasia "Madama Butterfly" .... Puccini
Suite "Nutcracker" .... Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
"La Boheme" .... Puccini
"Reve Angelique" .... Rubinstein
Waltz "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Stra ss

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4

French Military March .... Saint-Sa
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wag Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Stra
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leo
Tempest Scene from "Othello," Act 1 .... Verd
Adagio Cantabile from the Sonata "Pathetique" .... Beethove
Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps .... Berlioz
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Ouverture "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Giga (arr by Agide Jacchia) .... van Westerhout
Cortege de Bacchus .... Delibes

THURSDAY, MAY 5

Coronation March, from "Le Prophete"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "The Girl of the Golden West" Puccini
Overture to "Il Guarany" .... Gomez
"Waltz of the Hours," from "Coppelia"
Delibes
"Aurora" .... H. Dunham
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Dance of the Cammorrists .... Wolf-Ferrari

FRIDAY, MAY 6

"Rakoczy" March .... Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"
Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" ....
R. Strauss
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Dream of Love .... Blon
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Songs by Chorus of the Eastern Music Supervisors (with organ), Albert Edmund Brown, conductor
Fantasia "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Hindu Song .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

SATURDAY, MAY 7

Cortege, from "The Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" .... Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Suite No. 2 "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony .... Dvorak
Capriccio .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....
Saint-Saens

HERALD. MAY 1.

Pop Concerts Begin Tomorrow Night

The Pop Concerts begin their 26th season at Symphony Hall tomorrow night. Agide Jacchia will again conduct the orchestra of 80 Boston Symphony Orchestra members in programs of popular and standard music on every week day evening from 8 to 11. Tables fill the floor, at which soft drinks and light refreshments may be ordered. Those who sit in the balconies can obtain refreshments in the usual room at the end of the corridor. Smoking is permitted on the floor.

These details are familiar enough to most Bostonians, but newcomers to the city need to be told about the "Pops" since they are an institution not found elsewhere in the United States. Among the composers represented on the programs for the opening week are Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Debussy, Dvorak, Grieg, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Weber, Chabrier, Richard Strauss, Verdi, Beethoven, Berlioz, Saint-Saens, Casella, Liszt, Bizet and Scarlatti. Yet there are popular concerts in fact as well as in name, as the experience of past seasons has proved. Most permanently popular music is also great music.

The Symphony concerts have shown a steady and gratifying progress toward regaining their former remarkable excellence. Mr Monteux, who is to conduct them again next year, has shown admirable patience, good humor, and a high order of musicianship. His remolding of the twice shattered orchestra into a sensitive and pliable instrument is a great achievement. The programs have been unusually attractive, the performances have averaged better thn one hoped for. At best they have been equal to the best work done before the war, but there have been more flaws than of old, as was invitable under the circumstances.

GLOBE MAY 1.

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

An important and highly festive event will be the opening of the 36th season of Pop Concerts tonight in Symphony Hall at 8:15.

According to the custom of the Pops, refreshments will be served at the tables, while ravishing music is being performed by the splendid orchestra of 80 symphony players. Agide Jacchia, continuing at the conductor's post, will present the following eventful programme:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite"—
(a) En Bateau. (b) Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" .... Vollstedt
"Processor of the Sardar" .... Ippolito-Ivanoff

POST MAY 2

POP CONCERT SERIES WILL OPEN TONIGHT

Orchestra of 80 Symphony Musicians Will Play Under Jacchia

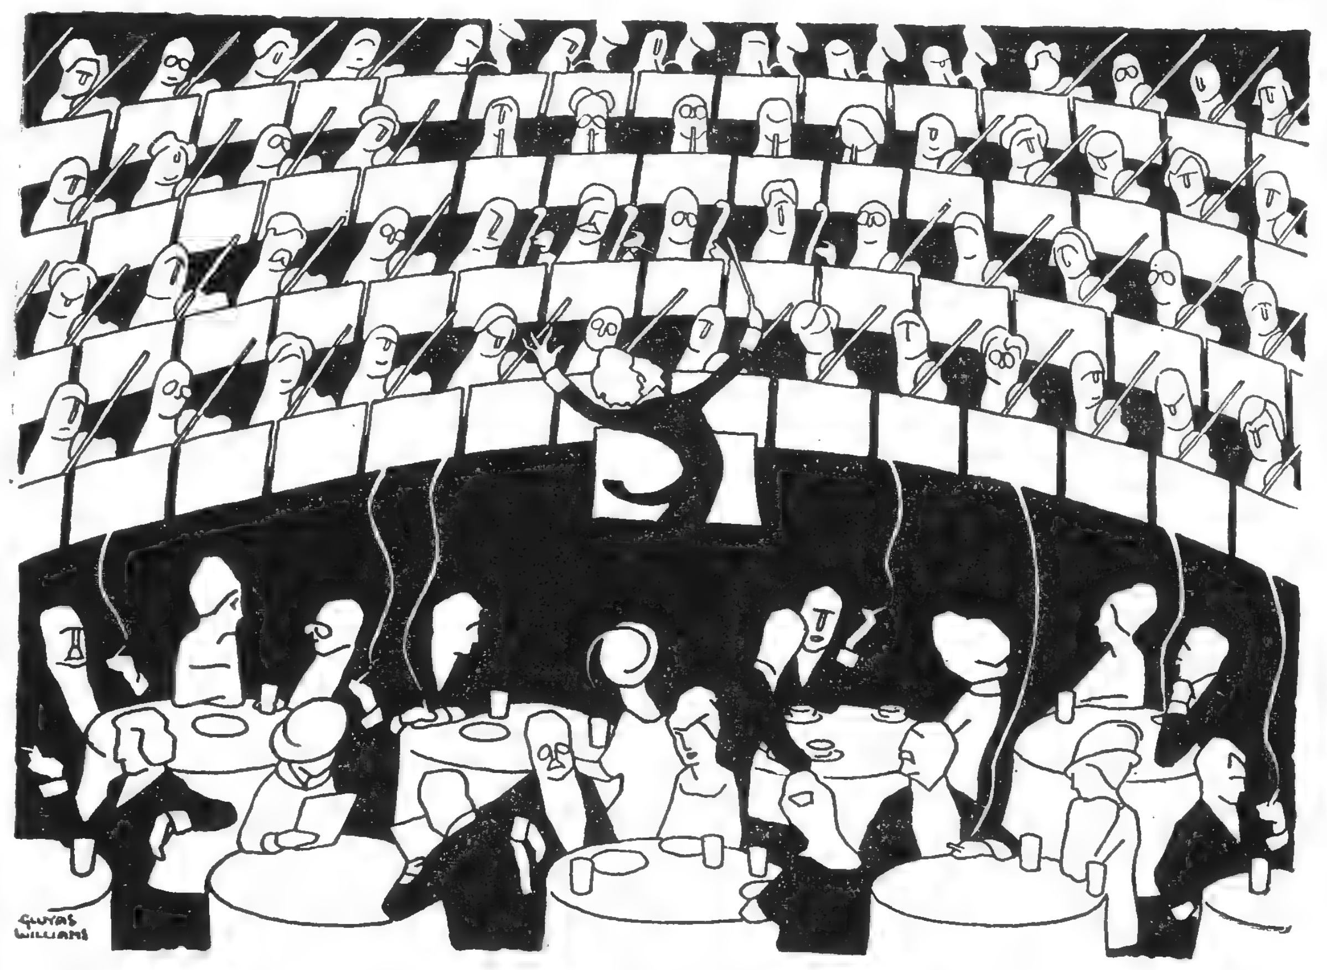
The 26th season of Pop Concerts opens tonight in Symphony Hall at 8:15. According to the custom of the Popo, refreshments will be served at the tables, while the spledid orchestra of 80 symphony players entertains from the platform Agide Jacchia, continuing at the conductor's post, will present the following program:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen" .... Suppe
"By Moonlight" .... Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky
From the "Petite Suite," a. En Bateau,
b. Cortege .... Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .... Dvorak
"Spring" .... Grieg
Finale, "Scheheazade" .... Bimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne" .... Vollstedt
"Procession of the Sardar"
Ippolito-Ivanoff

HERALD. MAY 2

Chamber's Second Annual Pop Concert, Monday, May 9

JUDGING from the increasing sale of tickets at the Chamber's offices for the Second Annual "Pop of Pops" those members who have not already secured reservations will do well to clip immediately the coupon at the bottom of this page. The best eats are going fast and applications are being filled in the order ceived.



The "Pop of Pops"

A well-chosen program has been arranged for this event by Conductor Agide Jacchia of Symphony's eighty piece orchestra. The program is as follows:

1. Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) .... Elgar
2. Waltz "The Skaters" .... Waldteufel
3. Ride of the Valkyrie .... Wagner
4. Fantasia "Tosca" .... Puccini
5. Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia" .... Delibes

---

a continued increased demand, with considerable orders coming in from cut-sole manufacturers. There is a slightly improved feeling in the upper leather market, but nothing like a boom can be expected until the demand for men's shoes becomes more normal. There are actual shortages in some kinds of upper leathers, including the best grade of black calf.

In the hide markets there is a firmer feeling, accompanied by slightly increased transactions, the most notable turnover in the Chicago market of late having been a quantity of winter native steers at 10 cents for January and 9 cents for February and March stock. Late sales of calf- this same market have been so serious in the case shoe manufacturing concern that has closed down its plant "until such time as the firm is able to produ and sell shoes," meaning until workers are willing to accept reduc pay.

There is a movement on foot boom the glazed kid branch of t tanning industry, the headquarters the propaganda being Wilmingto Del. The underlying idea is to to organize a National buying mov ment that will result in four milli pairs of shoes containing Wilmin glazed kid being worn by free a enlightened Americans. New En land has at least one important pla in which glazed kid is produced.

(Continued on Page 23)

URANT AFFAIRS MAY 2

SEASON OF POP CONCERTS OPEN

Symphony Hall Audience Shows Keen Appreciation of Program

ORCHESTRA PLAYS WITH USUAL SKILL

Though still under the spell of a certain melancholy that has enveloped them since the old popping days, the Pop concerts opened last night in Symphony Hall. The house was crowded and the throng had a more cosmopolitan appearance than ever. All parts of Boston seemed represented and a sizable part of the rest of the world also.

The program containing pieces by Wagner, Suppe, Tschaikowsky, Debussy, Dvorak and Grieg made a wide appeal that evidently had a thorough response. There were four selections by Slavonic composers and it was noticeable that these roused the most strenuous enthusiasm among the audience. One reason for this was that 200 seats had been provided for delegates attending a fraternal convention now in session in Boston and that a large proportion of the members are Russians.

The orchestra under the leadership of Agide Jacchia played with all its accustomed artistic skill, vim and vividness of expression. The musicians were generous in response to the acclaim of their hearers and an extra number was added after each regular selection. A fantasy based on Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" particularly took the people's fancy and in keeping with the Slavic predominance of the evening an arrangement of the Volga Boatman's song done by Mr. Jacchia was given. This called forth such a storm of approval that it was repeated.

Even without the old fizzing accompaniments of bygone days, the Pops are plainly as popular as ever and there can be no doubt that one of the most successful seasons in their long history was begun last night.

HERALD. MAY 3-

As the audience of Friday afternoon set the pace in leave-taking at the Symphony Concerts, so the audience of Saturday evening kept and sped it, while, incidentally, two familiar customs, for a year or two put by, were renewed. Before the concert began, in the tuning room, Judge Cabot speaking for the trustees, congratulated the orchestra upon the work of the year in such a little speech as Mr. Higginson used to make. By exception, moreover, Mrs. Higginson stood beside him while he spoke, as though to reaffirm, as have other recent works on her part, a continuing interest in the band. Again, the familiar flowers of the final concert stood by the conductor's stand—this time in the colors and the ribbons of France and the United States. When at last Mr. Monteux came to his place, an audience, from which only scattered subscribers were absent, saluted him with round upon round of applause. Still heartier clapping followed the performance of Franck's Symphony, swelling longest and loudest when the conductor stood in the crescent of the risen orchestra. As on Friday, the audience lingered after the concert; would not have done until twice and thrice it had recalled Mr. Monteux, striving to shift a share of these plaudits to the smiling orchestra; until rising, it had again clapped and cheered him. In such earned appreciation, it is pleasure both to give and to receive, and of such, beyond debating, are the deserts of the conductor and the men who are restoring the quality and with it the prestige of the Boston Orchestra. This season the stride has been long and full; on Friday and Saturday the plaudits also spanned it.

H. T. P.

—

Too Early Bloch

For novel piece in these final concerts, Mr. Monteux went back to Bloch—composer of individuality, vision, power and waxing fulfillment, like to none other in our time, much too rarely heard at Symphony Hall and then not always in a characteristic and revealing music. Once and twice Dr. Muck played his "Hebrew Poems," and hearers discovered the heighth and depth of his imagination kindled by the rites, the origins, the traits and emotions of his race—discovered also his command of sonorities, of color, of the whole decorative arsenal of modern music in voice of modern orchestra. Once and twice Mr. Monteux and Mme. Frijsh in a setting of Psalms, revealed his acrid vehemence, his rigors of form and progress, his sweep of exclamation. But of other music from Bloch's "Jewish period"—as the classifying commentators will name it—of the manifold and magniloquent Rhapsody, "King Solomon," for example, we in Boston know nothing by evidence of our own ears. Never have we heard the orchestral version of the Suite for Viola and Piano; nor do we yet know—though it is no obligation of Mr. Monteux—the present crown of Bloch's music, the Sonata for Piano and Violin. And both are the work of ripened, controlled, reinvigorated powers, quickened with an intensified imagery, sweeping into new channels of expression.

As it was, Mr. Monteux chose to return to the early Bloch of the brief and mated tone-poems: "Winter-Spring"—tonal meditation upon a world bare, cold, bleak; tonal ode to a world warmed, brightened, blossoming. The musical, the [illegible] means, method, contrasts were [illegible] to anticipate as they were pleasurable to hear. The motivs rose quickly into melody like to the voice of brooding and desolate, of blithesome and jocund song. Cleanly, sensitively drawn was the musical outline; apt, fanciful, mellow went the play of harmonies and timbres, with now and then a single voice or a vivid modulation sharp upon them. A pleasing music indeed, such as composers in their twenties wrote as many years ago; a music also that here and there in expression is still characteristic of Bloch; but a music that is not even preluding to the powers and splendors he has already fulfilled. For another year, doubtless, Mr. Monteux keeps them.

H. T. P.

—

Here in Boston

At the end of the week Mr. Monteux will take ship for Le Havre to remain in Europe until September, in part taking holiday, in part seeking recent music and new players for the Symphony Concerts next season. Ten or twelve others from the orchestra, for the most part the leaders of the several choirs, are also departing for a summer in Europe and almost on the same day.

At the Pops Tonight

Opening Programme

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen"......Suppé
By Moonlight....................Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugen Onégin"..Chaikovsky
Two Movements from the "Petite Suite" ....Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3..........Dvorak
Spring ....Grieg
Finale from the Suite, "Scheherazade" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"....Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne".Vollstedt
Procession of the Sardar, from the "Caucasian Sketches," Ippolitov-Ivanov

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY 2.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT POPS OPENING

The thirty-sixth season of the Boston Pops began in Symphony Hall last night. There were eighty men in the orchestra and Agide Jacchia was again the conductor.

The big audience, which always welcomes the opening of the Pops, was on hand, despite the comparative coolness of the weather. Real Pops weather is summer weather. There was the usual enthusiasm, encores and attractive mixture of classic and popular music.

Mr. Jacchia's programs grow more serious as the seasons go by. Last night he played from Wagner Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tschaikowsky, Grieg Dvorak, Debussy and Puccini. Only the encores were light, and they were not so very light. However, all the selections were tuneful and all were much admired.

The program:

1.—March from "Tannhauser".......Wagner
2.—Overture "Tantalusqualon"........Suppe
3.—"By Moonlight" ....Bendel
4.—Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky
5.—From the "Petite Suite"—
  a. En Bateau
  b. Cortege ....Debussy
6.—Slavonic Dance, No. 3............Dvorak
7.—"Spring" ....Grieg
8.—Finale, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
9.—Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".......Puccini
10.—Waltz, "Reve au Champagne," Vollstedt
11.—"Processor of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanoff

AMER. MAY 3

"POPS" OPENING DRAWS A CROWD

Larger Orchestra and More "High Brow" Music

"Volga Bargemen's Song" Makes the Hit of the Evening

The opening of the "Pops" drew a crowd which filled Symphony Hall to capacity last evening. Prohibition, which banished beer and light wines from the menus, had not diminished people's zest for hearing the best light music in a place where one can eat, smoke and consume innocuous beverages at one's ease.

Waitresses, first introduced during the war, still replace waiters, and the stage this season is banked with potted shrubs and flowers. The orchestra is slightly larger than it used to be, and there is a larger percentage of music from great composers.

Mr Jacchia had to refuse several insistent demands for extra pieces, after granting no less than five encores, in order that the concert might be out promptly at 11, as the rule requires. He was enthusiastically applauded at his first appearance by many who remember his spirited and intelligent conducting from former seasons. He gets better results from the orchestra than any of his recent predecessors have secured.

The first number was the lively march from "Tannhauser." The jazzy "Tantalusqualen" Overture of Suppe had to be encored by Cesar Cui's colorful "Orientale." Bendel's popular "By Moonlight," the third number, drew another even better liked piece as an extra, Rachmaninoff's C-sharp minor Prelude.

Debussy is commonly regarded as an especially high-brow composer, yet a selection from his "Petite Suite" was encored enthusiastically. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Chanson Indoue" and the finale from his "Scheherazade," more of what could be called "high-brow stuff," were exceptionally well received. Jacques Hoffman played the violin solo in the latter number with remarkable skill.

The "Volga Bargemen's Song," orchestrated by Mr Jacchia, played as an extra after a selection from Puccini's "Manon," made the hit of the evening. The audience refused to let the concert go on until it was repeated. Almost everyone stayed through the last number, the "Procession of the Sardar," by Ippolitov-Ivanov, a sonorous and tuneful Russian piece unfamiliar to most of the audience which proved a desirable addition to the repertory of these concerts.

Tonight is "Women's City Club Night," but places in the balconies and on the floor are available for the general public. The program is as follows:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture to "Oberon"................Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman'..Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"........Puccini
Suite, "Nutcracker"............Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci".........Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana".................Chabrier
"La Boheme".........................Puccini
"Reve Angelique"................Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss

TRANS-MAY 2

GLOBE-MAY.3.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Women's City Club has engaged a number of tables at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, this concert, the second of the season, will be in every way open to the public. The program:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture to "Oberon"..................Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman"..Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"........Puccini
Suite, "Nutcracker"...........Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci"........Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or"... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana"..................Chabrier
"La Boheme".........................Puccini
"Reve Angelique"................Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..Strauss

HERALD-MAY.3.

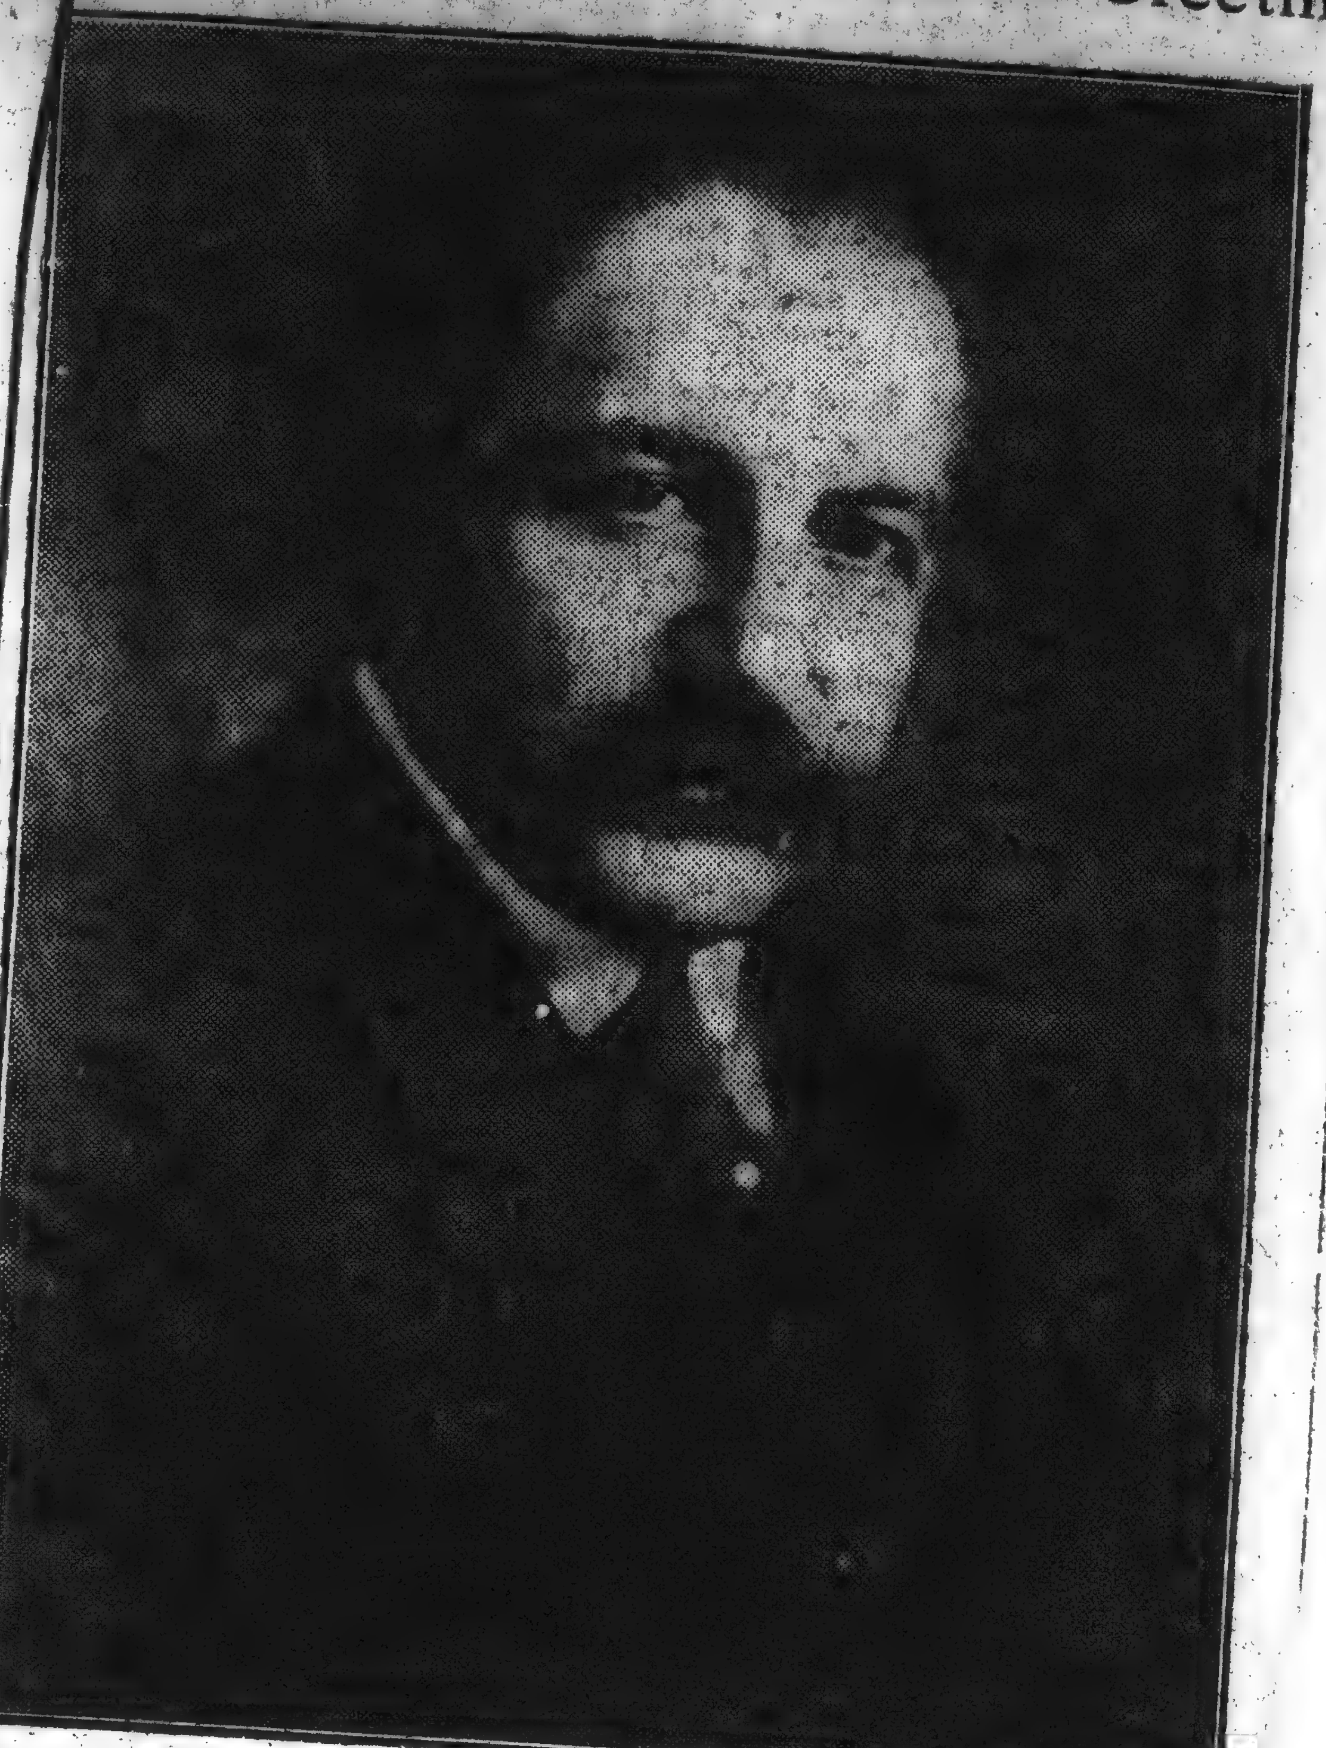
AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Although the Women's City Club have engaged for themselves a number of tables at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, this concert, the second of the season, will be in every way open to the public. The programme follows.

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture to "Oberon" ....Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman".Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".........Puccini
Suite, "Nutcracker" ....Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci".......Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun, from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana" ....Chabrier
"La Boheme" ....Puccini
Reve Angelique ....Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss

POST MAY.3-

For Spring Farewell and Autumn Greeting



Pierre Monteux (Photograph by Ga

Restorer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

POPS OPEN WITH HALL FILLED UP

High Type of Music and Refreshments Enjoyed

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 1921 season of the Pops opened last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Jacchia conducted. A programme of compositions of proved popularity was played by some 80 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience filled the hall to capacity and showed that the Pop concerts are becoming so attractive that the great public attends them for musical enjoyment, regardless of occasion or temperature.

BETTER MUSICAL FARCE

The programmes of these concerts have gradually changed of late years. There is more substance in the musical fare and less of the ephemeral. Some, the writer among them, regret certain features of the old programmes, but the net result of Mr. Jacchia's procedure emphasizes the truth of the saying of Theodore Thomas: that understanding of good music means simply familiarity with good music. Of late seasons, at the Pops, have been heard repeatedly such works as the March from Tannhauser, with its pomp and ceremony, which opened the concert last night; music from Tschaikosky's opera, "Eugene Onegin"; the two charming little pieces of the youthful Debussy, "En Bateau" and "Cortege"; the third Slavonic Dance of Dvorak; the exquisite melody, "Spring of Grieg"; and the gorgeous finale of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after the "Arabian Nights." Ippolitov-Ivanoff's orientalism in his "Marche du Sardar" from the "Causcasian Sketches" is less familiar, but not less fascinating.

These and other composition showed ability of Mr. Jacchia and the capacities of the orchestra which he leads offered variety, contrast music made by masters, yet simple, readily intelligible and melodious. Enthusiasm ran high. The orchestra played a number of encores. Glasses glittered and rattled, albeit somewhat chillily, in this opening night of the Pops of 1921, on this second night in May, in the spring?

POST-MAY 3

Big Crowd Attend Opening of "Pops"

The 36th season of the "Pops" was ushered in last night at Symphony Hall to an audience that crowded the hall. Although prohibition seems to have put the damper on many activities, it has not lessened the popularity of these annual concerts. The wines and beers of the old days are missing, but not enthusiasm for the music. Every seat was taken last night and many stood at the back of the hall.

The interesting program opened with the march from "Tannhauser," followed by the overture from "Tantalusqualen" and Bendel's "By Moonlight." The fantasia from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin" and the finale from Rimsky-Korsakoff's magnificent "Scheherazade" were beautifully played. The latter is truly dramatic music; the orchestra last night brought out all its disturbing beauty. Another of the great Russian's compositions, the Hindu song from "Sadko," was played as an extra. The truth of the remark, "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar," is borne out by much Russian music; underneath it all lies a definite strain of the Orient.

The program also included "En Bateau" and "Cortege," from Debussy's "Petite Suite"; Dvorak's Slavonic Dance No. 3; Grieg's "Spring"; the fantasia from Puccini's opera, "Manon Lescaut"; Vollstedt's "Reve au Champagne," and "Procession of the Sardar," by Ippolito-Ivanoff.

Mr. Jacchia conducted with his usual inspired intelligence and enthusiasm. Tonight is "Women's City Club Night" at the concert.

T AV. MAY 3.

The Pops Begin Again True to Recent Form—Large and Able Orchestra, Eager Audience and Programme According to It's Likings—Miscellany and Musicians from Bradford Academy

In their essence the "Pops" are as immutable as their more serious precursors, but in sundry minor details they change from year to year. Chief among the innovations to be noted at the opening concert last evening was the increase in the number of players. To the casual observer it might have seemed that the whole Symphony Orchestra sat upon the stage. There are now, for example, sixteen first and fourteen second violins and the lower strings are very nearly in proportion, with the result that the string section alone is as large as the entire "Pop" orchestra of a dozen years ago. Another departure from precedent is to be found in the shortened programme, of eleven numbers instead of twelve as heretofore—a wise provision in view of the increasing demand for "extras." Surely the "Pops" are an excellent breeding-place for the "encore-itis" that is the bane of American concert-rooms.

In the choice of his first programme Mr. Jacchia made a clear effort to introduce unhackneyed material. There was an unfamiliar overture by von Suppé—that to his operetta "Tantalusqualen"—but the music, though in the composer's characteristic manner, lacks the vitality of his better known pieces. The other novelties, actual or comparative, were an effective arrangement of the "Voyage by Moonlight" from Franz Bendel's romantic suite for the piano, "Am Genfer See"; two numbers of Henri Busser's orchestral adaptation of Debussy's "Petite Suite," played a year or so ago at the Symphony Concerts; and a waltz, "Rêve au Champagne," by Vollstedt, known chiefly as the author of the fantastic "Jolly Brothers." The beaten path was also avoided in the operatic "selections" which were drawn from Chaikovsky's "Eugen Onégin" and Puccini's "Manon Lescaut," but neither fantasia is particularly diverting. The remaining numbers were the March from "Tannhäuser"; a Slavonic Dance by Dvôrák, "The Last Spring," one of two pieces for strings by Grieg; the "Procession of the Sardar" from Ippolitov-Ivanov's colorful "Caucasian Sketches" and the vivid and dramatic Finale of "Scheherazade." Both Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra were at their best in the pieces that asked the most of them. The performance of Debussy's and Rimsky-Korsakov's music would have graced any Symphony Concert. Wagner's March was played at an unaccountable speed but Ippolitov-Ivanov's was brilliantly effective.

So much for the music, which is—or rather used to be—but half a Pop Concert. The other half, the audience, furthered the tendency already noticeable last season. It was a numerous company—the hall could scarcely have held more—but it was a singularly quiet one. There was far less attention paid to refreshments and general sociability than was once the case, and much more attention paid to the music. Probably the advent of warmer weather will speed the sale of cooling drinks, but Mr. Jacchia—with perhaps a little help from the Volstead Act—has worked a change that bids fair to be permanent. The new public of the Pops is quite as absorbed, almost as resentful of disturbances as the audiences of the Symphony Concerts. Their tastes are different but they take their pleasures quite as seriously. On the face of it Mr. Jacchia's programmes would seem too much to favor the music that is neither "heavy" enough to impress nor light enough to entertain, yet by every token he is giving his very considerable following exactly what it wants.

W. S. S.

TRANS. MAY 3.

[125]

SEASON OF POP CONCERTS OPEN

Symphony Hall Audience Shows Keen Appreciation of Program

ORCHESTRA PLAYS WITH USUAL SKILL

Though still under the spell of a certain melancholy that has enveloped them since the old popping days, the Pop concerts opened last night in Symphony Hall. The house was crowded and the throng had a more cosmopolitan appearance than ever. All parts of Boston seemed represented and a sizable part of the rest of the world also.

The program containing pieces by Wagner, Suppe, Tschaikowsky, Debussy, Dvorak and Grieg made a wide appeal that evidently had a thorough response. There were four selections by Slavonic composers and it was noticeable that these roused the most strenuous enthusiasm among the audience. One reason for this was that 200 seats had been provided for delegates attending a fraternal convention now in session in Boston and that a large proportion of the members are Russians.

The orchestra under the leadership of Agide Jacchia played with all its accustomed artistic skill, vim and vividness of expression. The musicians were generous in response to the acclaim of their hearers and an extra number was added after each regular selection. A fantasy based on Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" particularly took the people's fancy and in keeping with the Slavic predominance of the evening an arrangement of the Volga Boatman's song done by Mr. Jacchia was given. This called forth such a storm of approval that it was repeated.

Even without the old fizzing accompaniments of bygone days, the Pops are plainly as popular as ever and there can be no doubt that one of the most successful seasons in their long history was begun last night.

HERALD. MAY 3-

As the audience of Friday afternoon set the pace in leave-taking at the Symphony Concerts, so the audience of Saturday evening kept and sped it, while, incidentally, two familiar customs, for a year or two put by, were renewed. Before the concert began, in the tuning room, Judge Cabot speaking for the trustees, congratulated the orchestra upon the work of the year in such a little speech as Mr. Higginson used to make. By exception, moreover, Mrs. Higginson stood beside him while he spoke, as though to reaffirm, as have other recent works on her part, a continuing interest in the band. Again, the familiar flowers of the final concert stood by the conductor's stand—this time in the colors and the ribbons of France and the United States. When at last Mr. Monteux came to his place, an audience, from which only scattered subscribers were absent, saluted him with round upon round of applause. Still heartier clapping followed the performance of Franck's Symphony, swelling longest and loudest when the conductor stood in the crescent of the risen orchestra. As on Friday, the audience lingered after the concert; would not have done until twice and thrice it had recalled Mr. Monteux, striving to shift a share of these plaudits to the smiling orchestra; until rising, it had again clapped and cheered him. In such earned appreciation, it is pleasure both to give and to receive, and of such, beyond debating, are the deserts of the conductor and the men who are restoring the quality and with it the prestige of the Boston Orchestra. This season the stride has been long and full; on Friday and Saturday the plaudits also spanned it.

H. T. P.

Too Early Bloch

For novel piece in these final concerts, Mr. Monteux went back to Bloch—composer of individuality, vision, power and waxing fulfillment, like to none other in our time, much too rarely heard at Symphony Hall and then not always in a characteristic and revealing music. Once and twice Dr. Muck played his "Hebrew Poems," and hearers discovered the heighth and depth of his imagination kindled by the rites, the origins, the traits and emotions of his race—discovered also his command of sonorities, of color, of the whole decorative arsenal of modern music in voice of modern orchestra. Once and twice Mr. Monteux and Mme. Frijsh in a setting of Psalms, revealed his acrid vehemence, his rigors of form and progress, his sweep of exclamation. But of other music from Bloch's "Jewish period"—as the classifying commentators will name it—of the manifold and magniloquent Rhapsody, "King Solomon," for example, we in Boston know nothing by evidence of our own ears. Never have we heard the orchestral version of the Suite for Viola and Piano; nor do we yet know—though it is no obligation of Mr. Monteux—the present crown of Bloch's music, the Sonata for Piano and Violin. And both are the work of ripened, controlled, reinvigorated powers, quickened with an intensified imagery, sweeping into new channels of expression.

As it was, Mr. Monteux chose to return to the early Bloch of the brief and mated tone-poems; "Winter-Spring"—tonal meditation upon a world bare, cold, bleak; tonal ode to a world warmed, brightened, blossoming. The musical, the poetical means, method, contrasts were as easy to anticipate as they were pleasurable to hear. The motivs rose quickly into melody like to the voice of brooding and desolate, of blithesome and jocund song. Cleanly, sensitively drawn was the musical outline; apt, fanciful, mellow went the play of harmonies and timbres, with now and then a single voice or a vivid modulation sharp upon them. A pleasing music indeed, such as composers in their twenties wrote as many years ago; a music also that here and there in expression is still characteristic of Bloch; but a music that is not even preluding to the powers and splendors he has already fulfilled. For another year, doubtless, Mr. Monteux keeps them.

H. T. P.

Here in Boston

At the end of the week Mr. Monteux will take ship for Le Havre to remain in Europe until September, in part taking holiday, in part seeking recent music and new players for the Symphony Concerts next season. Ten or twelve others from the orchestra, for the most part the leaders of the several choirs, are also departing for a summer in Europe and almost on the same day.

At the Pops Tonight

Opening Programme

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Overture, "Tantalusqualen"......Suppé
By Moonlight..................Bendel
Fantasia, "Eugen Onégin"..Chaikovsky
Two Movements from the "Petite Suite" ....Debussy
Slavonic Dance, No. 3..........Dvorak
Spring ....Grieg
Finale from the Suite, "Scheherazade" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"....Puccini
Waltz, "Reve au Champagne".Vollstedt
Procession of the Sardar, from the "Caucasian Sketches," Ippolitov-Ivanov

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY 2.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT POPS OPENING

The thirty-sixth season of the Boston Pops began in Symphony Hall last night. There were eighty men in the orchestra and Agide Jacchia was again the conductor.

The big audience, which always welcomes the opening of the Pops, was on hand, despite the comparative coolness of the weather. Real Pops weather is summer weather. There was the usual enthusiasm, encores and attractive mixture of classic and popular music.

Mr. Jacchia's programs grow more serious as the seasons go by. Last night he played from Wagner Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tschaikowsky, Grieg Dvorak, Debussy and Puccini. Only the encores were light, and they were not so very light. However, all the selections were tuneful and all were much admired.

The program:

1.—March from "Tannhauser".......Wagner
2.—Overture "Tantalusqualon".......Suppe
3.—"By Moonlight" ....Bendel
4.—Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky
5.—From the "Petite Suite"—
a. En Bateau
b. Cortege ....Debussy
6.—Slavonic Dance, No. 3...........Dvorak
7.—"Spring" ....Grieg
8.—Finale, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
9.—Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"......Puccini
10.—Waltz, "Reve au Champagne," Vollstedt
11.—"Processor of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanoff

AMER. MAY 3

"POPS" OPENING DRAWS A CROWD

Larger Orchestra and More "High Brow" Music

"Volga Bargemen's Song" Makes the Hit of the Evening

The opening of the "Pops" drew a crowd which filled Symphony Hall to capacity last evening. Prohibition, which banished beer and light wines from the menus, had not diminished people's zest for hearing the best light music in a place where one can eat, smoke and consume innocuous beverages at one's ease.

Waitresses, first introduced during the war, still replace waiters, and the stage this season is banked with potted shrubs and flowers. The orchestra is slightly larger than it used to be, and there is a larger percentage of music from great composers.

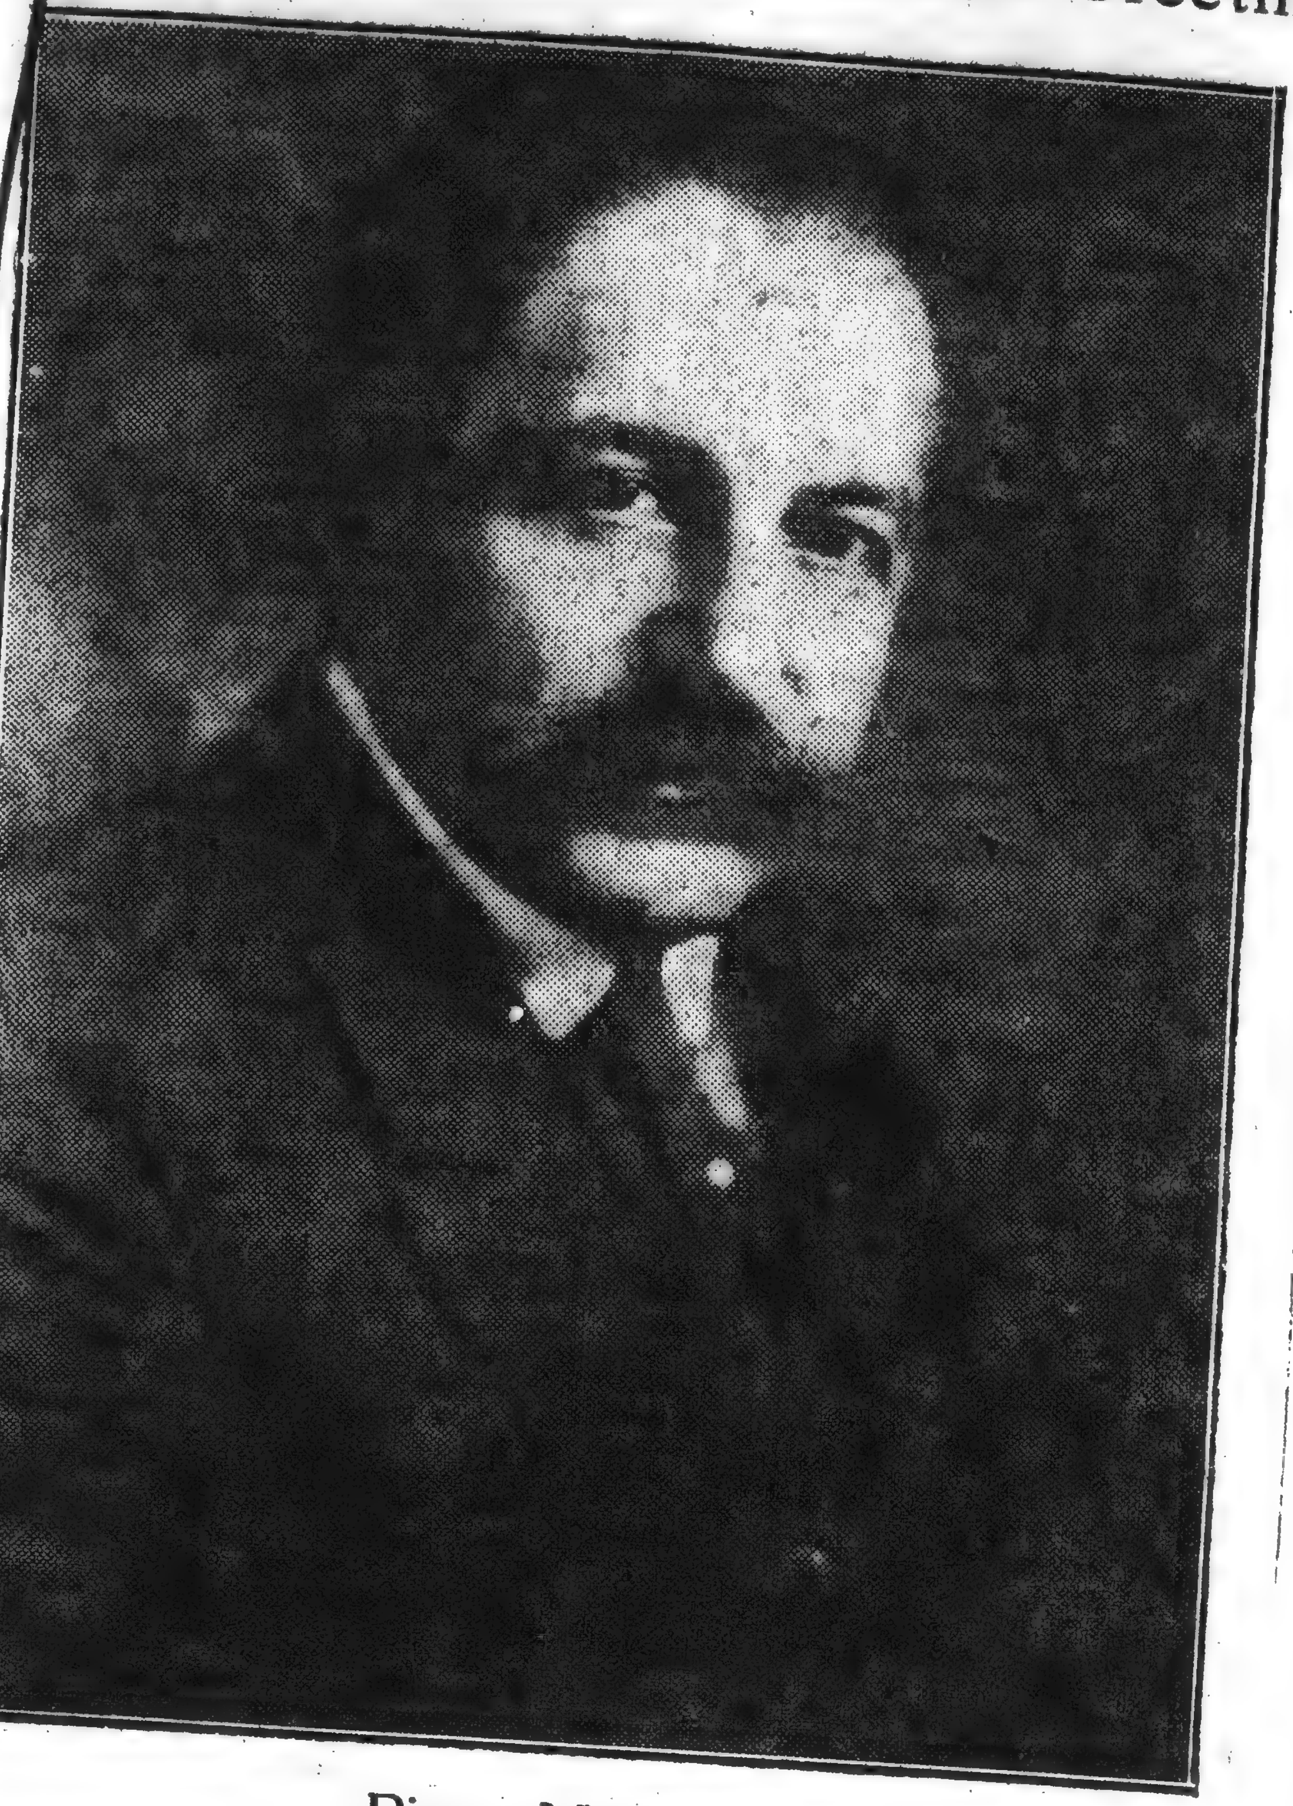
Mr Jacchia had to refuse several insistent demands for extra pieces, after granting no less than five encores, in order that the concert might be out promptly at 11, as the rule requires. He was enthusiastically applauded at his first appearance by many who remember his spirited and intelligent conducting from former seasons. He gets better results from the orchestra than any of his recent predecessors have secured.

The first number was the lively march from "Tannhauser." The jazzy "Tantalusqualen" Overture of Suppe had to be encored by Cesar Cui's colorful "Orientale." Bendel's popular "By Moonlight," the third number, drew another even better liked piece as an extra, Rachmaninoff's C-sharp minor Prelude.

Debussy is commonly regarded as an especially high-brow composer, yet a selection from his "Petite Suite" was encored enthusiastically. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Chanson Indoue" and the finale from his "Scheherazade," more of what could be called "high-brow stuff," were exceptionally well received. Jacques Hoffman played the violin solo in the latter number with remarkable skill.

The "Volga Bargemen's Song," orchestrated by Mr Jacchia, played as an extra after a selection from Puccini's

For Spring Farewell and Autumn Greeting



Pierre Monteux (Photograph by Ga

Restorer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TRANS-MAY 2

"Manon," made the hit of the evening. The audience refused to let the concert go on until it was repeated. Almost everyone stayed through the last number, the "Procession of the Sardar," by Ippolitov-Ivanov, a sonorous and tuneful Russian piece unfamiliar to most of the audience which proved a desirable addition to the repertory of these concerts.

Tonight is "Women's City Club Night," but places in the balconies and on the floor are available for the general public. The program is as follows:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture to "Oberon"...............Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman'..Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"........Puccini
Suite, "Nutcracker"..........Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci"........Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana"...............Chabrier
"La Boheme"........................Puccini
"Reve Angelique"................Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss

GLOBE-MAY.3.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Women's City Club has engaged a number of tables at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, this concert, the second of the season, will be in every way open to the public. The program:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture to "Oberon"..................Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman"..Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"........Puccini
Suite, "Nutcracker"............Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci"........Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or"... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana"...............Chabrier
"La Boheme".......................Puccini
"Reve Angelique"..............Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..Strauss

HERALD-MAY.3.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Although the Women's City Club have engaged for themselves a number of tables at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, this concert, the second of the season, will be in every way open to the public. The programme follows.

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture to "Oberon" ....Weber
Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffman".Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"........Puccini
Suite, "Nutcracker" ....Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci"........Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun, from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody, "Espana" ....Chabrier
"La Boheme" ....Puccini
Reve Angelique ....Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss

POST MAY.3-

POPS OPEN WITH HALL FILLED UP

High Type of Music and Refreshments Enjoyed

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 1921 season of the Pops opened last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Jacchia conducted. A programme of compositions of proved popularity was played by some 80 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience filled the hall to capacity and showed that the Pop concerts are becoming so attractive that the great public attends them for musical enjoyment, regardless of occasion or temperature.

BETTER MUSICAL FARCE

The programmes of these concerts have gradually changed of late years. There is more substance in the musical fare and less of the ephemeral. Some, the writer among them, regret certain features of the old programmes, but the net result of Mr. Jacchia's procedure emphasizes the truth of the saying of Theodore Thomas: that understanding of good music means simply familiarity with good music. Of late seasons, at the Pops, have been heard repeatedly such works as the March from Tannhauser, with its pomp and ceremony, which opened the concert last night; music from Tschaikosky's opera, "Eugene Onegin"; the two charming little pieces of the youthful Debussy, "En Bateau" and "Cortege"; the third Slavonic Dance of Dvorak; the exquisite melody, "Spring of Grieg"; and the gorgeous finale of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after the "Arabian Nights." Ippolitov-Ivanoff's orientalism in his "Marche du Sardar" from the "Causcasian Sketches" is less familiar, but not less fascinating.

These and other composition showed ability of Mr. Jacchia and the capacities of the orchestra which he leads offered variety, contrast music made by masters, yet simple, readily intelligible and molodious. Enthusiasm ran high. The orchestra played a number of encores. Glasses glittered and rattled, albeit somewhat chillily, in this opening night of the Pops of 1921, on this second night in May, in the spring?

POST - MAY 3.

Big Crowd Attend Opening of "Pops"

The 36th season of the "Pops" w ushered in last night at Symphony H to an audience that crowded the hall. Although prohibition seems to have put the damper on many activities, it has not lessened the popularity of these annual concerts. The wines and beers of the old days are missing, but not enthusiasm for the music. Every seat was taken last night and many stood at the back of the hall.

The interesting program opened with the march from "Tannhauser," followed by the overture from "Tantalusqualen" and Bendel's "By Moonlight." The fantasia from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin" and the finale from Rimsky-Korsakoff's magnificent "Scheherazade" were beautifully played. The latter is truly dramatic music; the orchestra last night brought out all its disturbing beauty. Another of the great Russian's compositions, the Hindu song from "Sadko," was played as an extra. The truth of the remark, "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar," is borne out by much Russian music; underneath it all lies a definite strain of the Orient.

The program also included "En Bateau" and "Cortege," from Debussy's "Petite Suite"; Dvorak's Slavonic Dance No. 3; Grieg's "Spring"; the fantasia from Puccini's opera, "Manon Lescaut"; Vollstedt's "Reve au Champagne," and "Procession of the Sardar," by Ippolito-Ivanoff.

Mr. Jacchia conducted with his usual inspired intelligence and enthusiasm. Tonight is "Women's City Club Night" at the concert.

MAY 3.

The Pops Begin Again True to Recent Form—Large and Able Orchestra, Large Audience and Programme According to It's Likings—Miscellany and Musicians from Bradford Academy

IN their essence the "Pops" are as immutable as their more serious precursors, but in sundry minor details they change from year to year. Chief among the innovations to be noted at the opening concert last evening was the increase in the number of players. To the casual observer it might have seemed that the whole Symphony Orchestra sat upon the stage. There are now, for example, sixteen first and fourteen second violins and the lower strings are very nearly in proportion, with the result that the string section alone is as large as the entire "Pop" orchestra of a dozen years ago. Another departure from precedent is to be found in the shortened programme, of eleven numbers instead of twelve as heretofore—a wise provision in view of the increasing demand for "extras." Surely the "Pops" are an excellent breeding-place for the "encore-itis" that is the bane of American concert-rooms.

In the choice of his first programme Mr. Jacchia made a clear effort to introduce unhackneyed material. There was an unfamiliar overture by von Suppé—that to his operetta "Tantalusqualen"—but the music, though in the composer's characteristic manner, lacks the vitality of his better known pieces. The other novelties, actual or comparative, were an effective arrangement of the "Voyage by Moonlight" from Franz Bendel's romantic suite for the piano, "Am Genfer See"; two numbers of Henri Busser's orchestral adaptation of Debussy's "Petite Suite," played a year or so ago at the Symphony Concerts; and a waltz, "Rêve au Champagne," by Vollstedt, known chiefly as the author of the fantastic "Jolly Brothers." The beaten path was also avoided in the operatic "selections" which were drawn from Chaikovsky's "Eugen Onégin" and Puccini's "Manon Lescaut," but neither fantasia is particularly diverting. The remaining numbers were the March from "Tannhäuser"; a Slavonic Dance by Dvôrák, "The Last Spring," one of two pieces for strings by Grieg; the "Procession of the Sardar" from Ippolitov-Ivanov's colorful "Caucasian Sketches" and the vivid and dramatic Finale of "Scheherazade." Both Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra were at their best in the pieces that asked the most of them. The performance of Debussy's and Rimsky-Korsakov's music would have graced any Symphony Concert. Wagner's March was played at an unaccountable speed but Ippolitov-Ivanov's was brilliantly effective.

So much for the music, which is—or rather used to be—but half a Pop Concert. The other half, the audience, furthered the tendency already noticeable last season. It was a numerous company—the hall could scarcely have held more—but it was a singularly quiet one. There was far less attention paid to refreshments and general sociability than was once the case, and much more attention paid to the music. Probably the advent of warmer weather will speed the sale of cooling drinks, but Mr. Jacchia—with perhaps a little help from the Volstead Act—has worked a change that bids fair to be permanent. The new public of the Pops is quite as absorbed, almost as resentful of disturbances as the audiences of the Symphony Concerts. Their tastes are different but they take their pleasures quite as seriously. On the face of it Mr. Jacchia's programmes would seem too much to favor the music that is neither "heavy" enough to impress nor light enough to entertain, yet by every token he is giving his very considerable following exactly what it wants.

W. &

TRANS. MAY 3.

rowd Attends ening of "Pops"

season of the "Pops" was last night at Symphony Hall dience that crowded the hall. ugh prohibition seems to have put damper on many activities, it has lessened the popularity of these al concerts. The wines and beers e old days are missing, but not usiasm for the music. Every seat taken last night and many stood at back of the hall.

e interesting program opened with march from "Tannhauser," followed he overture from "Tantalusqualen" Bendel's "By Moonlight." The fan- a from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene gin" and the finale from Rimsky- sakoff's magnificent "Scheherazade" e beautifully played. The latter is ly dramatic music; the orchestra last ht, brought out all its disturbing rity. Another of the great Russian's positions, the Hindu song from adko," was played as an extra. The h of the remark, "Scratch a Russian you find a Tartar," is borne out by h Russian music; underneath it all a definite strain of the Orient.

e program also included "En Ba- u" and "Cortege," from Debussy's tite Suite"; Dvorak's Slavonic Dance 3; Grieg's "Spring"; the fantasia n Puccini's opera, "Manon Lescaut"; stedt's "Reve au Champagne," and ocession of the Sardar," by Ippolito- noff.

r. Jacchia conducted with his usual ired intelligence and enthusiasm. ight is "Women's City Club Night" he concert.

AV. MAY 8.

---

ops Begin Again True to Recent —Large and Able Orchestra, Eager nce and Programme According to ikings—Miscellany and Musicians Bradford Academy

heir essence the "Pops" are as im- able as their more serious pre- ors, but in sundry minor details hange from year to year. Chief he innovations to be noted at the concert last evening was the in- n the number of players. To the bserver it might have seemed that ole Symphony Orchestra sat upon ge. There are now, for example, first and fourteen second violins lower strings are very nearly in on, with the result that the string- alone is as large as the entire rchestra of a dozen years ago. An- parture from precedent is to be n the shortened programme, of umbers instead of twelve as here- wise provision in view of the ng demand for "extras." Surely os" are an excellent breeding-place "encore-itis" that is the bane of n concert-rooms.

choice of his first programme Mr. made a clear effort to introduce eyed material. There was an un- overture by von Suppé—that to retta "Tantalusqualen"—but the though in the composer's char- c manner, lacks the vitality of his nown pieces. The other novelties, r comparative, were an effective ment of the "Voyage by Moonlight" anz Bendel's romantic suite for the Am Genfer See"; two numbers of Busser's orchestral adaptation of s "Petite Suite," played a year o at the Symphony Concerts; and "Rêve au Champagne," by Voll- own chiefly as the author of the "Jolly Brothers." The beaten s also avoided in the operatic ns" which were drawn from ky's "Eugen Onégin" and Puc- Manon Lescaut," but neither fan- particularly diverting. The re- numbers were the March from user"; a Slavonic Dance by "The Last Spring," one of two r strings by Grieg; the "Proces- the Sardar" from Ippolitov- colorful "Caucasian Sketches" vivid and dramatic Finale of azade." Both Mr. Jacchia and estra were at their best in the at asked the most of them. The nce of Debussy's and Rimsky- 's music would have graced any y Concert. Wagner's March was t an unaccountable speed but -Ivanov's was brilliantly effec-ch for the music, which is—or ed to be—but half a Pop Concert r half, the audience, furthered the already noticeable last season. It omerous company—the hall could have held more—but it was a sing- uiet one. There was far less at- paid to refreshments and general than was once the case, and ore attention paid to the music; the advent of warmer weather the sale of cooling drinks, but —with perhaps a little help from Act—has worked a change that to be permanent. The new pub- is quite as absorbed, almost of disturbances as the audi- Symphony Concerts. Their different but they take their as seriously. On the face programmes would seem the music that is neither ress nor light enough every token he is giving following exactly

W. S. S.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Women's City Club

Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon" .. Weber
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann" .... Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" .. Puccini
Suite from the Ballet, "Nutcracker" .... Chaikovsky
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" ...... Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Fantasia, "La Bohème" .... Puccini
Reve Angelique .... Rubinstein
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... J. Strauss

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRAV. MAY 5.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Durant, Inc.

French Military March ...... Saint-Saëns
Overture to the Opera "Rienzi" . Wagner
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" ...... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Tempest Scene from "Othello" .... Verdi
Adagio Cantabile from the Pathetic Sonata .... Beethoven
Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps . Berlioz
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Overture, "1812" .... Chaikovsky
Giga .... van Westerhout
Rout of Bacchus from "Sylvia" .. Delibes

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. MAY 4.

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops, with his splendid orchestra of 80 symphony players, will present this program in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation march from "Le Prophete" Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" ...... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "The Girl of the Golden West" Puccini
Overture to "Il Guarany" .... Gomez
"Waltz of the Hours" from "Coppelia" Delibes
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffman" Offenbach
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
"Dance of the Camorrists" .. Wolf-Ferrari

HERALD-MAY 5

At the Pops Tonight

Music-Supervisors' Evening

Rakoczy March .... Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Overture to "Tannhaeuser" .... Wagner
Dream of Love .... Blon
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Songs with Organ
(Chorus of Supervisors)
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .... Boito
Hindu Song .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

Conductors:
A Jacchia Albert Edmund Brown

TRANS MAY 6

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following programme will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of symphony players at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, thus closing the first week of the Pop Concerts:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" .. Gounod
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" .... Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
a. Prelude; b. Minuet; c. Farandole.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony, Dvorak
Capriccio .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens

POST MAY 7.

SECOND WEEK OF THE POPS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, which will begin their second week Monday, have easily proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm on every night of this, the first week, that the Pops of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Conductor Agide Jacchia, accounting for the varied taste of heterogeneous Pops audiences, has nevertheless subtly raised the quality of the program so that, suitable to the large orchestra of symphony players, the Pops are still enjoyable to all and forbidding to none. Occasionally brilliant symphonic pieces bring great applause, while operatic excerpts, waltzes, dances, and light numbers innumerable, keep their due places.

Every night of next week will be open to the public, although the following organizations have engaged own enjoyment; The

---

Boston Chamber of Commerce on Monday; Amherst College on Wednesday; the Canadian Club on Thursday, and the Massachusetts-Maine daughters on Friday. Tuesday night, May 10th, will bring a particularly attractive program, featuring the music of Wagner. The program for that night follows:

1.—Polonaise Militaire ..... Chopin-Glazounow
2.—Overture "Rosamunde" .... Schubert
3.—Marcia alla Turca from "Ruins of Athens" .... Beethoven
4.—Fantasia "Othello" .... Verdi
5.—Prelude to "Lohengrin"
6.—Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"
7.—Introduction to Act 3. "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner.
English horn solo—L. Speyer.
8.—Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
9.—Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
10.—En Badinant (for strings) .... d'Ambrosio
11.—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

AMER. MAY 7

Progress of The Pops—The Harvard Glee Club at the Art Museum—A Lecture on Bell-Music—The Impending "Festival of Song"

AFTER a pleasurable and prosperous first week, the Pop Concerts, every evening at Symphony Hall, pass next Monday into a second week as promising. Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra, often seventy or eighty strong, programmes and performance, have all kept to established standards and yielded anticipated satisfactions. As good in kind are cuisine and service, while every discriminating person knows that music and tobacco mate well together. But, nowadays, it is the music before all else with the public of The Pops —on the floor as well as in the galleries. Therefore, be it said at once that next Tuesday, it may expect a "Wagner Programme," with numbers from "Lohengrin," "Tannhaeuser," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Walküre," with Schubert's overture to "Rosamünde" added for good measure; that next Wednesday, the march-movement from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will clang into the list; that the Venusberg Music from "Tannhaeuser" will return on Thursday; and that Litolff's overture to "King Lear," seldom heard in recent years, will have place on Friday. In the course of the week, the Chamber of Commerce, Monday; Amherst College Wednesday; the Canadian Club, Thursday and the Maine-Massachusetts Daughters Friday—all have their "nights"; but on each and every evening there will be room and welcome for the general pub-

TRANS. MAY 7

THE POPS TONIGHT

The third Pop concert of the season will take place tonight in Symphony Hall, members of Durant, Inc. being particularly represented. Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Ora colo" .... Leoni
Tempest Scene from "Othello," Act I.... Verdi
Adagio Cantabile from the Sonata, "Pathetique" .... Beethoven
Minuet of the "Will o' the Wisps" .... Berlioz
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Ouverture Solonnelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Giga (Arr. by Agide Jacchia) ... van Westerhout
"Cortege de Bacchus" .... Delibes

HERALD. MAY 4

POPS TONIGHT

Although the Music Supervisors' Convention will be represented in considerable numbers at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this will be primarily a public affair. Conductor Agide Jacchia has compiled the following program:

"Rakoczy" March .... Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Dream of Love .... Blon
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Sons by chorus of the Eastern Music Supervisors (with organ)
Albert Edmund Brown, conductor.
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Hindu Song .... Rimsky-Korsakof
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

HERALD-MAY 6.

TONIGHT'S POPS

This program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of symphony players at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" ... Gounod
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" .... Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
(a) Prelude. (b) Minuet. (c) Farandole.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony .. Dvorak
Capriccio .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens

HERALD-MAY 7.

At the Pops Tonight

March from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" ...... Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Prelude, Minuet and Farandole from Suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony .... Dvorak
Capriccio .... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" Wagner
Slavic March .... Chaikovsky
Indian Summer .... Herbert
Bacchanal from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS MAY 7

Second Week of the Pops

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, which will begin their second week Monday, have easily proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm on every night of this, the first week, that the Pops of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Every night of next week will be open to the public, although the following organizations have engaged tables for their own enjoyment: The Boston Chamber of Commerce on Monday; Amherst College on Wednesday; The Canadian Club on Thursday, and the Massachusetts-Maine Daughters on Friday. Tuesday night, May 10, will bring a particularly attractive program, featuring the music of Wagner.

TRAV. MAY 7

MUSIC TEACHERS SING AT POPS

The annual convention of the eastern music supervisors closed its session with an evening at the Pops on Friday night. The supervisors, numbering about 600, have been in Boston during the past week talking over methods and various means of improving that all-important subject, "music in the public schools."

At the Pops concert a chorus of over 100 of these teachers sang four selections as part of the evening's program, under the conductorship of Mr. A. E. Brown.

Some of the decisions which were reached by the conference were standardization of music in the schools and a step for betterment of musical conditions in the South.

The fact that there was not enough credit given music in the high schools was under consideration, and the decision was made that in many high schools from now on music would count toward points for graduation.

In the afternoon at the hall an orchestra of 45 violins, played by boys from English high school, under the leadership of Mr. Joy, gave a demonstration of the effectiveness of instrumental music in the schools, as this was one of the important matters taken up by members at the conference.

HERALD MAY 8.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Chamber of Commerce

March, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar
Waltz, "The Skaters" .... Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyrs .... Wagner
Fantasia, "Tosca" .... Puccini
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia" ... Delibes
Prelude .... Rakhmaninov
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(For String Orchestra with Harp and Organ)
Slavic March .... Chaikovsky
Rhapsody, "España" .... Chabrier
Selection, "Apple Blossoms," Kreisler-Jacobi
March from "Aida" .... Verdi

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY 9.

TONIGHT'S POPS

For the pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight the Boston chamber of commerce has taken the floor for their own celebration. The balconies, however, will be open to the public and Agide Jacchia will present this program:

Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) ... —Elgar
Waltz, "The Skaters" .... Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Fantasia, "Tosca" .... Puccini
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia" .... Delibes
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Ave Maria (solo violin, harp, organ and strings) .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" .. Kreisler-Jacobi
March from "Aida" .... Verdi

HERALD-MAY 9.

WAGNER NIGHT AT POPS

One of the best programmes of the season will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, featuring popular selections from the operas of Richard Wagner. The numbers in detail follows:

Polonaise Militaire .... Chopin-Glazounow
Overture, "Rosamunde" .... Schubert
Marcia alla Turca from the "Ruins of Athens" .... Beethoven
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner
Introduction to Act 3, "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
English horn solo—Mr. L. Speyer.
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
En Badinant (for strings) .... D'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

POST MAY 10

TONIGHT'S POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the Massachusetts Maine Daughters being largely represented, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Entrance of the Gladiators .... Fucik
Overture, "King Lear" .... Litolff
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube" .. Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Two northern melodies (for strings). Grieg
(a) Popular song.
(b) Cow-keeper's Tune and Peasant Dance.
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" .... Mascagni
Moorish Serenade .... Elgar
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Invitation to the Dance .... Weber-Berlioz

Mr. Monteux Seeks New Talent

Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader Sails for England and the Continent in Search for New Artists

Mr. Monteux is on the high seas. He will engage some new artists for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the personnel will be increased next season. He will visit the Chesters, one of the most enterprising of music publishing houses, in London. He will be the not always happy recipient of innumerable new works by French composers, old and new. He will, in short, come in touch with the new productions of the entire musical world of Europe, and he will bring back so many of these new works as he thinks fit, to delight young people and shock old ones with, next winter.

of the man who composed the music, so much as the feeling latent in the listener.

POST-MAY 8.

THE POPS

The 36th season of "The Pops" in Symphony Hall promises to be the most popular of all. Operatic fantasias and overtures have gained much favor under the hand of this conductor of opera; waltzes, other dances innumerable, and "dreamy" pieces of a lighter sort, complete the musical fare at the Pops.

POST MAY 8.

At the Pops Tonight

Wagner Programme

Polonaise Militaire ...... Chopin-Glazunov
Overture, "Rosamünde" .... Schubert
Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens" .... Beethoven
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin"—Ride of the Valkyrs—Introduction to Act III., "Tristan and Isolde"—Excerpts from "The Mastersingers" .... Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
En Badinant .... d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Guests in "Tannhäuser" .... Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Soloist: L. Speyer (English Horn).

TRANS. MAY 10.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Amherst Alumni

March from "Aida" .... Verdi
Prelude .... Rakhmaninov
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" .. Puccini
Amherst Numbers ....
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1 .... Grieg
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppé
March Movement from The Pathetic Symphony .... Chaikovsky
Amherst Number ....
Selections from "Lady Billy" .... Levey
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Ride of the Valkyrs .... Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS MAY 11

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Canadian Club

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .. J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah". Saint-Saëns
God Save the King.
Selection from "Pinafore" .... Sullivan
Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser" .... Wagner
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Star-Spangled Banner.
Fantasia, "The Thistle" .... Myddleton
Valse Gracieuse .... German
Land of the Maple .... Laurendeau

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY 12

POPS OPEN IN RECORD FASHION

A record attendance and unbounded enthusiasm were so evident throughout the opening week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall that this, the thirty-sixth season of this Bostonian institution, promises to be the most popular of all. Although this may be attributed to refreshments and the general air of festivity, the prime attraction of the Pops is, of course, the orchestra of Symphony players, and the excellent results which Agide Jacchia, presiding over them, is able to obtain.

Every night this week will be open to the public. Tuesday night will feature Wagner music.

ADVERTISER-MAY 8.

TONIGHT'S POPS

One of the best programs of the season will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, featuring popular selections from the operas of Richard Wagner. The numbers:

Polonaise Militaire .... Chopin-Glazounow
Overture, "Rosamunde" .... Schubert
Marcia alla Turca from the "Ruins of Athens" .... Beethoven
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner
Introduction to act 3, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
English horn solo—Mr. L. Speyer.
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
En Badinant (for strings) .... D'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

HERALD-MAY 10

TONIGHT'S POPS

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, which will be in every sense public, although the Canadian Club has taken a section of the floor, Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra will present this program:

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
"God Save the King."
Selection from "Pinafore" .... Sullivan
Bacchanale (The Venusberg) from Act I. "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"Star Spangled Banner."
Selection of Scotch Airs, "The Thistle" Arr. Myddleton
"Valse Gracieuse" .... E. German
Land of the Maple .... Laurendeau

HERALD-MAY 12

At the Pops Tonight

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, which will be in every sense public, although the Canadian Club has taken a section of the floor, Agide Jacchia and his splendid orchestra will present the following programme:

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
"Roses From the South," waltz ...... Strauss
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens
"God Save the King."
Selection From "Pinafore" .... Sullivan
Bacchanale (The Venusberg) From Act I. "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"Star Spangled Banner."
Selection of Scotch airs, "The Thistle," Myddleton
"Valse Gracieuse" .... E. German
Land of the Maple .... Laurendeau

POST-MAY 12

The renewal of subscriptions for the Symphony Concerts next season exceeds that of any spring since the orchestra was reorganized. Barely two hundred seats, in various parts of the hall, are open to new subscribers to the matinées of Friday; while applications for the less costly seats on Saturday evenings are so numerous that the management may hardly fill them. There is pride now, as well as pleasure, in Mr. Monteux and his band.

A recent piece by Saint-Saëns will be played for the first time in America by Mr. Jacchia and his orchestra at the Pop Concert next Wednesday. It is memorial music, "Cypresses and Laurels," suggested by the aftermath of the late war. The first division, "Cypresses," is written for organ, of which instrument Saint-Saëns is past master. The second division, "Laurels," runs for organ and orchestra.

At the Pop Concert of Tuesday last, Mr. Jacchia set on the programme, among other pieces from Wagner, the introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan," which culminates in the long and melancholy measures played by the English horn, music of desolation and longing, if ever such was written. In the opera house they are played, not from the orchestra-pit, but from behind the scenes, so that they may seem to come from the watching, piping shepherd. Accordingly Mr. Jacchia placed Mr. Speyer "off-stage" and with his skill and sensibility to aid, gained something of the illusion designed by Wagner for the theatre.

TRANS. MAY 12

g Crowd Attends Opening of "Pops"

he 36th season of the "Pops" was ered in last night at Symphony Hall an audience that crowded the hall. hough prohibition seems to have put damper on many activities, it has lessened the popularity of these ual concerts. The wines and beers the old days are missing, but not husiasm for the music. Every seat taken last night and many stood at back of the hall.

he interesting program opened with march from "Tannhauser," followed the overture from "Tantalusqualen" Bendel's "By Moonlight." The fan- ia from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene egin" and the finale from Rimsky- rsakoff's magnificent "Scheherazade" re beautifully played. The latter is ly dramatic music; the orchestra last ht brought out all its disturbing uty. Another of the great Russian's npositions, the Hindu song from adko," was played as an extra. The th of the remark, "Scratch a Russian you find a Tartar," is borne out by ch Russian music; underneath it all a definite strain of the Orient.

he program also included "En Ba- u" and "Cortege," from Debussy's tite Suite"; Dvorak's Slavonic Dance 3; Grieg's "Spring"; the fantasia n Puccini's opera, 'Manon Lescaut"; lstedt's "Reve au Champagne," and ocession of the Sardar," by Ippolito- noff.

r. Jacchia conducted with his usual pired intelligence and enthusiasm. ight is "Women's City Club Night" he concert.

RAV. MAY 8.

ops Begin Again True to Recent —Large and Able Orchestra, Eager nce and Programme According to Likings—Miscellany and Musicians Bradford Academy

heir essence the "Pops" are as im- able as their more serious pre- ors, but in sundry minor details hange from year to year. Chief the innovations to be noted at the concert last evening was the in- n the number of players. To the observer it might have seemed that ole Symphony Orchestra sat upon ge. There are now, for example, first and fourteen second violins lower strings are very nearly in on, with the result that the string- alone is as large as the entire orchestra of a dozen years ago. An- eparture from precedent is to be n the shortened programme, of umbers instead of twelve as here- a wise provision in view of the ng demand for "extras." Surely ps" are an excellent breeding-place "encore-itis" that is the bane of n concert-rooms.

choice of his first programme Mr. made a clear effort to introduce neyed material. There was an un- overture by von Suppé—that to eretta "Tantalusqualen"—but the though in the composer's char- c manner, lacks the vitality of his known pieces. The other novelties, or comparative, were an effective ment of the "Voyage by Moonlight" anz Bendel's romantic suite for the Am Genfer See"; two numbers of Busser's orchestral adaptation of 's "Petite Suite," played a year o at the Symphony Concerts; and "Rêve au Champagne," by Volj- nown chiefly as the author of the "Jolly Brothers." The beaten s also avoided in the operatic ns" which were drawn from sky's "Eugen Onégin" and Puc- Manon Lescaut," but neither fan- particularly diverting. The re- numbers were the March from user"; a Slavonic Dance by "The Last Spring," one of two r strings by Grieg; the "Proces- the Sardar" from Ippolitov- colorful "Caucasian Sketches" vivid and dramatic Finale of razade." Both Mr. Jacchia and estra were at their best in the at asked the most of them. The nce of Debussy's and Rimsky- 's music would have graced any y Concert. Wagner's March was at an unaccountable speed but -Ivanov's was brilliantly effec-ch for the music, which is—or sed to be—but half a Pop Concert, r half, the audience, furthered the already noticeable last season. It umerous company—the hall could have held more—but it was a sing- uiet one. There was far less at- paid to refreshments and general y than was once the case, and ore attention paid to the music. the advent of warmer weather ed the sale of cooling drinks, but hia—with perhaps a little help from ead Act—has worked a change that to be permanent. The new pub- Pops is quite as absorbed, almost tful of disturbances as the audi- the Symphony Concerts. Their e different but they take their quite as seriously. On the face Jacchia's programmes would seem to favor the music that is neither enough to impress nor light enough ain, yet by every token he is giving considerable following exactly wants. W. S. S.

ANS. MAY 3.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Women's City Club

Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon"..Weber
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann" ....Offenbach
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"..Puccini
Suite from the Ballet, "Nutcracker" ....Chaikovsky
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"....... Leoncavallo
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Rhapsody, "Espana".........Chabrier
Fantasia, "La Bohème".......Puccini
Reve Angelique..............Rubinstein
Waltz, "Blue Danube"......J. Strauss

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Durant, Inc.

French Military March......Saint-Saëns
Overture to the Opera "Rienzi". Wagner
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"......J. Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"...........Leoni
Tempest Scene from "Othello"....Verdi
Adagio Cantabile from the Pathetic Sonata ....Beethoven
Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps..Berlioz
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Overture, "1812"...........Chaikovsky
Giga...................van Westerhout
Rout of Bacchus from "Sylvia"..Delibes

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. MAY 4.

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops, with his splendid orchestra of 80 symphony players, will present this program in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation march from "Le Prophete" Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon"............Thomas
Waltz "Dornroeschen"......Tschalkowsky
Fantasia, "The Girl of the Golden West" Puccini
Overture to "Il Guarany".........Gomez
"Waltz of the Hours" from "Coppelia" Delibes
Rhapsody, "Italia"................Casella
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffman" Offenbach
Prelude.....................Rachmaninoff
"Dance of the Camorrists"..Wolf-Ferrari

HERALD-MAY

At the Pops Tonight

Music-Supervisors' Evening

Rakoczy March................Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ....Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
First Hungarian Rhapsody........Liszt
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"....Wagner
Dream of Love...................Blon
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"....Bizet
Songs with Organ
(Chorus of Supervisors)
Fantasia, "Mefistofele"..........Boïto
Hindu Song..........Rimsky-Korsakov
Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen

Conductors:
A Jacchia Albert Edmund Brown

TRANS. MAY

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following programme will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of symphony players at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, thus closing the first week of the Pop Concerts:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"..Gounod
Overture to "William Tell"........Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver"..........Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida"......................Verdi
Suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienne"........Bizet
a. Prelude; b. Minuet; c. Farandole.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony, Dvorak
Capriccio ....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Indian Summer ....Herbert
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens

POST MA

SECOND WEEK OF THE POPS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, which will begin their second week Monday, have easily proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm on every night of this, the first week, that the Pops of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Conductor Agide Jacchia, accounting for the varied taste of heterogeneous Pops audiences, has nevertheless subtly raised the quality of the program so that, suitable to the large orchestra of symphony players, the Pops are still enjoyable to all and forbidding to none. Occasionally brilliant symphonic pieces bring great applause, while operatic excerpts, waltzes, dances, and light numbers innumerable, keep their due places.

Every night of next week will be open to the public, although the following organizations have engaged tables for their own enjoyment: The

---

Boston Chamber of Commerce on Monday; Amherst College on Wednesday; the Canadian Club on Thursday, and the Massachusetts-Maine daughters on Friday. Tuesday night, May 10th, will bring a particularly attractive program, featuring the music of Wagner. The program for that night follows:

1.—Polonaise Militaire.....Chopin-Glazounow
2.—Overture "Rosamunde"..........Schubert
3.—Marcia alla Turca from "Ruins of Athens" ....Beethoven
4.—Fantasia "Othello"....................Verdi
5.—Prelude to "Lohengrin";
6.—Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure";
7.—Introduction to Act 3, "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner.
English horn solo—L. Speyer.
8.—Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
9.—Overture to "Mignon"...............Thomas
10.—En Badinant (for strings)....d'Ambrosio
11.—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser"........Wagner

AMER. MAY 7

Progress of The Pops—The Harvard Glee Club at the Art Museum—A Lecture on Bell-Music—The Impending "Festival of Song"

AFTER a pleasurable and prosperous first week, the Pop Concerts, every evening at Symphony Hall, pass next Monday into a second week as promising. Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra, often seventy or eighty strong, programmes and performance, have all kept to established standards and yielded anticipated satisfactions. As good in kind are cuisine and service, while every discriminating person knows that music and tobacco mate well together. But, nowadays, it is the music before all else with the public of The Pops—on the floor as well as in the galleries. Therefore, be it said at once that next Tuesday, it may expect a "Wagner Programme," with numbers from "Lohengrin," "Tannhaeuser," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Walküre," with Schubert's overture to "Rosamünde" added for good measure; that next Wednesday, the march-movement from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will clang into the list; that the Venusberg Music from "Tannhaeuser" will return on Thursday; and that Litolff's overture to "King Lear," seldom heard in recent years, will have place on Friday. In the course of the week, the Chamber of Commerce, Monday; Amherst College Wednesday; the Canadian Club, Thursday and the Maine-Massachusetts Daughters Friday—all have their "nights"; but on each and every evening there will be room and welcome for the general pub-

TRANS. MAY 7

THE POPS TONIGHT

The third Pop concert of the season will take place tonight in Symphony Hall, members of Durant, Inc. being particularly represented. Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

French Military March...........Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi"....................Wagner
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..................Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Ora colo"......................Leoni
Tempest Scene from "Othello," Act I....Verdi
Adagio Cantabile from the Sonata, "Pathetique" ....Beethoven
Minuet of the "Will o' the Wisps".....Berlioz
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Ouverture Solonnelle, "1812" ....Tschaikowsky
Giga (Arr. by Agide Jacchia ...van Westerhout
"Cortege de Bacchus"..................Delibes

HERALD. MAY 4.

POPS TONIGHT

Although the Music Supervisors' Convention will be represented in considerable numbers at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this will be primarily a public affair. Conductor Agide Jacchia has compiled the following program:

"Rakoczy" March.......................Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ....Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier".... R. Strauss
First Hungarian Rhapsody.............Liszt
Overture to "Tannhauser"...........Wagner
Dream of Love..........................Blon
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"..........Bizet
Sons by chorus of the Eastern Music Supervisors (with organ)
Albert Edmund Brown, conductor.
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"............Boito
Hindu Song..............Rimsky-Korsakof
Entrance of the Boyards..........Halvorsen

HERALD-MAY 6.

TONIGHT'S POPS

This program will be presented by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of symphony players at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"...Gounod
Overture to "William Tell"...........Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver"..................Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida"...........................Verdi
Suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienne"................Bizet
(a) Prelude. (b) Minuet. (c) Farandole.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.. Dvorak
Capriccio ....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Marche Slave..................Tschaikowsky
Indian Summer.........................Herbert
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".. Saint-Saens

HERALD-MAY 7.

At the Pops Tonight

March from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture to "William Tell"....Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver".......Lehar
Fantasia, "Aida"................Verdi
Prelude, Minuet and Farandole from Suite No. 2, "L'Arlesienné"....Bizet Largo from the "New World" Symphony ....Dvorák
Capriccio ....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Prelude to "The Mastersingers". Wagner
Slavic March...............Chaikovsky
Indian Summer................Herbert
Bacchanal from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saëns

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. MAY 7.

Second Week of the Pops

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, which will begin their second week Monday, have easily proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm on every night of this, the first week, that the Pope of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Every night of next week will be open to the public, although the following organizations have engaged tables for their own enjoyment: The Boston Chamber of Commerce on Monday; Amherst College on Wednesday; The Canadian Club on Thursday, and the Massachusetts-Maine Daughters on Friday. Tuesday night, May 10, will bring a particularly attractive program, featuring the music of Wagner.

TRAV. MAY 7

MUSIC TEACHERS SING AT POPS

The annual convention of the eastern music supervisors closed its session with an evening at the Pops on Friday night. The supervisors, numbering about 600, have been in Boston during the past week talking over methods and various means of improving that all-important subject, "music in the public schools."

At the Pops concert a chorus of over 100 of these teachers sang four selections as part of the evening's program, under the conductorship of Mr. A. E. Brown.

Some of the decisions which were reached by the conference were standardization of music in the schools and a step for betterment of musical conditions in the South.

The fact that there was not enough credit given music in the high schools was under consideration, and the decision was made that in many high schools from now on music would count toward points for graduation.

In the afternoon at the hall an orchestra of 45 violins, played by boys from English high school, under the leadership of Mr. Joy, gave a demonstration of the effectiveness of instrumental music in the schools, as this was one of the important matters taken up by members at the conference.

HERALD MAY 8.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Chamber of Commerce

March, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar
Waltz, "The Skaters".......Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyrs............Wagner
Fantasia, "Tosca"..............Puccini
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia"...Delibes
Prelude ....Rakhmaninov
Ave Maria...........Schubert-Wilhelmj
(For String Orchestra with Harp and Organ)
Slavic March..............Chaikovsky
Rhapsody, "España".........Chabrier
Selection, "Apple Blossoms," Kreisler-Jacobi
March from "Aida"..............Verdi

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY 9.

TONIGHT'S POPS

For the pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight the Boston chamber of commerce has taken the floor for their own celebration. The balconies, however, will be open to the public and Agide Jacchia will present this program:

Pomp and Circumstance (with organ)...—Elgar
Waltz, "The Skaters"...................Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries........................Wagner
Fantasia, "Tosca"..............................Puccini
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia"...........Delibes
Prelude.......................................Rachmaninoff
Ave Maria (solo violin, harp, organ and strings)......................Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave............................Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Espana"........................Chabrier
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"...Kreisler-Jacobi
March from "Aida"..............................Verdi

HERALD-MAY.9.

WAGNER NIGHT AT POPS

One of the best programmes of the season will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, featuring popular selections from the operas of Richard Wagner. The numbers in detail follows:

Polonaise Militaire ....Chopin-Glazounow
Overture, "Rosamunde" ....Schubert
Marcia alla Turca from the "Ruins of Athens" ....Beethoven
Fantasia, "Othello" ....Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..............Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner
Introduction to Act 3, "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
English horn solo—Mr. L. Speyer.
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Overture to "Mignon"..................Thomas
En Badinant (for strings)........D'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser"..................Wagner

POST-MAY 10

TONIGHT'S POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the Massachusetts Maine Daughters being largely represented, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Entrance of the Gladiators.........Fucik
Overture, "King Lear"...............Litolff
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"..Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"............Wagner
Two northern melodies (for strings). Grieg
(a) Popular song.
(b) Cow-keeper's Tune and Peasant Dance.
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" ....Mascagni
Moorish Serenade.....................Elgar
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812". Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Carmen"....................Bizet
Minuet ....Bolzoni
Invitation to the Dance....Weber-Berlioz

HERALD-MAY.13

Mr. Monteux Seeks New Talent

Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader Sails for England and the Continent in Search for New Artists

Mr. Monteux is on the high seas. He will engage some new artists for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the personnel will be increased next season. He will visit the Chesters, one of the most enterprising of music publishing houses, in London. He will be the not always happy recipient of innumerable new works by French composers, old and new. He will, in short, come in touch with the new productions of the entire musical world of Europe, and he will bring back so many of these new works as he thinks fit, to delight young people and shock old ones with, next winter.

of the man who composed the music, so much as the feeling latent in the listener.

POST-MAY.8.

THE POPS

The 36th season of "The Pops" in Symphony Hall promises to be the most popular of all. Operatic fantasias and overtures have gained much favor under the hand of this conductor of opera; waltzes, other dances innumerable, and "dreamy" pieces of a lighter sort, complete the musical fare at the Pops.

POST. MAY. 8.

At the Pops Tonight

Wagner Programme

Polonaise Militaire......Chopin-Glazunov
Overture, "Rosamünde"..........Schubert
Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens" ....Beethoven
Fantasia, "Othello"...................Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin"—Ride of the Valkyrs—Introduction to Act III., "Tristan and Isolde"—Excerpts from "The Mastersingers" ....Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" ....Thomas
En Badinant................d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Guests in "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Soloist: L. Speyer (English Horn).

TRANS. MAY 10.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Amherst Alumni

March from "Aida".............Verdi
Prelude .... Rakhmaninov
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"...Puccini
Amherst Numbers
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1..........Grieg
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppé
March Movement from The Pathetic Symphony ....Chaikovsky
Amherst Number ....
Selections from "Lady Billy".....Levey
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".......Bizet
Ride of the Valkyrs............Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY. 11.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Canadian Club

March, "Pomp and Circumstance". Elgar
Overture to "William Tell".......Rossini
Waltz, "Roses from the South".... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
God Save the King.
Selection from "Pinafore".....Sullivan
Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner
Kammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.........Liszt
Star-Spangled Banner.
Fantasia, "The Thistle".....Myddleton
Valse Gracieuse..................German
Land of the Maple..............Laurendeau

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY 12.

POPS OPEN IN RECORD FASHION

A record attendance and unbounded enthusiasm were so evident throughout the opening week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall that this, the thirty-sixth season of this Bostonian institution, promises to be the most popular of all. Although this may be attributed to refreshments and the general air of festivity, the prime attraction of the Pops is, of course, the orchestra of Symphony players, and the excellent results which Agide Jacchia, presiding over them, is able to obtain.

Every night this week will be open to the public. Tuesday night will feature Wagner music.

ADVERTISER-MAY.8.

TONIGHT'S POPS

One of the best programs of the season will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, featuring popular selections from the operas of Richard Wagner. The numbers:

Polonaise Militaire..............Chopin-Glazounow
Overture, "Rosamunde"...............Schubert
Marcia alla Turca from the "Ruins of Athens"..........................Beethoven
Fantasia, "Othello"..............................Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walküre" Wagner
Introduction to act 3, "Tristan and Isolde." Wagner
English horn solo—Mr. L. Speyer.
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" ....Thomas
En Badinant (for strings)........D'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser" ....Wagner

HERALD-MAY.10.

TONIGHT'S POPS

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, which will be in every sense public, although the Canadian Club has taken a section of the floor, Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra will present this program:

Pomp and Circumstance..................Elgar
Overture to "William Tell"..............Rossini
Waltz, "Roses from the South"..........Strauss
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"....Saint-Saens
"God Save the King."
Selection from "Pinafore"..............Sullivan
Bacchanale (The Venusberg) from Act I., "Tannhauser"..........................Wagner
Kammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..............Liszt
"Star Spangled Banner."
Selection of Scotch Airs, "The Thistle." Arr. Myddleton
"Valse Gracieuse"......................E. German
Land of the Maple....................Laurendeau

HERALD-MAY.12

At the Pops Tonight

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, which will be in every sense public, although the Canadian Club has taken a section of the floor, Agide Jacchia and his splendid orchestra will present the following programme:

Pomp and Circumstance ....Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ....Rossini
"Roses From the South," waltz ....Strauss
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"....Saint-Saens
"God Save the King."
Selection From "Pinafore"..............Sullivan
Bacchanale (The Venusberg) From Act I., "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Kammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ....Liszt
"Star Spangled Banner."
Selection of Scotch airs, "The Thistle." Myddleton
"Valse Gracieuse" ....E. German
Land of the Maple ....Laurendeau

POST-MAY 12.

The renewal of subscriptions for the Symphony Concerts next season exceeds that of any spring since the orchestra was reorganized. Barely two hundred seats, in various parts of the hall, are open to new subscribers to the matinées of Friday; while applications for the less costly seats on Saturday evenings are so numerous that the management may hardly fill them. There is pride now, as well as pleasure, in Mr. Monteux and his band.

A recent piece by Saint-Saëns will be played for the first time in America by Mr. Jacchia and his orchestra at the Pop Concert next Wednesday. It is memorial music, "Cypresses and Laurels," suggested by the aftermath of the late war. The first division, "Cypresses," is written for organ, of which instrument Saint-Saëns is past master. The second division, "Laurels," runs for organ and orchestra.

At the Pop Concert of Tuesday last, Mr. Jacchia set on the programme, among other pieces from Wagner, the introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan," which culminates in the long and melancholy measures played by the English horn, music of desolation and longing, if ever such was written. In the opera house they are played, not from the orchestra-pit, but from behind the scenes, so they may seem to come from the watching, piping shepherd. Accordingly Mr. Jacchia placed Mr. Speyer "off-stage" and with his skill and sensibility to aid, gained something of the illusion designed by Wagner for the theatre.

TRANS. MAY 12.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of The Daughters of Maine

Entrance of the Gladiators........Fucik
Overture to "King Lear"........Litolff
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube."
Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Two Northern Melodies for Strings.Grieg
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz,"
Mascagni
Moorish Serenade..................Elgar
Overture, "1812"...........Chaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen"...............Bizet
Minuet ....Bolzoni
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY. 13.

CONCERT-CALENDAR

Progress of The Pops—"Nights," Novelties and Other Incidents Arranged for Next Week—A Matinee by the Harvard Orchestra—Lute-Playing in Prospect

PUBLIC programmes and performance at The Pops keep familiar and equal pace. Nightly, at the tables upon the floor of Symphony Hall and in the chairs of the galleries above, the usual audience of many seasons assembles for assured pleasure, savors it with the minor satisfactions of food, drink, cigarettes, chatter. Nightly, Mr. Jacchia's programmes contain pieces that his hearers have long liked or that whet their curiosity, that please them as a semi-classic overture, an operatic, fantasia, an artful waltz or a lively jingle from a musical play may pleasure. Nnghtly also the conductor keeps an expert and numerous orchestra to its mettle.. To this public the schedule for next week adds The Cecilia—the choral society—on Monday; the alumnæ of Wellesley on Tuesday; members of the Boston City Club on Wednesday; and lesser groups on Thursday and Friday. To current pieces Mr. Jacchia will add on Monday three dances from old operas by Rameau; on Wednesday a piece for organ and orchestra by Saint-Saëns—"Cypress and Laurels," memorial music of the late war; a Hungarian overture, "Ilka," on Thursday; and fragments from Grieg's suite, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" on Friday. In the concert of Monday, the choir of The Cecilia will sing the choruses in the dancing scene from Borodin's Tartar opera, "Prince Igor"; in the concert of Tuesday, the Wellesley Chorus and organ-piece by Miss Katherine Davis, a graduate of the college in 1914 will be heard. From day to day as usual the programmes will be printed in this place.

lowing the usual fortunes of the usual sentimental hero. Shaun O'Fa[illegible] the new-found "Irish Troubadour" [illegible] act him and sing his songs.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Masaniello".......Auber
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Song Without Words.......Chaikovsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod Waltz and Czardas from
"Coppélia" ....Delibes
Sérénade Lyrique ....Elgar
Intermezzo from
"Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
Finale from
"Scheherazade" ..Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" ....J. Strauss Dance of the Hours from
"La Gioconda"...........Ponchielli

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY. 14

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following popular programme will be heard at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, to be played by Agide Jacchia and his large orchestra:

Overture to "Masaniello"..............Auber
Waltz, "La Barcarole"...........Waldteufel
Song Without Words..........Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod
Suite, "Copelia," a. Waltz. b. Czardas.
Delibes
Serenade Lyrique ....Elgar
Intermezo from "Cavalleria Rusticana,"
Mascagni
Finale, "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"................Verdi
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods,"
Strauss
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli

POST-MAY. 14.

The unprecedented patronage and enthusiasm at the Pop Concerts of 1921, now completing their second week at Symphony Hall, are largely attributable to the engrossing program of Agide Jacchia and the splendid performance of them by the superfine orchestra of 80 Symphony players under him.

Monday night, which is dedicated to the Cecilia Society, will be a special treat for Pop-goers, in that the Cecilia Society Chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers with the orchestra under the eminent conductor, who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will celebrate, and a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesady, the night of the Boston City Club, the first performance in America of Saint-Saens's latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra, will of course be a notable event. This and all other nights are open to the public.

THE POPS

The unprecedented patronage and enthusiasm at the Pop Concerts of 1921, now completing their second week at Symphony Hall, are largely attributable to the engrossing programs of Agide Jacchia and the splendid performance of them by the superfine orchestra of eighty symphony players under him. Indeed, music for its own sake is now by far the most important aspect of the Pop Concerts, although sociability and a general air of festivity always prevail in Symphony Hall through this season.

Monday night, which is dedicated to the Cecilia Society, will be a special treat for Pop-goers, in that the Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers with the orchestra under the eminent conductor who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will celebrate, and a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club, the first performance in America of Saint-Saens' latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra, will, of course, be a notable event. This and all other nights are open to the public.

The programs of the week follow:

AMER. MAY. 14.

THE POPS

No former season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall has flourished as have these entertainments in the season of 1921, now reaching the third week. Probably the secret of this popularity lies in the quality of the music. When the Pops were first started in the 80's, as a light summer supplement to the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, there were only 30 or 40 musicians; a great deal of attention was paid to clothes and conversation, and the menu, which provided a real meal. Circumstances have now radically changed.

The splendid symphony orchestra of 80 musicians gives every night performances in accord with the highest standards. The programs of Mr. Jacchia are always engrossing and enjoyable. People still gather round the tables, and if they eat less heartily and save their remarks for the intervals between numbers, the general festive atmosphere still pervades the Pops.

Tomorrow night is dedicated to the Cecilia Society. The Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices, will render choral numbers with the orchestra, under Mr. Jacchia, who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night, Wellesley College will celebrate; a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club there will be the first performance in America of Saint-Saens's latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra. This and all other nights are open to the public. The programs follow:

MONDAY, MAY 16.
Cecilia Society Night.
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc"...............Verdi
Waltz, Espana.......................Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"...Saint-Saens
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"..Borodin
(with the Cecilia Society Chorus)
Hymn to Saint Cecilia...................Gounod
Tarantelle...............................Jacchia
Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust"..............................Berlioz
Ballet music from "Platee" and Fetes d'Hebe........................Rameau-Motti
Whispering of the Flowers...............Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony..Tschaikowsky

TUESDAY, MAY 17.
Wellesley College Night.
Prelude to "Carmen"........................Bizet
Overture "Stradella"......................Flotow
Solo for organ, "Pastorale"....K. K. Davis '14
Fantasia, "La Boheme"...................Puccini
First Hungarian Rhapsody..................Liszt
Ave Maria, solo violin, harp, strings and organ ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ride of the Valkyries....................Wagner
Wellesley Medley by Wellesley chorus with organ, Charlotte Homer, '21, leader.
Laura Chandler, accompanist.
Selection, "Lady Billy"....................Levey
Waltz "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Pomp and Circumstance....................Elgar

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.
Boston City Club Night.
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream".Thomas
Waltz, "Pomono"......................Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow....................Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"....................Verdi
Polonaise Militaire............Chopin-Glazounow
Solo for organ end orchestra, "Cypress et Lauriers" ....Saint-Saens
Albert Snow
a, Cypress (organ solo). b, Laurels (organ and orchestra). First time in America.
Serenade ....Schubert-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi".........................Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann"......Offenbach
Largo, solo violin, J. Hoffman..........Handel
Harp, organ and strings.
Marche Slave......................Tschaikowsky

THURSDAY, MAY 19.
Marche Militaire.........................Schubert
Overture, "Ilka"..........................Doppler
Waltz, "Tres Jolie"...................Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna"
Wolf-Ferrari
Scenes Alsaciennes.....................Massenet
a, Sunday Morning. b, Sunday Evening.
Prelude to "Carmen".........................Bizet
Bolero ....Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"..............Wagner
Selection, "Cavallieria Rusticana"....Mascagni
Loin du Bal.................................Gillet
Polonaise, "Eugen Oneigin".....Tschaikowsky

FRIDAY, MAY 20.
Coronation March.........................Svendsen
Overture to "Raymond"..................Thomas
Waltz, "Artist's Life"....................Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca"..........................Puccini
Suite, "Sigurd Jorsalfar"..................Grieg
March of the Little Lead Soldiers........Pierne
Andante and Minuet (Viola d'Amour solo, Paul Shirley).............................Milandre
Roumanian Rhapsody.......................Enesco
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann", Offenbach
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"..................Komzak
First Slavonic Dance........................Dvorak

SATURDAY, MAY 21.
Wedding March from "Feramors"...Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame"..................Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"...Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater"..................Rossini
Gypsy Suite...................................German
Violin solo, Jacques Hoffmann.
Whispering of the Flowers....................Blon
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre".....Litolff
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"........Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"....................Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever....................Sousa

HERALD-MAY. 15.

The Pops

No former season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall has flourished as have these musical entertainments in the season of 1921, which is now reaching the third week.

Probably the real secret of this great popularity lies in the quality of the music which the Pops now afford. When the Pops were first started in the 80's, as a very light summer supplement to the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, there were only 30 or 40 musicians; a great deal of attention was paid to clothes and conversation, and the menu, which provided a real meal.

Circumstances have now radically changed. The full-fledged Symphony orchestra of 80 musicians gives every night performances in accord with the highest standards. The programmes of Agide Jacchia are enjoyable to all.

Tomorrow night, which is dedicated to the Cecilia Society, will be a special treat for Pop-goers, in that the Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers with the orchestra under the eminent conductor who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will celebrate, and a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club, the first performance in America of Saint-Saens' latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra, will of course be a notable event. This and all other nights are open to the public.

POST-MAY. 15.

ANOTHER BIG WEEK AT THE POPS

No former season of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall has flourished like the present one, now reaching the third week. Probably the real secret of this great popularity lies in the quality of the music which the Pops now afford.

Tomorrow night the Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will sing a medley of college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club, will be given the first performance in America of Saint-Saens' latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels." All nights are open to the public.

ADVERTISER. MAY. 15

Third Week of the Pops

The third week of what has proved an exceptionally successful season of the Pops begins tomorrow night at Symphony Hall. The Cecilia Society, which Mr Jacchia has so ably conducted during the present season, will sing choral numbers with the orchestra. Tuesday is Wellesley Night, and the Wellesley Chorus will sing a medley of college songs. Wednesday, Boston City Club Night, Mr Snow, will play a new piece for organ by Saint-Saens with the orchestra, the first performance in America. This and all nights are open to the public. The program for Monday follows.

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc," Verdi; Waltz "Espana," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Hymn to Saint Cecilia, Gounod; Tarantelle, Jacchia; Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; Ballet Music from "Platee" and "Fetes d'Hebe," Rameau-Mottl; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; Finale of the Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky.

GLOBE-MAY. 15.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of The Cecilia Society

Introduction to Act Third, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture, "Joan of Arc".........Verdi
Waltz, "España"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"..
Saint-Saëns
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
(The Chorus of The Cecilia Assisting)
Hymn to Saint Cecilia..........Gounod
Tarantella ....Jacchia
Rakoczy March................Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Platée" and "Les Fetes d'Hébé"...Rameau-Mottl
Whispering of the Flowers........Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony....
Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. MAY. 16.

CHORAL POP CONCERT

One of the most notable Pop Concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, in that the chorus of the Cecilia Society, 200 strong, will sing choral numbers with the fine Pops orchestra, under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, who is also the regular conductor of the Cecilia Chorus.

The programme follows:

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc".............Verdi
Waltz, Espana ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".Saint-Saens
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".Borodin
(With the Cecilia Society Chorus)
Hymn to St. Cecilia ....Gounod
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust" ....Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Platee" and "Fetes d'Hebe" ....Rameau-Mottl
Whispering of the Flowers..............Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony.Tschaikowsky

POST-MAY. 16.

TONIGHT'S POPS

One of the most notable Pop concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, in that the chorus of the Cecilia Society, 200 strong, will sing choral numbers with the fine Pops orchestra under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, who is also the regular conductor of the Cecilia chorus. The program follows:

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"
Wagner
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc"...........Verdi
Waltz, "Espana"................Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"
Saint-Saens
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"
Borodin
(With the Cecilia Society Chorus.)
Hymn to Saint Cecilia............Gounod
Tarantelle.......................... Jacchia
Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust"..................Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Platee" and "Fetes d'Hebe"...........Rameau-Mottl
"Whispering of the Flowers"........Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony
Tschaikowsky

HERALD-MAY. 16.

Has Prohibition Affected Popularity of "Pops?"

That famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, ~~which will open its 36th season tomorrow night,~~ has undergone many changes according to the shifting fashions since it started in 1885. When prohibition became a statute, it was thought by many that the Pops would be revolutionized, and by some that they were doomed. On the contrary, the consequent alteration of the menu in the spring of 1919 caused not the slightest ripple on the surface of Pops history; rather, the account books show that a far greater number of people attended the Pops in the last two years and that an unprecedented amount of food and drink was consumed.

As a matter of fact, anecdotes on the popularity and the effect of drinking at the Pops in the early '90's prove incontestably that alcohol flowed far more freely in those times than in our present century.

When the Pops were instituted, to follow the winter season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the old Music Hall on Hamilton place, the "beers, wines and light viands" served blended so admirably with the music that the "Promenade Concerts" as they were then called, became the sole and principal form of amusement in Boston of a spring and summer evening.

Great hogsheads of beer had to be installed in the cellar and pumped up into the waiting glasses on the bar by steam pressure. The chief steward relates how, on big nights, the tap was never turned off. A waiting line of glasses was always kept in readiness and he would shove one after another under the endless, golden stream, yelling down cellar again and again for "more steam." Sometimes six "halves" (the equivalent of 240 gallons) were emptied in a night.

The Harvard nights, it seems, were not wild in those days. There was cheering and singing, but also that wholesome restraint which the presence of mothers and sweethearts always brings to such occasions. It was later, when the Harvard nights went "stag" that furniture smashing, "flying wedges," and various skirmishes took place. A waiter with a tray of filled glasses stood a small chance then of reaching his destination. On one of these nights Timothee Adamowski, who was then conductor, could not raise his brasses above the din of the riotous audience; whereupon in justifiable rage, he laid down his baton in the middle of the first number and walked off the stage, motioning the orchestra to follow him. It took fully three-quarters of an hour to placate the conductor and restore order and music.

Nothing more clearly proves the contention that strong drink was less popular just before prohibition than the way the Pops met exactly the same contingency in 1890 and 1919. In the spring of 1890 the Pops failed to obtain a liquor license for technical reasons. There was much discussion in the newspapers and elsewhere, but it occurred to no one that there might be Pops without beer. It was never even suggested, and the Pops were simply omitted for a season as a matter of course. "No More Pops," ran the headlines; "Police Commissioner Refuses License," "They Let All the North End Dives Run," and this quotation is typical of the editorials—"It doesn't seem reasonable that the police commissioner should deprive such a respectable place as Music Hall of a license in order to accommodate some cheap, disreputable rum hole with a right to dispense vile liquors"—(Boston Gazette, June 15, 1890.)

The Pops are far more musical now than they used to be. The original orchestra was smaller and the programs lighter. When Music Hall was abandoned in the summer of 1900, the Pops were held for a season in Mechanics Hall, since Symphony Hall, then being built as the new home of the orchestra, was not quite ready for occupancy.

HERALD-MAY. 15.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Wellesley Alumnæ

Prelude to "Carmen"............Bizet
Overture "Stradella"............Flotow
Solo for Organ, "Pastorale".....Davis
Fantasia, "La Bohème"........Puccini
First Hungarian Rhapsody........Liszt
Ave Maria..........Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ride of the Valkyrs............Wagner
Wellesley Medley
Selection, "Lady Billy"..........Levey
Waltz, "Blue Danube"......J. Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance",
Elgar

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Assisting: The Wellesley Chorus
Charlotte Homer, Leader

TRANS. MAY. 17

In Charge of the First Radcliffe Night at Pops

Champlain Studio

MISS SIBYL BINGHAM.
In charge of the first Radcliffe Night at the Symphony Pops, May 27.

Miss Sibyl Bingham of Boston, a Radcliffe graduate of the class of 1916 is in charge of the first Radcliffe Night at the Pops in Symphony Hall Friday evening, May 27, for the benefit of the endowment fund. The concert is to be given under the auspices of the Radcliffe Club of Boston. The Radcliffe Choral Society, which has been heard already this year at Symphony Hall with the Harvard Glee Club, under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison of Harvard University, will sing with the Radcliffe Club chorus, accompanied by the full orchestra.

OST. MAY. 17.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Boston City Club

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Thomas
Waltz, "Pomona"..........Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow...........Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".........Verdi
Military Polonaise......Chopin-Glazunov
Concert-Pieces for Organ and Orchestra, "Cypresses and Laurels."
Saint-Saëns
Serenade ....Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann,"
Offenbach
Largo ....Händel
Slavic March.................Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Organist: Albert Snow.
(No tables are available for the public)

TRANS-MAY. 1

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of The Daughters of Maine

Entrance of the Gladiators........Fucik
Overture to "King Lear"........Litolff
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube," Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".........Wagner
Two Northern Melodies for Strings.Grieg
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni
Moorish Serenade.................Elgar
Overture, "1812"..........Chaikovsky
Selection, "Carmen"..............Bizet
Minuet ....Bolzoni
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY. 13.

CONCERT-CALENDAR

Progress of The Pops—"Nights," Novelties and Other Incidents Arranged for Next Week—A Matinee by the Harvard Orchestra—Lute-Playing in Prospect

PUBLIC programmes and performance at The Pops keep familiar and equal pace. Nightly, at the tables upon the floor of Symphony Hall and in the chairs of the galleries above, the usual audience of many seasons assembles for assured pleasure, savors it with the minor satisfactions of food, drink, cigarettes, chatter. Nightly, Mr. Jacchia's programmes contain pieces that his hearers have long liked or that whet their curiosity, that please them as a semi-classic overture, an operatic, fantasia, an artful waltz or a lively jingle from a musical play may pleasure. Nnghtly also the conductor keeps an expert and numerous orchestra to its mettle.. To this public the schedule for next week adds The Cecilia—the choral society—on Monday; the alumnæ of Wellesley on Tuesday; members of the Boston City Club on Wednesday; and lesser groups on Thursday and Friday. To current pieces Mr. Jacchia will add on Monday three dances from old operas by Rameau; on Wednesday a piece for organ and orchestra by Saint-Saëns—"Cypress and Laurels," memorial music of the late war; a Hungarian overture, "Ilka," on Thursday; and fragments from Grieg's suite, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" on Friday. In the concert of Monday, the choir of The Cecilia will sing the choruses in the dancing scene from Borodin's Tartar opera. "Prince Igor"; in the concert of Tuesday, the Wellesley Chorus and organ-piece by Miss Katherine Davis, a graduate of the college in 1914 will be heard. From day to day as usual the programmes will be printed in this place.

lowing the usual fortunes of [illegible] usual sentimental hero. Shaun O'Fa[illegible] the new-found "Irish Troubadour" [illegible] act him and sing his songs.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Masaniello".......Auber
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Song Without Words.......Chaikovsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod
Waltz and Czardas from "Coppélia" ....Delibes
Sérénade Lyrique ....Elgar
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
Finale from "Scheherazade" ..Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" ....J. Strauss
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"..........Ponchielli

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY. 14

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following popular programme will be heard at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, to be played by Agide Jacchia and his large orchestra:

Overture to "Masaniello"............Auber
Waltz, "La Barcarole"..........Waldteufel
Song Without Words..........Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ....Gounod
Suite, "Copelia," a. Waltz. b. Czardas. Delibes
Serenade Lyrique ....Elgar
Intermezo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Finale, "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Strauss
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli

POST - MAY. 14.

The unprecedented patronage and enthusiasm at the Pop Concerts of 1921, now completing their second week at Symphony Hall, are largely attributable to the engrossing program of Agide Jacchia and the splendid performance of them by the superfine orchestra of 80 Symphony players under him.

Monday night, which is dedicated to the Cecilia Society, will be a special treat for Pop-goers, in that the Cecilia Society Chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers with the orchestra under the eminent conductor, who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will celebrate, and a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesady, the night of the Boston City Club, the first performance in America of Saint-Saens's latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra, will of course be a notable event. This and all other nights are open to the public.

TRAN. MAY. 14

THE POPS

The unprecedented patronage and enthusiasm at the Pop Concerts of 1921, now completing their second week at Symphony Hall, are largely attributable to the engrossing programs of Agide Jacchia and the splendid performance of them by the superfine orchestra of eighty symphony players under him. Indeed, music for its own sake is now by far the most important aspect of the Pop Concerts, although sociability and a general air of festivity always prevail in Symphony Hall through this season.

Monday night, which is dedicated to the Cecilia Society, will be a special treat for Pop-goers, in that the Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers with the orchestra under the eminent conductor who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will celebrate, and a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club, the first performance in America of Saint-Saens' latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra, will, of course, be a notable event. This and all other nights are open to the public.

The programs of the week follow:

AMER. MAY. 14.

THE POPS

No former season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall has flourished as have these entertainments in the season of 1921, now reaching the third week. Probably the secret of this popularity lies in the quality of the music. When the Pops were first started in the 80's, as a light summer supplement to the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, there were only 30 or 40 musicians; a great deal of attention was paid to clothes and conversation, and the menu, which provided a real meal. Circumstances have now radically changed.

The splendid symphony orchestra of 80 musicians gives every night performances in accord with the highest standards. The programs of Mr. Jacchia are always engrossing and enjoyable. People still gather round the tables, and if they eat less heartily and save their remarks for the intervals between numbers, the general festive atmosphere still pervades the Pops.

Tomorrow night is dedicated to the Cecilia Society. The Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices, will render choral numbers with the orchestra, under Mr. Jacchia, who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night, Wellesley College will celebrate; a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club there will be the first performance in America of Saint-Saens's latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra. This and all other nights are open to the public. The programs follow:

MONDAY, MAY 16,
Cecilia Society Night.
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc"...................Verdi
Waltz, Espana..........................Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"...Saint-Saens
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"..Borodin
(with the Cecilia Society Chorus)
Hymn to Saint Cecilia....................Gounod
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust" ....Berlioz
Ballet music from "Platee" and Fetes d'Hebe........................Rameau-Mottl
Whispering of the Flowers.................Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony..Tschaikowsky

TUESDAY, MAY 17,
Wellesley College Night.
Prelude to "Carmen"............................Bizet
Overture "Stradella"...........................Flotow
Solo for organ, "Pastorale"....K. K. Davis '14
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....................Puccini
First Hungarian Rhapsody....................Liszt
Ave Maria, solo violin, harp, strings and organ ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ride of the Valkyries...........................Wagner
Wellesley Medley by Wellesley chorus with organ, Charlotte Homer, '21, leader.
Laura Chandler, accompanist.
Selection, "Lady Billy"...........................Levey
Waltz "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..Strauss
Pomp and Circumstance........................Elgar

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18,
Boston City Club Night.
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream".Thomas
Waltz, "Pomono"...........................Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow........................Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"........................Verdi
Polonaise Militaire...............Chopin-Glazounow
Solo for organ and orchestra, "Cypress et Lauriers" ....Saint-Saens
Albert Snow
a, Cypress (organ solo). b, Laurels (organ and orchestra). First time in America.
Serenade ....Schubert-Jacchia
Overture to "Rienzi"............................Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann"........Offenbach
Largo, solo violin, J. Hoffman............Handel
Harp, organ and strings.
Marche Slave.........................Tschaikowsky

THURSDAY, MAY 19.
Marche Militaire..............................Schubert
Overture, "Ilka"................................Doppler
Waltz, "Tres Jolie"........................Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Scenes Alsaciennes..........................Massenet
a, Sunday Morning. b, Sunday Evening.
Prelude to "Carmen".............................Bizet
Bolero ....Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"...................Wagner
Selection, "Cavallieria Rusticana"....Mascagni
Loin du Bal...Gillet
Polonaise, "Eugen Oneigin"......Tschaikowsky

FRIDAY, MAY 20.
Coronation March.............................Svendsen
Overture to "Raymond"........................Thomas
Waltz, "Artist's Life"............................Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca"................................Puccini
Suite, "Sigurd Jorsalfar"..........................Grieg
March of the Little Lead Soldiers........Pierne
Andante and Minuet (Viola d'Amour solo, Paul Shirley).....................................Milandre
Roumanian Rhapsody............................Enesco
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann"..Offenbach
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"........................Komzak
First Slavonic Dance...........................Dvorak

SATURDAY, MAY 21.
Wedding March from "Feramors"...Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame".........................Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"...Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater"........................Rossini
Gypsy Suite......................................German
Violin solo, Jacques Hoffmann.
Whispering of the Flowers.......................Blon
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre"....Litolff
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser".......Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"........................Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever......................Sousa

HERALD-MAY. 15.

The Pops

No former season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall has flourished as have these musical entertainments in the season of 1921, which is now reaching the third week.

Probably the real secret of this great popularity lies in the quality of the music which the Pops now afford. When the Pops were first started in the 80's, as a very light summer supplement to the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, there were only 30 or 40 musicians; a great deal of attention was paid to clothes and conversation, and the menu, which provided a real meal.

Circumstances have now radically changed. The full-fledged Symphony orchestra of 80 musicians gives every night performances in accord with the highest standards. The programmes of Agide Jacchia are enjoyable to all.

Tomorrow night, which is dedicated to the Cecilia Society, will be a special treat for Pop-goers, in that the Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers with the orchestra under the eminent conductor who is at the head of both. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will celebrate, and a chorus will sing a medley of the college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club, the first performance in America of Saint-Saens' latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels," for organ and orchestra, will of course be a notable event. This and all other nights are open to the public.

POST - MAY. 15.

ANOTHER BIG WEEK AT THE POPS

No former season of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall has flourished like the present one, now reaching the third week. Probably the real secret of this great popularity lies in the quality of the music which the Pops now afford.

Tomorrow night the Cecilia Society chorus of 200 voices will render choral numbers. On Tuesday night Wellesley College will sing a medley of college songs. On Wednesday, the night of the Boston City Club, will be given the first performance in America of Saint-Saens' latest work, "Cypresses and Laurels." All nights are open to the public.

ADVERTISER. MAY. 15

Third Week of the Pops

The third week of what has proved an exceptionally successful season of the Pops begins tomorrow night at Symphony Hall. The Cecilia Society, which Mr Jacchia has so ably conducted during the present season, will sing choral numbers with the orchestra. Tuesday is Wellesley Night, and the Wellesley Chorus will sing a medley of college songs. Wednesday, Boston City Club Night, Mr Snow, will play a new piece for organ by Saint-Saens with the orchestra, the first performance in America. This and all nights are open to the public. The program for Monday follows.

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc," Verdi; Waltz "Espana," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Hymn to Saint Cecilia, Gounod; Tarantelle, Jacchia; Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; Ballet Music from "Platee" and "Fetes d'Hebe," Rameau-Mottl; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; Finale of the Fourth Symphony," Tschaikowsky.

GLOBE-MAY. 15.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of The Cecilia Society

Introduction to Act Third, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture, "Joan of Arc".........Verdi
Waltz, "España"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".. Saint-Saëns
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
(The Chorus of The Cecilia Assisting)
Hymn to Saint Cecilia..........Gounod
Tarantella ....Jacchia
Rakoczy March................Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Platée" and "Les Fetes d'Hébé"....Rameau-Mottl
Whispering of the Flowers........Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony.... Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. MAY. 16.

CHORAL POP CONCERT

One of the most notable Pop Concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, in that the chorus of the Cecilia Society, 200 strong, will sing choral numbers with the fine Pops orchestra, under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, who is also the regular conductor of the Cecilia Chorus:

The programme follows:

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc"..............Verdi
Waltz, Espana ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".Saint-Saens
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".Borodin
(With the Cecilia Society Chorus)
Hymn to St. Cecilia ....Gounod
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust" ....Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Platee" and "Fetes d'Hebe" ....Rameau-Mottl
Whispering of the Flowers...................Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony.Tschaikowsky

POST - MAY. 16.

TONIGHT'S POPS

One of the most notable Pop concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, in that the chorus of the Cecilia Society, 200 strong, will sing choral numbers with the fine Pops orchestra under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, who is also the regular conductor of the Cecilia chorus. The program follows:

Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc"...........Verdi
Waltz, "Espana"...............Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
(With the Cecilia Society Chorus.)
Hymn to Saint Cecilia............Gounod
Tarantelle.........................Jacchia
Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust"..................Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Platee" and "Fetes d'Hebe"...........Rameau-Mottl
"Whispering of the Flowers"........Blon
Finale of the Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky

HERALD-MAY. 16.

Has Prohibition Affected Popularity of "Pops?"

That famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, ~~which will open its 36th season tomorrow night,~~ has undergone many changes according to the shifting fashions since it started in 1885. When prohibition became a statute, it was thought by many that the Pops would be revolutionized, and by some that they were doomed. On the contrary, the consequent alteration of the menu in the spring of 1919 caused not the slightest ripple on the surface of Pops history; rather, the account books show that a far greater number of people attended the Pops in the last two years and that an unprecedented amount of food and drink was consumed.

As a matter of fact, anecdotes on the popularity and the effect of drinking at the Pops in the early '90's prove incontestably that alcohol flowed far more freely in those times than in our present century.

When the Pops were instituted, to follow the winter season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the old Music Hall on Hamilton place, the "beers, wines and light viands" served blended so admirably with the music that the "Promenade Concerts" as they were then called, became the sole and principal form of amusement in Boston of a spring and summer evening.

Great hogsheads of beer had to be installed in the cellar and pumped up into the waiting glasses on the bar by steam pressure. The chief steward relates how, on big nights, the tap was never turned off. A waiting line of glasses was always kept in readiness and he would shove one after another under the endless, golden stream, yelling down cellar again and again for "more steam." Sometimes six "halves" (the equivalent of 240 gallons) were emptied in a night.

The Harvard nights, it seems, were not wild in those days. There was cheering and singing, but also that wholesome restraint which the presence of mothers and sweethearts always brings to such occasions. It was later, when the Harvard nights went "stag" that furniture smashing, "flying wedges," and various skirmishes took place. A waiter with a tray of filled glasses stood a small chance then of reaching his destination. On one of these nights Timothee Adamowski, who was then conductor, could not raise his brasses above the din of the riotous audience; whereupon in justifiable rage, he laid down his baton in the middle of the first number and walked off the stage, motioning the orchestra to follow him. It took fully three-quarters of an hour to placate the conductor and restore order and music.

Nothing more clearly proves the contention that strong drink was less popular just before prohibition than the way the Pops met exactly the same contingency in 1890 and 1919. In the spring of 1890 the Pops failed to obtain a liquor license for technical reasons. There was much discussion in the newspapers and elsewhere, but it occurred to no one that there might be Pops without beer. It was never even suggested, and the Pops were simply omitted for a season as a matter of course. "No More Pops," ran the headlines; "Police Commissioner Refuses License," "They Let All the North End Dives Run." and this quotation is typical of the editorials—"It doesn't seem reasonable that the police commissioner should deprive such a respectable place as Music Hall of a license in order to accommodate some cheap, disreputable rum hole with a right to dispense vile liquors"—(Boston Gazette, June 15, 1890).

The Pops are far more musical now than they used to be. The original orchestra was smaller and the programs lighter. When Music Hall was abandoned in the summer of 1900, the Pops were held for a season in Mechanics Hall, since Symphony Hall, then being built as the new home of the orchestra, was not quite ready for occupancy.

HERALD-MAY. 15.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Wellesley Alumnæ

Prelude to "Carmen"............Bizet
Overture "Stradella"...........Flotow
Solo for Organ, "Pastorale".....Davis
Fantasia, "La Bohême"........Puccini
First Hungarian Rhapsody.........Liszt
Ave Maria...........Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ride of the Valkyrs............Wagner
Wellesley Medley
Selection, "Lady Billy"..........Levey
Waltz, "Blue Danube"......J. Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance", Elgar

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Assisting: The Wellesley Chorus
Charlotte Homer, Leader

TRANS. MAY. 17

In Charge of the First Radcliffe Night at Pops

Champlain Studio

MISS SIBYL BINGHAM.

In charge of the first Radcliffe Night at the Symphony Pops, May 27.

Miss Sibyl Bingham of Boston, a Radcliffe graduate of the class of 1918 is in charge of the first Radcliffe Night at the Pops in Symphony Hall Friday evening, May 27, for the benefit of the endowment fund. The concert is to be given under the auspices of the Radcliffe Club of Boston. The Radcliffe Choral Society, which has been heard already this year at Symphony Hall with the Harvard Glee Club, under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison of Harvard University, will sing with the Radcliffe Club chorus, accompanied by the full orchestra.

S. MAY. 17.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Boston City Club

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Thomas
Waltz, "Pomona"..........Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow...........Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".........Verdi
Military Polonaise......Chopin-Glazunov
Concert-Piece for Organ and Orchestra, "Cypresses and Laurels," Saint-Saëns
Serenade ....Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi"...........Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach
Largo ....Händel
Slavic March...................Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Organist: Albert Snow.
(No tables are available for the public)

TRANS-MAY. 14

Affected of "Pops?"

"Police Commissioner Refuses ...nse," "They Let All the North End ... Run," and this quotation is typi... of the editorials—"It doesn't seem ...sonable that the police commissioner ...uld deprive such a respectable place ...Music Hall of a license in order to ...ommodate some cheap, disreputable ...n hole with a right to dispense vile ...rs"—(Boston Gazette, June 15, 1890). ...e Pops are far more musical now ... they used to be. The original ...hestra was smaller and the pro...ms lighter. When Music Hall was ...ndoned in the summer of 1900, the ...s were held for a season in Me...nics Hall, since Symphony Hall, then ...ng built as the new home of the ...hestra, was not quite ready for ...upancy.

Charge of the First Radcliffe Night at Pops

Champlain Studio

MISS SIBYL BINGHAM.

...n charge of the first Radcliffe Night at the Symphony Pops, May 27.

Miss Sibyl Bingham of Boston, a ...adcliffe graduate of the class of 1918, ... in charge of the first Radcliffe Night ... the Pops in Symphony Hall Friday ...ening, May 27, for the benefit of the ...dowment fund. The concert is to be ...ven under the auspices of the Rad...iffe Club of Boston. The Radcliffe ...oral Society, which has been heard ...ready this year at Symphony Hall ...th the Harvard Glee Club, under the ...rection of Dr. A. T. Davison of Har...rd University, will sing with the ...adcliffe Club chorus, accompanied by ...e full orchestra.

POST.MAY.17.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Boston City Club

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream," .... Thomas
Waltz, "Pomona" .... Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Military Polonaise .... Chopin-Glazunov
Concert-Pieces for Organ and Orchestra, "Cypresses and Laurels," .... Saint-Saëns
Serenade .... Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann," .... Offenbach
Largo .... Händel
Slavic March .... Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Organist: Albert Snow.
(No tables are available for the public)

TRANS.MAY.17

CITY CLUB AT POPS

Although the Boston City Club has taken the floor for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the program will be of general interest and the balcony will be open to the public. Agide Jacchia will conduct this program:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Pomone" .... Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trevatore" .... Verdi
Polonaise Militaire .... Chopin-Glazounow
Solo for organ and orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers" .... Saint-Saens
Albert Snow.
a. Cypresses (organ solo).
b. Laurels (organ and orchestra).
(First time in America).
Serenade .... Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Selections, "Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Largo .... Handel
Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffman. Harp, organ and strings.
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky

MAY.16

CITY CLUB AT POPS

Although the Boston City Club has taken the floor for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the programme will be of general interest and the balcony will be open to the public. Agide Jacchia will conduct the following programme:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream." .... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone" .... Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Polonaise Militaire .... Chopin-Glazounow
Solo for Organ and Orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers" .... Saint-Saens
Mr. Albert Snow
a. Cypresses (organ solo)
b. Laurels (organ and orchestra)
(First time in America)
Serenade .... Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Largo .... Handel
Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffmann
Harp, organ and strings.
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky

POST MAY. 18

From Saint-Saens at 86

"Cypress and Laurel," a recent piece by Saint-Saëns for organ and orchestra, was heard for the first time in Boston last evening at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall and well received by an audience consisting, for the most part, of members of the City Club. Seemingly the aftermath of war suggested the music; while possibly, even plausibly, the composer designed it for memorial services in churches. It begins with many measures for the organ alone. They use the manifold voices of the instrument with Saint-Saëns's ripe knowledge; they do not spare the skill of so able an organist as Mr. Albert Snow again proved himself. These technical exactions serve music of grave but not lugubrious mood, running now in stately sonorities, again in gentler melody appropriately invented, expertly made. Presently the orchestra enters with trumpet-calls, drum-beats and other martial suggestion, and soon swells into a sharply rhythmed but commonplace military march. Only the full-voiced interventions of the organ save these final periods from cheapness. Seemingly Mr Snow and Mr. Jacchia made the most of the whole music.

Via Symphony Hall

According to Le Figaro, Mr. Monteux is to remind Paris of his mettle as conductor in a concert of his own at the Salle Gaveau on Tuesday evening, May 31. His ... and will be the Colonne Orchestra. Parisians have not heard him since he came to the United States five years ago with Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet. Yet in Paris, at the Concerts-Monteux for novel them, at the Concerts-Monteux for novel music, he won his first note as conductor.

It is not likely that Richard Strauss, when he revisits the United States next autumn, will be asked to conduct at a pair of Symphony Concerts because the fee demanded for such "invitation" is exorbitant. In all probability, however, he will be heard in a concert of his own in Boston.

At the Pops Tonight

Military March .... Schubert
Overture, "Ilka" .... Doppler
Waltz, "Très Jolie" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
"Sunday Morning" and "Sunday Evening," from "Alsatian Scenes" .... Massenet
Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Bolero .... Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhäuser" .... Wagner
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana," .... Mascagni
Loin du Bal .... Gillet
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin," .... Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS MAY 18

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 symphony players will be heard in this program:

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
Overture, "Ilka" .... Doppler
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna," .... Wolf-Ferrari
Scenes Alsaciennes: a. Sunday Morning. b. Sunday Evening .... Massenet
Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Bolero .... Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
"Lion du Bal" .... Gillet
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky

HERALD. MAY 19

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 symphony players will be heard in the following programme:

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
Overture, "Ilka" .... Doppler
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Scenes Alsaciennes .... Massenet
Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Bolero .... Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Lon du Bal .... Gillet
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky

POST MAY. 19

SYMPHONY HALL—The Pop Concerts at Symphony hall, which are now in their third week, have easily proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm night after night, that the Pops of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Conductor Agide Jacchia, accounting for the varied taste of the heterogeneous Pop audiences, has nevertheless subtly raised the quality of the program so that, suitable to the large orchestra of eighty symphony players, the Pops are still enjoyable to all and forbidding to none. Occasionally, brilliant symphonic pieces bring great applause, while operatic excerpts, waltzes, dances, and light numbers innumerable, keep their due places. Social intercourse, light refreshments, and smoking, around the tables and at the new "bar," lend the Pops the atmosphere of gaiety which lightens every evening.

HINGHAM-JOURNAL
MAY. 20.

THE POPS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, now in their third week, have proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm night after night, that the Pops of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Conductor Agide Jacchia has raised the quality of the programmes so that suitable to the large orchestra of 80 symphony players, the pops are still enjoyable to all and forbidding to none. Occasionally, brilliant symphonic pieces bring great applause, while operatic excerpts, waltzes, dances, and light numbers innumerable, keep their due places.

Social intercourse, light refreshments and smoking around the tables and at the new "Bar", lend to the pops the atmosphere of gaiety which lightens every evening. The program for Friday, May 20, consists of Coronation March, Overture to "Raymond", waltz "Artist's Life", fantasia "La Tosca" March of the Little Lead Soldiers; Andante and Minuet Viola d'Amore Solo—Mr. Paul Shirley; Roumanian Rhapsody, selection "The Tales of Hoffman"; waltz "Girls of Baden"; first slavonic dance.

WEYMOUTH-GAZETTE
MAY. 20.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

This program will be played in Symphony Hall at the Pop concert tonight by Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra:

Coronation March .... Svendson
Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Artist's Life" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca" .... Puccini
Suite, "Sigard Jorsalfar" .... Grieg
a. In the Hall of the King
b. Festival March.
March of the Little Lead Soldiers .. Pierne
Andante and Minuet .... Milandre
Voila d'Amore Solo ... Mr. Paul Shirley
Roumanian Rhapsody .... Enesco
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komzak
First Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak

HERALD.MAY 20.

POP CONCERTS

Programs performed with superlative skill by the Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, make the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, now completing their third week, the musical centre of Boston and, indeed, a treat of a special sort, which probably no other city in this country affords.

Monday night will bring the Russian-Tschaikowsky program, the popularity of which is unexcelled at the Pops; on Tuesday Simmons College, on Thursday the Roxbury Latin school, and on Friday Radcliffe College will celebrate at the Pops. But these and all other nights are public occasions.

Monday's program follows:

Procession of the Sardar .. Ippolito-Ivanoff
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Valse Caprice .... Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky
Marche Slave
Andante Cantabile (for strings)
From the "Nutracker Suite
(a) Ouverture Miniature
(b) Trepak
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" } Tschaikowsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
Two Russian Folk-Songs Arranged by Agide Jacchia
a. Volga Bargemen's Song
b. Dubinushka
Cortege from "Mlada" .. Rimsky-Korsakoff

TRAV. MAY.21

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

In Symphony Hall tonight the following programme will be played by the Pops Orchestra under Conductor Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramors" .. Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame" .... Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" .. Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater" .... Rossini
Gypsy Suite. a. The Dance. b. Love Duet. c. Tarantella
Violin Solo—Mr. Jacques Hoffmann. .... German
Whispering of the Flowers .... Blon
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre" .... Litolff
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa

POST MAY. 21

Progress of The Pops—John McCormack Exceptionally—A Flute-Players' Matinee—Thomas Wilfred, Rare Lutanist—Men of Color as Pianist and Singer—Spring Opera by a New Company

Only two evenings at the Pop Concerts, next week, escape a special designation—Wednesday and Saturday. On both those who prefer their Pops "straight" may take their varied pleasure—with the music and the playing of it, with the "light refreshments"—tobacco included; with lighter prattle or with amiable observation of their neighbors. For either evening, Mr. Jacchia has set an amusing programme—the better on Wednesday for the inclusion of the Pizzicato movement from Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings and on Saturday for a solo-piece for violoncello to be played by Mr. Keller. The "special nights" begin on Monday with a Russian programme to which Chaikovsky contributes liberally and Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov and Rakhmaninov in less degree. On Tuesday falls the evening of Simmons College when students and alumnæ will sing four of its songs. Radcliffe will outdo them, however, on Friday, when its daughters will be heard in six of its tunes with Dr. Davison leading the Choral Society in two of them. The men squeeze in, as it were, on Thursday, the evening for graduates of the Roxbury Latin School, likewise with one or two particular numbers. And in the pleasures of each and every one of these "special nights" the public may share.

At the Pops Tonight

Wedding March from "Feramors" .... Rubinstein
Overture, "Pique Dame" .... Suppé
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" .... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater" .... Rossini
Gypsy Suite, violin solo .... German
Whispering of the Flowers .... Blon
Overture, "Robespierre" .... Litolff
Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser" .... Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
March, "Stars and Stripes" .... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Solist: Jacques Hoffmann.

TRANS. MAY. 21.

POP CONCERTS

A prime reason for the success of the programs which Conductor Agide Jacchia makes for the Pop Concerts, now about to open their fourth week at Symphony Hall, lies in his regard for the response which each number brings. If the favor of any piece of long-standing begins to wane, it is dropped, and, likewise, newly acquired ones must meet the test of the popular referendum. Hence the nights of keen delight which the Pop-goers of this Spring are enjoying from beginning to end. Tomorrow night will bring a Russian program. On Tuesday Simmons College will celebrate; on Thursday, Roxbury Latin; on Friday, Radcliffe. But all nights are open to the public.

ADVERTISER. MAY 22

At the Pops

A prime reason for the success of the programmes which Conductor Agide Jacchia makes for the Pop concerts, now about to open their fourth week at Symphony Hall, lies in his regard for the responses which each number brings. If the favor of any piece of long-standing begins to wane it is dropped and, likewise, newly acquired ones must meet the test of the popular referendum. The worthiest of 1921 music, the choicest waltzes, ballet suites and light pieces of our grandfathers' time and our own, the most tuneful of operatic selections, whether Wagnerian, French or Italian, are performed every night by the orchestra of Symphony players. Since the time when Mr. Jacchia was the pupil and disciple of Pietro Mascagni he has conducted opera throughout Italy, crossed the ocean twice, and at the head of first rate opera companies toured the United States from coast to coast with additional seasons in New York, also in Canada and Central America.

Tomorrow night will bring the Russian-Tschaikowsky programme, the popularity of which is unexcelled at the Pops; on Tuesday, Simmons College; on Thursday, the Roxbury Latin School, and on Friday, Radcliffe College. But these and all other nights are public occasions.

POST-MAY. 22

Fourth Week of the Pops

The fourth week of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall opens tomorrow night with a Russian-Tschaikowsky program. Tuesday, Simmons College; Thursday, Roxbury Latin School, and Friday, Radcliffe College will celebrate at the Pops. But every night this week is open to the public. The marked success with the public of Mr Jacchia's programs may be ascribed to his regard for the amount of applause each number draws. Each new piece must win popular favor to gain a permanent place in the repertory. Likewise if a former favorite fails to provoke warm applause it is dropped.

The program for Monday follows: "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanoff; Prelude, Rachmaninoff; Valse Caprice, Rubinstein; Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "Marche Slave," Andante Cantabile (for strings); "Ouverture Miniature," "Trepack" and Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Volga Bargemen's Song" and "Dubinushka," Arranged by Agide Jacchia; Cortage from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakoff.

GLOBE MAY.22

RADCLIFFE AND POPS

Radcliffe College will have its first night at the "Pops" next Friday. The occasion is not only one of general festivity but serves to call attention to the Radcliffe endowment fund, which will be publicly launched in the fall. In addition to the numbers by the regular orchestra, special features have been arranged. A chorus comprising the Choral Society and the Radcliffe Club chorus under the direction of Dr. Archibald T. Davison of Harvard University, will sing "June Rhapsody," by Mabel W. Daniels, 1900, and a group of Schubert waltzes with orchestra. Mrs. Laura Lintefield, 1904, will sing an area from "Louise," with orchestra. There will be a number of the latest college songs. The program will close with the Radcliffe Hymn.

Tickets may be obtained of Miss Sibyl Bingham, Massachusetts Chambers.

SIMMONS AND THE POPS

Next Tuesday evening at the Pops will be devoted to the interests of Simmons College. The program will include "Simmons March Song" by Emma Burchenal, 1911; "Our Alma Mater," music by Marion Fitch, 1919, and a new march with chorus, "Stand by Simmons," words by Mrs. Ira Rich Kent, music by Miss Fitch.

This is the second Simmons night at the Pops. It is said that the one last year drew the largest audience in the history of the Pops. It is expected that the one this week will be equally successful.

AGIDE JACCHIA AT POPS

A prime reason for the success of the programs which Conductor Agide Jacchia makes for the Pop concerts, now about to open their fourth week at Symphony Hall, lies in his regard for the response which each number brings. If the favor of any piece of long-standing begins to wane, it is dropped. Newly acquired ones must meet the test of the popular referendum. Hence the nights of keen delight which the pop-goers of this spring are enjoying from beginning to end. The worthiest of 1921 music, the choicest waltzes, ballet suites, and light pieces of our grandfathers' time and our own, the most tuneful of operatic selections, whether Wagnerian, French or Italian, are performed every night by the symphony orchestra of maximum size and of highest skill. In operatic music especially Agide Jacchia is eminent as a conductor.

The programs of the week follow:

Monday, May 23.

RUSSIAN TSCHAIKOWSKY PROGRAM.

Procession of the Sardar, ... Ippolitova-Ivanoff
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Valse Caprice .... Rubenstein
Fantasia, "Eugen Onlegin" .. Tschaikowsky
Marche Slave. Andante Cantabile (for strings). From the "Nutcracker" Suite. Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
Two Russian Folk Songs.
(a) Volga Bargemen's Song.
(b) Dubinushka. Arr. by Jacchia
Cortege from "Mlada" .. Rimsky-Korsakoff

Tuesday, May 24.

SIMMONS COLLEGE NIGHT.

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
Overture, "La Forza del Destino" .. Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
Simmons College Songs:
(a) Simmons Marching Song. .... Emma Burchenal
(b) Our Alma Mater ... Marion Fitch '19
(c) Stand by Simmons .. Marion Fitch '19
(Words by Louise Andrews Kent).
Fantasia, "Carmen" .... Bizet
"Hindu Song" from the Opera "Sadko" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria, solo violin, harp, organ and strings .... Bach-Gounod
Rhaspody Espana .... Chabrier
College Hymn.
(Words by Sarah Louise Arnold).
Selection, "Lady Billy" .... Levey
Song of the Volga Boatmen. .... Arr. by Jacchia
Charge of the Hussars .... Spindler

Wednesday, May 25.

Entrance of the Boyards .... Harvorsen
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .. Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
Pizzicato .... Foote
Enfantillage ("Children at Play") .... van Westerhout
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris" .. Mascagni
"S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen," Folk song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner .... Ochs
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor, ... Brahms

Thursday, May 26.

ROXBURY LATIN SCHOOL NIGHT.

March, "Old Roxbury" .... Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .... Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiontina" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhaspody .... Liszt
Harp solo, Fantasy .... Kovarovic
Mr. Alfred Holy.
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" . Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Shamrock" .... Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South .... Strauss
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin" .. Wagner

Friday, May 27.

RADCLIFFE COLLEGE NIGHT.

Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" .. Suppe
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Choral pieces by the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society. (Conductor, Dr. Davison):
(a) June Rhapsody ... Mabel Daniels '00
(b) German Dances .... Schubert
Danse Macabre .... Saint-Saens
Soprano Solo, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" .... Charpentier
(Laura Littlefield '04)
Procession to the Cathedral, from Act II, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
(a) Polonaise, "Eugen Oneigin" .... Tschaikowsky
(b) College Songs:
1. Cherry Ribbon, ... Mildred Clarke Crook '14
2. Just on the Other Side, ... Sophie Morris '13
3. Bring a Brick .... Rosamond Eliot '17
Leader, Sibyl Bingham '18,
Accompanist, Emily Walle '18.
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" .... Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantelle .... Jacchia
Hungarian March .... Berlioz
"Now We Rise to Greet Thee" .... Emily Coolidge '00

Saturday, May 28.

Overture to "Zampa" .... Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus" .... Strauss
Letter of Manon .... Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival .... Svendsen
'Cello Solo (Mr. Keller)
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" .... Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony, ... Tschaikowsky
Valse Bluette .... Drigo
American Patrol .... Meacham

HERALD MAY.22

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Programme

Procession of the Sardar, ... Ippolitov-Ivanov
Prelude .... Rakhmaninov
Valse Caprice .... Rubinstein
Fantasia from "Eugen Onégin"—Slavic March—Andante Cantabile for Strings—Overture and Trépak from the Ballet, "Nutcracker"—Overture, "1812," .... Chaikovsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
Russian Folk-Songs, "The Volga Bargemen"—"Dubinushka" .. Jacchia
Procession from "Mlada," .... Rimsky-Korsakov

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS.MAY.23

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

No Pop concert of the season is more popular than the Russian-Tschaikowsky night, which consists entirely of this wonderful music. This splendid programme will be presented by Agide Jacchia in Symphony Hall tonight:

Procession of the Sardar .... Ippolito-Ivanoff
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Valse Caprice .... Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" .... Tschaikowsky
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Andante Cantabile (for strings) .. Tschaikowsky
From the "Nutcracker Suite" .... Tschaikowsky
a. Ouverture Miniature. b. Trepak.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tschaikowsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" . Borodin
Two Russian Folk Songs .... Arranged by Agide Jacchia
a. Volga Bargemen's Song. b. Dubinushka.
Cortege from "Mlada" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff

POST MAY 23

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Simmons College

Military March .... Schubert
Overture, "La Forza del Destino" . Verdi
Waltz, "Blue Danube" .... J. Strauss
Simmons College Songs
Fantasia, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Hindu Song from "Sadko", ... Rimsky-Korsakov
Ave Maria .... Schubert
(For strings, organ and harp.)
Rhapsody, "España" .... Chabrier
College Hymn
Selection, "Lady Billy" .... Levey
Song of The Volga Boatmen ... Jacchia
Charge of the Hussars .... Spindler

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS MAY.24

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song." .... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Final Scene from "Tristan and Isolde," .... Wagner
Pizzicato from the Suite for Strings, ... Foote
Children at Play .... van Westerhout
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" . Mascagni
Folk-Song with Variations in the styles of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner .... Ochs
Introduction to Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ... Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance No. 1 .... Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

POST-MAY.25

n Affected
y of "Pops?"

es, "Police Commissioner Refuses cense," "They Let All the North End ves Run," and this quotation is typi of the editorials—"It doesn't seem asonable that the police commissioner ould deprive such a respectable place Music Hall of a license in order to commodate some cheap, disreputable n hole with a right to dispense vile uors"—(Boston Gazette, June 15, 1899). he Pops are far more musical now an they used to be. The original chestra was smaller and the pro ams lighter. When Music Hall was andoned in the summer of 1900, the ps were held for a season in Mechanics Hall, since Symphony Hall then ing built as the new home of the chestra, was not quite ready for cupancy.

n Charge of the First Radcliffe Night at Pops

Champlain Studio

MISS SIBYL BINGHAM.
n charge of the first Radcliffe Night at the Symphony Pops, May 27.

Miss Sibyl Bingham of Boston, a adcliffe graduate of the class of 1918 in charge of the first Radcliffe Night the Pops in Symphony Hall Friday ening, May 27, for the benefit of the dowment fund. The concert is to be ven under the auspices of the Radffe Club of Boston. The Radcliffe horal Society, which has been heard ready this year at Symphony Hall ith the Harvard Glee Club, under the rection of Dr. A. T. Davison of Harrd University, will sing with the adcliffe Club chorus, accompanied by e full orchestra.

POST. MAY. 17.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Boston City Club

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Thomas
Waltz, "Pomona"..........Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow..........Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"........Verdi
Military Polonaise......Chopin-Glazunov
Concert-Pieces for Organ and Orchestra, "Cypresses and Laurels," Saint-Saëns
Serenade ....Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach
Largo ....Händel
Slavic March................Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Organist: Albert Snow.
(No tables are available for the public)

TRANS-MAY. 17

CITY CLUB AT POPS

Although the Boston City Club has taken the floor for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the program will be of general interest and the balcony will be open to the public. Agide Jacchia will conduct this program:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Thomas
Waltz, "Pomone" ....Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ....Verdi
Polonaise Militaire ....Chopin-Glaszounow
Solo for organ and orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers" .....Saint-Saens
Albert Snow.
a. Cypresses (organ solo).
b. Laurels (organ and orchestra).
(First time in America).
Serenade ....Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi" ....Wagner
Selections, "Tales of Hoffman" Offenbach
Largo ....Handel
Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffman. Harp, organ and strings.
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky

[illegible] MAY. [illegible]

CITY CLUB AT POPS

Although the Boston City Club has taken the floor for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the programme will be of general interest and the balcony will be open to the public. Agide Jacchia will conduct the following programme:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone" ....Waldteufel
Kammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ....Verdi
Polonaise Militaire........Chopin-Glazounow
Solo for Organ and Orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers" ....Saint-Saens
Mr. Albert Snow
a. Cypresses (organ solo)
b. Laurels (organ and orchestra)
(First time in America)
Serenade ....Schubert
Overture to "Rienzi" ....Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffman" ....Offenbach
Largo ....Handel
Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffmann
Harp, organ and strings.
Marche Slave ....Tschnikowsky

[illegible] MAY. [illegible]

From Saint-Saens at 86

"Cypress and Laurel," a recent piece by Saint-Saëns for organ and orchestra, was heard for the first time in Boston last evening at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall and well received by an audience consisting, for the most part, of members of the City Club. Seemingly the aftermath of war suggsted the music; while possibly, even plausibly, the composer designed it for memorial services in churches. It begins with many measures for the organ alone. They use the manifold voices of the instrument with Saint-Saëns's ripe knowledge; they do not spare the skill of so able an organist as Mr. Albert Snow again proved himself. These technical exactions serve music of grave but not lugubrious mood, running now in stately sonorities, again in gentler melody, appropriately invented, expertly made. Presently the orchestra enters with trumpet-calls, drum-beats and other martial suggestion, and soon swells into a sharply rhythmed but commonplace military march. Only the full-voiced interventions of the organ save these final periods from cheapness. Seemingly Mr. Snow and Mr. Jacchia made the most of the whole music.

Via Symphony Hall

According to Le Figaro, Mr. Monteux is to remind Paris of his mettle as conductor in a concert of his own at the Salle Gaveau on Tuesday evening, May 31. His band will be the Colonne Orchestra. Parisians have not heard him since he came to the United States five years ago with Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet. Yet in Paris, at the Concerts-Monteux for novel them, at the Concerts-Monteux for novel music, he won his first note as conductor.

It is not likely that Richard Strauss, when he revisits the United States next autumn, will be asked to conduct at a pair of Symphony Concerts because the fee demanded for such "invitation" is exorbitant. In all probability, however, he will be heard in a concert of his own in Boston.

At the Pops Tonight

Military March................Schubert
Overture, "Ilka"...............Doppler
Waltz, "Très Jolie"........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
"Sunday Morning" and "Sunday Evening," from "Alsatian Scenes" ....Massenet
Prelude to "Carmen"............Bizet
Bolero ....Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhäuser"......Wagner
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana."
Loin du Bal......................Mascagni
.................................Gillet
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin," Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS MAY

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 symphony players will be heard in this program:

Marche Militaire...................Schubert
Overture, "Ilka"..................Doppler
Waltz, "Tres Jolie"..............Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari
Scenes Alsaciennes: a. Sunday Morning. b. Sunday Evening........Massenet
Prelude to "Carmen"..................Bizet
Bolero ....Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"
"Lion du Bal"......................Mascagni
...................................Gillet
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin"...Tschaikowsky

HERALD. MAY 9.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 symphony players will be heard in the following programme:

Marche Militaire ....Schubert
Overture, "Ilka" ....Doppler
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Scenes Alsaciennes ....Massenet
Prelude to "Carmen" ....Bizet
Bolero ....Mozkowski
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Lon du Bal ....Gillet
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin" .....Tschaikowsky

POST MAY. 19.

SYMPHONY HALL—The Pop Concerts at Symphony hall, which are now in their third week, have easily proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm night after night, that the Pops of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Conductor Agide Jacchia, accounting for the varied taste of the heterogeneous Pop audiences, has nevertheless subtly raised the quality of the program so that, suitable to the large orchestra of eighty symphony players, the Pops are still enjoyable to all and forbidding to none. Occasionally, brilliant symphonic pieces bring great applause, while operatic excerpts, waltzes, dances, and light numbers innumerable, keep their due places. Social intercourse, light refreshments, and smoking, around the tables and at the new "bar," lend to the Pops the atmosphere of gaiety which lightens every evening.

HINGHAM JOURNAL MAY. 20.

THE POPS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, now in their third week, have proved by the record attendance and the manifest enthusiasm night after night, that the Pops of 1921 are more popular than ever before. Conductor Agide Jacchia has raised the quality of the programmes so that suitable to the large orchestra of 80 symphony players, the pops are still enjoyable to all and forbidding to none. Occasionally, brilliant symphonic pieces bring great applause, while operatic excerpts, waltzes, dances, and light numbers innumerable, keep their due places.

Social intercourse, light refreshments and smoking around the tables and at the new "Bar", lend to the pops the atmosphere of gaiety which lightens every evening. The program for Friday, May 20, consists of Coronation March, Overture to "Raymond", waltz, "Artist's Life", fantasia "La Tosca" March of the Little Lead Soldiers; Andante and Minuet Viola d'Amore Solo—Mr. Paul Shirley; Roumanian Rhapsody, selection "The Tales of Hoffman"; waltz "Girls of Baden"; first slavonic dance.

WEYMOUTH GAZETTE MAY. 20.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

This program will be played in Symphony Hall at the Pop concert tonight by Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra:

Coronation March...............Svendson
Overture to "Raymond"...........Thomas
Waltz, "Artist's Life"...........Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca"............Puccini
Suite, "Sigurd Jorsalfar"...........Grieg
a. In the Hall of the King
b. Festival March.
March of the Little Lead Soldiers..Pierne
Andante and Minuet............Milandre
Voila d'Amore Solo...Mr. Paul Shirley
Roumanian Rhapsody.............Enesco
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman" Offenbach
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"........Komzak
First Slavonic Dance..............Dvorak

HERALD. MAY 20.

POP CONCERTS

Programs performed with superlative skill by the Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, make the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, now completing their third week, the musical centre of Boston and, indeed, a treat of a special sort, which probably no other city in this country affords.

Monday night will bring the Russian-Tschaikowsky program, the popularity of which is unexcelled at the Pops; on Tuesday Simmons College, on Thursday the Roxbury Latin school, and on Friday Radcliffe College will celebrate at the Pops. But these and all other nights are public occasions.

Monday's program follows:

Procession of the Sardar..Ippolito-Ivanoff
Prelude........................Rachmaninoff
Valse Caprice...................Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin"...Tschaikowsky
Marche Slave
Andante Cantabile (for strings)
From the "Nutracker Suite"
(a) Ouverture Miniature
(b) Trepak
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"
} Tschaikowsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
Two Russian Folk-Songs
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
a. Volga Bargemen's Song
b. Dubinushka
Cortege from "Mlada"..Rimsky-Korsakoff

TRAV. MAY. 21.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

In Symphony Hall tonight the following programme will be played by the Pops Orchestra under Conductor Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramors".Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame".......... Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"..Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater"..........Rossini
Gypsy Suite. a. The Dance. b. Love Duet. c. Tarantella
Violin Solo—Mr. Jacques Hoffmann..........German
Whispering of the Flowers..........Blon
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre"...Litolff
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"....Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"..............Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever ....Sousa

POST. MAY. 21

Progress of The Pops—John McCormack Exceptionally—A Flute-Players' Matinee—Thomas Wilfred, Rare Lutanist—Men of Color as Pianist and Singer—Spring Opera by a New Company

ONLY two evenings at the Pop Concerts, next week, escape a special designation—Wednesday and Saturday. On both those who prefer their Pops "straight" may take their varied pleasure—with the music and the playing of it, with the "light refreshments"—tobacco included; with lighter prattle or with amiable observation of their neighbors. For either evening, Mr. Jacchia has set an amusing programme—the better on Wednesday for the inclusion of the Pizzicato movement from Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings and on Saturday for a solo-piece for violoncello to be played by Mr. Keller. The "special nights" begin on Monday with a Russian programme to which Chaikovsky contributes liberally and Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov and Rakhmaninov in less degree. On Tuesday falls the evening of Simmons College when students and alumnæ will sing four of its songs. Radcliffe will outdo them, however, on Friday, when its daughters will be heard in six of its tunes with Dr. Davison leading the Choral Society in two of them. The men squeeze in, as it were, on Thursday, the evening for graduates of the Roxbury Latin School, likewise with one or two particular numbers. And in the pleasures of each and every one of these "special nights" the public may share.

At the Pops Tonight

Wedding March from "Feramors". Rubinstein
Overture, "Pique Dame"........Suppé
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater"......Rossini
Gypsy Suite, violin solo ......German
Whispering of the Flowers........Blon
Overture, "Robespierre" ....Litolff
Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".......Vollstedt
March, "Stars and Stripes"......Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Solist: Jacques Hoffmann.

TRANS. MAY. 21.

POP CONCERTS

A prime reason for the success of the programs which Conductor Agide Jacchia makes for the Pop Concerts, now about to open their fourth week at Symphony Hall, lies in his regard for the response which each number brings. If the favor of any piece of long-standing begins to wane, it is dropped, and, likewise, newly acquired ones must meet the test of the popular referendum. Hence the nights of keen delight which the Pop-goers of this Spring are enjoying from beginning to end. Tomorrow night will bring a Russian program. On Tuesday Simmons College will celebrate; on Thursday, Roxbury Latin; on Friday, Radcliffe. But all nights are open to the public.

ADVERTISER. MAY. 22

At the Pops

A prime reason for the success of the programmes which Conductor Agide Jacchia makes for the Pop concerts, now about to open their fourth week at Symphony Hall, lies in his regard for the responses which each number brings. If the favor of any piece of long-standing begins to wane it is dropped and, likewise, newly acquired ones must meet the test of the popular referendum. The worthiest of 1921 music, the choicest waltzes, ballet suites and light pieces of our grandfathers' time and our own, the most tuneful of operatic selections, whether Wagnerian, French or Italian, are performed every night by the orchestra of Symphony players. Since the time when Mr. Jacchia was the pupil and disciple of Pietro Mascagni he has conducted opera throughout Italy, crossed the ocean twice, and at the head of first rate opera companies toured the United States from coast to coast with additional seasons in New York, also in Canada and Central America.

Tomorrow night will bring the Russian-Tschaikowsky programme, the popularity of which is unexcelled at the Pops; on Tuesday, Simmons College; on Thursday, the Roxbury Latin School, and on Friday, Radcliffe College. But these and all other nights are public occasions.

POST-MAY. 22

Fourth Week of the Pops

The fourth week of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall opens tomorrow night with a Russian-Tschaikowsky program. Tuesday, Simmons College; Thursday, Roxbury Latin School, and Friday, Radcliffe College will celebrate at the Pops. But every night this week is open to the public. The marked success with the public of Mr Jacchia's programs may be ascribed to his regard for the amount of applause each number draws. Each new piece must win popular favor to gain a permanent place in the repertory. Likewise if a former favorite fails to provoke warm applause it is dropped.

The program for Monday follows: "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanoff; Prelude, Rachmaninoff; Valse Caprice, Rubinstein; Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "Marche Slave," Andante Cantabile (for strings), "Ouverture Miniature," "Trepack" and Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Volga Bargemen's Song" and "Dubinushka," Arranged by Agide Jacchia; Cortage from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakoff.

GLOBE MAY 22

RADCLIFFE AND POPS

Radcliffe College will have its first night at the "Pops" next Friday. The occasion is not only one of general festivity but serves to call attention to the Radcliffe endowment fund, which will be publicly launched in the fall. In addition to the numbers by the regular orchestra, special features have been arranged. A chorus comprising the Choral Society and the Radcliffe Club chorus under the direction of Dr. Archibald T. Davison of Harvard University, will sing "June Rhapsody," by Mabel W. Daniels, 1900, and a group of Schubert waltzes with orchestra. Mrs. Laura Lintefield, 1904, will sing an area from "Louise," with orchestra. There will be a number of the latest college songs. The program will close with the Radcliffe Hymn.

Tickets may be obtained of Miss Sibyl Bingham, Massachusetts Chambers.

SIMMONS AND THE POPS

Next Tuesday evening at the Pops will be devoted to the interests of Simmons College. The program will include "Simmons March Song" by Emma Burchenal, 1911; "Our Alma Mater," music by Marion Fitch, 1919, and a new march with chorus, "Stand by Simmons," words by Mrs. Ira Rich Kent, music by Miss Fitch.

This is the second Simmons night at the Pops. It is said that the one last year drew the largest audience in the history of the Pops. It is expected that the one this week will be equally successful.

AGIDE JACCHIA AT POPS

A prime reason for the success of the programs which Conductor Agide Jacchia makes for the Pop concerts, now about to open their fourth week at Symphony Hall, lies in his regard for the response which each number brings. If the favor of any piece of long-standing begins to wane, it is dropped. Newly acquired ones must meet the test of the popular referendum. Hence the nights of keen delight which the pop-goers of this spring are enjoying from beginning to end. The worthiest of 1921 music, the choicest waltzes, ballet suites, and light pieces of our grandfathers' time and our own, the most tuneful of operatic selections, whether Wagnerian, French or Italian, are performed every night by the symphony orchestra of maximum size and of highest skill. In operatic music especially Agide Jacchia is eminent as a conductor.

The programs of the week follow:

Monday, May 23.

RUSSIAN TSCHAIKOWSKY PROGRAM.

Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitoga-Ivanoff
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff
Valse Caprice..................Rubenstein
Fantasia, "Eugen Oniegin"..Tschaikowsky
Marche Slave. Andante Cantabile (for strings). From the "Nutcracker" Suite. Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
Two Russian Folk Songs.
(a) Volga Bargemen's Song.
(b) Dubinushka.
Arr. by Jacchia
Cortege from "Mlada"..Rimsky-Korsakoff

Tuesday, May 24.

SIMMONS COLLEGE NIGHT.

Marche Militaire..................Schubert
Overture, "La Forza del Destino"....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Simmons College Songs:
(a) Simmons Marching Song, Emma Burchenal
(b) Our Alma Mater...Marion Fitch '19
(c) Stand by Simmons..Marion Fitch '19
(Words by Louise Andrews Kent).
Fantasia, "Carmen"...................Bizet
"Hindu Song" from the Opera "Sadko".............Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria, solo violin, harp, organ and strings ....Bach-Gounod
Rhaspody Espana ....Chabrier
College Hymn.
(Words by Sarah Louise Arnold).
Selection, "Lady Billy"..............Levey
Song of the Volga Boatmen, Arr. by Jacchia
Charge of the Hussars..............Spindler

Wednesday, May 25.

Entrance of the Boyards.........Harvosen
Overture to "Mignon"..............Thomas
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"..........Leoncavallo
Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
Pizzicato ....Foote
Enfantillage ("Children at Play") van Westerhout
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris"...Mascagni
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen," Folk song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner ....Ochs
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna"..............Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor, Brahms

Thursday, May 26.

ROXBURY LATIN SCHOOL NIGHT.

March, "Old Roxbury"................Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiontina"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida".......................Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Harp solo, Fantasy..............Kovarovic
Mr. Alfred Holy.
Kammenoi Ostrow................Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Shamrock"......Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South"....Strauss
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin". Wagner

Friday, May 27.

RADCLIFFE COLLEGE NIGHT.

Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"..Suppe
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..............Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
Choral pieces by the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society, (Conductor, Dr. Davison):
(a) June Rhapsody....Mabel Daniels '00
(b) German Dances...............Schubert
Danse Macabre...............Saint-Saens
Soprano Solo, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"....................Charpentier
(Laura Littlefield '04)
Procession to the Cathedral, from Act II, "Lohengrin"...............Wagner
(a) Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin" Tschaikowsky
(b) College Songs:
1. Cherry Ribbon, Mildred Clarke Crook '14
2. Just on the Other Side, Sophie Morris '18
3. Bring a Brick....Rosamond Elliot '17
Leader, Sibyl Bingham '18.
Accompanist, Emily Walle '18.
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Hungarian March ....Berlioz
"Now We Rise to Greet Thee" Emily Coolidge '09

Saturday, May 28.

Overture to "Zampa" ....Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus".........Strauss
Letter of Manon ....Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival....Svendsen
'Cello Solo (Mr. Keller)
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky
Valse Bluette ....Drigo
American Patrol ....Meacham

HERALD MAY 22

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Programme

Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov
Prelude ....Rakhmaninov
Valse Caprice..................Rubinstein
Fantasia from "Eugen Onégin"—Slavic March—Andante Cantabile for Strings—Overture and Trépak from the Ballet, "Nutcracker"—Overture, "1812." Chaikovsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
Russian Folk-Songs, "The Volga Bargemen"—"Dubinushka".Jacchia
Procession from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakov

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY. 23.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

No Pop concert of the season is more popular than the Russian-Tschaikowsky night, which consists entirely of this wonderful music. This splendid programme will be presented by Agide Jacchia in Symphony Hall tonight:

Procession of the Sardar.......Ippolito-Ivanoff
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff
Valse Caprice ....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin"......Tschaikowsky
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Andante Cantabile (for strings)..Tschaikowsky
From the "Nutcracker Suite"....Tschaikowsky
a. Ouverture Miniature, b. Trepak.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tschaikowsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"..Borodin
Two Russian Folk Songs
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
a. Volga Bargemen's Song. b. Dubinushka.
Cortege from "Mlada"..........Rimsky-Korsakoff

POST MAY 23

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Simmons College

Military March..............Schubert
Overture, "La Forza del Destino". Verdi
Waltz, "Blue Danube".......J. Strauss
Simmons College Songs
Fantasia, "Carmen"..............Bizet
Hindu Song from "Sadko", Rimsky-Korsakov
Ave Maria........................Schubert
(For strings, organ and harp.)
Rhapsody, "España" ....Chabrier
College Hymn
Selection, "Lady Billy"........Levey
Song of The Volga Boatmen...Jacchia
Charge of the Hussars.......Spindler

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. MAY. 24.

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Boyards.......Halvorsen
Overture to "Mignon"..............Thomas
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"......Leoncavallo
Final Scene from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
Pizzicato from the Suite for Strings, Foote
Children at Play........van Westerhout
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"...Mascagni
Folk-Song with Variations in the styles of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner.........Ochs
Introduction to Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna"...Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance No. 1...........Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

POST-MAY. 25

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards..........Halvorson
Overture to "Mignon"..................Thomas
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"....Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci,"..........Leoncavallo
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde,"
Wagner
Pizzicato ....Foote
Enfantillage ("Children at Play").......
van Westerhout
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris"......Mascagni
Folk Song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner ....Ochs
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor...Brahms

POST MAY. 26

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Sympl
Orchestra will be heard in this prog
at Symphony Hall tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards.......Halvo
Overture to "Mignon"...........The Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"..Str
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".........Leoncav
Love-Death from 'Tristan and Isolde
Wa
Pizzicato ....F
Enfantillage ("Children at Play")
van Wester
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"...Masc
Folk Song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner...........................O
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferr
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G Minor
Brahn

HERALD-MAY. 25.

ROXBURY LATIN AT POPS

Although the Roxbury Latin School will have their annual Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this will be in every sense a public occasion and the programme of special appeal. The numbers follow:

March, "Old Roxbury"...................Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..............Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"...........................Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.............Liszt
Harp Solo—Fantasy ....Kovarovic
Mr. Alfred Holy.
Kammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Shamrock"..........Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South".........Strauss
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"....Wagner

POST-MAY. 26.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Roxbury Latin School

March, "Old Roxbury"............Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry"......Suppé
Waltz, "Estudiantina"......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"..................Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Liszt
Solo for Harp, Fantasia.....Kovarovic
Kammenoi Ostrow...........Rubinstein
Overture, "1812"............Chaikovsky
Selection, "The Shamrock"..Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South"
J. Strauss
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin"
Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Alfred Holy

TRANS-MAY. 26

פאפס קאָנצערטען אין סימפאָני האָלל, באָסטאָן.

פארוואס דער נאָמען „פּאָפּס“? ווי אזוי די אינסטיטוציע איז געשאַפען געווארען און וואס זי איז יעצט. — דער איבערגאַנג פון לייכטע צו קלאסישע מוזיק. — די גרויסע צאהל אידישע באזוכער און די אלגעמיינע בעגייסטערונג פאר רוסישע מוזיק.

באסטאן, וועלכע ציילט זיך אויס אלס איינע פון די מוזיקאלישסטע שטעדט אין אמעריקא, מיט איהר באַריהמטער מוזיקאלישער קאָנסערוואטאָריע, מיט איהר וועלט־בעריהמטען סימפאני ארקעסטער, און מיט איהר סימפאני האלל, אין וועלכען עס האבען אויפ־ [illegible]

RADCLIFFE AT THE POPS

Radcliffe College students and alumnae will attend in numbers the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, and the noted chorus of the college will sing under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison. However, this concert will be open to the public and of unusual general interest. The program follows:

Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea".....Suppe
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".................Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".........Puccini
Choral pieces by the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society.
Danse Macabre.......................Saint-Saens
Soprano Solo, "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"..........................Charpentier
Mrs. Laura Littlefield.
Procession to the Cathedral from Act II. "Lohengrin"..............................Wagner
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin"......Tschaikowsky
College Songs—
"Cherry Ribbon...............Mildred C. Crook
"Just on the Other Side"......Sophie Morris
"Bring a Brick".............Rossmond Eliot
Leader, Sibyl Bingham '16,
Accompanist, Emily Walle '18.
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"...Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantelle.................................Jacchia
Hungarian March..........................Berlioz
"Now We Rise to Greet Thee"..Emily Coolidge

HERALD. MAY. 27.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

In Symphony Hall tonight the following program will be played by the Pops Orchestra, under Conducto
Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramors"..Rubinstei
Overture to "Pique Dame"..............Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"..Straus Fantasia, "Stabat Mater" ....Rossin
Gypsy Suite ....Germa
a. The Dance. b. Love Duet. c. Tarantella.
Violin solo, Mr. Jacque Hoffmann.
Whispering of the Flowers ....Blon
Overture to "Pique Dame"................Supp
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"......Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ....Vollsted
Stars and Stripes Forever ....Sous
Symphony Hall, Boston.

AMER. MAY. 27.

TONIGHT'S POPS

In Symphony Hall tonight this program will be played by the Pops Orchestra under Conductor Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramore"...Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame"..................Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"....Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater"..............Rossini
Gypsy Suite—
(a) The Dance...................... } German
(b) Love Duet....................... } German
(c) Tarantella .... } German
Violin Solo...........Mr. Jacquez Hoffmann
Whispering of the Flowers.................Blon
Ocerture, "Maximilian Robespierre"....Litolff
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".......Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"...............Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever..................Sousa

HERALD. MAY. 27.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Radcliffe College

Overture, "The Fair Galatea"..Suppé
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"...J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" Puccini
Choral Numbers.....................
Danse Macabre...........Saint-Saëns
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" ....Charpentier
Procession to the Minster from "Lohengrin ....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin"..
Chaikovsky
Radcliffe Songs ....
Selection, "Apple Blossoms".....
Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantella ....Jacchia
Rácokzy March ....Berlioz
Radcliffe Hymn ....

Conductors: A. Jacchia and A. T. Davison.
Assisting: The Radcliffe Choral Society and the Radcliffe Club Chorus.
Soloist: Laura Littlefield.

TRANS. MAY. 27.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

For the Pop Concert, to be given in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia has compiled the following programme to be played by the famous Pops Symphony Orchestra:

Overture to "Zampa"..................Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus"...........Strauss
Letter of Manon ....Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival.......Svendsen
Meditation from "Thais"..........Massonet
Solo violin, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor"
Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony.Tschaikowsky
Serenade, "Harlequin's Millions"......Drigo
American Patrol ....Meacham

POST-MAY. 28.

TONIGHT'S POPS

For the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Agide Jacchia has compiled this program to be played by the Pops symphony orchestra:

Overture to "Zampa"....................Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus"..............Strauss
Letter of Manon.............................Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".......................Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival..........Svendsen
Mediation from "Thais"..............Massenet
Solo violin, Jacques Hoffmann.
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor"..Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser"............Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony..Tschaikowsky
Serenade, "Harlequin's Millions".......Drigo
American Patrol...........................Meacham

HERALD-MAY. 28.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Zampa".............Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus"...J. Strauss
Letter of Manon....................Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"..............Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival...Svendsen
Meditation from "Thais"......Massenet
Sextet from "Lucia"..........Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhäuser".......Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony,
Chaikovsky
Serenade from "Harlequin's Millions"
Drigo
American Patrol...................Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Solo Violin: Jacques Hoffmann.

Progress of the Pops—A "Harvard Night" with the Glee Club, on Tuesday—Other Incidents—The Fleck Company Betters Its Performances

THROUGH next week, the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will run, for the most part, familiar course. The programme for Monday evening is more or less adjusted to the light pleasure and the gay mood of a spring holiday. On Tuesday befalls the annual "Harvard Night," with the Glee Club to sing four pieces, and with fragments for orchestras from two recent extravaganzas of the Hasty Pudding Club. Dr. Davison will lead the Glee Club in its numbers and the choir will be heard publicly for the last time before its summer journey to France. It is safe to predict also that not a few "among those present" will be able "to carry the tune" in Mr. Steinert's numbers from the Pudding plays. On Thursday the students of the Boston Conservatory—Mr. Jacchia's school of music—will keep rendeavous at the Pops and for them the conductor has dotted the programme with the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Sibelius's "Finlandia," Casella's "Italia" and other of his more exacting pieces. In the main, however, the lists for the week bring few fresh items—no more than two dances, on Monday, from Chaminade's ballet, "Callirhoe"; the waltzes, on Friday, from Strauss's operatic comedy, "Der Rosenkavalier," and Mr. Warren Storey Smith's songful Andante on Saturday. Enough, however, for most of those frequenting them that The Pops remain The Pops to the last piece on each programme and up and down the accompanying bill of food and drink. Also tobacco.

TRANS MAY. 28

THE POPS

The fifth week of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall finds the Pops' season of 1921 one of the most popular and crowded in the long history of this Bostonian institution.

Although a number of other cities have from time to time attempted to emulate the Pops' system of serving light refreshments at tables while popular music is being played by a large symphony orchestra, in Boston alone have these concerts been successful enough to survive.

AMER-MAY. 28.

POPS CONCERTS

The fifth week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall finds the Pops season of 1921 one of the most popular and crowded in the long history of this Bostonian institution.

The eventful programs of Agide Jacchia and the fine music which he can draw from the great Pops orchestra are of course always the centre of interest and delight at the Pops. The coming week will bring a number of particularly attractive special nights. For Decoration day there will be an appropriate holiday program; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard night, always one of the biggest Pops nights of the year. This one will be in the nature of a send-off for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Ruinstein's "Tower of Babel," with the orchestra, and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

TRAN. MAY 28.

Bosn...

POP CONCERTS

Harvard night will be celebrated next Tuesday at the Pops. The Harvard Glee Club will take part. Wednesday will bring Professional Women's Club night, and Thursday will be Boston Conservatory of Music night. Mr. Jacchia has made up the following program for tomorrow night:

Father of Victory...........................Ganne
Overture to Orpheus ....Offenbach
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" ....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Suite, "Callirhoe" ....Chaminade
Ave Maria ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo: Violin, harp, organ and strings.
Pawane ....German
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"....Mascagni
Miserere from "Il Trovatore"...............Verdi
Procession of the Sardar.......Ippolito-Ivanoff

HERALD-MAY. 28.

THE POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall continue to be the nightly gathering place for all of musical Boston and for a very considerable part of sociable Boston; indeed, the citizen with no "musical education" is largely represented, and a person to whom the Pops do not appeal would be hard to find. A great quantity of food and drink is now passing over tables which occupy the floor of Symphony Hall and the "bar" in the first balcony. This week will bring a number of particularly attractive special nights. For Memorial day there will be an appropriate holiday program; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard night. It will be in the nature of a send-off for the Harvard Glee Club, its last appearance in America before sailing for Europe. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

Monday.

Father of Victory..........................Ganne
Overture to Orpheus..................Offenbach
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".........Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"......................Wagner
From the Suite, "Callirhoe".......Chaminade
a. Scarf Dance.
b. Cymbal Dance.
Ave Maria.....................Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
Pavane ....German
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"

Miserere from "Il Trovatore"......
Procession of the Sardar
Ippolito-Ivan

HARVARD NIGHT.
Tuesday
March, "El Capitan" ....
Overture, "Phedre"....................
Waltz, "Artists' Life".................Stra
Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra)
Three Pictures from the "Tower of Babel".......................Rubens
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt".......Gri
Excerpts from the Hasty Pudding Club shows:
a. "Rameses" from "Barnum Was Right" 1920.................A. Steinert
b. "The Voodoo Dance" from "Wet-more Ho" 1921..............A. Steinert Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) act 1, "Tannhaeuser"....................Wagner
Harvard Glee Club—
Love Songs..........................Brahms
Chorus of Bacchantes from "Philemon and Baucis"...............Gounod
Cavalier Song....................Stanford
(Dr. Davison, conductor)
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"....................Verdi
Invitation to the Dance....Webber-Berlioz
Cruiser Harvard.........................Stra
Fair Harvard

PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB NIGHT
Wednesday.
Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"
Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..............................Straus
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"..............Boito
Tempest scene from "Othello".......Verdi
Spring ....Grieg
Aragonaise from "The Cid"........Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala" ....Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen" ....Bizet
Marche Miniature..............Tschaikowsky
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC NIGHT
Thursday.
Prelude to "Carmen" ....
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Finlandia ....Sibelius
Violoncello solo, "Intermezzo" from the Concerto ....
Enrico Fabrizio.
Theme with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner ....Ochs
Overture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" ....Casell
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ....Volste
"In the Hall of the Mountain King" from "Peer Gynt" ....Gr
Friday.
March from "Tannhaeuser"..........W
Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor"
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalie
R.
Fantasia, "Faust"....................
From the Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"
Sextet from "Lucia di Lamme
Norwegion Dance No. 2...
Second Hungarian Rhapso
Baccanale from "Samson Largo (Harp, organ and
Violin solo, J. H
American Patrol..........
Saturday.
Wedding march from "A Night's Dream" ....
Overture, "Morning, Noon Vienna" ....
Andante Cantabile........
Hymn to the Sun from "Ir
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..
Hungarian Dance in D ma
Minuet ....
Overture to "Oberon".......
Selection, "Eva"...............
Valse, "Espana"...............
March, "Lorraine"............

HERALD MAY. 29

Fourth Week of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

The coming week will bring a number of attractive special nights at the Symphony Hall "Pops." For Memorial Day there will be an appropriate holiday program; Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard Night, always one of the biggest "Pops" night of the year.

This one will be in the nature of a sendoff for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly, where they will be heard in Paris and other cities of France. Under their conductor, Dr Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" with the orchestra and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

Monday night's program is as follows: "Father of Victory," Ganne; overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; waltz, "Dornroeschen," Tschaikowsky; fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; from the suite, "Callirhoe," Chaminade; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm; Pavane, German; ballet music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Miserere from "Il Trovatore," Verdi; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanoff.

NET. MAY. 29.

THE POP CONCERTS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall continue to enjoy the most popular season in their history. The coming week will bring a number of special nights. For Decoration Day there will be an appropriate holiday programme; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard Night, always one of the biggest Pops nights of the year. This one will be in the nature of a sendoff for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly, where they will be heard in Paris and other cities of France. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," with the orchestra, and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

POST-MAY. 29.

[121]

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorson
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci," .... Leoncavallo
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
Pizzicato .... Foote
Enfantillage ("Children at Play") .... van Westerhout
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris" ...... Mascagni
Folk Song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner .... Ochs
Intermezzo, Act. III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor ... Brahms

POST MAY. 25

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symph Orchestra will be heard in this prog at Symphony Hall tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvo
Overture to "Mignon" .... Tho
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .. Str
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .... Leonca
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde Wa
Pizzicato .... F
Enfantillage ("Children at Play") van Wester
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ... Masca
Folk Song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner .... O
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferra
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G Minor Brahm

HERALD - MAY. 25.

ROXBURY LATIN AT POPS

Although the Roxbury Latin School will have their annual Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this will be in every sense a public occasion and the programme of special appeal. The numbers follow:

March, "Old Roxbury" .... Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .... Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Harp Solo—Fantasy .... Kovarovic
Mr. Alfred Holy.
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Shamrock" .... Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner

POST - MAY. 26.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Roxbury Latin School

March, "Old Roxbury" .... Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ...... Suppé
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ...... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Solo for Harp, Fantasia ..... Kovarovic
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Overture, "1812" .... Chaikovsky
Selection, "The Shamrock" .. Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South" J. Strauss
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Alfred Holy

TRANS - MAY. 26

פאפס קאָנצערטען אין סימפאָני האָלל, באָסטאָן.

פארוואס דער נאָמען „פּאָפּס"? ווי אזוי די אינסטיטוציע איז געשאַפען געוואָרען און וואס זי איז יעצט. — דער איבערגאַנג פון לייכטע צו קלאַסישע מוזיק. — די גרויסע צאָהל אידישע באזוכער און די אלגעמיינע בעגייסטערונג פאר רוסישע מוזיק.

באָסטאָן, וועלכע צייכענט זיך אויס אלס איינע פון די מוזיקאלישסטע שטעדט אין אמעריקא, מיט איהר באַריהמטער מוזיקאלישער קאָנסערוואַטאָריע, מיט איהר וועלט-בעריהמטען סימפאָני ארקעסטער, און מיט איהר סימפאָני האָלל, אין וועלכען עס האבען אויפגעטראָטען די גרעסטע מוזיקאלישע גאונים פון אונזער צייט, — אָט די באָסטאָן פארמאָגט א מוזיקאלישע אינסטיטוציע וועלכע ווערט גערופען די „פּאָפּס" און וועלכע איז פאר'ן פאָלק די וויכטיגסטע, כמעט קען מען זאָגען די בעליעבטעסטע און פּאָפּולערסטע מוזיקאלישע אונטערנעהמונג.

באָסטאָן פארמאָגט זעהר פיעל היסטאָרישע בילדער און מאָנומענטען ווי אויך אינסטיטוציעס וועלכע סימבאָליזירען די שטאָדט אלס א טיפּיש יענקישע. ניט דער פּאַבליק קאָמאָן, וועלכער איז איינער פון די שעהנסטע זומער-גערטנער, ניט די סטייט הויז מיט איהר געגילדערטען שפּיץ און ניט אירגענד וועלכע אנדערע באָסטאָנער אינסטיטוציעס, דערמאָנען אָן דער טיפּישער באָסטאָן אזוי ווי עס דערמאָנען די פּאָפּס-קאָנצערטען אין סימפאָני האָלל, וועלכע ווערען שוין אבגעהאלטען זייט די לעצטע זעקס און דרייסיג זומער סיזאָנס.

אין 1885, פיער יאָהר נאָכדעם ווי די באָסטאָן סימפאָני ארקעסטער איז אָרגאַניזירט געוואָרען, איז געפּלאַנעוועט געוואָרען צו געבען א סעריע פון נאָך-ווינטער קאָנצערטען, אביסעל לייכטערע און בארעכענטער, אום צוצופּאַסען זיך צו דער צייט פון יאָהר.

ביי דיזע קאָנצערטען האָבען זיך די מענשען געפיהלט זעהר [illegible] פרעהלאך און עס איז פאר זיי געוואָרען צו ענג די טשערס אויף וועלכע זיי האָבען געדאַרפט אָפּזיצען איבער צוויי שטונדען צייט און זיך ניט ריהרען פון אָרט.

די מענעדזשמענט האָט דאָס גלייך פארשטאַנען און זי האָט די סיטס ארויסגענומען פון האָלל, אויסגעשטעלט טישלאך און געלאָזען אין מיטען האָלל א פרייען בעקוועמען דורכגאַנג. דאָס איז געטהאָן געוואָרען לויט דער איינריכטונג פון די אייראָפּעאישע קאַפע-קאָנצערטען. אין יענער צייט האָט מען די היינטיגע „פּאָפּס" קאָנצערטען גערופען „פּראָמענייד" קאָנצערטען, ווי זיי זיינען גערופען געוואָרען אין אייראָפּא, ווייל דאָרט האָט דער עולם געקענט ארומשפּאַצירען נאָך יעדער אינטערמישאָן.

אָט דיזע „פּראָמענייד-קאָנצערטען" זיינען אָפּגעהאַלטען געוואָרען אין דעם אלטען „מוזיק האָלל", וועלכער איז געווען די אָריגינעלע היים פון דער באָסטאָן סימפאָני ארקעסטער אויף העמילטאָן פּלייס. צו יענע קאָנצערטען זיינען געקומען טויזענדער מענשען, און די באַקוועמליכקייט וועלכע זיי האָבען דאָרטען געהאַט זיצענדיג ביי א טישעל און קווי־קענדיג זיך מיט פארשיעדענע זומער-געטרענקע, וועלכע זיינען סערווירט געוואָרען אין דער צייט, וואס דער ארקעסטער האָט געשפּיעלט — אָט דיזע היימישקייט און פּאָלקסטימליכקייט וועלכע איז דאָרט געשאַפען געוואָרען, האָט דיזע קאָנצערטען אזוי פּאָפּולער געמאַכט ביי די מאַסען, אז זיי האָבען פארביטען דעם נאָמען פון „פּראָמענייד קאָנצערטען„ צו „פּאָפּס-קאָנצערטען", וואס מיינט אין ענגליש די פארקירצונג פון „פּאָפּולאַר" — „פּאָפּ"ס.

אָט דיזע „פּאָפּס-קאָנצערטען" זיינען ווירקליך איינע פון די ניצליכסטע און שעהנסטע מוזיקאלישע אינסטיטוציעס מיט וועלכע באָסטאָן מעג זיך איבערנעהמען.

ניט קוקענדיג דאַרויף וואס עס איז א הייסער זומער-אָבענד, קענט איהר דאָרט באַגעגנען טויזענדער מענשען, וועלכע קומען צוגעהן אין סימפאָני האָלל צו דיזע קאָנצערטען, זעצען זיך ארום די טישלאך, רויכערען און שלינגען אייזקרים, אויב די קעשענע ערלויבט דאָס נור, און אזוי ווי דער מענש איז העכער פון א מלאך און קען יא טהאָן צוויי מלאכות אין איין און דערזעלבער צייט, טהוט מען טאַקע ווי גאָט האָט געבאָטען, — מיט'ן אויער הערט מען גוטע מוזיק און מיט'ן מויל געניסט מען דער ווייל ערפרישענדע מאכלים ומשקאות, הכלל, דער עולם פיהלט זיך דאָרטען ווי „ביים טאַטען אין ווייגאַרטען".

וואס גרעסער און צאָהלרייכער עס זיינען געוואָרען די באזוכער פון דיזע „פּאָפּס-קאָנצערטען", אלץ אינהאַלטסרייכער און קלאַסישער איז געוואָרן דער מוזיקאלישער פּראָגראַם אזוי, אז ביי די היינטיגע קאָנצערטען הערט איהר שוין קלאַסישע קאָמפּאָזיציאָנען פון בעטהאָווען, באַך, מאָצאַרט, שובערט, טשאַיקאָווסקי, רובינשטיין, ראַכמאַנינאָוו, רימסקי - קאָרסאַקאָוו, גלאַזונאָוו און פיעלע אנדערע.

און וואס רייכער עס זיינען געוואָרען דיא פּראָגראַמס אין מוזיקאַלישען זינן, אלץ רייכער איז געוואָרען דער אָרקעסטער מיט קינסטלער מכל המינים, און יעצט באַשטעהט דער אָרקעסטער מיט קליינע אויסנאַהמען פון דיא אלע קינסטלער, וועלכע נעהמען אנטייל אין די ווינטערדיגע קלאַסישע קאָנצערטען פון דער באָסטאָן סימפאָני.

דיא „פּאָפּס-קאָנצערטען" זיינען אין עצם פאַר'ן פאָלק, אדער בעסער געזאָגט פאַר דיא ברייטע ארבייטער מאַסען, ווייל אום זומער אין, יא גרויסע היצען ווען דיא רייכע פארבייטען דיא שטאָדט פאַר דיא זומער-פּלעצער און ים-ברעגען, זיינען, יא איינציגע וואָס קומען צו דיזע קאָנצערטען, דיא ארבייטער-מאַסען.

צווישען דיא שטענדיגע באזוכער פון דיזע קאָנצערטען טרעפט מען זעהר פיעל אידען, און אזוי וויא דיא מעהרסטע פון זיי קומען פון רוסלאַנד, פון וואַנען זיי האָבען אריבערגעבראַכט א גרויסע ליעבע צו דער רוסישער מוזיק און איהרע פארפאַסער, — דאָן קען מען זיך לייכט פאָרשטעלען דיא גוואַלדיגע אַפּלאָדיסמענטען מיט וועלכע דער אָרקעסטער ווערט בעגריסט ווען ער שפּיעלט רוסישע מוזיק. דער רוסישער איד מיט זיינע התלהבות האָט אויך אַנגעשטעקט דעם אמעריקאַנעם עולם מיט באַגייסטערונג פאַר רוסישע פערפאַסער און פאַר רוסישע פאָלקס-מוזיק, און עס איז פּשוט ערשטוינענד צו הערען דיא אַפּלאָדיסמענטען, וואס דער אָרקעסטער קריעגט ווען ער שפּיעלט טשאַיקאָווסקי'ס „1812", „מאַרטש סלאַוו" אדער „רובינושקאַ" „וואָלגאַ-ליעד" אדער רימסקי-קאָרסאַקאָוו'ס „א ליעד פון אינדיען". דיא אַפּלאָדיסמענטען קומען ניט נור פון אידען אליין. נור דער גאַנצער עולם פּאַטשט און פּאַטשט ביז דער אָרקעסטער איז געצוואונגען אויף אלעמענס פערלאַנג איבערצו'חזר'ען דאָס זעלבע.

גאַנץ אָפט ווערען געגעבען ספּעציעלע פּראָגראַמען פון א געוויסען כאַראַקטער, וויא צ. ב. ש. וואַגנער, טשאַיקאָווסקי, א. ז. וו. אין דעם אבענד פאַר וועלכען עס ווערט אראַנזשירט א טשאַיקאָווסקי פּראָגראַם, קען מען מיט זיכערהייט בעהויפּטען, אז טויזענדער מענשען זיינען געצוואונגען צו געהן צוריק אוים מאַנגעל אין פּלאַץ.

לויט דיא מוזיקאַלישע קוואַליטעט מיט וועלכע דיא ביז-איצטיגע קאָנצערטען האָבען זיך אויסגעצייכענט, קען מען מיט זיכערהייט זאָגען, אז אויך דער היינטיגער סיזאָן פון דיא „פּאָפּ"-קאָנצערטען וועט דעם עולם געבען גענוג שטאָף פאַר גייסטיגע פערגניגען און שפּאַס

RADCLIFFE AT THE POPS

Radcliffe College students and alumnae will attend in numbers the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, and the noted chorus of the college will sing under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison. However, this concert will be open to the public and of unusual general interest. The program follows:

Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Choral pieces by the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society.
Danse Macabre .... Saint-Saens
Soprano Solo, "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise" .... Charpentier
Mrs. Laura Littlefield.
Procession to the Cathedral from Act II, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin" ...... Tschaikowsky
College Songs—
"Cherry Ribbon .... Mildred C. Crook
"Just on the Other Side" ..... Sophie Morris
"Bring a Brick" .... Rosamond Eliot
Leader, Sibyl Bingham '16.
Accompanist, Emily Walle '18.
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ... Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantelle .... Jacchia
Hungarian March .... Berlioz
"Now We Rise to Greet Thee" .. Emily Coolidge

HERALD. MAY. 27.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

In Symphony Hall tonight the following program will be played by the Pops Orchestra, under Conductor Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramors" .. Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame" .... Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" .. Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater" .... Rossini
Gypsy Suite .... German
a. The Dance. b. Love Duet. c. Tarantella.
Violin solo, Mr. Jacque Hoffmann.
Whispering of the Flowers .... Blon
Overture to "Pique Dame" .... Suppe
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ...... Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa
Symphony Hall, Boston.

AMER. MAY. 27.

TONIGHT'S POPS

In Symphony Hall tonight this program will be played by the Pops Orchestra under Conductor Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramore" ... Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame" .... Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater" .... Rossini
Gypsy Suite—
(a) The Dance .... } German
(b) Love Duet .... }
(c) Tarantella .... }
Violin Solo .... Mr. Jacquez Hoffmann
Whispering of the Flowers .... Blon
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre" ..... Litolff
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa

HERALD. MAY. 27.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Radcliffe College

Overture, "The Fair Galatea" .. Suppé
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" . Puccini
Choral Numbers ....
Danse Macabre .... Saint-Saëns
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" .... Charpentier
Procession to the Minster from "Lohengrin .... Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin" .. Chaikovsky
Radcliffe Songs ....
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ...... Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantella .... Jacchia
Rácokzy March .... Berlioz
Radcliffe Hymn ....

Conductors: A. Jacchia and A. T. Davison.
Assisting: The Radcliffe Choral Society and the Radcliffe Club Chorus.
Soloist: Laura Littlefield.

TRANS. MAY. 27.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

For the Pop Concert, to be given in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia has compiled the following programme to be played by the famous Pops Symphony Orchestra:

Overture to "Zampa" .... Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus" .... Strauss
Letter of Manon .... Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival .... Svendsen
Meditation from "Thais" .... Massonet
Solo violin, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony . Tschaikowsky
Serenade, "Harlequin's Millions" ..... Drigo
American Patrol .... Meacham

POST - MAY. 28.

TONIGHT'S POPS

For the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Agide Jacchia has compiled this program to be played by the Pops symphony orchestra:

Overture to "Zampa" .... Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus" .... Strauss
Letter of Manon .... Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival .... Svendsen
Mediation from "Thais" .... Massenet
Solo violin, Jacques Hoffmann.
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" .. Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony .. Tschaikowsky
Serenade, "Harlequin's Millions" .... Drigo
American Patrol .... Meacham

HERALD - MAY. 28.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Zampa" .... Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus" ... J. Strauss
Letter of Manon .... Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival ... Svendsen
Meditation from "Thais" ...... Massenet
Sextet from "Lucia" .... Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony, Chaikovsky
Serenade from "Harlequin's Millions" Drigo
American Patrol .... Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia,
Solo Violin: Jacques Hoffmann.

Progress of the Pops—A "Harvard Night" with the Glee Club, on Tuesday—Other Incidents—The Fleck Company Betters Its Performances

THROUGH next week, the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will run, for the most part, familiar course. The programme for Monday evening is more or less adjusted to the light pleasure and the gay mood of a spring holiday. On Tuesday befalls the annual "Harvard Night," with the Glee Club to sing four pieces, and with fragments for orchestras from two recent extravaganzas of the Hasty Pudding Club. Dr. Davison will lead the Glee Club in its numbers and the choir will be heard publicly for the last time before its summer journey to France. It is safe to predict also that not a few "among those present" will be able "to carry the tune" in Mr. Steinert's numbers from the Pudding plays. On Thursday the students of the Boston Conservatory—Mr. Jacchia's school of music—will keep rendezvous at the Pops and for them the conductor has dotted the programme with the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Sibelius's "Finlandia," Casella's "Italia" and other of his more exacting pieces. In the main, however, the lists for the week bring few fresh items—no more than two dances, on Monday, from Chaminade's ballet, "Callirhoë"; the waltzes, on Friday, from Strauss's operatic comedy, "Der Rosenkavalier," and Mr. Warren Storey Smith's songful Andante on Saturday. Enough, however, for most of those frequenting them that The Pops remain The Pops to the last piece on each programme and up and down the accompanying bill of food and drink. Also tobacco.

TRANS. MAY. 28

THE POPS

The fifth week of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall finds the Pops' season of 1921 one of the most popular and crowded in the long history of this Bostonian institution.

Although a number of other cities have from time to time attempted to emulate the Pops' system of serving light refreshments at tables while popular music is being played by a large symphony orchestra, in Boston alone have these concerts been successful enough to survive.

AMER. MAY 28.

POPS CONCERTS

The fifth week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall finds the Pops season of 1921 one of the most popular and crowded in the long history of this Bostonian institution.

The eventful programs of Agide Jacchia and the fine music which he can draw from the great Pops orchestra are of course always the centre of interest and delight at the Pops. The coming week will bring a number of particularly attractive special nights. For Decoration day there will be an appropriate holiday program; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard night, always one of the biggest Pops nights of the year. This one will be in the nature of a send-off for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Ruinstein's "Tower of Babel," with the orchestra, and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

BOST.

POP CONCERTS

Harvard night will be celebrated next Tuesday at the Pops. The Harvard Glee Club will take part. Wednesday will bring Professional Women's Club night. and Thursday will be Boston Conservatory of Music night. Mr. Jacchia has made up the following program for tomorrow night:

Father of Victory .... Ganne
Overture to Orpheus .... Offenbach
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Suite, "Callirhos" .... Chaminade
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo: Violin, harp, organ and strings.
Pawane .... German
Ballet music from "La Gioconda" ... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Miserere from "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Procession of the Sardar ..... Ippolito-Ivanoff

HERALD - MAY. 28.

THE POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall continue to be the nightly gathering place for all of musical Boston and for a very considerable part of sociable Boston; indeed, the citizen with no "musical education" is largely represented, and a person to whom the Pops do not appeal would be hard to find. A great quantity of food and drink is now passing over tables which occupy the floor of Symphony Hall and the "bar" in the first balcony. This week will bring a number of particularly attractive special nights. For Memorial day there will be an appropriate holiday program; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard night. It will be in the nature of a send-off for the Harvard Glee Club, its last appearance in America before sailing for Europe. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

Monday.

Father of Victory .... Ganne
Overture to Orpheus .... Offenbach
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
From the Suite, "Callirhoe" .... Chaminade
a. Scarf Dance.
b. Cymbal Dance.
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
Pavane .... German
Ballet music from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"

5/29

Miserere from "Il Trovatore" ....
Procession of the Sardar .... Ippolito-Ivanoff

HARVARD NIGHT.

Tuesday.

March, "El Capitan" ....
Overture, "Phedre" ....
Waltz, "Artists' Life" ....
Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra)
"Babel" from the "Tower of Babel"
Three Pictures from the ....
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt" ....
Excerpts from the Hasty Pudding Club shows:
a. "Rameses" from "Samson .... Right" 1920
b. "The Voodoo Dance" from "Westward Ho" 1921
Bacchanale (from "Tannhauser") ....
Harvard Glee Club—
Love Songs ....
Chorus of Bacchantes from "Philemon and Baucis" .... Gounod
Cavalier Song ....
(Dr. Davison, conductor.)
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....
Invitation to the Dance .... Weber Cruiser Harvard ....
Fair Harvard

PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB NIGHT

Wednesday.

Coronation March from "The Prophet" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ....
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" ....
Tempest scene from "Othello" ....
Spring ....
Aragonaise from "The Cid" ....
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen" ....
Marche Miniature ....
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" ....

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC NIGHT

Thursday.

Prelude to "Carmen" ....
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....
Fantasia, "Aida" ....
Finlandia ....
Violoncello solo, "Intermezzo" from the Concerto ....
Enrico Fabrizio.
Theme with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner ....
Overture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" ....
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ....
"In the Hall of the Mountain King" from "Peer Gynt" ....

Friday.

March from "Tannhauser" ....
Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor" ....
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" .... R.
Fantasia, "Faust" ....
From the Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ....
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" ....
Norwegian Dance No. 2 ....
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ....
Baccanale from "Samson" ....
Largo (Harp, organ and violin solo, J. H ....
American Patrol ....

Saturday

Wedding march from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" ....
Andante Cantabile ....
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ....
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....
Hungarian Dance in D mi ....
Minuet ....
Overture to "Oberon" ....
Selection, "Eva" ....
Valse, "Espana" ....
March, "Lorraine" ....

5/29

Fourth Week of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

The coming week will bring a number of attractive special nights at the Symphony Hall "Pops." For Memorial Day there will be an appropriate holiday program. Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard Night, always one of the biggest "Pops" night of the year. This one will be in the nature of a sendoff for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly, where they will be heard in Paris and other cities of France. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" with the orchestra and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

Monday night's program is as follows: "Father of Victory," Ganne; overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; waltz, "Dornroeschen," Tschaikowsky; fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; from the suite, "Callirhoe," Chaminade; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; Pavane, German; ballet music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Miserere from "Il Trovatore," Verdi; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanoff.

5.29

THE POP CONCERTS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall continue to enjoy the most popular season in their history. The coming week will bring a number of special nights. For Decoration Day there will be an appropriate holiday programme. on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard Pops Night, always one of the biggest Pops nights of the year. This one will be in the nature of a sendoff for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly, where they will be heard in Paris and other cities of France. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," with the orchestra, and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

POST - MAY. 29.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards............Halvorson
Overture to "Mignon"...............Thomas
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci,"...........Leoncavallo
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
Pizzicato ....Foote
Enfantillage ("Children at Play")....... van Westerhout
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris"......Mascagni
Folk Song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner ....Ochs
Intermezzo, Act. III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor...Brahms

POST MAY 26

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will be heard in this prog at Symphony Hall tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards.......Halvo
Overture to "Mignon"...........Tho
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"..Str
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".........Leonca
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" Wa
Pizzicato ....F
Enfantillage ("Children at Play") van Wester
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"...Masca
Folk Song with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner.................O
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferr
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G Minor Brahm

HERALD-MAY 25.

ROXBURY LATIN AT POPS

Although the Roxbury Latin School will have their annual Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this will be in every sense a public occasion and the programme of special appeal. The numbers follow:

March, "Old Roxbury"...................Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..............Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..............Liszt
Harp Solo—Fantasy ....Kovarovic
Mr. Alfred Holy.
Kammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Shamrock"..........Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South".......Strauss
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin"....Wagner

POST-MAY. 26.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Roxbury Latin School

March, "Old Roxbury"..........Zach
Overture, "Light Cavalry"......Suppé
Waltz, "Estudiantina"......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"...............Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Liszt
Solo for Harp, Fantasia.....Kovarovic
Kammenoi Ostrow...........Rubinstein
Overture, "1812"..........Chaikovsky
Selection, "The Shamrock"..Myddleton
Waltz, "Roses from the South" J. Strauss
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Alfred Holy

TRANS MAY 26

פאפס קאנצערטען אין סימפאני האלל, באסטאן.

פארוואס דער נאמען „אפס“? ווי אזוי די אינסטיטוציע איז געשאפען געווארען און וואס זי איז יעצט. — —דער איבערגאנג פון לייכטע צו קלאסישע מוזיק. — די גרויסע צאהל אידישע באזוכער און די אלגעמיינע בעגייסטערונג פאר רוסישע מוזיק.

באסטאן, וועלכע צייכענט זיך אויס אלס איינע פון די מוזיקאלישסטע שטעדט אין אמעריקא, מיט איהר באריהמטער מוזיקאלישער קאנסערוואטאריע, מיט איהר וועלט-בעריהמטען סימפאני ארקעסטער, און מיט איהר סימפאני האלל, אין וועלכען עס האבען אויפגעטראטען די גרעסטע מוזיקאלישע גאונים פון אונזער צייט, — אט די באסטאן פארמאגט א מוזיקאלישע אינסטיטוציע וועלכע ווערט גערופען די „פאפס“ און וועלכע איז פאר'ן פאלק די וויכטיגסטע, כמעט קען מען זאגען די בעליעבטעסטע און פאפולערסטע מוזיקאלישע אונטערנעהמונג.

באסטאן פארמאגט זעהר פיעל היסטארישע בילדער און מאנומענטען ווי אויך אינסטיטוציעס וועלכע סימבאליזירען די שטאדט אלס א טיפיש יענקישע. ניט דער פאבליק קאמאן, וועלכער איז איינער פון די שעהנסטע זומערגערטנער, ניט די סטייט הויז מיט איהר גענגילדערטען שפיץ און ניט אירגענד וועלכע אנדערע באסטאנער אינסטיטוציעס, דערמאנען אן דער טיפישער באסטאן אזוי ווי עס דערמאנען די פאפס-קאנצערטען אין סימפאני האלל, וועלכע ווערען שוין אבגעהאלטען זייט די לעצטע זעקס און דרייסיג זומער סיזאנס.

אין 1885, פיער יאהר נאכדעם ווי די באסטאן סימפאני ארקעסטער איז ארגאניזירט געווארען, איז געפלאנעוועט געווארען צו געבען א סעריע פון נאכווינטער קאנצערטען, אביסעל לייכטערע און בארעבענטער, אום צוצופאסען זיך צו דער צייט פון יאהר.

ביי דיזע קאנצערטען האבען זיך די מענשען בעפיהלט זעהר פריי פרעהלאך און עס איז פאר זיי געווארען צו ענג די טשערס אויף וועלכע זיי האבען געדארפט אפזיצען איבער צוויי שטונדען צייט און זיך ניט ריהרען פון ארט.

די מענעדזשמענט האט דאס גלייך פארשטאנען און זי האט די סיטס ארויסגענומען פון האלל, אויסגעשטעלט טישלאך און געלאזען אין מיטען האלל א פרייען בעקוועמען דורכגאנג. דאס איז געטהאן געווארען לויט דער איינריכטונג פון די איירעפעאישע קאפע-קאנצערטען. אין יענער צייט האט מען די היינטיגע „פאפס“ קאנצערטען גערופען „פראמענייד“ קאנצערטען, ווי זיי זיינען גערופען געווארען אין איירעפא, ווייל דארט האט דער עולם געקענט ארומשפאצירען נאך יעדער אינטערמישאן.

אט דיזע „פראמענייד-קאנצערטען“ זיינען אפגעהאלטען געווארען אין דעם אלטען „מוזיק האלל“, וועלכער איז געווען די אריגינעלע היים פון דער באסטאן סימפאני ארקעסטער אויף העמילטאן פלייס. צו יענע קאנצערטען זיינען געקומען טויזענדער מענשען, און די באקוועמליכקייט וועלכע זיי האבען דארטען געהאט זיצענדיג ביי א טישעל און קוויקענדיג זיך מיט פארשיעדענע זומער-געטרענקע, וועלכע זיינען סערווירט געווארען אין דער צייט, וואס דער ארקעסטער האט געשפיעלט — אט דיזע היימישקייט און פאלקסטימליכקייט וועלכע איז דארט געשאפען געווארען, האט דיזע קאנצערטען אזוי פאפולער געמאכט ביי די מאסען, אז זיי האבען פארביטען דעם נאמען פון „פראמענייד קאנצערטען“ צו „פאפס-קאנצערטען“, וואס מיינט אין ענגליש די פארקירצונג פון „פאפולאר“ — „פאפ“ס.

אט דיזע „פאפס-קאנצערטען“ זיינען ווירקליך איינע פון די ניצליכסטע און שעהנסטע מוזיקאלישע אינסטיטוציעס מיט וועלכע באסטאן מעג זיך איבערנעהמען.

ניט קוקענדיג דארויף וואס עס איז א הייסער זומער-אבענד, קענט איהר דארט באגעגענען טויזענדער מענשען, וועלכע קומען צוגעהן אין סימפאני האלל צו דיזע קאנצערטען, זעצען זיך ארום די טישלאך, רויכערען און שלינגען אייז-קרים, אויב די קעשענע ערלויבט דאס נור, און אזוי ווי דער מענש איז העכער פון א מלאך און קען יא טהאן צוויי מלאכות אין איין און דערזעלבער צייט, נו, טהוט מען טאקע ווי גאט האט געבאטען, — מיט'ן אויער הערט מען גוטע מוזיק און מיט'ן מויל געניסט מען דערווייל ערפרישענדע מאכלים ומשקאות, הכלל, דער עולם פיהלט זיך דארטען ווי „ביים טאטען אין וויינגארטען“.

וואס גרעסער און צאהלרייכער עס זיינען געווארען די באזוכער פון דיזע „פאפס-קאנצערטען“, אלץ אינהאלטסרייכער און קלאסישער איז געווארען דער מוזיקאלישער פראגראם אזוי, אז ביי די היינטיגע קאנצערטען הערט איהר שוין קלאסישע קאמפאזיציאנען פון בעטהאווען, באך, מאצארט, שוברט, טשאיקאווסקי, רובינשטיין, ראכמאנינאוו, רימסקי-קארסאקאוו, גלאזונאוו און פיעלע אנדערע.

און וואס רייכער עס זיינען געווארען דיא פראגראמס אין מוזיקאלישען זינן, אלץ רייכער איז געווארען דער ארקעסטער מיט קינסטלער מכל המינים, און יעצט באשטעהט דער ארקעסטער מיט קליינע אויסנאהמען פון דיא אלע קינסטלער, וועלכע נעהמען אנטייל אין די ווינטערדיגע קלאסישע קאנצערטען פון דער באסטאן סימפאני.

דיא „פאפס-קאנצערטען“ זיינען אין עצם פאר'ן פאלק, אדער בעסער געזאגט פאר דיא ברייטע ארבייטער מאסען, ווייל אום זומער אין ; יא גרויסע היצען ווען דיא רייכע פארבייטען דיא שטאדט פאר דיא זומער-פלעצער און ים-ברעגען, זיינען ; יא איינציגע וואס קומען צו דיזע קאנצערטען, דיא ארבייטער-מאססען.

צווישען דיא שטענדיגע באזוכער פון דיזע קאנצערטען טרעפט מען זעהר פיעל אידען, און אזוי וויא דיא מעהרסטע פון זיי קומען פון רוסלאנד, פון וואנען זיי האבען אריבערגעבראכט א גרויסע ליעבע צו דער רוסישער מוזיק און איהרע פארפאסער, — דאן קען מען זיך לייכט פארשטעלען דיא גוואלדיגע אפלאדיסמענטען מיט וועלכע דער ארקעסטער ווערט בעגריסט ווען ער שפיעלט רוסישע מוזיק. דער רוסישער איד מיט זיינע התלהבות האט אויך אנגעשטעקט דעם אמעריקאנעם עולם מיט באגייסטערונג פאר רוסישע פארפאסער און פאר רוסישע פאלקס-מוזיק, און עס איז פשוט ערשטוינענד צו הערען דיא אפלאדיסמענטען, וואס דער ארקעסטער קריגט ווען ער שפיעלט טשאיקאווסקי'ס „1812“, „מארטש סלאוו“ אדער „רובינושקא“, „וואלגא-ליעד“ אדער רימסקי-קארסאקאוו'ס „א ליעד פון אינדיען“. דיא אפלאדיסמענטען קומען ניט נור פון אידען אליין. נור דער גאנצער עולם פאטשט און פאטשט ביז דער ארקעסטער איז געצוואונגען אויף אלעמענס פער-

[illegible]

FORWARD MAY 26

RADCLIFFE AT THE POPS

Radcliffe College students and alumnae will attend in numbers the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, and the noted chorus of the college will sing under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison. However, this concert will be open to the public and of unusual general interest. The program follows:

Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea".....Suppe
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"...................Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"..........Puccini
Choral pieces by the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society.
Danse Macabre..................Saint-Saens
Soprano Solo, "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"......................Charpentier
Mrs. Laura Littlefield.
Procession to the Cathedral from Act II, "Lohengrin"...........................Wagner
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin"......Tschaikowsky
College Songs—
"Cherry Ribbon.............Mildred C. Crook
"Just on the Other Side".....Sophie Morris
"Bring a Brick"...........Rosamond Ellot
Leader, Sibyl Bingham '16.
Accompanist, Emily Walle '18.
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"...Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantelle.............................Jacchia
Hungarian March......................Berlioz
"Now We Rise to Greet Thee"..Emily Coolidge

HERALD MAY 27.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

In Symphony Hall tonight the following program will be played by the Pops Orchestra, under Conductor Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramors"..Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame"..............Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"..Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater" ....Rossini
Gypsy Suite ....German
a. The Dance. b. Love Duet. c. Tarantella.
Violin solo, Mr. Jacque Hoffmann.
Whispering of the Flowers ....Blon
Overture to "Pique Dame"...............Suppe
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"......Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ....Vollsted
Stars and Stripes Forever ....Sousa
Symphony Hall, Boston.

AMER. MAY 27.

TONIGHT'S POPS

In Symphony Hall tonight this program will be played by the Pops Orchestra under Conductor Agide Jacchia:

Wedding March from "Feramore"...Rubinstein
Overture to "Pique Dame"................Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"....Strauss
Fantasia, "Stabat Mater".................Rossini
Gypsy Suite—
(a) The Dance
(b) Love Duet } German
(c) Tarantella
Violin Solo...........Mr. Jacquez Hoffmann
Whispering of the Flowers.................Blon
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre".....Litolff
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".........Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"...................Vollstedt
Stars and Stripes Forever..................Sousa

HERALD MAY 27

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Radcliffe College

Overture, "The Fair Galatea"..Suppé
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"....J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".Puccini
Choral Numbers..................
Danse Macabre..........Saint-Saëns
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" ....Charpentier
Procession to the Minster from "Lohengrin ....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin".. Chaikovsky
Radcliffe Songs ....
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"...... Kreisler-Jacobi
Tarantella ....Jacchia
Rácokzy March ....Berlioz
Radcliffe Hymn ....

Conductors: A. Jacchia and A. T. Davison.

Assisting: The Radcliffe Choral Society and the Radcliffe Club Chorus.

Soloist: Laura Littlefield.

TRANS MAY 27

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

For the Pop Concert, to be given in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia has compiled the following programme to be played by the famous Pops Symphony Orchestra:

Overture to "Zampa"...............Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus"..........Strauss
Letter of Manon ....Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ....Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival.......Svendsen
Meditation from "Thais".........Massonet
Solo violin, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony.Tschaikowsky
Serenade, "Harlequin's Millions"......Drigo
American Patrol ....Meacham

POST MAY 26.

TONIGHT'S POPS

For the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Agide Jacchia has compiled this program to be played by the Pops symphony orchestra:

Overture to "Zampa"....................Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus"..............Strauss
Letter of Manon..............................Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"......................Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival.........Svendsen
Mediation from "Thais"............Massenet
Solo violin, Jacques Hoffmann.
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor"..Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhauser"...............Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony..Tschaikowsky
Serenade, "Harlequin's Millions"........Drigo
American Patrol..........................Meacham

HERALD-MAY 25.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Zampa"..............Herold
Waltz, "Bei uns zu Haus"...J. Strauss
Letter of Manon....................Gillet
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"..............Leoni
Norwegian Artists' Carnival...Svendsen
Meditation from "Thais"......Massenet
Sextet from "Lucia".........Donizetti
Overture to "Tannhäuser"......Wagner
Finale of the Fourth Symphony, Chaikovsky
Serenade from "Harlequin's Millions" Drigo
American Patrol.................Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Solo Violin: Jacques Hoffmann.

Progress of the Pops—A "Harvard Night" with the Glee Club, on Tuesday—Other Incidents—The Fleck Company Betters Its Performances

THROUGH next week, the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will run, for the most part, familiar course. The programme for Monday evening is more or less adjusted to the light pleasure and the gay mood of a spring holiday. On Tuesday befalls the annual "Harvard Night," with the Glee Club to sing four pieces, and with fragments for orchestras from two recent extravaganzas of the Hasty Pudding Club. Dr. Davison will lead the Glee Club in its numbers and the choir will be heard publicly for the last time before its summer journey to France. It is safe to predict also that not a few "among those present" will be able "to carry the tune" in Mr. Steinert's numbers from the Pudding plays. On Thursday the students of the Boston Conservatory—Mr. Jacchia's school of music—will keep rendezvous at the Pops and for them the conductor has dotted the programme with the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Sibelius's "Finlandia," Casella's "Italia" and other of his more exacting pieces. In the main, however, the lists for the week bring few fresh items—no more than two dances, on Monday, from Chaminade's ballet, "Callirhoë"; the waltzes, on Friday, from Strauss's operatic comedy, "Der Rosenkavalier," and Mr. Warren Storey Smith's songful Andante on Saturday. Enough, however, for most of those frequenting them that The Pops remain The Pops to the last piece on each programme and up and down the accompanying bill of food and drink. Also tobacco.

TRANS MAY 28

THE POPS

The fifth week of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall finds the Pops' season of 1921 one of the most popular and crowded in the long history of this Bostonian institution.

Although a number of other cities have from time to time attempted to emulate the Pops' system of serving light refreshments at tables while popular music is being played by a large symphony orchestra, in Boston alone have these concerts been successful enough to survive.

AM... MAY 28

POPS CONCERTS

The fifth week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall finds the Pops season of 1921 one of the most popular and crowded in the long history of this Bostonian institution.

The eventful programs of Agide Jacchia and the fine music which he can draw from the great Pops orchestra are of course always the centre of interest and delight at the Pops. The coming week will bring a number of particularly attractive special nights. For Decoration day there will be an appropriate holiday program; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard night, always one of the biggest Pops nights of the year. This one will be in the nature of a send-off for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Ruinstein's "Tower of Babel," with the orchestra, and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

POP CONCERTS

Harvard night will be celebrated next Tuesday at the Pops. The Harvard Glee Club will take part. Wednesday will bring Professional Women's Club night, and Thursday will be Boston Conservatory of Music night. Mr. Jacchia has made up the following program for tomorrow night:

.......................Ganne
Father of Victory......................Offenbach
Overture to Orpheus ....Tschaikowsky Waltz, "Dornroeschen" ....Wagner
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....Chaminade
Suite, "Callirhos" ....Schubert-Wilhelmj Ave Maria
Solo: Violin, harp, organ and strings.
.......................German
Pawane ....Ponchielli
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"...Mascagni
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"....Verdi
Miserere from "Il Trovatore".........Ippolito-Ivanoff
Procession of the Sardar......

HERALD MAY 28.

THE POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall continue to be the nightly gathering place for all of musical Boston and for a very considerable part of sociable Boston; indeed, the citizen with no "musical education" is largely represented, and a person to whom the Pops do not appeal would be hard to find. A great quantity of food and drink is now passing over tables which occupy the floor of Symphony Hall and the "bar" in the first balcony. This week will bring a number of particularly attractive special nights. For Memorial day there will be an appropriate holiday program; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard night. It will be in the nature of a send-off for the Harvard Glee Club, its last appearance in America before sailing for Europe. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

Monday.

Father of Victory..........................Ganne
Overture to Orpheus.............Offenbach
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".......Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"...................Wagner
From the Suite, "Callirhoe"....Chaminade
a. Scarf Dance.
b. Cymbal Dance.
Ave Maria...............Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
Pavane ....German
Ballet music from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"

Miserere from "Il Trovatore" ......Verdi
Procession of the Sardar ...... Ippolito-Ivanoff

HARVARD NIGHT.

Tuesday

March, "El Capitan"...................Sousa
Overture, "Phedre"....................Massenet
Waltz, "Artists' Life".....................Strauss
Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra)
Three Pictures from the "Tower of Babel" ....Rubenstein
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt".........Grieg
Excerpts from the Hasty Pudding Club shows:
a. "Rameses" from "Barnum Was Right" 1920..............A. Steinert
b. "The Voodoo Dance" from "Wetmore Ho" 1921..........A. Steinert
Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) Act 1, "Tannhaeuser" ....Wagner
Harvard Glee Club—
Love Songs................................Brahms
Chorus of Bacchantes from "Philemon and Baucis"...............Gounod
Cavalier Song.......................Stanford
(Dr. Davison, conductor.)
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"........................Verdi
Invitation to the Dance....Webber-Berlioz
Cruiser Harvard..........................Strube
Fair Harvard

PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB NIGHT

Wednesday.

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..............................Strauss
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"................Boito
Tempest scene from "Othello"........Verdi
Spring ....Grieg
Aragonaise from "The Cid"......Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala"........Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen"................Bizet
Marche Miniature.............Tschaikowsky
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC NIGHT

Thursday.

Prelude to "Carmen"....................Bizet
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"...............................Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"..........................Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida"..........................Verdi
Finlandia ....Sibelius
Violoncello solo, "Intermezzo" from the Concerto ....Lalo
Enrico Fabrizio.
Theme with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner ....Ochs
Overture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia".......................Casell
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"..............Vollste
"In the Hall of the Mountain King" from "Peer Gynt" ....Gr

Friday.

March from "Tannhaeuser"........W
Overture to "Merry Wives of Windso Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavali R.
Fantasia, "Faust"..................
From the Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"
Sextet from "Lucia di Lamme

Norwegian Dance No. 2...
Second Hungarian Rhapso
Bacchanale from "Samson

Largo (Harp, organ and Violin solo, J. H
American Patrol.........

Saturday

Wedding march from "A Night's Dream" ....
Overture, "Morning, Noon Vienna" ....
Andante Cantabile.......
Hymn to the Sun from "Ir
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..
Hungarian Dance in D ma
Minuet ... .
Overture to "Oberon"......
Selection, "Eva"...........
Valse, "Tesana"...........
March, "Lorraine"..........

...29

Fourth Week of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

The coming week will bring a number of attractive special nights at the Symphony Hall "Pops." For Memorial Day there will be an appropriate holiday program: Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard Night, always one of the biggest "Pops" night of the year. This one will be in the nature of a sendoff for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly, where they will be heard in Paris and other cities of France. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" with the orchestra and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

Monday night's program is as follows: "Father of Victory," Ganne; overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; waltz, "Dornroeschen," Tschaikowsky; fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; from the suite, "Callirhoe," Chaminade; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; Pavane, German; ballet music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Miserere from "Il Trovatore," Verdi; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanoff.

...29.

THE POP CONCERTS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall continue to enjoy the most popular season in their history. The coming week will bring a number of special nights. For Decoration Day there will be an appropriate holiday programme; on Tuesday, May 31, comes Harvard Night, always one of the biggest Pops nights of the year. This one will be in the nature of a sendoff for the famous Harvard Glee Club, since it will be their last appearance in America before sailing for Europe shortly, where they will be heard in Paris and other cities of France. Under their conductor, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, they will sing excerpts from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," with the orchestra, and another group of songs without accompaniment. The Boston Conservatory of Music will have its night on Thursday, June 2. All nights are open to the public.

...29.

Ippolitoff-Ivanof

RVARD NIGHT

Tuesday

......Sousa
Life"......Massenet Club (with orchestra)......Strauss ictures from the "Tower of ......Rubenstein
Suite, "Peer Gynt"......Grieg
from the Hasty Pudding Club
"Rameses" from "Barnum Was 1920......A. Steinert
e Voodoo Dance" from "West-
Ho" 1921......A. Steinert
(Der Venusberg) Act 1,
......Wagner
e Club—
......Brahms
s of Bacchantes from "Phileand Baucis"......Gounod
r Song......Stanford Davison, conductor.)
"Rigoletto"......Verdi
n to the Dance....Webber-Berlioz
arvard......Strube
Fair Harvard

SIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB NIGHT

Wednesday.

n March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
to "The Marriage of Figaro"
Mozart
On the Beautiful Blue Dan-
"Mephistofele"......Strauss scene from "Othello"......Boito
......Verdi
se from "The Cid"......Grieg to "Sakuntala"......Massenet from "Carmen"......Goldmark
......Bizet
......Tschaikowsky
from "The Queen of Sheba"

CONSERVATORY OF MU NIGHT

Thursday.

"Carmen"
"The Mastersingers of Nur-
......Wagner
zo "A Midsummer Night's
"Aida"......Mendelssohn
......Verdi
......Sibelius
solo, "Intermezzo" from the
......Lalo
Enrico Fabrizio.
h variations in the style of Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi,
......Ochs
Solennelle "1812" Tschaikowsky
"Italia"......Casell
lly Fellows"......Vollste
all of the Mountain King"
er Gynt"......G

Friday.

n "Tannhaeuser"......W
"Merry Wives of Windso
rom "Der Rosenkavali
R.
"Faust"
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"
n "Lucia di Lamme
Dance No. 2
ngarian Rhapso
from "Samson
p, organ and
Violin solo, J. H
Patrol......

Saturday

arch from "A ream"
Morning, Noon
ntabile
he Sun from "Ir
"Lohengrin"
Dance in D ma
"Oberon"
"Eva"
pana" orraine"

ALD MAY 29

eek of "Pop"
rts at Symphony Hall

g week will bring a number ve special nights at the Hall "Pops." For Memo- here will be an appropriate ogram; Tuesday, May 31, vard Night, always one of "Pops" night of the year. will be in the nature of a the famous Harvard Glee it will be their last appear- merica before sailing for ortly, where they will be Paris and other cities of nder their conductor, Dr T. Davison, they will sing om Rubinstein's "Tower of the orchestra and another ngs without accompaniment. n Conservatory of Music will ght Thursday, June 2. All pen to the public.

ght's program is as follows: Victory," Ganne; overture " Offenbach; waltz, "Dorn- Tschaikowsky; fantasia, Wagner; from the suite, Chaminade; "Ave Maria," lhelm; Pavane, German; c from "La Gioconda," antasia, "Cavalleria Rusti- cagni; Miserere from "Il Verdi; "Procession of the olito-Ivanoff.

3E MAY 29.

HE POP CONCERTS

p Concerts at Symphony Hall to enjoy the most popular n their history. The coming ll bring a number of special For Decoration Day there will propriate holiday programme; lay, May 31, comes Harvard ways one of the biggest Pops the year. This one will be in e of a sendoff for the famous Glee Club, since it will be their arance in America before sail- urope shortly, where they will in Paris and other cities of Under their conductor, Dr. T. Davison, they will sing rom Rubinstein's "Tower of with the orchestra, and an- up of songs without accom- The Boston Conservatory will have its night on Thurs . All nights are open to th

ST-MAY 29.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Harvard College

March, "El Capitan"......Sousa
Overture, "Phèdre"......Massenet
Waltz, "Artists' Life"......J. Strauss
Choruses from "The Tower of Babel"......Rubinstein
Anitra's Dance—Hall of the Mountain King from the Suite, "Peer Gynt"......Grieg
Rameses—Voodoo Dance......Steinert
(From Pudding Plays)
Venusberg Music from "Tannhaüser"......Wagner
Choral Pieces:
Love Songs......Brahms
Bacchantes' Chorus......Gounod
Cavalier Song......Stanford
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"......Verdi
Invitation to the Dance..Weber-Berlioz
March "Cruiser Harvard"......Strube

Conductors:
A. Jacchia. A. T. Davison.
Assisting: The Harvard Glee Club

TRANS-MAY 31

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS

Harvard Night, one of the most eventful of the year, will take place at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. A special feature of an unusually lively programme will be two numbers by the famous Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra and unaccompanied) under the leadership of Dr. Archibald T. Davison. The Harvard folk and the Boston public will on this occasion bid bon voyage to the famous chorus which has taken such a high standing in musical America and is to depart in a few days for Europe to meet important engagements in Paris and other French cities.

The programme follows:

March, "El Capitan"......Sousa
Overture, "Phedre"......Massenet
Waltz, "Artists' Life"......Strauss
Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra)
Three Pictures from the "Tower of Babel"......Rubinstein
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt"......Grieg
a. Anitra's dance.
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Excerpts from Hasty Pudding Club shows:
a. "Rameses," from "Barnum Was Right," 1920......A. Steinert
b. "The Voodoo Dance" from "Westward Ho," 1921......A. Steinert
Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) Act 1, "Tannhauser"......Wagner
Harvard Glee Club......Brahms
Love Songs......
Chorus of Bacchantes from "Philemon......Gounod and Baucis"......Stanford
Cavalier Song......
(Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor)
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"......Verdi
Invitation to the Dance....Weber-Berlioz
Cruiser Harvard......Strube

POST-MAY. 31

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS

Harvard night, one of the most eventful of the year, will take place at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. A special feature of an unusually lively program will be two numbers by the Harvard Glee Club, with orchestra and unaccompanied, under the leadership of Dr. Archibald T. Davison. The Harvard folk and the Boston public will on this occasion bid "bon voyage" to the chorus, which is to depart in a few days for Europe to meet important engagements in Paris and other French cities.

The program follows:

March, "El Capitan"......Sousa
Overture, "Phedre"......Massenet
Waltz, "Artists' Life"......Strauss
Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra), Three Pictures from the "Tower of Babel"......Rubinstein
From the suite, "Peer Gynt"......Grieg
a. Anitra's Dance. b. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Excerpts from Hasty Pudding Club shows:
a. "Rameses," from "Barnum Was Right," 1920......A. Steinert
b. "The Voodoo Dance," from "Westward Ho," 1921......A. Steinert
Bacchanale (Der Venusberg), act I, "Tannhauser"......Wagner
Harvard Glee Club—
Love Songs......Brahms
Chorus of Bacchantes, from "Philemon and Baucis"......Gounod
Cavalier Song......Stanford
(Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor.)
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"......Verdi
Invitation to the Dance....Weber-Berlioz
Cruiser Harvard......Strube

HERALD-MA

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March from "The Prophet,"......Meyerbeer
Overture to "Figaro's Wedding,"
Waltz, "Blue Danube"......Mozart
Fantasia, "Mefistofele"......J. Strauss
Tempest Scene from "Othello"......Boito
Minuet......Verdi
Aragonaise from "The Cid"......Gulesian
Overture to "Sakountala"......Massenet
Toréador's Song and Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"......Goldmark
Miniature March......Bizet
Procession from......Chaikovsky
"The Queen of Sheba"......Gounod

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS JUN

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SINGS AT THE POPS

Appears Here Last Time Before Tour Abroad

The Harvard Glee Club made its last appearance in Boston previous to its European tour last evening at the Pops. Dr Davison conducted the orchestra and chorus with his usual skill in the three "Tone Pictures" from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," first heard here last season at a pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra. He also led the Glee Club in three unaccompanied numbers, which were part of the regular program.

Brahms' "Love Song," "The Chorus of Bacchantes" from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis" and Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's spirited setting of one of Browning's "Cavalier Songs," sung with the vigor and polish which have made this chorus of college boys famous, were all enthusiastically received by an audience which packed the hall to suffocation.

Oldtimers unfamiliar with the "Pops" in the days of prohibition would have been astonished to see a "Harvard night" crowd listening to the music as silently as though the occasion were a regular Symphony concert, not only while the Glee Club was singing, but while Mr Jacchia was leading the orchestra through the usual array of selections from Sousa, Strauss, Greig, Verdi, Wagner and Weber. There was plenty of lively conversation and laughter during the pauses between numbers, but everybody quieted down the instant the music began, on the floor as well as in the balconies.

There was no display of Harvard banners draped from the balconies, as of old. Only the word "Harvard" spelled by crimson electric light bulbs against the white and gold of the organ at the back of the stage gave token of the occasion.

The orchestra played as a novelty appropriate to "Harvard night" excerpts from last year's and this year's "Hasty Pudding" musical comedies, composed by Alexander Steinert, '22, of Boston, which were unusually effective, both harmonically and rhythmically. Mr Steinert's music has figured on programs played here by Percy Grainger and others, but the pieces played last night surpassed his previous work. They greatly pleased the audience. "Fair Harvard," as always, brought the audience to its feet at the end of the concert.

GLOBE JUNE 1.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The program to be played by the famous Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight under the leadership of Agide Jacchia will be as follows:

Coronation March from "Le Prophete"......Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"......Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"......Strauss
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"......Boito
Tempest Scene from "Otello"......Verdi
Minuet......Gulesian
Aragonaise from "The Cid"....Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala"......Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen"......Bizet
(a) Toreador's Song. (b) Gypsy Dance
Marche Miniature......Tschaikowsky
Cortege, from "The Queen of Sheba"......Gounod

TRAV. JUNE 1.

PROGRAM AT POPS TONIGHT

The program to be played by the famous Pope Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight, under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, will be as follows:

Coronation March from "Le Prophets"......Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"......Strauss
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"......Boito
Tempest Scene from "Othello"......Verdi
"Spring"......Grieg
Aragonaise from "The Cid"......Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala"......Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen"
aTereador's Song. bGypsy Dance....Bizet
Marche Miniature......Tschaikswsky
Cortge, from "The Queen of Sheba"..Gounod

AMER. JUNE 1.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The program to be played by the famous Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight, under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, will be as follows:

Coronation March from "Le Prophete"......Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"......Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"......Strauss
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"......Boito
Tempest Scene from "Otello"......Verdi
Minuet......Gulesian
Aragonaise from "The Cid"....Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala"......Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen"......Bizet
(a) Toreador's Song. (b) Gypsy Dance
Marche Miniature......Tschaikowsky
Cortege, from "The Queen of Sheba"......Gounod

HERALD-JUNE 1.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, is the director; but the program is of particular musical worth and of interest to the general public.

Prelude to "Carmen"......Bizet
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"......Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"......Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida"......Verdi
Finlandia......Sibelius
Violoncello solo, "Intermezzo from the Concerto-Lalo
Mr. Enrico Fabrizio
Theme with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner......Ochs
Overture Solennelle "1812"..Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"......Casella
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"......Vollstedt
In the Hall of the Mountain King from "Peer Gynt"......Grieg

HERALD-JUNE 2

Although the Pop concert to be given in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, is the director, the program is of particular musical worth and of interest to the public. The numbers follow:

Prelude to "Carmen"......Bizet
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"......Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"......Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida"......Verdi
Finlandia......Sibelius
Violoncello solo, "Intermezzo" from the Concerto—Lalo......Mr. Enrico Fabrizio
Theme with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner......Ochs
Overture Solennell "1812"......Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"......Casella
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"......Vollstedt
In the Hall of the Mountain King from "Peer Gynt"......Grieg

Y W C A to Hold a Pop Concert

Miss Jessie G. King, in charge of the first pop concert by the Young Women's Christian Association, to be held Monday night.

The first pop concert of the Young Women's Christian Association will be held Monday evening in Symphony Hall, under the direction of an active committee, headed by Miss Jessie G. King. Miss King is well known as a Red Cross worker and since she has directed her energies in Y. W. C. A. circles has accomplished a great deal. The demand for tables has far exceeded original expectations and a hilarious night is anticipated by members and their friends.

TRAV. JUNE 2.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Boston Conservatory

Prelude to "Carmen"......Bizet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".Wagner
Scherzo from the Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"..Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida"......Verdi
Tone Poem, "Finlandia"......Sibelius
Intermezzo from the Concerto for Violoncello......Lalo
Theme with Variations in the Style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner......Ochs
Overture, "1812"......Chaikovsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"......Casella
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"......Vollstedt
In the Hall of the Mountain King, from "Peer Gynt"......Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Soloist: E. Fabrizio.

TRANS. JUNE 2.

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia and his noted orchestra of eighty symphony players will present the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "Tannhauser"......Wagner
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"......Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier" R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust"......Gounod
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia"......Delibe
1—Les Chasseresses. 2—Pizzicato.
3—Cortege de Bacchus.
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor,"......Donizet
Norwegian Dance No. 2......Grei
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Lisz
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"......Saint Saen
Largo, Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffman....Hande
Harp, organ and strings.
American Patrol......Meacha

AMER. JUNE 3.

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and his noted orchestra of eighty symphony players will present the following program at the pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "Tannhauser"......Wagner
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"......Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier" R. Straus Fantasia, "Faust"......Gouno
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia"....Delibe
1. Les Chasseersses. 2. Pizzicato.
3. Cortege de Bacchus.
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor"......Donizet
Norwegian Dance No 2......Gri
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Lis
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"......Saint-Sae Largo, solo violin, J. Hoffman......Hand
Harp, organ and strings
"American Patrol"......Meacha

HERALD JUNE

[130]

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser"......Wagner
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"......Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier"......R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust"......Gounod
Suite from the Ballet, "Sylvia"..Delibes
Sextet from "Lucia"......Donizetti
Norwegian Dance No. 2......Grieg
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Liszt
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"......Saint-Saëns
Largo......Händel
American Patrol......Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 3.

Mr. Monteux's Concert in Paris—Mr. Lankow Joins the Chicago Opera—A New Quintet by Faure—London and Kreisler

If Mr. Monteux held to the announced programme for his concert in Paris with the Colonne Orchestra on Tuesday last, he conducted in Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," heard for the first time in France; in Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," likewise new to Parisian ears and in Debussy's symphonic sketches, "The Sea." Miss Janacopulos, heard and liked in the United States as a plastic, colorful and generally eloquent singer, assisted at the concert in songs of Wagner, Musorgsky and Ravel.

Progress of the Pops

By exception, two of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall next week will be closed to the public. On Monday evening the Young Women's Christian Association has taken every place in the hall—the seats in the balconies no less than the tables on the floor. On Friday evening, the graduating classes and the alumni of Boston University have done likewise. On Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings the concerts will proceed as usual and the public will find seats wherever it chooses to seek them. On Tuesday, Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra will be heard in an operatic programme drawn from Gounod, Puccini, Verdi, Wagner, Saint-Saëns and other composers and bringing familiar fragments of their music from stage to concert hall. On Wednesday—evening of the Institute of Technology—its songs and a sketch—"Happiness Blues"—by a student, will diversify the programme. On Thursday, Homer Humphrey will play the solo part in a piece for organ and orchestra and Mr. Jacchia will make known his own arrangement for orchestra of the Hebrew melody, "Eili, Eili"—favorite piece of alto voices lifted in song. For Saturday, the conductor has set the usual pleasureable miscellany. Thus for another week—with the exception of the two closed evenings—the Pops remain the Pops.

TRANS. JUNE 4.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, the Pops orchestra will play this program in Symphony Hall tonight:

Wedding March, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream"......Mendelssohn
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna"......Suppe
Andante Cantabile......Storey-Smith
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"......Mascagni
Prelude to "Lohengrin"......Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major......Brahms
Minuet......Boccherini
Overture to "Oberon"......Weber
Selection, "Eva"......Lehar
Valse Espana......Waldteufel
March, "Lorraine"......Ganne

HERALD JUNE 4

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

Under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, the Pops Orchestra will play the following program at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"......Mendelssohn
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna"......Suppe
Andante Cantabile......W. S. Smith
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"......Mascagni
Prelude to "Lohengrin"......Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major......Brahms
Minuet......Boccherini
Overture to "Oberon"......Weber
Selection, "Eva"......Lehar
Valse Espana......Waldteufel
March, "Lorraine"......Ganne

No institution of Summer amusement is as venerable as the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which are now seeing their 36th Summer, and yet none is younger in spirit, for Agide Jacchia, the celebrated conductor, is consulting with characteristic care the musical tastes of 1921.

One of the best programs of the season will be the Operatic Program, which occurs next Tuesday, June 7. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken next Monday and next Friday nights, respectively, for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Business Women's Club Night, next Tuesday; Technology Night, Wednesday, with a particularly lively program, and Euclid Lodge Night, Thursday. The Operatic Program Tuesday, June 7, follows:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"..Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"......Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Oneigen"..Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"......Puccini
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"......Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah"......Saint-Saens
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleoptara's Night"..Hadley
Selection, "Carmen" (Cavalleria)......Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet"......Meyerbeer

AMER. JUNE 4.

Fifth Week of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

In 1885, when the Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-Winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermission. But the public soon christened them "the Pops," and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted.

This institution of many Summers is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. One of the most popular of the season will be the "operatic" program, which occurs next Tuesday. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken Monday and Friday nights, respectively, for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Business Women's Club night, Tuesday; Technology night, Wednesday, and Euclid Lodge night, Thursday.

Tomorrow evening's program is as follows: March from "Aida," Verdi; overture, "Il Guarany," Gomez; "Pastorale," Scarlatti; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; from the "Nutcracker" suite, Tschaikowsky; Largo, Handel; "Children at Play," van Westerhout; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; selection, "Apple Blossoms," Kreisler-Jacobi; "Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik.

GLOBE JUNE 5

THE POPS

One of the most popular "Pop" concerts of the season will be the operatic programme which occurs next Tuesday, June 7. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken next Monday and next Friday nights respectively for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Boston Women's Club night on Tuesday, Technology night next Wednesday, with a particularly lively programme, and Euclid Lodge night next Thursday.

POST-JUNE 5

POP CONCERTS STARTED IN 1885

Neither the Common nor the gold-domed State House is more typical of Boston than the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, now enjoying their thirty-sixth season. Other cities have tried to emulate the Pops again and again, but they have never succeeded.

In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-Winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "Promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, but the public soon christened them "The Pops."

This institution of many Summ is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken tomorrow and Frida nights respectively for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public. An operatic program will be offered Tuesday night.

ADVERTISER JUNE 5

THE POPS

In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "Promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermissions; but the public soon christened them "The Pops," and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted.

This institution of many summers is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. One of the most popular of the season will be the operatic program, which occurs next Tuesday, June 7. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken next Monday and next Friday nights respectively for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Business Women's Club Night on Tuesday, Technology Night next Wednesday, with a particularly lively program, and Euclid Lodge night next Thursday. The programs of the week follow:

Tuesday

OPERATIC PROGRAM

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"......Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin"......Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"......Puccini
Prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg"......Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah"......Saint-Saens
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleopatra's Night"..Hadley
Selection, "Carmen"......Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet,"......Meyerbeer

Wednesday

TECHNOLOGY NIGHT

French Military March......Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi"......Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"......Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues"......Gage '22
Rhapsody, "Espana"......Chabrier
Minuet......Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"......Verdi
"Tech" songs (with organ)
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"....Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball"......Czibulka
"Stars and Stripes Forever"......Sousa

Thursday

Military Polonaise......Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
Song (selected)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah", Saint-Saens
Finlandia......Sibelius
Solo for Organ with Orchestra,
Fantaisie Dialoguee......Boellmann
Homer Humphrey

"Trovatore" .... Verdi
of the Sardar
Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
HARVARD NIGHT.
Tuesday
El Capitan" .... Sousa
"Phedre" .... Massenet
Artists' Life" .... Strauss
Glee Club (with orchestra) Pictures from the "Tower of Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Rubenstein
.... Grieg
from the Hasty Pudding Club
Rameses" from "Barnum Was ht" 1920 .... A. Steinert he Voodoo Dance" from "Wet-re Ho" 1921 .... A. Steinert le (Der Venusberg) Act 1, haeuser" .... Wagner
Glee Club—
Songs .... Brahms us of Bacchantes from "Philen and Baucis" .... Gounod lier Song .... Stanford
(Dr. Davison, conductor.)
"Rigoletto" .... Verdi
n to the Dance.... Webber-Berlioz
Harvard .... Strube
Fair Harvard
SIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB NIGHT
Wednesday.
March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
to "The Marriage of Figaro"
Mozart
"On the Beautiful Blue Dan-
.... Strauss
"Mephistofele" .... Boito
scene from "Othello" .... Verdi
.... Grieg
se from "The Cid" .... Massenet to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
from "Carmen" .... Bizet Miniature .... Tschaikowsky
from "The Queen of Sheba"
CONSERVATORY OF MUSI NIGHT
Thursday.
"Carmen" .... Bizet
"The Mastersingers of Nur-
.... Wagner
om "A Midsummer Night's
.... Mendelssohn
"Aida" .... Verdi
.... Sibelius
solo, "Intermezzo" from the
.... Lalo
Enrico Fabrizio.
h variations in the style of Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi,
.... Ochs
Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
"Italia" .... Casella
lly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
all of the Mountain King"
er Gynt" .... G
Friday.
"Tannhaeuser" .... W
"Merry Wives of Windso
rom "Der Rosenkavali
R.
"Faust" ....
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"
n "Lucia di Lamme
Dance No. 2
ngarian Rhapso
from "Samson rp, organ and
Violin solo, J. H.
Patrol ....
Saturday
March from "A Dream"
Morning, Noon
ntabile
e Sun from "Ir
"Lohengrin"
Dance in D ma
"Oberon" ....
"Eva" ....
pana" ....
orraine" ....

RALD MAY 29

Week of "Pop"
rts at Symphony Hall

g week will bring a number ve special nights at the Hall "Pops." For Memo-here will be an appropriate ogram; Tuesday, May 31, vard Night, always one of
"Pops" night of the year. will be in the nature of a the famous Harvard Glee it will be their last appear-merica before sailing for ortly, where they will be Paris and other cities of nder their conductor, Dr
T. Davison, they will sing om Rubinstein's "Tower of the orchestra and another ngs without accompaniment.
n Conservatory of Music will ght Thursday, June 2. All pen to the public.
ght's program is as follows:
Victory," Ganne; overture
" Offenbach; waltz, "Dorn-
" Tschaikowsky; fantasia,
" Wagner; from the suite,
Chaminade; "Ave Maria,"
lhelm; Pavane, German;
c from "La Gioconda," antasia, "Cavalleria Rusti-cagni; Miserere from "Il Verdi; "Procession of the olito-Ivanoff.

3E

HE POP CONCERTS

p Concerts at Symphony Hall to enjoy the most popular their history. The coming ll bring a number of special For Decoration Day there will ppropriate holiday programme;
day, May 31, comes Harvard ways one of the biggest Pops the year. This one will be in e of a sendoff for the famous Glee Club, since it will be their arance in America before sailurope shortly, where they will in Paris and other cities of Under their conductor, Dr.
T. Davison, they will sing from Rubinstein's "Tower of with the orchestra, and an-up of songs without accom-
The Boston Conservatory will have its night on Thurs
2. All nights are open to th

ST. MAY 29.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Harvard College

March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa
Overture, "Phèdre" .... Massenet
Waltz, "Artists' Life" .... J. Strauss
Choruses from "The Tower of Babel" .... Rubinstein
Anitra's Dance—Hall of the Mountain King from the Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
Rameses—Voodoo Dance .... Steinert
(From Pudding Plays)
Venusberg Music from "Tannhaüser" .... Wagner
Choral Pieces:
Love Songs .... Brahms
Bacchantes' Chorus .... Gounod
Cavalier Song .... Stanford
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Invitation to the Dance.. Weber-Berlioz
March "Cruiser Harvard" .... Strube

Conductors:
A. Jacchia. A. T. Davison.
Assisting: The Harvard Glee Club

TRANS. MAY 31

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS

Harvard Night, one of the most eventful of the year, will take place at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. A special feature of an unusually lively programme will be two numbers by the famous Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra and unaccompanied) under the leadership of Dr. Archibald T. Davison. The Harvard folk and the Boston public will on this occasion bid bon voyage to the famous chorus which has taken such a high standing in musical America and is to depart in a few days for Europe to meet important engagements in Paris and other French cities.

The programme follows:
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa
Overture, "Phedre" .... Massenet
Waltz, "Artists' Life" .... Strauss
Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra)
Three Pictures from the "Tower of Babel" .... Rubinstein
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
a. Anitra's dance.
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Excerpts from Hasty Pudding Club shows:
a. "Rameses," from "Barnum Was Right," 1920 .... A. Steinert
b. "The Voodoo Dance" from "Westward Ho," 1921 .... A. Steinert
Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) Act 1, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Harvard Glee Club
Love Songs .... Brahms
Chorus of Bacchantes from "Philemon and Baucis" .... Gounod
Cavalier Song .... Stanford
(Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor)
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Invitation to the Dance .... Weber-Berlioz
Cruiser Harvard .... Strube

POST - MAY 31

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS

Harvard night, one of the most eventful of the year, will take place at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. A special feature of an unusually lively program will be two numbers by the Harvard Glee Club, with orchestra and unaccompanied, under the leadership of Dr. Archibald T. Davison. The Harvard folk and the Boston public will on this occasion bid "bon voyage" to the chorus, which is to depart in a few days for Europe to meet important engagements in Paris and other French cities.

The program follows:
March, "El Capitan" .... Sousa
Overture, "Phedre" .... Massenet
Waltz, "Artists' Life" .... Strauss
Harvard Glee Club (with orchestra),
Three Pictures from the "Tower of Babel" .... Rubinstein
From the suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
a. Anitra's Dance. b. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Excerpts from Hasty Pudding Club shows:
a. "Rameses," from "Barnum Was Right," 1920 .... A. Steinert
b. "The Voodoo Dance," from "Westward Ho," 1921 .... A. Steinert
Bacchanale (Der Venusberg), act I, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Harvard Glee Club—
Love Songs .... Brahms
Chorus of Bacchantes, from "Philemon and Baucis" .... Gounod
Cavalier Song .... Stanford
(Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor.)
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
Cruiser Harvard .... Strube

HERALD-MA

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer
Overture to "Figaro's Wedding,"
Waltz, "Blue Danube" Mozart
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .... J. Strauss
Tempest Scene from "Othello" .... Boito
Minuet .... Verdi
Aragonaise from "The Cid" .... Gulesian
Overture to "Sakountala" .... Massenet
Toreador's Song and Gypsy Dance .... Goldmark
from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Miniature, March .... Chaikovsky
Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUN

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SINGS AT THE POPS

Appears Here Last Time Before Tour Abroad

The Harvard Glee Club made its last appearance in Boston previous to its European tour last evening at the Pops. Dr Davison conducted the orchestra and chorus with his usual skill in the three "Tone Pictures" from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," first heard here last season at a pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra. He also led the Glee Club in three unaccompanied numbers, which were part of the regular program.

Brahms' "Love Song," "The Chorus of Bacchantes" from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis" and Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's spirited setting of one of Browning's "Cavalier Songs," sung with the vigor and polish which have made this chorus of college boys famous, were all enthusiastically received by an audience which packed the hall to suffocation.

Oldtimers unfamiliar with the "Pops" in the days of prohibition would have been astonished to see a "Harvard night" crowd listening to the music as silently as though the occasion were a regular Symphony concert, not only while the Glee Club was singing, but while Mr Jacchia was leading the orchestra through the usual array of selections from Sousa, Strauss, Greig, Verdi, Wagner and Weber. There was plenty of lively conversation and laughter during the pauses between numbers, but everybody quieted down the instant the music began, on the floor as well as in the balconies.

There was no display of Harvard banners draped from the balconies, as of old. Only the word "Harvard" spelled by crimson electric light bulbs against the white and gold of the organ at the back of the stage gave token of the occasion.

The orchestra played as a novelty appropriate to "Harvard night" excerpts from last year's and this year's "Hasty Pudding" musical comedies, composed by Alexander Steinert, '22, of Boston, which were unusually effective, both harmonically and rhythmically. Mr Steinert's music has figured on programs played here by Percy Grainger and others, but the pieces played last night surpassed his previous work. They greatly pleased the audience. "Fair Harvard," as always, brought the audience to its feet at the end of the concert.

GLOBE JUNE 1.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The program to be played by the famous Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, will be as follows:

Coronation March from "Le Prophete" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Tempest Scene from "Otello" .... Verdi
Minuet .... Gulesian
Aragonaise from "The Cid" .... Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen" .... Bizet
(a) Toreador's Song. (b) Gypsy Dance
Marche Miniature .... Tschaikowsky
Cortege, from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod

TRAV. JUNE 1.

PROGRAM AT POPS TONIGHT

The program to be played by the famous Pope Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight, under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, will be as follows:

Coronation March from "Le Prophets" Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro".. Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Tempest Scene from "Othello" .... Verdi
"Spring" .... Grieg
Aragonaise from "The Cid" .... Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen"
aTereador's Song. bGypsy Dance.... Bizet
Marche Miniature .... Tschaikswsky
Cortge, from "The Queen of Sheba".. Gounod

AMER. JUNE 1.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The program to be played by the famous Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight, under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, will be as follows:

Coronation March from "Le Prophete" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Tempest Scene from "Otello" .... Verdi
Minuet .... Gulesian
Aragonaise from "The Cid" .... Massenet
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Excerpts from "Carmen" .... Bizet
(a) Toreador's Song. (b) Gypsy Dance
Marche Miniature .... Tschaikowsky
Cortege, from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod

HERALD: JUNE 1.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, is the director; but the program is of particular musical worth and of interest to the general public.

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" .... Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Finlandia .... Sibelius
Violoncello solo, "Intermezzo" from the Concerto-Lalo
Mr. Enrico Fabrizio
Theme with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner .... Ochs
Overture Solennelle "1812".. Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
In the Hall of the Mountain King from "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg

HERALD - JUNE 2

Although the Pop concert to be given in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, is the director, the program is of particular musical worth and of interest to the public. The numbers follow:

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Finlandia .... Sibelius
Violoncello solo, "Intermezzo" from the Concerto—Lalo Mr. Enrico Fabrizio
Theme with variations in the style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner .... Ochs
Overture Solennell "1812" Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
In the Hall of the Mountain King from "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg

Y W C A to Hold a Pop Concert

Miss Jessie G. King, in charge of the first pop concert by the Young Women's Christian Association, to be held Monday night.

The first pop concert of the Young Women's Christian Association will be held Monday evening in Symphony Hall, under the direction of an active committee, headed by Miss Jessie G. King. Miss King is well known as a Red Cross worker and since she has directed her energies in Y. W. C. A. circles has accomplished a great deal. The demand for tables has far exceeded original expectations and a hilarious night is anticipated by members and their friends.

TRAV. JUNE 2.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Boston Conservatory

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".Wagner
Scherzo from the Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"..Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Tone Poem, "Finlandia" .... Sibelius
Intermezzo from the Concerto for Violoncello .... Lalo
Theme with Variations in the Style of Haydn, Mozart, J. Strauss, Verdi, Wagner .... Ochs
Overture, "1812" .... Chaikovsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
In the Hall of the Mountain King, from "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Soloist: E. Fabrizio.

TRANS. JUNE 2.

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia and his noted orchestra of eighty symphony players will present the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier" R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust" .... Gounod
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
1—Les Chasseresses. 2—Pizzicato.
3—Cortege de Bacchus.
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti
Norwegian Dance No. 2 .... Grieg
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint Saens
Largo, Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffman..... Handel
Harp, organ and strings.
American Patrol .... Meacham

AMER. JUNE 3.

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and his noted orchesrta of eighty symphony players will present the following program at the pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier" R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust" .... Gounod
Suite from the Ballet "Sylvia" ... Delibes
1. Les Chasseresses. 2. Pizzicato.
3. Cortege de Bacchus.
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" .... Donizetti
Norwegian Dance No 2 .... Grieg
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
Largo, solo violin, J. Hoffman .... Handel
Harp, organ and strings
"American Patrol" .... Meacham

HERALD JUNE

[136]

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust" .... Gounod
Suite from the Ballet, "Sylvia".. Delibes
Sextet from "Lucia" .... Donizetti
Norwegian Dance No. 2 .... Grieg
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns
Largo .... Händel
American Patrol .... Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 3.

Mr. Monteux's Concert in Paris—Mr. Lankow Joins the Chicago Opera—A New Quintet by Faure—London and Kreisler

If Mr. Monteux held to the announced programme for his concert in Paris with the Colonne Orchestra on Tuesday last, he conducted in Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," heard for the first time in France; in Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," likewise new to Parisian ears and in Debussy's symphonic sketches, "The Sea." Miss Janacopulos, heard and liked in the United States as a plastic, colorful and generally eloquent singer, assisted at the concert in songs of Wagner, Musorgsky and Ravel.

Progress of the Pops

By exception, two of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall next week will be closed to the public. On Monday evening the Young Women's Christian Association has taken every place in the hall—the seats in the balconies no less than the tables on the floor. On Friday evening, the graduating classes and the alumni of Boston University have done likewise. On Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings the concerts will proceed as usual and the public will find seats wherever it chooses to seek them. On Tuesday, Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra will be heard in an operatic programme drawn from Gounod, Puccini, Verdi, Wagner, Saint-Saëns and other composers and bringing familiar fragments of their music from stage to concert hall. On Wednesday—evening of the Institute of Technology—its songs and a sketch—"Happiness Blues"—by a student, will diversify the programme. On Thursday, Homer Humphrey will play the solo part in a piece for organ and orchestra and Mr. Jacchia will make known his own arrangement for orchestra of the Hebrew melody, "Eili, Eili"—favorite piece of alto voices lifted in song. For Saturday, the conductor has set the usual pleasureable miscellany. Thus for another week—with the exception of the two closed evenings—the Pops remain the Pops.

TRANS. JUNE 4.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, the Pops orchestra will play this program in Symphony Hall tonight:

Wedding March, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" .... Suppe
Andante Cantabile .... Storey-Smith
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" .... Mascagni
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major .... Brahms
Minuet .... Boccherini
Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Selection, "Eva" .... Lehar
Valse Espana .... Waldteufel
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

HERALD JUNE 4

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

Under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, the Pops Orchestra will play the following program at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" .... Suppe
Andante Cantabile .... W. S. Smith
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major .... Brahms
Minuet .... Boccherini
Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Selection, "Eva" .... Lehar
Valse Espana .... Waldteufel
March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne

No institution of Summer amusement is as venerable as the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which are now seeing their 36th Summer, and yet none is younger in spirit, for Agide Jacchia, the celebrated conductor, is consulting with characteristic care the musical tastes of 1921.

One of the best programs of the season will be the Operatic Program, which occurs next Tuesday, June 7. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken next Monday and next Friday nights, respectively, for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Business Women's Club Night, next Tuesday; Technology Night, Wednesday, with a particularly lively program, and Euclid Lodge Night, Thursday. The Operatic Program Tuesday, June 7, follows:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" .. Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" .... Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Oneigen" .. Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Naremberg" .... Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
Ballet music from "La Gioconda" .. Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleopatra's Night" .. Hadley
Selection, "Carmen" (Cavalleria) .... Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer

AMER. JUNE 4.

Fifth Week of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

In 1885, when the Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-Winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermission. But the public soon christened them "the Pops," and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted.

This institution of many Summers is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. One of the most popular of the season will be the "operatic" program, which occurs next Tuesday. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken Monday and Friday nights, respectively, for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Business Women's Club night, Tuesday; Technology night, Wednesday, and Euclid Lodge night, Thursday.

Tomorrow evening's program is as follows: March from "Aida," Verdi; overture, "Il Guarany," Gomez; "Pastorale," Scarlatti; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; from the "Nutcracker" suite, Tschaikowsky; Largo, Handel; "Children at Play," van Westerhout; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; selection, "Apple Blossoms," Kreisler-Jacobi; "Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik.

GLOBE JUNE 5.

THE POPS

One of the most popular "Pop" concerts of the season will be the operatic programme which occurs next Tuesday, June 7. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken next Monday and next Friday nights respectively for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Boston Women's Club night on Tuesday, Technology night next Wednesday, with a particularly lively programme, and Euclid Lodge night next Thursday.

POST - JUNE 5.

POP CONCERTS STARTED IN 1885

Neither the Common nor the gold-domed State House is more typical of Boston than the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, now enjoying their thirty-sixth season. Other cities have tried to emulate the Pops again and again, but they have never succeeded.

In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-Winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "Promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, but the public soon christened them "The Pops."

This institution of many Summers is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken tomorrow and Friday nights respectively for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public. An operatic program will be offered Tuesday night.

ADVERTISER - JUNE 5

THE POPS

In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "Promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermissions; but the public soon christened them "The Pops," and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted.

This institution of many summers is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. One of the most popular of the season will be the operatic program, which occurs next Tuesday, June 7. The Y. W. C. A. and Boston University have taken next Monday and next Friday nights respectively for their own celebrations. All other nights of the week, however, are open to the public, including Business Women's Club Night on Tuesday, Technology Night next Wednesday, with a particularly lively program, and Euclid Lodge night next Thursday. The programs of the week follow:

Tuesday
OPERATIC PROGRAM
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" .... Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" ...... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg" Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleopatra's Night" .. Hadley
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer

Wednesday
TECHNOLOGY NIGHT
French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .... Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues" .... Gage '22
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
"Tech" songs (with organ)
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball" .... Czibulka
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa

Thursday
Military Polonaise .... Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" .R. Strauss
Song (selected)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" . Saint-Saens
Finlandia .... Sibelius
Solo for Organ with Orchestra,
Fantaisie Dialoguee .... Boellmann
Homer Humphrey

Elli, Elli,
(Arranged for orchestra by Jacchia)
Overture to "Tannhaeuser" .... Wagner
Selection from the Filene show "Home Brew" .... R. L. Harlow
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky

Saturday

Charge of the Hussars .... Spindler
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "The Kiss" .... Arditi
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann" . Offenbach
Finale of "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride" .... Mozart
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Selection, "The Fortune Teller" ...... Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" ..... Strauss
March, "Semper Fidelis" .... Sousa

HERALD-JUNE 5.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Y. W. C. A.

THE Young Women's Christian Association has taken all the seats for this evening and no places are available for the general public.

TRANS-JUNE 6.

At the Pops Tonight

Operatic Programme

Cortège from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onégin," Chaikovsky
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" .. Puccini
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saëns
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleopatra's Night," Hadley
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS-JUNE 7-

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Institute of Technology

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .... Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues" ... Gage '22
Rhapsody, "España" .... Chabrier
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
"Tech" Songs ....
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball" Czibulka
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE. 8.

OPERATIC PROGRAM AT POPS TONIGHT

Always in high favor at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall is the operatic program, which will be given tonight. In no field of music is Conductor Agide Jacchia more finely equipped, for he has conducted many opera companies in his day. The program follows:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" .... Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda" .. Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleopatra's Night" .. Hadley
Selection, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer

AMER. JUNE 7.

TECH NIGHT AT POPS

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will have its annual night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. This occasion is also open to the public. The following program will be played:

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .... Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues" .... Gage '22
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
"Tech" Songs (with organ)
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" . Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ... Czibulka
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa

HERALD-JUNE 8.

TECH NIGHT AT THE POPS

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will have its annual night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. On this occasion, which is also open to the public, the following programme will be played:

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .... Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues" .... Gage, '22
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
"Tech" Songs (with organ)
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .. Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball" .... Czibulka
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa

POST JUNE 8

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, members of Euclid lodge being particularly represented, Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra will present this program:

Military Polonaise ...... Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss
Aria, "Cieloee Mar" from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
(Mr. Charles Stratton)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Finlandia .... Sibelius
Solo for organ with orchestra .. Boellman
Fantaisie Dialoguee
(Mr. Homer Humphrey)
Elli, Elli
(Arranged for orchestra by Agide Jacchit)
Overture to "Tanrhauser" ...... Wagner
Selection from the Filene show, "Home Brew" .... R. L. Harlow
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .... Vollstedt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky

HERALD-JUNE 9.

At the Pops Tonight

Military Polonaise ...... Chopin-Glazunov
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss
Aria, "Cielo E Mar," from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
(Charles Stratton)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns
Finlandia .... Sibelius
Solo for Organ with Orchestra .. Böllman
(Homer Humphrey)
Eili, Eili,
Arranged for Orchestra by Agide Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Selection from the Filene Show, "Home Brew" .... R. L. Harlow
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ...... Vollstedt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony, Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 9.

האט פראהיבישאן געווירקט אויף דער פאפולאריטעט פון די „פאפס־קאנצערטען.

די באריהמטע באסטאנער אינסטי־טוציע, די „פאפס־קאנצערטען" אין סימפאני האל, האט דורכגעלעבט זעהר פיעל ענדערונגען פון דער צייט ווען זי איז געגרינדעט געווארען אין 1885. ווען פראהיבישאן איז געווארען א געזעץ, האבען מאנכע געדיינקט אז די „פאפס־קאנצערטען" וועלען רעוואלוציאניזירט ווערען און אנדערע ווידער האבען גע־גלויבט אז די קאנצערטען וועלען אונ־טערגעהן. אויסגעלאזט האט זיך פונקט פארקעהרט.

ווען די „ביל און פעיר" איז אלס רעזולטאט פון פראהיבישאן געענדערט געווארען אין פריהלינג פון 1919, האט דיזע ענדערונג ניט געווירקט אויף אזוי וויט, אז עס זאל זיך ארויסזעהן א שא־דען וואס קען פארדונקלען די היסטאריע פון דער ערפאלגרייכער עקזיסטענץ פון דיזע קאנצערטען.

די ביכער פון דער פערוואלטונג בע־ווייזען אז זייט די לעצטע צוויי יאהר האבען מעהר מענשען באזוכט די קאנ־צערטען און אז א פיל גרעסערע צאהל שפייז און געטרענקע איז פארברויכט געווארען, ווי אין די פערגאנגענע יאה־רען. בפרט נאר ווען מען דערמאנט זיך אז אין 1890 איז „שנאפס" געווען דער פאפולערסטער געטראנק ביי די „פאפס־קאנצערטען", מוז מען קומען צום שלוס אז פראהיבישאן האט גאר ניט געווירקט אויף די קאנצערטען.

ווען די „פאפס־קאנצערטען" זיינען געגרינדעט געווארען, צו פארנעהמען דעם פלאץ פון ווינטער קאנצערטען מיט דער באסטאן סימפאני ארקעסטער אין אלטען מוזיק־האל אויף העמילטאן פלייס איז „ביער, וויין און לייכטע וויין" אזוי פאפולער געווארען צוזאמען מיט דער מוזיק, אז די „פראמענייד־קאנצערטען", ווי מען האט זיי דאן גערופען, זיינען געווארען די איינציגע אמוזירונג פאר מענשען וואס האבען געוואלט פארברייני־גען אן אנגענעהמען זומער־אוונד.

דער קעלער איז געווען פול מיט ביער־פעסלאך, און הונדערטער גלעזער זיינען געווען אויסגעשטעלט אין ליין. די ביער האט געמוזט געצאפט ווערען דורך סטיעם, כדי צו קענען בעפריעדי־גען דעם גרויסען פערלאנג. א גרויסע פייפ האט זיך געצויגען פון בייסמענט צום באר־טיש און דער שאפען האט זיך קיינמאל ניט פערמאכט. אריבער 240 גאלאן ביער פלעגט אויסגעצאפט ווערען יעדע נאכט.

אין יענער צייט ווען עס פלעגט פארקומען א „הארווארד־נאכט" פאר די הארווארד סטודענטען, האט זיך אבגע־טאן חושך. די סטודענטען האבען זיך געווארפען משערס איבער די קעפ און דער ווייטער האט געמוזט ריזיקירען מיט

זיין לעבען צוצוקומען צו א באשטימטע טישעל. אין איינער פון אזעלכע שטור־מישע אווענדע האט דער קאנדוקטאר טימאטהי אדאמאווסקי ניט געקענט ארויסברענגען אזעלכע הויכע טענער מיט זיין ארקעסטער, וועלכע זאלען קע־נען בייקומען דעם ליארם פון עולם. ער איז דאן געווארען אין כעס, האט אוועק־געווארפען זיין שטעקעל, און איז ארונ־טער פון פלאטפארם, רופענדיג דעם גאנ־צען ארקעסטער מיט זיך. עס האט גע־דויערט פולע דריי פירטעל שטונדען ביז וואנען עס איז געלונגען צו בארוהיגען דעם עולם און באוועגען דעם קאנדוק־טאר אז ער זאל ארויס מיט זיין ארקעס־טער און פארטזעצען זיין פראגראם.

נאך בעפאר פראהיבישאן איז גע־ווארען געזעצליך, אין 1890, האט דער פאלים־קאמישאנער צוגענומען די ליי־סענס פון די „פאפס" אויס געוויסע טעכנישע אורזאכען.

א גאנצען סיזאן האבען די „פאפס־קאנצערטען" דערפון געליטען, אבער באלד זיינען טויזענדער מענשען געקו־מען און די צאהל פון באזוכער איז פאר־גרעסערט געווארען.

דאס איז א לעבעדיגער בעווייז, אז די „פאפס־קאנצערטען" זיינען ניט פאפו־לער געווען צוליעב דעם גוטען ביער און וויין וועלכע זיינען אמאל דארט סער־ווירט געווארען נור אז דיזע קאנצערטען זיינען היינט, נאכדעם ווי פראהיבישאן איז אריין אין קראפט, פיעל מעהר פא־פולער געווארען ווי אין די פריהער־דיגע יאהרען פאר די אינהאלטסרייכע מוזיקאלישע פראגראמען וואס ווערען ביי דיזע קאנצערטען אויסגעפירט, — פראגראמען מיט קאמפאזיציעס פון די גרעסטע מוזיקאלישע קלאסיקער, גע־שפיעלט פון אן ארקעסטער לויטער קינסטלער.

עס איז אן אמת'ער פארגעניגען צו פארברייגען א זומער־אוונד אין די „פאפס"!

FORWARD JUNE 11.

Jacchia Favors Opera Selections

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which have now considerably passed the midway point of the present season, has so glorified the Pops during the five summers of his conductorship, that the interest of the program and the beauty of the performances are generally considered to surpass anything the Pops have previously known. The maestro's particular fondness for operatic selections is not surprising, in that, during the larger part of his illustrious career, he has concducted a number of splendid opera companies in many parts of the world.

Every Pops night next week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions, although on Wednesday the English high school will be particularly represented, and on Thursday, Tufts College. Bunker Hill day on Friday will bring a special holiday program.

TRAV. JUNE 11

The Pop Concerts

Every Pop Concert in Symphony Hall next week will be a public occasion and have its particular attractions, although on Wednesday, the 15th, the English High School will be especially represented, and Tufts College on Thursday. Bunker Hill Day on Friday will have a special holiday programme.

TRANS. JUNE 11.

At the Pops Tonight

Charge of the Hussars .... Spindler
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "The Kiss" .... Arditi
Fantasia, "Tales of Hoffmann" ... Offenbach
Finale of "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride" Mozart
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Selection, "The Fortune Teller" . Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song". Strauss
March, "Semper Fidelis" .... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 11.

JACCHIA AT THE POPS

One of the most talented conductors of these times is Agide Jacchia, leader of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which have now well passed the midway point of the present season. It is hardly disputed that the five summers in which he has presided over the famous Pops Orchestra of Symphony players have been unprecedented in the interest of the programs and the zest, authority and general beauty of the performances. The maestro's leanings toward operatic selections are accounted for by his illustrious career as conductor of opera. Since his student days in Italy, when he became a pupil and lifelong friend of Pietro Mascagni, he has conducted every opera of that master and given more than one its first performance. After European successes he toured America with the Milan opera company and later with the Boston National opera company. His four seasons as leader of the splendid opera in Montreal were particularly notable. During two seasons in New York he was principal conductor at the Academy of Music and Century Theatre, respectively. His breadth of musicianship was further revealed when, as the new conductor of the Cecilia Society, he brought forth one of the finest performances of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which was ever heard in Boston.

Every Pops night next week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions, although on Wednesday, the 15th, the English high school will be particularly represented, and Tufts College on Thursday. Bunker Hill day on Friday will bring a special holiday program.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

Overture to "Orpheus" .... Offenbach
Waltz, "A Night in Venice" .... Strauss
"Kammenoi Ostrow" (with organ) .. Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
"Roumanian Rhapsody" .... Enesco
"Aurora" .... Dunham
Cymbal Dance from "Callirhoe" .... Chaminade
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Valse, "Tres Jolie" .... Waldteufel
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.

Hungarian March .... Berlioz
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppe
"The Lost Chord" .... Sullivan
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
From the "Petite Suite" .... Debussy
a, En Bateau, b, Cortege.
Trombone Quartet:
"Serenade"
"The Tear" .... Haerte .... Witt
(Messrs. Hampe, Adam, Mausebach and Kenfield.)
"Dance of the Desert Girls" .... Hadley
"Marche Slave" .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komzak
"Procession of Bacchus" .... Delibes

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15,

English High School Night.

March, "Second Connecticut" .... Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .... Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalerria Rustimana" ... Mascagni
"Second Hungarian Rhapsody" .... Liszt
"Souvenir" .... Drdla
"Pomp and Circumstance" (with organ) .. Elgar
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube". Strauss
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky

THURSDAY, JUNE 16,

Tufts College Night.

"March of the Gladiators" .... Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicola
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
College Songs:
"Tuftonia's Day" .... Hayes '1
"Ain't You Glad" .... Newton '9
"Alma Mater's Day" (new) .... Hayes '1
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmar
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann" . Offenbac
Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin" .... Wagne
College Songs:
"Spell It Out" .... Williams '1
"Dear Alma Mater" .... Lewis '8
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs. ..... Morton '11
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
"Entrance of the Boyards" .... Halvorsen

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.

"Marche Tartare" .... Ganne
Overture to "Fra Diavolo" .... Auber
Waltz, "1001 Nights" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
"Star Spangled Banner"
Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony. Dvorak
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris" .... Mascagni
Night, Dawn, Sunrise.
Grand American Military Fantasy, Arr. by Rollinson
"En Sourdine" .... Tellam
"Invitation to the Dance" .... Weber-Berlioz

SATURDAY, JUNE 18.

March, "The Favorite Regiment" .... Ertl
Overture to "Norma" .... Bellini
Waltz, "Violets" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Triumphal Procession from "Sigurd Jorsalfar" .... Grieg
Violin Solo, "Spanish Dance" .... Sarasate
Julius Theodorowicz
Aragonaise from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ... Tschkaikowsky
Selection, "Lady Billy" .... Levey
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods". Strauss
Bacchanale from "Philemon and Baucis" Gounod

HERAL JUNE 12

AT THE POPS

One of the most talented conductors of drama day is Agide Jacchia, leader of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which have now passed the mid-way point of the present season. It is hardly disputed that in five Summers in which he has presided over the famous Pops Orchestra of Symphony players have been unprecedented in the interest of the performances and the spirit of the performances. The maestro's leanings toward operatic selections are accounted for by his career as conducted of opera. Since his student days in Italy, when he became a pupil and life-long friend of Pietro Mascagni, he has conducted every performance. Every Pops night this week has its particular attraction. Bunker Hill Day on Friday will bring a special holiday program.

ADVER. JUNE 12

The Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall have now passed the mid-way point of the present season.

Every Pops night next week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions, although on Wednesday, the 15th, the English High School will be particularly represented, and Tufts College on Thursday. Bunker Hill Day on Friday will bring a special holiday programme. All performances are open to the public.

POST-JUNE 10

Seventh Week of the Pops

Every evening this week at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall is open to the public, although there are two special nights, for the Boston English High School Wednesday and for Tufts College Thursday. Friday, Bunker Hill Day, the "Star Spangled Banner" will be played in the first intermission, and an American Military Fantasy is included in the program in honor of the holiday.

Three numbers on the Tufts Night program are taken up with college songs. Mr Jacchia has chosen the usual attractive array of operatic and popular music for the other programs. The fact that the present is the most successful season the Pops have yet had is a sufficient tribute to his skill in program making as well as in conducting. The program for Monday follows: Overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; waltz, "A Night in Venice," Strauss; "Kammenoi Ostrow" (with organ), Rubinstein; fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; "Rumanian Rhapsody," Enesco; "Aurora," Dunham; cymbal dance from "Callihoe," Chaminade; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; selection, "L'Oracolo," Leoni; Valse, "Tres Jolie," Waldteufel; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

L.13.7

TONIGHT'S POPS

This program will be played at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony orchestra:

Overture to "Orpheus" .... Offenbach
Waltz, "A Night in Venice" .... Strauss
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ) .... Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Roumanian Rhapsody .... Enesco
Aurora .... Dunham
Cymbal dance from "Callirhoe" .... Chaminade
Overture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tschaikowsky
Selection, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Valse, "Tres Jolie" .... Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa

HERALD-JUNE 13.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following programme will be played at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and the famous Pops Symphony Orchestra:

Overture to "Orpheus" .... Offenbach
Waltz, "A Night in Venice" .... Strauss
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ) .... Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .... Puccini
Rumanian Rhapsody .... Enesco
Aurora .... Dunham
Cymbal Dance from "Callirhoe" .... Chaminade
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "L'Oracolo" .... Leoni
Valse, "Tres Jolie" .... Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa

POST JUNE 13.

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

For the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall tonight, which is a public occasion although the Graduate Nurses hereabouts will assemble in goodly numbers, Agide Jacchia and the splendid Pops Symphony Orchestra will present the following program:

Hungarian March .... Berlio
Hungarian March .... Berlioz
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppe
The Lost Chord .... Sullivan
Solo Trumpet, Georges Mager
Fantasia "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
From the "Petite Suite" .... Debussy
(a) En Bateau.
(b) Cortege.
Trombone Quartet:
(a) Serenade .... Haertel
(b) The Tear .... Witt
(Messrs Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield.)
Dance of the Desert Girls .... Hadley
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komzak
Procession of Bacchus .... Delibes

TO ATTEND POPS.

Tomorrow evening English High School night will be observed at the Pop concert. Arthur L. Norton, '86, chairman of the Pop committee, has had charge of the arrangements, and Carlos Penfield, '06, who has played at the Boston Symphony for several years, will be in attendance. There will be singing of the old school songs under the leadership of Richard W. Grant.

AMER. JUNE 14.

At the Pops Tonight

1. Hungarian March .... Berlios
2. Overture to "Poet and Peasant" Suppé
3. The Lost Chord, solo trumpet, Georges Mager .... Sullivan
4. Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
5. From the "Petite Suite" (a) En Bateau, (b) Cortège .... Debussy
6. Trombone Quartet—
   (a) Serenade .... Haertel
   (b) The Tear .... Witt
   (Messrs. Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield)
7. Dance of the Desert Girls .. Hadley
8. Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
9. Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
10. Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .. Komzak
11. Procession of Bacchus ...... Delibes

Conductor: A Jacchia

S. JUNE 14.

Tufts Night at the Pops

March of the Gladiators .... Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
College Songs:
Tuftonia's Day .... Hayes '16
Ain't You Glad? .... Newton '90
Alma Mater's Day .... Hayes '16
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
College Songs:
Spell It Out .... Williams '19
Dear Alma Mater .... A Lewis '87
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs, Morton '11
Prelude .... Rakhmannov
Entrance of the Boyards ...... Halvorsen

Conductor: A Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE

Elli, Elli,
(Arranged for orchestra by Jacchia)
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"..........Wagner
Selection from the Filene show "Home Brew"..........R. L. Harlow
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"..........Vollstedt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony.Tschaikowsky

Saturday

Charge of the Hussars..........Spindler
Overture to "Mignon"..........Thomas
Waltz, "The Kiss"..........Arditi
Fantasia, "The Tales of Hoffmann".Offenbach
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Valse Triste..........Sibelius
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride".....Mozart
Ride of the Valkyries..........Wagner
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".......Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"......Strauss
March, "Semper Fidelis"..........Sousa

HERALD-JUNE 5.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Y. W. C. A.

THE Young Women's Christian Association has taken all the seats for this evening and no places are available for the general public.

TRANS. JUNE 6.

At the Pops Tonight

Operatic Programme

Cortège from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onégin," Chaikovsky
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"..Puccini
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..........Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saëns
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleopatra's Night," Hadley
Selection, "Carmen"..........Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS-JUNE 7-

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Institute of Technology

French Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"....Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues"...Gage '22
Rhapsody, "España"........Chabrier
Minuet..........Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"........Verdi
"Tech" Songs..........
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball" Czibulka
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever"..........Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE. 8.

OPERATIC PROGRAM AT POPS TONIGHT

Always in high favor at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall is the operatic program, which will be given tonight. In no field of music is Conductor Agide Jacchia more finely equipped, for he has conducted many opera companies in his day. The program follows:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"....Verdi
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin"...Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"........Puccini
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" Wagner
Dance of the Priestesses from "Samson and Delilah"..........Saint-Saens
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "Cleopatra's Night"..Hadley
Selection, "Carmen"..........Bizet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer

AMER JUNE 7,

TECH NIGHT AT POPS

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will have its annual night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. This occasion is also open to the public. The following program will be played:

French Military March.......Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"........Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues".......Gage '22
Rhapsody, "Espana"..........Chabrier
Minuet..........Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"..........Verdi
"Tech" Songs (with organ)
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball"...Czibulka
Stars and Stripes Forever..........Sousa

HERALD-JUNE 8.

TECH NIGHT AT THE POPS

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will have its annual night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall tonight. On this occasion, which is also open to the public, the following programme will be played:

French Military March..........Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"..........Waldteufel
Sketch, "Happiness Blues"........Gage, '22
Rhapsody, "Espana"..........Chabrier
Minuet..........Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"..........Verdi
"Tech" Songs (with organ)
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..Mascagni
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ....Czibulka
Stars and Stripes Forever..........Sousa

POST JUNE 8.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, members of Euclid lodge being particularly represented, Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra will present this program:

Military Polonaise.......Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss
Aria, "Cieloee Mar" from "La Gioconda"..........Ponchielli
(Mr. Charles Stratton)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Finlandia..........Sibelius
Solo for organ with orchestra..Boellman
Fantaisie Dialoguee
(Mr. Homer Humphrey)
Elli, Elli
(Arranged for orchestra by Agide Jacchit)
Overture to "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Selection from the Filene show, "Home Brew"..........R. L. Harlow
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"..........Vollstedt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky

HERALD-JUNE 9

At the Pops Tonight

Military Polonaise......Chopin-Glazunov
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss
Aria, "Cielo E Mar," from "La Gioconda"..........Ponchielli
(Charles Stratton)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns
Finlandia..........Sibelius
Solo for Organ with Orchestra..Böllman
(Homer Humphrey)
Eili, Eili,
Arranged for Orchestra by Agide Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhäuser"......Wagner
Selection from the Filene Show, "Home Brew"........R. L. Harlow
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".......Vollstedt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony, Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 9.

האט פראהיבישאן געווירקט אויף דער פאפולאריטעט פון דיא „פאפס-קאנצערטען.

די בארימטע באסטאנער אינסטיטוציע, די „פאפס-קאנצערטען“ אין סימפאני האל, האט דורכגעלעבט זעהר פיעל ענדערונגען פון דער צייט ווען זי איז געגרינדעט געווארען אין 1885. ווען פראהיבישאן איז געווארען א געזעץ, האבען מאנכע געדיינקט אז די „פאפס-קאנצערטען“ וועלען רעוואלוציאניזירט ווערען און אנדערע ווידער האבען געגלויבט אז די קאנצערטען וועלען אונטערגעהן. אויסגעלאזט האט זיך פונקט פארקעהרט.

ווען די „ביל און פעיר“ איז אלס רעזולטאט פון פראהיבישאן געענדערט געווארען אין פריהלינג פון 1919, האט דיזע ענדערונג ניט געווירקט אויף אזוי וויט, אז עס זאל זיך ארויסזעהן א שאדען וואס קען פארדונקלען די היסטאריע פון דער ערפאלגרייכער עקזיסטענץ פון דיזע קאנצערטען.

די ביכער פון דער פערוואלטונג בעווייזען אז זייט די לעצטע צוויי יאהר האבען מעהר מענשען באזוכט די קאנצערטען און אז א פיל גרעסערע צאהל שפייז און געטרענקע איז פארברויכט געווארען, ווי אין די פערגאנגענע יאהרען. בפרט נאך ווען מען דערמאנט זיך אז אין 1890 איז „שנאפס“ געווען דער פאפולערסטער געטראנק ביי די „פאפס-קאנצערטען“, מוז מען קומען צום שלום אז פראהיבישאן האט גאר ניט געווירקט אויף די קאנצערטען.

ווען די „פאפס-קאנצערטען“ זיינען געגרינדעט געווארען, צו פארנעהמען דעם פלאץ פון ווינטער קאנצערטען מיט דער באסטאן סימפאני ארקעסטער אין אלטען מוזיק-האל אויף העמילטאן פליים איז „ביער, וויין און לייכטע וויין“ אזוי פאפולער געווארען צוזאמען מיט דער מוזיק, אז די „פראמענייד-קאנצערטען“, ווי מען האט זיי דאן גערופען, זיינען געווארען די איינציגע אמוזירונג פאר מענשען וואס האבען געוואלט פארברייגגען אן אנגענעהמען זומער-אווענד.

דער קעלער איז געווען פול מיט ביער-פעסלאך, און הונדערטער גלעזער זיינען געווען אויסגעשטעלט אין ליין. די ביער האט געמוזט געצאפט ווערען דורך סטיעם, כדי צו קענען בעפריעדיגען דעם גרויסען פערלאנג. א גרויסע פויפ האט זיך געצויגען פון בייסמענט צום באר-טיש און דער שאפען האט זיך קיינמאל ניט פערמאכט. אריבער 240 גאלאן ביער פלעגט אויסגעצאפט ווערען יעדע נאכט.

אין יענער צייט ווען עס פלעגט פארקומען א „הארווארד-נאכט“ פאר די הארווארד סטודענטען, האט זיך אבגעטוען חושך. די סטודענטען האבען זיך געווארפען טשערס איבער די קעפ און דער וויימער האט געמוזט ריזיקירען מיט זיין לעבען צוצוקומען צו א באשטימטען טישעל. אין איינער פון אזעלכע שטורמישע אווענדען האט דער קאנדוקטאר טימאטהי אדאמאווסקי ניט געקענט ארויסברענגען אזעלכע הויכע טענער מיט זיין ארקעסטער, וועלכע זאלען קענען בייקומען דעם ליארם פון עולם. ער איז דאן געווארען אין כעס, האט אוועקגעווארפען זיין שטעקעל, און איז ארונטער פון פלאטפארם, רופענדיג דעם גאנצען ארקעסטער מיט זיך. עס האט געדויערט פולע דריי פירטעל שטונדען ביז וואנען עס איז געלינגען צו בארוהיגען דעם עולם און באוועגען דעם קאנדוקטאר אז ער זאל ארויס מיט זיין ארקעסטער און פארטזעצען זיין פראגראם.

נאך בעפאר פראהיבישאן איז געווארען געזעצליך, אין 1890, האט דער פאליס-קאמישאנער צוגענומען די ליייסענס פון די „פאפס“ אוים געוויסע טעכנישע אורזאכען.

א גאנצען סיזאן האבען די „פאפס-קאנצערטען“ דערפון געליטען, אבער באלד זיינען טויזענדער מענשען געקומען און די צאהל פון באזוכער איז פארגרעסערט געווארען.

דאס איז א לעבעדיגער בעוויז, אז די „פאפס-קאנצערטען“ זיינען ניט פאפולער געווען צוליעב דעם גוטען ביער און וויין וועלכע זיינען אמאל דארט סערווירט געווארען נור אז דיזע קאנצערטען זיינען היינט, נאכדעם ווי פראהיבישאן איז ארייין אין קראפט, פיעל מעהר פאפולערער געווארען ווי אין די פריהערדיגע יאהרען פאר די אינהאלטסרייכע מוזיקאלישע פראגראמען וואס ווערען ביי דיזע קאנצערטען אויסגעפירט, — פראגראמען מיט קאמפאזיציעס פון די גרעסטע מוזיקאלישע קלאסיקער, געשפיעלט פון אן ארקעסטער לויטער קינסטלער.

עס איז אן אמת'ער פארגעניגען צו פארברייינגען א זומער-אווענד אין די „פאפס“ !

FORWARD JUNE 11.

Jacchia Favors Opera Selections

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which have now considerably passed the midway point of the present season, has so glorified the Pops during the five summers of his conductorship, that the interest of the program and the beauty of the performances are generally considered to surpass anything the Pops have previously known. The maestro's particular fondness for operatic selections is not surprising, in that, during the larger part of his illustrious career, he has conducted a number of splendid opera companies in many parts of the world.

Every Pops night next week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions, although on Wednesday the English high school will be particularly represented, and on Thursday, Tufts College. Bunker Hill day on Friday will bring a special holiday program.

TRAV. JUNE. 11

The Pop Concerts

Every Pop Concert in Symphony Hall next week will be a public occasion and have its particular attractions, although on Wednesday, the 15th, the English High School will be especially represented, and Tufts College on Thursday. Bunker Hill Day on Friday will have a special holiday programme.

TRANS. JUNE 11.

At the Pops Tonight

Charge of the Hussars..........Spindler
Overture to "Mignon"..........Thomas
Waltz, "The Kiss"..........Arditi
Fantasia, "Tales of Hoffmann"... Offenbach
Finale of "Scheherazade"........ Rimsky-Korsakoff
Valse Triste..........Sibelius
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride". Mozart
Ride of the Valkyries..........Wagner
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song". Strauss
March, "Semper Fidelis"........Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 11.

JACCHIA AT THE POPS

One of the most talented conductors of these times is Agide Jacchia, leader of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which have now well passed the midway point of the present season. It is hardly disputed that the five summers in which he has presided over the famous Pops Orchestra of Symphony players have been unprecedented in the interest of the programs and the zest, authority and general beauty of the performances. The maestro's leanings toward operatic selections are accounted for by his illustrious career as conductor of opera. Since his student days in Italy, when he became a pupil and lifelong friend of Pietro Mascagni, he has conducted every opera of that master and given more than one its first performance. After European successes he toured America with the Milan opera company and later with the Boston National opera company. His four seasons as leader of the splendid opera in Montreal were particularly notable. During two seasons in New York he was principal conductor at the Academy of Music and Century Theatre, respectively. His breadth of musicianship was further revealed when, as the new conductor of the Cecilia Society, he brought forth one of the finest performances of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which was ever heard in Boston.

Every Pops night next week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions, although on Wednesday, the 15th, the English high school will be particularly represented, and Tufts College on Thursday. Bunker Hill day on Friday will bring a special holiday program.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

Overture to "Orpheus"..........Offenbach
Waltz, "A Night in Venice"..........Strauss
"Kammenoi Ostrow" (with organ)..Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"..........Puccini
"Roumanian Rhapsody"..........Enesco
"Aurora"..........Dunham
Cymbal Dance from "Callirhoe"....Chaminade
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "L'Oracolo"..........Leoni
Valse, "Tres Jolie"..........Waldteufel
"Stars and Stripes Forever"..........Sousa

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.

Hungarian March..........Berlioz
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"........Suppe
"The Lost Chord"..........Sullivan
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
From the "Petite Suite"..........Debussy
a, En Bateau. b, Cortege.
Trombone Quartet:
"Serenade"
"The Tear"..........Haerte
..........Witt
(Messrs. Hampe, Adam, Mausebach and Kenfield.)
"Dance of the Desert Girls"..........Hadley
"Marche Slave"..........Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"..........Komzak
"Procession of Bacchus"..........Delibes

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15.

English High School Night.
March, "Second Connecticut"..........Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalerria Rustimana"....Mascagni
"Second Hungarian Rhapsody"..........Liszt
"Souvenir"..........Drdla
"Pomp and Circumstance" (with organ)..Elgar
Overture, "William Tell"..........Rossini
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky

THURSDAY, JUNE 16.

Tufts College Night.
"March of the Gladiators"..........Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicola Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Straus
College Songs:
"Tuftonia's Day"..........Hayes '1
"Ain't You Glad"..........Newton '9
"Alma Mater's Day" (new)........Hayes '1
Overture to "Sakuntala"..........Goldmar
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann".Offenbac
Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin"..........Wagne
College Songs:
"Spell It Out"..........Williams '1
"Dear Alma Mater"..........Lewis '8
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs......Morton '11
Prelude..........Rachmaninoff
"Entrance of the Boyards"..........Halvorsen

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.

"Marche Tartare"..........Ganne
Overture to "Fra Diavolo"..........Auber
Waltz, "1001 Nights"..........Strauss
Fantasia, "Othello"..........Verdi
"Star Spangled Banner"
Prelude to "Carmen"..........Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.Dvorak
"Ride of the Valkyries"..........Wagner
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris"......Mascagni
Night, Dawn, Sunrise.
Grand American Military Fantasy, Arr. by Rollinson
"En Sourdine"..........Tellam
"Invitation to the Dance"........Weber-Berlioz

SATURDAY, JUNE 18.

March, "The Favorite Regiment"........Ertl
Overture to "Norma"..........Bellini
Waltz, "Violets"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Triumphal Procession from "Sigurd Jorsalfar"..........Grieg
Violin Solo, "Spanish Dance"........Sarasate
Julius Theodorowicz
Aragonaise from "Carmen"..........Bizet
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tschkaikowsky
Selection, "Lady Billy"..........Levey
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods".Strauss
Bacchanale from "Philemon and Baucis" Gounod

HERAL JUNE 12

AT THE POPS

One of the most talented conductors of drama day is Agide Jacchia, leader of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, which have now passed the mid-way point of the present season. It is hardly disputed that in five Summers in which he has presided over the famous Pops Orchestra of Symphony players have been unprecedented in the interest of the performances and the spirit of the performances. The maestro's leanings toward operatic selections are accounted for by his career as conducted of opera. Since his student days in Italy, when he became a pupil and life-long friend of Pietro Mascagni, he has conducted every performance. Every Pops night this week has its particular attraction. Bunker Hill Day on Friday will bring a special holiday program.

ADVER. JUNE 12

The Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall have now passed the mid-way point of the present season.

Every Pops night next week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions, although on Wednesday, the 15th, the English High School will be particularly represented, and Tufts College on Thursday. Bunker Hill Day on Friday will bring a special holiday programme. All performances are open to the public.

POST-JUNE 12

Seventh Week of the Pops

Every evening this week at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall is open to the public, although there are two special nights, for the Boston English High School Wednesday and for Tufts College Thursday. Friday, Bunker Hill Day, the "Star Spangled Banner" will be played in the first intermission, and an American Military Fantasy is included in the program in honor of the holiday.

Three numbers on the Tufts Night program are taken up with college songs. Mr Jacchia has chosen the usual attractive array of operatic and popular music for the other programs. The fact that the present is the most successful season the Pops have yet had is a sufficient tribute to his skill in program making as well as in conducting. The program for Monday follows: Overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; waltz, "A Night in Venice," Strauss; "Kammenoi Ostrow" (with organ), Rubinstein; fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; "Rumanian Rhapsody," Enesco; "Aurora," Dunham; cymbal dance from "Callihoe," Chaminade; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; selection, "L'Oracolo," Leoni; Valse, "Tres Jolie," Waldteufel; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

TONIGHT'S POPS

This program will be played at the pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony orchestra:

Overture to "Orpheus"..........Offenbach
Waltz, "A Night in Venice"..........Strauss
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ) Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"......Puccini
Roumanian Rhapsody..........Enesco
Aurora..........Dunham
Cymbal dance from "Callirhoe" Chaminade
Overture Solennelle, "1812"..Tschaikowsky
Selection, "L'Oracolo"..........Leoni
Valse, "Tres Jolie"..........Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever..........Sousa

HERALD-JUNE 13.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following programme will be played at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and the famous Pops Symphony Orchestra:

Overture to "Orpheus"..........Offenbach
Waltz, "A Night in Venice"..........Strauss
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ)......Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"..........Puccini
Rumanian Rhapsody..........Enesco
Aurora..........Dunham
Cymbal Dance from "Callirhoe"....Chaminade
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tschaikowsky
Selection, "L'Oracolo"..........Leoni
Valse, "Tres Jolie"..........Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever..........Sousa

JUNE 13.

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

For the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall tonight, which is a public occasion although the Graduate Nurses hereabouts will assemble in goodly numbers, Agide Jacchia and the splendid Pops Symphony Orchestra will present the following program:

Hungarian March..........Berlioz
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..........Suppe
The Lost Chord..........Sullivan
Solo Trumpet, Georges Mager
Fantasia "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
From the "Petite Suite"..........Debussy
(a) En Bateau.
(b) Cortege.
Trombone Quartet:
(a) Serenade..........Haertel
(b) The Tear..........Witt
(Messrs Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield.)
Dance of the Desert Girls..........Hadley
Marche Slave..........Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"..........Komzak
Procession of Bacchus..........Delibes

TO ATTEND POPS.

Tomorrow evening English High School night will be observed at the Pop concert. Arthur L. Norton, '86, chairman of the Pop committee, has had charge of the arrangements, and Carlos Penfield, '06, who has played at the Boston Symphony for several years, will be in attendance. There will be singing of the old school songs under the leadership of Richard W. Grant.

JUNE, 14.

At the Pops Tonight

1. Hungarian March..........Berlioz
2. Overture to "Poet and Peasant" Suppé
3. The Lost Chord, solo trumpet, Georges Mager..........Sullivan
4. Fantasia, "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
5. From the "Petite Suite" (a) En Bateau, (b) Cortège..........Debussy
6. Trombone Quartet—
   (a) Serenade..........Haertel
   (b) The Tear..........Witt
   (Messrs. Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield)
7. Dance of the Desert Girls..Hadley
8. Marche Slave..........Tschaikowsky
9. Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna"..........Wolf-Ferrari
10. Waltz, "Girls of Baden"..........Komzak
11. Procession of Bacchus.....Delibes

Conductor: A Jacchia

JUNE 14.

Tufts Night at the Pops

March of the Gladiators..........Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"..........Nicolai
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Strauss
College Songs:
Tuftonia's Day..........Hayes '16
Ain't You Glad?..........Newton '90
Alma Mater's Day..........Hayes '16
Overture to "Sakuntala"..........Goldmark
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann."..........Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
College Songs:
Spell It Out..........Williams '19
Dear Alma Mater..........Lewis '87
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs. Morton '11
Prelude..........Rakhmaninov
Entrance of the Boyards..........Halvorsen

Conductor: A Jacchia

JUNE 1

SYMPHONY
the Boston S
four years started of a certs in light of year. Th
enade concer certs of Euro would stroll ridors during the public sc
Pops, and th that it was institution o
other cities many times
young as we tastes of 192
by Agide Ja making his night of occasion an tractions

At the P

March Tartare.
Overture to "Fr Waltz, "Thousa
Fantasia, "Othe
"The Star Spang
Prelude to "Ca
Largo from the
phony
Ride of the Va
Hymn to the Su
Grand American
En Sourdine.
Invitation to the Conduc

TONIG

The following
by Agide Jacchia
March, "The F
Waltz, "Violets"
Fantasia,
Triumphal
Violin Solo, Spanish
Julius Aragonaise from "C
Overture Solennelle,
Selection, "Lady Bil Waltz, "Tales from Bacchanale from [13]

T'S POPS

rogram will be played at the cert in Symphony Hall tonight
e Jacchia and the Pops Sym-orchestra:
to "Orpheus" .... Offenbach
"A Night in Venice" .... Strauss
noi Ostrew (with organ) .... Strauss
"Manon Lescaut" .... Rubinstein
ian Rhapsody .... Puccini
.... Enesco
dance from "Callirhoe" .... Dunham Solennelle, "1812" .... Chaminade
"L'Oracolo" .... Tschaikowsky
"Tres Jolie" .... Leoni
and Stripes Forever .... Waldteufel
.... Sousa

RALD-JUNE 13.

THE POPS TONIGHT

llowing programme will be played at Concert in Symphony Hall tonight by acchia and the famous Pops Symphony.
to "Orpheus" .... Offenbach
A Night in Venice" .... Strauss
Ostrow (with organ) .... Strauss
"Manon Lescaut" .... Rubinstein
an Rhapsody .... Puccini
.... Enesco
Dance from "Callirhoe" .... Dunham
e Solennelle, "1812" .... Chaminade
"L'Oracolo" .... Tschaikowsky
es Jolie" .... Leoni
d Stripes Forever .... Waldteufel
.... Sousa

ST-JUNE 13.

S PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

e Pop Concert at Symphony night, which is a public oc-though the Graduate Nurses will assemble in goodly Agide Jacchia and the d Pops Symphony Orchestra
esent the following program:
March .... Berlio
March .... Berlioz
"Poet and Peasant" .... Suppe
Chord .... Sullivan
Trumpet, Georges Mager
Lohengrin .... Wagner
"Petite Suite" .... Debussy
Bateau.
Quartet:
Serenade .... Haertel
The Tear .... Witt
Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield.) of the Desert Girls .... Hadley Slave .... Tschaikowsky
"The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
"Girls of Baden" .... Komsak of Bacchus .... Delibes

ATTEND POPS.

morrow evening English High night will be observed at the concert. Arthur L. Norton, '86, of the Pop committee, has
of the arrangements, and Penfield, '06, who has played Boston Symphony for several will be in attendance. There be singing of the old school under the leadership of Rich-
W. Grant.

MER. JUNE 14.

At the Pops Tonight

1. Hungarian March .... Berlioz
2. Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppé
3. The Lost Chord, solo trumpet, Georges Mager .... Sullivan
4. Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
5. From the "Petite Suite" (a) En Bateau, (b) Cortège .... Debussy
6. Trombone Quartet—
   (a) Serenade .... Haertel
   (b) The Tear .... Witt
   (Messrs. Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield)
7. Dance of the Desert Girls .... Hadley
8. Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
9. Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
10. Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .... Komsak
11. Procession of Bacchus .... Delibes

Conductor: A Jacchia

TRANS, JUNE 14.

Tufts Night at the Pops

arch of the Gladiators .... Fucik verture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai altz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss ollege Songs:
Tuftonia's Day .... Hayes '16
Ain't You Glad? .... Newton '90
Alma Mater's Day .... Hayes '16
verture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark election, "Tales of Hoffmann," .... Offenbach rocession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
ollege Songs:
Spell It Out .... Williams '19
Dear Alma Mater .... A Lewis '87
edley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs. .... Morton '11
Prelude .... Rakhmannov
ntrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

Conductor: A Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 1

TUFTS NIGHT AT POPS

The annual celebration of Tufts College at the Pops will take place in Symphony Hall tonight. This, however, will only further enliven a Pop concert of general interest. The programme follows:

March of the Gladiators .... Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
College Songs:
a. "Tuftonia's Day," Hayes, '16.
b. "Ain't You Glad?" Newton, '90.
c. "Alma Mater's Day," Hayes, '16.
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann" .... Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
College Songs:
a. "Spell It Out," Williams, '19.
b. "Dear Alma Mater," Lewis, '87.
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs, Morton, '11
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halversen

POST. JUNE 1

TUFTS NIGHT AT THE POPS

The annual celebration of Tufts College at the Pops will take place in Symphony Hall tonight. The programme follows:

March of the Gladiators .... Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .... Strauss
College Songs
a. Tuftonia's Day .... Hayes '16
b. Ain't You Glad? .... Newton '90
c. Alma Mater's Day .... Hayes '16
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Selection, "Tales of Hoffman" .... Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
College Songs ....
a. Spell It Out .... Williams '19
b. Dear Alma Mater .... Lewis '87
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs .... Morton '11
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen

AMER. 16

SYMPHONY HALL—In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the promenade concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermissions. But the public soon christened them The Pops, and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted. This institution of many summers, which other cities have tried to imitate many times but without success, is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. Every Pops night of the week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions.

HINGHAM JOURNAL - JUNE 17

At the Pops Tonight

March Tartare .... Ganne
Overture to "Fra Diavolo," .... Auber
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights," .... Strauss
Fantasia, "Othello" .... Verdi
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony .... Dvorak
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris" .... Mascagni
Grand American Military Fantasy, ... Rollinson
En Sourdine .... Tellam
Invitation to the Dance .... Weber-Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRAV JUN 17.

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following programme will be presented by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Orchestra at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "The Favorite Regiment" .... Ertl
Overture to "Norma" .... Bellini
Waltz, "Violets" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Triumphal Procession from "Sigurd Jorsalfar" .... Grieg
Violin Solo, Spanish Dance .... Sarasate
Julius Theodorowicz
Aragonaise from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Lady Billy" .... Levy
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" .... Strauss
Bacchanale from "Philemon and Baucis" .... Gounod

POST JUN 6.

"Pops"

Only three weeks remain of the present season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. On hot nights and cool nights alike, the splendid music and plentiful refreshments which the Pops provide bring enjoyment and relaxation to all of musical and sociable Boston under Agide Jacchia's excellent direction. Voices involuntarily drop to a whisper before the entrancing strains of the famous Pops orchestra of Symphony players and more lengthy remarks are saved for the intermissions. On Tuesday of the coming week will occur the Italian-Verdi program, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, with numbers to be sung by pupils and faculty.

TRAV JUNE 18

THE POPS

In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "Promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermissions. But the public soon christened them "The Pops", and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted. This institution of many summers, which other cities have tried to imitate many times without success, is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor of the Pops, in making his programmes.

END OF POPS IN THREE WEEKS

But three weeks remain of the present season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, the largest so far in attendance and poplarity. On hot nights and cool nights alike, the splendid music and plentiful refreshments which the Pops provide bring enjoyment and relaxation to all of musical and sociable Boston. So persuasive is Agide Jacchia's magnetic baton that discussion as to whether Pops' audiences might talk during the music has become a thing of the past. Voices involuntarily drop to a whisper before the entrancing strains of the famous Pops orchestra of symphony players, and more lengthy remarks are saved for the intermissions.

The Italian-Verdi program of Tuesday, June 21, follows:

Prologue to "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" .... Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise.
Fantasia, "Ballo in Maschere" .... Verdi
Quartet from "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Prelude to "Aida" .... Verdi
Fantasia, "Otello" .... Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Verdi
Waltz, "Le Sarah Rose" .... Casella
Marcia Reale Italiana .... Arditi
.... Cabetti

AMER. JUNE 18.

Eighth Week of the Pops

The special nights at the Pops th week are New England Conservator Monday; Italian-Verdi program, Tue day, and Insurance Society of Massach setts, Friday. For these and the othe evenings Mr Jacchia has put togethe the usual agreeable miscellanies. Th numbers for tomorrow night ar French military March, Saint-Saen overture to "Mignon," Thomas; waltz from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Straus Fantasia, "Tosca," Puccini; symphon ballad, "Tam O'Shanter" (conducted the composer), Chadwick; Air of Lepa ello from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; ove ture to "The Mastersingers of Nure berg," Wagner; quartet from "Rigole to," act 3, Verdi; rhapsody, "Italia Casella; Hindu song from "Sadko Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Cortege de Ba chus," Delibes.

GLOBE JUNE 19

The Pops Soon to End

Only three weeks remain of the prese season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Ha On Tuesday of the coming week will occ the Italian-Verdi programme, one of t most popular of all, as conducted by Agi Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to t New England Conservatory of Music, wi numbers to be sung by pupils and facult Although the Insurance Society of Mass chusetts will attend the Pops on Frida this and each night of the week will be op to the public.

TRANS. JUNE 18

POPS NEARING CLOSE

The season of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall, being seven weeks old, with but three remaining, has broken all previous records. The heat scarcely penetrates into the cool spaces of Symphony, where splendid music and ice refreshments furnish relaxation and enjoyment to all. Next Tuesday night will have an Italian-Verdi program, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Tomorrow night will have special New England Conservatory of Music features. Every night of the week is open to the public.

ADVERTISER JUNE 19.

Pops Nearing Close

The season of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall is seven weeks old, with but three remaining. On Tuesday of the coming week will occur the Italian-Verdi programme, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, with numbers to be sung by pupils and faculty. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will attend the Pops on Friday, this and each night of the week will be open to the public.

POST-JUNE 19.

POPS NEARING CLOSE

The season of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall, being seven weeks old, with but three remaining, each week to date has exceeded the preceding in attendance and all previous records have been broken. Indeed, the heat scarcely penetrates into the cool spaces of Symphony Hall, where, whether the night be warm or mild, splendid music and iced refreshments plentifully abound and give relaxation and enjoyment to all.

There used to be much discussion as to whether Pop-goers might talk during the music. Now there is nothing to argue about. So magnetic is the persuasion of Agide Jacchia's leadership, and so entrancing the strains which come from the famous Pops Symphony orchestra, that voices involuntarily drop to an occasional whisper, and substantial remarks are withheld by preference until the pauses between numbers.

On Tuesday of the coming week will occur the Italian-Verdi program, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, with numbers to be sung by pupils and faculty. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will attend the Pops on Friday, this and each night of the week will be open to the public.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 20,

New England Conservatory of Music.

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" .... R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" .... Puccini
Symphonic Ballad, "Tam o'Shanter" .... Chadwick
(Conducted by the composer)
Air of Leparello "Madamina" from Act 1, "Don Giovanni" .... Mozart
(Charles Bennett)
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto," Act III .... Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Hindu Song from "Sadko" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Cortege de Bacchus .... Delibes

TUESDAY, JUNE 21,

Italian-Verdi Program

Prologue to "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" .... Mascagni
Night, Dawn, Sunrise.
Fantasia, "Ballo in Maschere" .... Verdi
Quartet from "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Prelude to "Aida" .... Verdi
Fantasia, "Otello" .... Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Waltz, "Le Saran Rose" .... Arditi
Marcia Reale Italiana .... Cabetti

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"Elli, Elli" .... Arr by Jacchia
"Whispering of the Flowers" .... Blon
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wagner
Selection, "Eva" .... Lehar
Bandana Sketches (Negro Spirituals)
"Nobody Knows De Trouble I've Seen"
Negro Dance
"Procession of the Sardar" .... Ippolito-Ivanoff

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.

March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Marche Miniature .... Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo .... Carroll
Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla, from "Das Rheingold" .... Wagner
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Serenade .... Toselli
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 5) .... Brahms

FRIDAY, JUNE 24,

Insurance Society of Massachusetts Night.

Military Polonaise .... Chopin-Glazounoff
Overture, "Le Roi l'a dit" .... Delibes
Waltz, "Espana" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen" .... Bizet
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
a, Morning Mood. b, In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Largo .... Handel
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; organ, harp and strings.
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" .... Kreisler-Jacobi
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar

SATURDAY, JUNE 25.

March from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Overture "Maximilian Robespierre" .... Litoff
The Last Days of the "Terror"
Orientale .... Cui
(Arranged by Gustave Strube)
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba" .... Goldmark
Solo violoncello, Joseph Keller
Enfantillage, "Children at Play" .... Van Westerhout
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
Roumanian Rhapsody .... Enesco
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor" .... Donizetti
Waltz, "Jolly Sisters" .... Vollstedt
Rakoczy March .... Berlioz

HERALD, JUNE 19.

CONSERVATORY NIGHT AT POPS

The New England Conservatory of Music will celebrate their annual Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program is of particular interest to the general public. The numbers follow:

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" .... R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" .... Puccini
Symphonic Ballad, "Tam O'Shanter" .... Chadwick
Conducted by the composer.
Air of Leparello "Madamina" from Act 1, "Don Giovanni" .... Mozart
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto," Act III .... Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Hindu Song from "Sadko" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Cortege de Bacchus .... Delibes

AMER JUNE 20

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The New England Conservatory of Music will celebrate its annual Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The programme is of particular musical interest to the general public. The numbers follow:

French Military March .... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" .... R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" .... Puccini
Symphonic ballad, "Tam o' Shanter" .... Chadwick
Conducted by the composer.
Air of Leparello, "Madamina," from Act 1, "Don Giovanni" .... Mozart
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto," Act III .... Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Hindu song from "Sadko" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Cortege de Bacchus .... Delibes

POST-JUNE 20.

Italian Club to Have Pops' Night

(Photograph by Marceau)

Mrs. Frank Sordillo, chairman of the entertainment committee of the Women's Italian Club.

The Women's Italian Club has completed plans for a Pop Concert to be given tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall, Huntington avenue. From the large advance sale or tickets a record-breaking attendance is anticipated. Mrs. Frank Sordillo, chairman of the entertainment committee, is in charge of the arrangements. The proceeds will be used in the charity relief work of the organization.

TRAV. JUNE 20.

At the Pops Tonight

Italian-Verdi Programme

Prologue to "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavalla
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" .... Mascagni
Night, Dawn, Sunrise.
Fantasia, "Ballo in Maschere" .... Verdi
Quartette from "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Prelude to "Aida" .... Verdi
Fantasia, "Otello" .... Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Waltz, "Le Saran Rose" .... Arditi
Marcia Reale Italiana .... Cabetti

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 21.

THE POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of symphony players will present this program:

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Elli, Elli (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Whispering of the Flowers .... Blon
Closing scene from "Des Rheingold" .... Wagner
Selection, "Eva" .... Lehar
Bandana Sketches (Negro spirituels) .... White
(a) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."
(b) Negro Dance.
Procession of the Sardar. .... Ippolitoff-Ivanof

HERALD-JUNE 2

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his famous orchestra of symphony players will present the following programme:

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Elli, Elli (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Whispering of the Flowers .... Blon
Closing Scene from "Das Rheingold" .... Wagner
Selection, "Eva" .... Lehar
Bandana Sketches (Negro Spirituels) .... White
"Nobody Knows De Trouble I've Seen"
Negro Dance
Procession of the Sardar .... Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

POST-JUNE 22.

At the Pops Tonight

March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone" .... Waldtenfel
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Marche Miniature .... Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo .... Carroll
Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla, from "Das Rheingold" .... Wagner
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Serenade .... Toselli
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 5). .... Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 23

[132]

TONIGHT'S POPS

This program will be played at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra:

March, "Lorraine" .... Ganne
Overture to "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Pugliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Marche Miniature .... Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo .... Carroll
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wagner
Fantasia, "Mephistofele" .... Boito
Serenade .... Toselli
Hungarian Dance in G minor, No. 5 .... Brahms

HERALD-JUNE 23.

At the Pops Tonight

Military Polonaise .... Chopin-Glazounoff
Overture, "Le Roi l'a dit" .... Delibes
Waltz, "Espana" .... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Morning Mood—In the Hall of the Mountain King, from the Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
Largo .... Handel
Solo violin (J. Theodorowicz), organ, harp and strings
Prelude .... Rachmaninoff
Overture, "1812" .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Apple Blossoms," .... Kreisler-Jacobi
Kammenoi Ostrow .... Rubinstein
Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 24

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops Orchestra, has compiled the following popular programme for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "Tannhauser" (with organ) .... Wagner
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre" The Last Days of the "Terror" .... Litolff
Orientale (arranged by Gustav Strube) .... Cui
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" .... Puccini
Ballet music from "The Queen of Sheba" .... Goldmark
(Solo violoncello, Joseph Keller)
Enfantillage ("Children at Play") .... Van Westerhout
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
Roumanian Rhapsody .... Enesco
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor" .... Donizetti
Waltz, "Jolly Sisters" .... Vollstedt
Rackoczy March .... Berlioz

POST-JUNE 25

POPS STILL POPULAR AS EVER

Boston is a nice town but it's a little conservative, not to say slow. It really takes about thirty years for Boston to get enthusiastic about anything, and the Boston Pops, having served their time, are ralishing a wonderful measure of prosperity.

Just at present the amusement business is enjoying a slump. The theatre managers are shrieking from the housetops that they are ruined and the number of actors and performers out of work is larger than the number of office holders in Washington still doing war work, which is a lot bigger army than Wellington had at Waterloo.

Up at Symphony Hall, no matter how hot it gets, the multitude assembles every night, fills every table, absorbs cold drinks and ices to an incredible degree and listens to programs about as light as a new wife's biscuits.

For Signor Agide Jacchia does not play light programs. They are not as heavy, to be sure, as Monsieur Monteux serves up at the regular Symphony concert, but they include big overtures, tone poems, Wagnerian excerpts, selections from the grand operas, suites and such things. Occasionally he stoops to a comic opera, and once in a while to a popular song, but jazz is anathema.

Now the curious thing about it is that these programs seem to be just what the public wishes. If they were not the public would stay away with the greatest good will in the world, and the fact that the people pack the hall every night proves that the signor has hit the popular taste right between the eyes.

That Pops orchestra grows every year as the programs grow in ponderosity. Not so many years ago fifty men played the Pops. This year there are eighty musicians responding to the baton of Jacchia. There is no symphonic composition which a band of this size cannot play satisfactorily, and the folks who go to the Pops are really hearing good symphonic programs under delightful conditions.

AMER. JUNE 25.

TONIGHT'S POPS

program will be played at the cert in Symphony Hall tonight de Jacchia and the Pops Sym- orchestra:

to "Orpheus"........Offenbach
A Night in Venice".......Strauss
noi Ostrow (with organ)
"Manon Lescaut"......Rubinstein
an Rhapsody..........Puccini
...........Enesco
Dance from "Callirhoe"........Dunham
Solennelle, "1812"......Chaminade
"L'Oracolo".......Tschaikowsky
"Tres Jolie"..........Leoni
and Stripes Forever..........Waldteufel
..........Sousa

RALD-JUNE 13.

THE POPS TONIGHT

following programme will be played at op concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Jacchia and the famous Pops Symphony

re to "Orpheus"........Offenbach
A Night in Venice"........Strauss
enoi Ostrow (with organ)....Rubinstein
"Manon Lescaut"..........Puccini
ian Rhapsody..........Enesco
.........Dunham
Dance from "Callirhoe".....Chaminade
ture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
ion, "L'Oracolo"..........Leoni
"Tres Jolie"..........Waldteufel and Stripes Forever..........Sousa

OST-JUNE 13.

PS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

r the Pop Concert at Symphony tonight, which is a public oc- n although the Graduate Nurses abouts will assemble in goodly bers, Agide Jacchia and the did Pops Symphony Orchestra present the following program:

rian March..........Berlio
rian March..........Berlioz
re to "Poet and Peasant"......Suppe ost Chord..........Sullivan
Solo Trumpet, Georges Mager
ia, "Lohengrin"
the "Petite Suite"..........Wagner En Bateau..........Debussy Cortege.
one Quartet:
Serenade..........Hartel
The Tear..........Witt
rs Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield.)
of the Desert Girls..........Hadley
e Slave..........Tschaikowsky ion, "The Jewels of the Madonna"
..........Wolf-Ferrari
"Girls of Baden"..........Komzak
sion of Bacchus..........Delibes

ATTEND POPS.

omorrow evening English High ool night will be observed at the concert. Arthur L. Norton, '86, rman of the Pop committee, has charge of the arrangements, and os Penfield, '06, who has played he Boston Symphony for several s, will be in attendance. There be singing of the old school s under the leadership of Rich- W. Grant.

MER. JUNE 14.

At the Pops Tonight

1. Hungarian March..........Berlioz
2. Overture to "Poet and Peasant"
Suppé
3. The Lost Chord, solo trumpet, Georges Mager..........Sullivan
4. Fantasia, "Lohengrin"......Wagner
5. From the "Petite Suite" (a) En Bateau, (b) Cortège..........Debussy
6. Trombone Quartet—
(a) Serenade..........Haertel
(b) The Tear..........Witt
(Messrs. Hampe, Mausebach, Adam and Kenfield)
7. Dance of the Desert Girls..Hadley
8. Marche Slave..........Tschaikowsky
9. Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna"..........Wolf-Ferrari
10. Waltz, "Girls of Baden"..Komzak
11. Procession of Bacchus......Delibes

Conductor: A Jacchia

TRANS, JUNE 14.

Tufts Night at the Pops

March of the Gladiators..........Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"..........Nicolai
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Strauss
College Songs:
Tuftonia's Day..........Hayes '16
Ain't You Glad?..........Newton '90
Alma Mater's Day..........Hayes '16
Overture to "Sakuntala"......Goldmark
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann,"
Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
College Songs:
Spell It Out..........Williams '19
Dear Alma Mater..........Lewis '87
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs.
Morton '11
Prelude..........Rakhmannov
Entrance of the Boyards......Halvorsen

Conductor: A Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 1

TUFTS NIGHT AT POPS

The annual celebration of Tufts College at the Pops will take place in Symphony Hall tonight. This, however, will only further enliven a Pop concert of general interest. The programme follows:

March of the Gladiators..........Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"..........Nicolai
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Strauss
College Songs:
a. "Tuftonia's Day," Hayes, '16.
b. "Ain't You Glad?" Newton, '90.
c. "Alma Mater's Day," Hayes, '16.
Overture to "Sakuntala"..........Goldmark
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann"......Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
College Songs:
a. "Spell It Out," Williams, '19.
b. "Dear Alma Mater," Lewis, '87.
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs..Morton, '11
Prelude..........Rachmaninoff
Entrance of the Boyards..........Halvorsen

POST JUN

TUFTS NIGHT AT THE POPS

The annual celebration of Tufts College at the Pops will take place in Symphony Hall tonight. The programme follows:

March of the Gladiators..........Fucik
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"
Nicolai
Strauss
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........
College Songs..........Hayes '16
a. Tuftonia's Day..........Newton '90
b. Ain't You Glad?..........Hayes '16
c. Alma Mater's Day..........Goldmark
Overture to "Sakuntala"..........Offenbach Selection, "Tales of Hoffman" Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin"
Wagner
College Songs..........Williams '19
a. Spell It Out..........Lewis '87
b. Dear Alma Mater..........Morton '11
Medley, Fantasia on Tufts Airs......Rachmaninoff Prelude..........Halvorsen
Entrance of the Boyards

AMER

Symphony Hall—In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the promenade concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermissions. But the public soon christened them The Pops, and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted. This institution of many summers, which other cities have tried to imitate many times but without success, is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, in making his programs. Every Pops night of the week is a public occasion and has its particular attractions.

HINGHAM JOURNAL — 17

At the Pops Tonight

March Tartare..........Ganne
Overture to "Fra Diavolo,"..........Auber
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights,"
Strauss
Fantasia, "Othello"..........Verdi
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Prelude to "Carmen"..........Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony..........Dvorak
Ride of the Valkyries..........Wagner
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris". Mascagni
Grand American Military Fantasy,
Rollinson
En Sourdine..........Tellam
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRAV JUNE 7.

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following programme will be presented by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Orchestra at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "The Favorite Regiment"......Ertl
Overture to "Norma"..........Bellini
Waltz, "Violets"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Triumphal Procession from "Sigurd Jorsalfar"..........Grieg
Violin Solo, Spanish Dance..........Sarasate
Julius Theodorowicz
Aragonaise from "Carmen"..........Bizet
Overture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Lady Billy"..........Levy
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods"
Strauss
Bacchanale from "Philemon and Baucis"
Gounod

POST JUN 6.

"Pops"

Only three weeks remain of the present season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. On hot nights and cool nights alike, the splendid music and plentiful refreshments which the Pops provide bring enjoyment and relaxation to all of musical and sociable Boston under Agide Jacchia's excellent direction. Voices involuntarily drop to a whisper before the entrancing strains of the famous Pops orchestra of Symphony players, and more lengthy remarks are saved for the intermissions.

On Tuesday of the coming week will occur the Italian-Verdi program, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, with numbers to be sung by pupils and faculty.

TRAV. JUNE 18.

THE POPS

In 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old, the project was started of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein, to suit the time of year. They were called the "Promenade" concerts, after the cafe concerts of Europe, where the audience would stroll up and down in the corridors during the intermissions. But the public soon christened them "The Pops", and the title became so popular that it was officially adopted. This institution of many summers, which other cities have tried to imitate many times without success, is young as well as old, for the musical tastes of 1921 are carefully consulted by Agide Jacchia, the conductor of the Pops, in making his programmes.

END OF POPS IN THREE WEEKS

But three weeks remain of the present season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, the largest so far in attendance and poplarity. On hot nights and cool nights alike, the splendid music and plentiful refreshments which the Pops provide bring enjoyment and relaxation to all of musical and sociable Boston. So persuasive is Agide Jacchia's magnetic baton that discussion as to whether Pops' audiences might talk during the music has become a thing of the past. Voices involuntarily drop to a whisper before the entrancing strains of the famous Pops orchestra of symphony players, and more lengthy remarks are saved for the intermissions.

The Italian-Verdi program of Tuesday, June 21, follows:

Prologue to "Pagliacci"..........Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell"..........Rossini
Minuet..........Bölzoni
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"......Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise.
Fantasia, "Ballo in Maschere"..........Verdi
Quartet from "Rigoletto"..........Verdi
Prelude to "Aida"..........Verdi
Fantasia, "Otello"..........Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Waltz, "Le Sarah Rose"..........Arditi
Marcia Reale Italiana..........Cabetti

AMER. JUNE 18.

Eighth Week of the Pops

The special nights at the Pops th week are New England Conservator Monday; Italian-Verdi program, Tue day, and Insurance Society of Massach setts, Friday. For these and the othe evenings Mr Jacchia has put togethe the usual agreeable miscellanies. Th numbers for tomorrow night ar French military March, Saint-Saen overture to "Mignon," Thomas; waltz from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Straus Fantasia, "Tosca," Puccini; symphon ballad, "Tam O'Shanter" (conducted the composer), Chadwick; Air of Lepa ello from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; ove ture to "The Mastersingers of Nure berg," Wagner; quartet from "Rigole to," act 3, Verdi; rhapsody, "Italia Casella; Hindu song from "Sadko Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Cortege de Ba chus," Delibes.

GLOBE JUNE 19

The Pops Soon to End

Only three weeks remain of the prese season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Ha On Tuesday of the coming week will occ the Italian-Verdi programme, one of t most popular of all, as conducted by Agi Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to t New England Conservatory of Music, wi numbers to be sung by pupils and facult Although the Insurance Society of Mass chusetts will attend the Pops on Frida this and each night of the week will be op to the public.

TRANS. JUNE 18.

POPS NEARING CLOSE

The season of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall, being seven weeks old, with but three remaining, has broken all previous records. The heat scarcely penetrates into the cool spaces of Symphony, where splendid music and ice refreshments furnish relaxation and enjoyment to all. Next Tuesday night will have an Italian-Verdi program, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Tomorrow night will have special New England Conservatory of Music features. Every night of the week is open to the pubilc.

ADVERTISER JUNE 19.

Pops Nearing Close

The season of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall is seven weeks old, with but three remaining. On Tuesday of the coming week will occur the Italian-Verdi programme, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, with numbers to be sung by pupils and faculty. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will attend the Pops on Friday, this and each night of the week will be open to the public.

POST-JUNE 19.

POPS NEARING CLOSE

The season of Pops concerts at Symprony Hall, being seven weeks old, wit but three remaining, each week to dat has exceeded the preceding in attend ance and all previous records have bee broken. Indeed, the heat scarcely penetrates into the cool spaces of Symphony Hall, where, whether the night be warm or mild, splendid music and iced refreshments plentifully abound and give relaxation and enjoyment to all.

There used to be much discussion as to whether Pop-goers might talk during the music. Now there is nothing to argue about. So magnetic is the persuasion of Agide Jacchia's leadership, and so entrancing the strains which come from the famous Pops Symphony orchestra, that voices involuntarily drop to an occasional whisper, and substantial remarks are withheld by preference until the pauses between numbers.

On Tuesday of the coming week will occur the Italian-Verdi program, one of the most popular of all, as conducted by Agide Jacchia, long celebrated as a conductor of Italian opera. Monday is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, with numbers to be sung by pupils and faculty. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will attend the Pops on Friday, this and each night of the week will be open to the public.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 20,
New England Conservatory of Music.
French Military March..........Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon"..........Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier"..R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca"..........Puccini
Symphonic Ballad, "Tam o'Shanter"..Chadwick
(Conducted by the composer)
Air of Leparello "Madamina" from Act 1, "Don Giovanni"..........Mozart
(Charles Bennett)
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..........Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto," Act III......Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Hindu Song from "Sadko"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
Cortege de Bacchus..........Delibes

TUESDAY, JUNE 21,
Italian-Verdi Program
Prologue to "Pagliacci"..........Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell"..........Rossini
Minuet..........Bolzoni
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"........Mascagni
Night, Dawn, Sunrise.
Fantasia, "Ballo in Maschere"..........Verdi
Quartet from "Rigoletto"..........Verdi
Prelude to "Aida"..........Verdi
Fantasia, "Otello"..........Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Waltz, "Le Saran Rose"..........Arditi
Marcia Reale Italiana..........Cabetti

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.
Marche Militaire..........Schubert
Overture to "Raymond"..........Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"..........Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Aida"..........Verdi
First Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
"Elli, Elli"..........Arr by Jacchia
"Whispering of the Flowers"..........Blon
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...Wagner
Selection, "Eva"..........Lehar
Bandana Sketches (..egro Spirituals)
"Nobody Knows De Trouble I've Seen"
Negro Dance
"Procession of the Sardar"......Ippolito-Ivanoff

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.
March, "Lorraine"..........Ganne
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"
Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"..........Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Marche Miniature..........Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo..........Carroll
Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla, from "Das Rheingold"..........Wagner
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"..........Boito
Serenade..........Toselli
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 5)....Brahms

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.
Insurance Society of Massachusetts Night.
Military Polonaise..........Chopin-Glazounoff
Overture, "Le Roi l'a dit"..........Delibes
Waltz, "Espana"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen"..........Bizet
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt"..........Grieg
a, Morning Mood. b, In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Largo..........Handel
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; organ, harp and strings.
Prelude..........Rachmaninoff
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"....Kreisler-Jacobi
Kammenoi Ostrow..........Rubinstein
Pomp and Circumstance..........Elgar

SATURDAY, JUNE 25.
March from "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Overture "Maximilian Robespierre"........Litoff
The Last Days of the "Terror"
Orientale..........Cui
(Arranged by Gustave Strube)
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"..........Puccini
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba"
Goldmark
Solo violoncello, Joseph Keller
Enfantillage, "Children at Play"
Van Westerhout
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
Roumanian Rhapsody..........Enesco
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"....Donizetti
Waltz, "Jolly Sisters"..........Vollstedt
Rakoczy March..........Berlioz

HERALD, JUNE 19.

CONSERVATORY NIGHT AT POPS

The New England Conservatory of Music will celebrate their annual Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program is of particular interest to the general public. The numbers follow:

French Military March..........Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon"..........Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca"..........Puccini
Symphonic Ballad, "Tam O'Shanter"
Chadwick
Conducted by the composer.
Air of Leparello "Madamina" from Act 1, "Don Giovanni"..........Mozart
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..........Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto," Act III......Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Hindu Song from "Sadko"..Rimsky-Korsakoff
Cortege de Bacchus..........Delibes

AMER JUNE 20

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The New England Conservatory of Music will celebrate its annual Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The programme is of particular musical interest to the general public. The numbers follow:

French Military March..........Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon"..........Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier"..R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca"..........Puccini
Symphonic ballad, "Tam o' Shanter"..Chadwick
Conducted by the composer.
Air of Leparello, "Madamina," from Act 1, "Don Giovanni"..........Mozart
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..........Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto," Act III..........Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Hindu song from "Sadko"..Rimsky-Korsakoff
Cortege de Bacchus..........Delibes

POST-JUNE 20.

Italian Club to Have Pops' Night

(Photograph by Marceau)

Mrs. Frank Sordillo, chairman of the entertainment committee of the Women's Italian Club.

The Women's Italian Club has completed plans for a Pop Concert to be given tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall, Huntington avenue. From the large advance sale of tickets a record-breaking attendance is anticipated. Mrs. Frank Sordillo, chairman of the entertainment committee, is in charge of the arrangements. The proceeds will be used in the charity relief work of the organization.

TRAV. JUNE 20.

At the Pops Tonight

Italian-Verdi Programme

Prologue to "Pagliacci"....Leoncavalla
Overture to "William Tell"......Rossini
Minuet..........Bolzoni
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris". Mascagni
Night, Dawn, Sunrise.
Fantasia, "Ballo in Maschere"....Verdi
Quartette from "Rigoletto"......Verdi
Prelude to "Aida"..........Verdi
Fantasia, "Otello"..........Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Waltz, "Le Saran Rose"..........Arditi
Marcia Reale Italiana..........Cabetti

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 21.

THE POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of symphony players will present this program:

Marche Militaire..........Schubert
Overture to "Raymond"..........Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"......Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Aida"..........Verdi
First Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Eili, Eili (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Whispering of the Flowers..........Blon
Closing scene from "Des Rheingold"
Wagner
Selection, "Eva"..........Lehar
Bandana Sketches (Negro spirituels)
White
(a) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."
(b) Negro Dance.
Procession of the Sardar.Ippolitoff-Ivanof

HERALD-JUNE 2

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his famous orchestra of symphony players will present the following programme:

Marche Militaire..........Schubert
Overture to "Raymond"..........Thomas
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"......Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Aida"..........Verdi
First Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Eili, Eili (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Whispering of the Flowers..........Blon
Closing Scene from "Das Rheingold". Wagner
Selection, "Eva"..........Lehar
Bandana Sketches (Negro Spirituels)...White
a. "Nobody Knows De Trouble I've Seen"
b. Negro Danca
Procession of the Sardar....Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

POST-JUNE 22.

At the Pops Tonight

March, "Lorraine"..........Ganne
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"..........Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"......Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Marche Miniature........Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo..........Carroll
Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla, from "Das Rheingold"....Wagner
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"..........Boito
Serenade..........Toselli
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 5).
Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 23
[132]

TONIGHT'S POPS

This program will be played at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra:

March, "Lorraine"..........Ganne
Overture to "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream"..........Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Pomone"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"..........Leoucavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Marche Miniature..........Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo..........Carroll
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"..Wagner
Fantasia, "Mephistofele"..........Boito
Serenade..........Toselli
Hungarian Dance in G minor, No. 5....Brahms

HERALD-JUNE 23.

At the Pops Tonight

Military Polonaise....Chopin-Glazounoff
Overture, "Le Roi l'a dit"......Delibes
Waltz, "Espana"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia,, "Carmen"..........Bizet
Morning Mood—In the Hall of the Mountain King, from the Suite, "Peer Gynt"..........Grieg
Largo..........Handel
Solo violin (J. Theodorowicz), organ, harp and strings
Prelude..........Rachmaninoff
Overture, "1812"........Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Apple Blossoms,"
Kreisler-Jacobi
Kammenoi Ostrow..........Rubinstein
Pomp and Circumstance..........Elgar

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 24

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops Orchestra, has compiled the following popular programme for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "Tannhauser" (with organ)
Wagner
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre" The Last Days of the "Terror"..........Litolff
Orientale (arranged by Gustav Strube)...Cui
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"......Puccini
Ballet music from "The Queen of Sheba"
Goldmark
(Solo violoncello, Joseph Keller)
Enfantillage ("Children at Play")......
Van Westerhout
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..
Strauss
Roumanian Rhapsody..........Enesco
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"..Donizetti
Waltz, "Jolly Sisters"..........Vollstedt
Rackoczy March..........Berlioz

POST-JUNE 25

POPS STILL POPULAR AS EVER

Boston is a nice town but it's a little conservative, not to say slow. It really takes about thirty years for Boston to get enthusiastic about anything, and the Boston Pops, having served their time, are ralishing a wonderful measure of prosperity.

Just at present the amusement business is enjoying a slump. The theatre managers are shrieking from the housetops that they are ruined and the number of actors and performers out of work is larger than the number of office holders in Washington still doing war work, which is a lot bigger army than Wellington had at Waterloo.

Up at Symphony Hall, no matter how hot it gets, the multitude assembles every night, fills every table, absorbs cold drinks and ices to an incredible degree and listens to programs about as light as a new wife's biscuits.

For Signor Agide Jacchia does not play light programs. They are not as heavy, to be sure, as Monsieur Monteux serves up at the regular Symphony concert, but they include big overtures, tone poems, Wagnerian excerpts, selections from the grand operas, suites and such things. Occasionally he stoops to a comic opera, and once in a while to a popular song, but jazz is anathema.

Now the curious thing about it is that these programs seem to be just what the public wishes. If they were not the public would stay away with the greatest good will in the world, and the fact that the people pack the hall every night proves that the signor has hit the popular taste right between the eyes.

That Pops orchestra grows every year as the programs grow in ponderosity. Not so many years ago fifty men played the Pops. This year there are eighty musicians responding to the baton of Jacchia. There is no symphonic composition which a band of this size cannot play satisfactorily, and the folks who go to the Pops are really hearing good symphonic programs under delightful conditions.

AMER. JUNE 25.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser" . . . . . Wagner
Overture "Maximilian Robespierre," . . . Litolff
Orientale . . . . Cui
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" . . . Puccini
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba" . . . . Goldmark
Enfantillage . . . . Van Westerhout
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" . . . . Strauss
Roumanian Rhapsody . . . . Enesco
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor," . . . Donizetti
Waltz, "Jolly Sisters" . . . . Vollstedt
Rakoczy March . . . . Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JUNE 25.

The Pops

The coming week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, which will be the last but one of the 1921 season, includes special programmes of interest. For request night, on Tuesday next, June 28, the programme has now been made, strictly in accordance with the votes which every Pops night for the last few weeks have been filling the ballot box in the Symphony Hall corridor. In this most popular of popular programmes the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow."

On Thursday, June 30, there will be given a programme consisting entirely of dance music. On Friday, July 1, will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programmes of the season, which with a certain public the most popular of all Pop offerin

POST- JUNE 26

POP CONCERTS

The famous Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall have but two weeks more. This week abounds in special programs. Request night comes on Tuesday. In this most popular of popular programs the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein"s "Kammeoi Ostrow." On Thursday will come a program entirely of dance music. On Friday will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programs, making one of the most popular of all Pops nights.

ADVER. JUNE. 26

Last Two Weeks of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall

The coming wek of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will be the last but one of the 1921 season. For Request Night, Tuesday, the program has now been made strictly in accordance with the votes which every Pops night for the last few weeks have been filling the ballot box in the Symphony Hall corridor. In this most popular of popular programs the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow."

Thursday the program consists entirely of dance music. Friday will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky program.

The program for Monday follows:

Overture to "Zampa," Herold; Waltz from "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky; Capriccio, Scarlatti; Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Intermezzo, act 3, "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; Polovtsian; Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet.

GLOBE JUNE 26

LAST TWO WEEKS OF POPS

The coming week of the famous Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which will be the last but one of the 1921 season, abounds in special programs of interest. For Request night, on Tuesday next, June 28, the program has now been made, strictly in accordance with the votes which, every Pops night for the last few weeks, have been filling the ballot box in the Symphony Hall corridor. In this most popular of popular programs the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammnoi Ostrow."

On Thursday, June 30, there will come a program consisting entirely of dance music, particularly eventful since this species of music comprises an important part of the Pops repertory. On Friday, July 1, will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programs of the season, which, with a certain public, is the most popular of all Pops nights.

The programs of the week, in which the splendid Pops Symphony orchestra will be heard under the inspired leadership of Agide Jacchia, follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 27

Overture to "Zampa" . . . . Herold
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" . . . . Tschaikowsky
Capriccio . . . . Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" . . Saint-Saens
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" . Wagner
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" . . . . Wolf-Ferrari
"Ave Maria" . . . . Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "Espana" . . . . Chabrier
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
"Love's Dream After the Ball" . . . . Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen" . . . . Bizet

TUESDAY, JUNE 28
Request Night

Hungarian March (Rakoczy) . . . . Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell" . . . . Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" . . . . Puccini
From the Suite "Peer Gynt" . . . . Grieg
a, Morning Mood. b, In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Elli, Elli (Arr. by Agide Jacchia)
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) . Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" . . . Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" . . . . Casella
Largo . . . . Handel
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, organ, harp and strings.
Pomp and Circumstance . . . . Elgar

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29

"Coronation March" . . . . Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon" . . . . Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life" . . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" . . . . Puccini
Second Hungarian Rhapsody . . . . Liszt
"March of the Little Lead Soldiers" . . . . Pier.
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" . . . . Wagne
"Charge of the Hussars" . . . . Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" . . . . Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" . . . . Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid" . . . . Massenet

THURSDAY, June 30
A Program of Dance Music

Military Polonaise . . . . Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" . . . . Strauss
Habanera and Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" . . . Bizet
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" . . . Saint-Saens
Egyptian Ballet . . . . Luigini
a, Gavotte. b, Tarantelle . . . . Jacchia
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 1) . . Brahms
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda" . . . Ponchielli
Bolero . . . . Moszkowski
Mazurka, "La Czarina" . . . . Ganne
Indian War Dance (Cheyenne) . . . . Skilton

FRIDAY, JULY 1
Russian-Tschaikowsky Program

Entrance of Anthony into Egypt . . . . Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen," from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty" . . . . . . Tschaikowsky
Orientale (arr. by G. Strube) . . . . Cui
Marche Slave . . . . Tschaikowsky
Finale of "Scheherazade" . . . . . Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Elli, Elli (Arr. by Agide Jacchia)
Russian Dance, "Trepak" . . . . Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" . . . . . Tschaikowsky
Finale of the Fourth Symphony . . Tschaikowsky
Allegro con fouco.
Russian Folk-Songs:
a, Kalinka. b, Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar . . . . . . Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

SATURDAY, JULY 2

Introdution to "Othello" (The Tempest) . Verdi
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea" . . . Suppe
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier" . . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust" . . . . Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin" . . . . Wagner
Elli, Elli (Arr, by Agide Jacchia)
"The Last Spring" . . . . Grieg
Carnival in Paris . . . . Svendsen
Southern Rhapsody . . . . Hosmer
Mexican Serenade, "La Paloma" . . . . Yradier
Marche Slave . . . . Tschaikowsky

HERALD-JUNE 26

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Zampa" . . . . Herold
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" . . . . Tschaikowsky
Capriccio . . . . Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" . . Saint-Saëns

Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" . . . . Wagner
Intermezzo, Act. III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" . . . . Wolf-Ferrari
Ave Maria . . . . Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "España" . . . . Chabrier

Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" . . . . Borodin
Love's Dream after the Ball . . . . Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen" . . . . Bizet

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 27

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia and his Pops orchestra of Symphony players will perform the following programme:

Overture to "Zampa" . . . . Herold
Waltz, from "Eugen Onegin" . . . Tschaikowsky
Capriccio . . . . Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" . Saint-Saens
Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde" . . . . Wagner
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" . . . . Wolf-Ferrari
Ave Maria . . . . Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "Espana" . . . . Chabrier
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" . . . . Borodin
Love's Dream After the Ball . . . . . . Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen" . . . . Bizet

POST-JUNE 27.

TONIGHT'S POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia and his symphony players will perform this program.

Overture to "Zampa" . . . . Herold
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" . . . Tschaikowsky
Capriccio . . . . Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" . . . Saint-Saens
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" . . . Wagner
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" . . . . Wolf-Ferrari
Ave Maria . . . . Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "Espana" . . . . Chabrier
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" . . . Borodin
Love's Dream After the Ball . . . . . Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen" . . . . Bizet

HERALD JUNE. 27

THE POPS—Tonight is "Request Night" at the Pops, most popular of all Pops' nights in that the program is determined entirely by popular vote. The votes having been counted, the following three numbers were in the lear—Tschaikowsky'c "1812" Overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow."

On Friday, July 1, will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programs of the season which, with a certain public, is the most popular of all programs.

On Thursday, June 30, will come a program consisting entirely of dance music. This program is as follows:

1. Military Polonaise . . . . . Chopin-Glazounoff
2. Waltz, "Vienna Blood" . . . . Strauss
3. Habanera and Gypsy Dance form "Carmen" . . . . Bizet
4. Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" . . . . Saint-Saens
5. Egyptian Ballet . . . . Luigini
6. (a) Gavotte. (b) Tarantelle . . . Jacchia
7. Hungarian Rhapsody in G minor (No. 1) . . . . Brahms
8. Ballet Music from "La Gioconda" . . . Ponchielli
9. Bolero . . . . Moszkowski
10. Mazurka, "La Czarina" . . . . Ganne
11. Indian War Dance (Cheyenne) . . . . Skilton

AMER. JUNE 28.

At the Pops Tonight

Request Night

Hungarian March (Rakoczy) . . . . Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell" . . . . . Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" . . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" . . Puccini

From the Suite "Peer Gynt" . . . . Grieg
a. Morning Mood.
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King
Elli, Elli (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) . . . . Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" . . . . Tschaikowsky

Rhapsody, "Italia" . . . . Casella
Largo . . . . Handel
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, Organ, Harp and Strings)
Pomp and Circumstance . . . . Elgar

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 28

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

Tonight the request program will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall. This is the most popular Pops program of them all, in that the numbers are entirely determined by the vote of the Pops audiences. The program follows:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy) . . . . . . Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell" . . . . Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" . . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" . . . . . Puccini
From the Suite "Peer Gynt" . . . . Crieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Elli, Elli (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
(Solo trumpet, Mr. Georges Mager)
Kammenio Ostrow (Reve Angelique) . . . . . Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennella, "1812" . Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" . . . . Casella
Largo (Solo, violin, J. Theodorowicz, Organ, harp and strings) . . . . . . Handel
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) . Elgar

HERALD JUNE 28

REPEAT PROGRAMME

Those who came to Request Night at the Pop concert last night were numerous enough to fill Symphony Hall twice over. Indeed, so many were unable to obtain tickets for this most popular programme of them all that the management has decided to accommodate them by repeating the request programme intact next Monday, July 4, instead of the programme originally announced for that date.

Tonight's programme follows:

Coronation March . . . . Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon" . . . . Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life" . . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" . . . . Puccini
Second Hungarian Rhapsody . . . . Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers . . . Pierne
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" . . . . . Wagner
Charge of the Hussars . . . . Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" . . . . Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" . . . . Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid" . . . . Massenet

POST-JUNE-29

TONIGHT'S POPS

Those who attended Request night at the Pop concerts last night were numerous enough to fill Symphony Hall twice over. So many were unable to obtain tickets that the management has decided to repeat the request program intact next Monday, July 4, instead of the program originally announced for that date.

Tonight's program follows:

Coronation March . . . . Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon" . . . . Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life" . . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" . . . . Puccini
Second Huugarian Rhapsody . . . . Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers . . . . . . Pierne
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" . . . . Wagner
Charge of the Hussars . . . . Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" . . . . Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" . . . . Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid" . . . . Massenet

HERALD JUNE. 29.

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March . . . . Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon" . . . . Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life" . . . . Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohême" . . . . Puccini
Second Hungarian Rhapsody . . . . . . Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers, . . . Pierné
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Charge of the Hussars . . . . Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" . . . . . . Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" . . . . Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid" . . . Massenet

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 29.

At the Pops Tonight

Military Polonaise . . . . Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" . . . . Strauss
Habanera and Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" . . . . Bizet
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" . . . . Saint-Saëns
Egyptian Ballet . . . . Luigini
Gavotte—Tarantelle . . . . Jacchia
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 1) . . . Brahms
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda," . . . Ponchielli
Spanish Dance, "Bolero" . . . . Moszkowski
Mazurka, "La Czarina" . . . . Ganne
Indian War Dance (Cheyenne) . . . Skilton

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 30.

LAST RUSSIAN NIGHT OF SEASON AT POPS

The second and last Russian-Tschaikowsky night of the season will take place at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight. The following program has been compiled for the occasion by Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor:

Entrance of Antony into Egypt . . . . Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty" . . . . . . Tschaikowsky
Orientale (Arr. by Gustave Strube) . . . . Cui
Marche Slave . . . . Tschaikowsky
Finale, "Scheherazade" . . . . . Rimsky-Korsakoff
(Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.)
Elli, Elli . . . . Arr. by Agide Jacchia
(Mr. Georges Mayer, solo trumpet.)
Russian Dance, "Trepak" . . . . Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solonnelle, "1812" . . . Tschaikowsky
Finale of the 4th Symphony, Allegro con fuoco . . . . Tschaikowsky
Russian Folk Songs—
(a) Kalinka.
(b) Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar . . . . . Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

HERALD-JULY 1

ANCE MUSIC AT POPS

program consisting entirely of dance music, which comprises a large and fascinating part of the Pops repertory, will feature the concert in Symphony Hall tonight.

Military Polonaise . . . . . . Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" . . . . Strauss
Habanera and Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" . . . . Bizet
cchanale from "Samson and Delilah" . . . . Saint-Saens
yptian Ballet . . . . Luigini
Gavotte b. Tarantelle . . . . Jacchia
ngarian Dance in G minor (No. 1) . . . . Brahms
llet Music from "La Gioconda" . . . . Ponchielli
anish Dance, "Bolero" . . . . . . Mozkowski
azurka, "La Czarina" . . . . Ganne
dian War Dance (Cheyenne) . . . . Skilton

HERALD-JUNE 30

טשאיקאווסקי פראגראם אין סימפאני האלל

קומענדען [illegible] נאכמיטאג וועט אין סימפאני האלל געגעבען ווערען א טשאיקאווסקי קאנצערט פון סימפאני ארקעסטער. צוויי סאלאיסטען וועלען זיך באטייליגען אין דעם קאנצערט. ריטשארד בורגין, דער גרויסער רוסישער וויאלין שפּיעלער, און זשעני בעדעטטי, דער גרויסער סעליסט, וועלען זיין די סאלאיסטען.

PROGRAMMA DI MUSICA VERDIANA AI POPS

Il programma Verdiano — uno dei più popolari della stagione dei Pops in Symphony Hall, di cui rimangono solamente tre settimane— sarà dato martedì sera prossimo sotto l'ispirata ed autorevole direzione del Maestro Agide Jacchia.

Il programma che sarà eseguito è il presente:

1. Prologue to "Pagliacci" — Leoncavallo.
2. Overture to "William Tell" — Rossini.
3. Minuet — Bolzoni.
4. Hymn to the sun from "Iris" — Mascagni.
5. Fantasia "Ballo in Maschera" —
6. Quartet from "Rigoletto" — Verdi.
7. Prelude to "Aida"
8. Fantasia, "Otello"
9. Rhapsody "Italia" — Casella.
10. Waltz, "Le Seran Rose" — Arditi.
11. Marcia Reale Italiana — Cabetti.

האט פּראהיבישאן געווירקט אויף דער פּאָפּולאריטעט פון דיא „פּאָפּס־קאָנצערטען.

די בארימטע באסטאנער אינסטיטוציע, די „פּאָפּס־קאנצערטען" אין סימפאני האל, האט דורכגעלעבט זעהר פיעל ענדערונגען פון דער צייט ווען זי איז געגרינדעט געווארען אין 1885. ווען פּראהיבישאן איז געווארען א געזעץ, האבען מאנכע געדיינקט אז די „פּאָפּס־קאנצערטען" וועלען רעוואלוציאניזירט ווערען און אנדערע ווידער האבען געגלויבט אז די קאנצערטען וועלען אונטערגעהן. אויסגעלאזט האט זיך פונקט פארקעהרט.

ווען די „ביל אוו פעיר" איז אלס רעזולטאט פון פּראהיבישאן געענדערט געווארען אין פריהלינג פון 1919, האט דיזע ענדערונג ניט געווירקט אויף אזוי וויים, אז עס זאל זיך ארויסזעהן א שאדען וואס קען פארדונקלען די היסטאריע פון דער ערפאלגרייכער עקזיסטענץ פון דיזע קאנצערטען.

די ביכער פון דער פערוואלטונג בעווייזען אז זיים די לעצטע צוויי יאהר האבען מעהר מענשען באזוכט די קאנצערטען און אז א פיל גרעסערע צאהל שפּייז און געטרענקע איז פארברויכט געווארען, ווי אין די פערגאנגענע יאהרען. בפרט נאך ווען מען דערמאנט זיך אז אין 1890 איז „שנאפּס" געווען דער פּאפּולערסטער געטראנק ביי די „פּאָפּס־קאנצערטען", מוז מען קומען צום שלוס אז פּראהיבישאן האט גאר ניט געווירקט אויף די קאנצערטען.

ווען די „פּאָפּס־קאנצערטען" זיינען געגרינדעט געווארען, צו פארנעהמען דעם פּלאץ פון ווינטער קאנצערטען מיט דער באסטאן סימפאני ארקעסטער אין אלטען מוזיק־האל אויף העמילטאן פּלייס איז „ביער, וויין און ליכטע וויין" אזוי פּאפּולער געווארען צוזאמען מיט דער מוזיק, אז די „פּראמענאיד־קאנצערטען" ווי מען האט זיי דאן גערופען, זיינען געווארען די איינציגע אמוזירונג פאר

[illegible]

א ביער־פעסלאך, און הונדערטער גלעזער זיינען געווען אויסגעשטעלט אין ליין. [illegible] 240 [illegible]

אין יענער צייט ווען עס פלעגט קומען א „הארוואורד־נאכט" פאר די הארוואורד סטודענטען [illegible]

[illegible] אין 1890, האט דער [illegible] „פּאפּס" [illegible]

[illegible] „פּאפּס־קאנצערטען" [illegible]

עס איז אן אמת'ער פארגעניגען צו פארברענגען א זומער־אווענד אין די „פּאפּס"!

Programma di musica italian

Martedì sera 21 corrente, nella Symphony Hall sarà tenuto il più grande concerto musicale della sera svolta in questa stagione dall'Orchestra dei "Pops". Diretta ed animat dal maestro Agide Jacchia, l'eccellen te Orchestra svolgerà magistralm te il seguente programma di music italiana:

1 — Prologo dei "Pagliacci" — R. Leoncavallo;
2 — Overture del "Guglielmo Tell" — Rossini;
3 — Minuet — Bolzoni;
4 — Inno al Sole dell'"Iris" - Not Tramonto, Alba — Mascagni;
5 — Fantasia "Ballo in Mascher
6 — Quartetto del "Rigolet
7 — Preludio di "Aida"
8 — Fantasia "Otello" di Giuseppe Verdi.
9 — Rhapsodia "Italia" — Casel
10 — Walz, Se saran rose—Ardi
11 — Marcia Reale Italiana — betti.

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of Anthony into Egypt . Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty" . . . Tschaikowsky
Orientale (arranged by Gustave Strube) . . . . Cui
Marche Slave . . . . Tschaikowsky
Finale "Scheherazade" . Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Elli, Elli (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
(Solo trumpet—Mr. Georges Mager.)
Russian Dance, "Trepak" . Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" . . . Tschaikowsky
Finale of the 4th Symphony, Allegro con fuoco . . . . Tschaikowsky
Russian Folk Songs—
a. Kalinka.
b. Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar . . . . Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Overture "Maximilian Robespierre," Litoff
Orientale ....Cui
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"...Puccini
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba" ....Goldmark
Enfantillage ....Van Westerhout
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Roumanian Rhapsody..........Enesco
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti
Waltz, "Jolly Sisters"........Vollstedt
Rakoczy March ....Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 25.

The Pops

The coming week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, which will be the last but one of the 1921 season, includes special programmes of interest. For request night, on Tuesday next, June 28, the programme has now been made, strictly in accordance with the votes which every Pops night for the last few weeks have been filling the ballot box in the Symphony Hall corridor. In this most popular of popular programmes the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow."

On Thursday, June 30, there will be given a programme consisting entirely of dance music. On Friday, July 1, will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programmes of the season, which with a certain public is the most popular of all Pop offerings.

POST- JUNE 26

POP CONCERTS

The famous Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall have but two weeks more. This week abounds in special programs. Request night comes on Tuesday. In this most popular of popular programs the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein"s "Kammeoi Ostrow." On Thursday will come a program entirely of dance music. On Friday will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programs, making one of the most popular of all Pops nights.

ADVER. JUNE 26

Last Two Weeks of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall

The coming wek of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will be the last but one of the 1921 season. For Request Night, Tuesday, the program has now been made strictly in accordance with the votes which every Pops night for the last few weeks have been filling the ballot box in the Symphony Hall corridor. In this most popular of popular programs the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow."

Thursday the program consists entirely of dance music. Friday will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky program.

The program for Monday follows: Overture to "Zampa," Herold; Waltz from "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky; Capriccio, Scarlatti; Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Intermezzo, act 3, "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; Polovtsian; Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet.

GLOBE JUNE 26

LAST TWO WEEKS OF POPS

The coming week of the famous Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which will be the last but one of the 1921 season, abounds in special programs of interest. For Request night, on Tuesday next, June 28, the program has now been made, strictly in accordance with the votes which, every Pops night for the last few weeks, have been filling the ballot box in the Symphony Hall corridor. In this most popular of popular programs the numbers which led in the count were Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammnoi Ostrow."

On Thursday, June 30, there will come a program consisting entirely of dance music, particularly eventful since this species of music comprises an important part of the Pops repertory. On Friday, July 1, will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programs of the season, which, with a certain public, is the most popular of all Pops nights.

The programs of the week, in which the splendid Pops Symphony orchestra will be heard under the inspired leadership of Agide Jacchia, follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 27

Overture to "Zampa"..........Herold
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin".....Tschaikowsky
Capriccio ....Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde".Wagner
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
"Ave Maria" ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "Espana" ....Chabrier
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".Borodin
"Love's Dream After the Ball"..........Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen" ....Bizet

TUESDAY, JUNE 28
Request Night

Hungarian March (Rakoczy)..........Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell"..........Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"..........Puccini
From the Suite "Peer Gynt"..........Grieg
a, Morning Mood. b, In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Eili, Eili (Arr. by Agide Jacchia)
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique).Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Largo ....Handel
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, organ, harp and strings.
Pomp and Circumstance..........Elgar

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29

"Coronation March"..........Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon"..........Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life"..........Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme"..........Puccini
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
"March of the Little Lead Soldiers"....Pier.
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"........Wagne
"Charge of the Hussars"..........Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"..........Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"..........Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid"..........Massenet

THURSDAY, June 30
A Program of Dance Music

Military Polonaise..........Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Strauss
Habanera and Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" Bizet
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Egyptian Ballet..........Luigini
a, Gavotte. b, Tarantelle..........Jacchia
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 1)..Brahms
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Bolero ....Moszkowski
Mazurka, "La Czarina"..........Ganne
Indian War Dance (Cheyenne)..........Skilton

FRIDAY, JULY 1
Russian-Tschaikowsky Program

Entrance of Anthony into Egypt.......Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen," from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty"......Tschaikowsky
Orientale (arr. by G. Strube)..........Cui
Marche Slave..........Tschaikowsky
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Kosrakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Eili, Eili (Arr. by Agide Jacchia)
Russian Dance, "Trepak"..........Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Finale of the Fourth Symphony..Tschaikowsky
Allegro con fouco.
Russian Folk-Songs:
a, Kalinka. b, Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar......Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

SATURDAY, JULY 2

Introduction to "Othello" (The Tempest).Verdi
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea"...Suppe
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier"....Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust"..........Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Eili, Eili (Arr, by Agide Jacchia)
"The Last Spring"..........Grieg
Carnival in Paris..........Svendsen
Southern Rhapsody..........Hosmer
Mexican Serenade, "La Paloma".......Yradier
Marche Slave..........Tschaikowsky

HERALD-JUNE 26

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Zampa"..........Herold
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin".......... Tschaikowsky
Capriccio .... Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".. Saint-Saëns

Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
Intermezzo, Act. III., "The Jewels of the Madonna"........Wolf-Ferrari
Ave Maria ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "España" ....Chabrier

Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ....Borodin
Love's Dream after the Ball....Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen"..........Bizet

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 27

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia and his Pops orchestra of Symphony players will perform the following programme:

Overture to "Zampa"..........Herold
Waltz, from "Eugen Onegin"...Tschaikowsky
Capriccio ....Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".Saint-Saens
Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde".. Wagner
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Ave Maria ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "Espana" ....Chabrier
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".. Borodin
Love's Dream After the Ball.......Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen"..........Bizet

POST-JUNE 27

TONIGHT'S POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia and his symphony players will perform this program.

Overture to "Zampa"..........Herold
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin" Tschaikowsky
Capriccio ....Scarlatti
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....Wolf-Ferrari
Ave Maria..........Schubert-Wilhelmj
Rhapsody, "Espana"..........Chabrier
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
Love's Dream After the Ball....Czibulka
Prelude to "Carmen"..........Bizet

HERALD JUNE 27.

THE POPS—Tonight is "Request Night" at the Pops, most popular of all Pops' nights in that the program is determined entirely by popular vote. The votes having been counted, the following three numbers were in the lear—Tschaikowsky'c "1812" Overture, Handel's "Largo" and Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow."

On Friday, July 1, will be given the second and last of the Russian-Tschaikowsky programs of the season which, with a certain public, is the most popular of all programs.

On Thursday, June 30, will come a program consisting entirely of dance music. This program is as follows:

1. Military Polonaise......Chopin-Glazounoff
2. Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Strauss
3. Habanera and Gypsy Dance form "Carmen" ....Bizet
4. Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
5. Egyptian Ballet ....Luigini
6. (a) Gavotte. (b) Tarantelle ....Jacchia
7. Hungarian Rhapsody in G minor (No. 1) .... Brahms
8. Ballet Music from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
9. Bolero ....Moszkowski
10. Mazurka, "La Czarina" ....Ganne
11. Indian War Dance (Cheyenne) ....Skilton

AMER. JUNE 28.

At the Pops Tonight

Request Night

Hungarian March (Rakoczy)....Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"..Puccini

From the Suite "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
a. Morning Mood.
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King
Eili, Eili (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky

Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Largo ....Handel
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, Organ, Harp and Strings)
Pomp and Circumstance..........Elgar

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 28

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

Tonight the request program will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall. This is the most popular Pops program of them all, in that the numbers are entirely determined by the vote of the Pops audiences. The program follows:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy).......Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell".......Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
From the Suite "Peer Gynt".......Crieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Eili, Eili (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
(Solo trumpet, Mr. Georges Mager)
Kammenio Ostrow (Reve Angelique) Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennella, "1812".Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"..........Casella
Largo (Solo, violin, J. Theodorowicz, Organ, harp and strings)...... Handel
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ).Elgar

HERALD. JUNE 28

REPEAT PROGRAMME

Those who came to Request Night at the Pop concert last night were numerous enough to fill Symphony Hall twice over. Indeed, so many were unable to obtain tickets for this most popular programme of them all that the management has decided to accommodate them by repeating the request programme intact next Monday, July 4, instead of the programme originally announced for that date.

Tonight's programme follows:

Coronation March ....Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon" ....Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ....Puccini
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ....Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ...Pierne
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Charge of the Hussars ....Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" ....Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ....Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid" ....Massenet

POST-JUNE-29

TONIGHT'S POPS

Those who attended Request night at the Pop concerts last night were numerous enough to fill Symphony Hall twice over. So many were unable to obtain tickets that the management has decided to repeat the request program intact next Monday, July 4, instead of the program originally announced for that date.

Tonight's program follows:

Coronation March..........Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon"..........Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life"..........Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme"..........Puccini
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers.......Pierne
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Charge of the Hussars..........Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"..........Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"..........Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid"..........Massenet

HERALD JUNE 29.

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March..........Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon"..........Weber
Waltz, "Artist's Life"..........Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohême"........Puccini
Second Hungarian Rhapsody......Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers, Pierné
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Charge of the Hussars..........Spindler
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"......Herbert
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".......Vollstedt
Aragonaise from "The Cid"...Massenet

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 29.

At the Pops Tonight

Military Polonaise....Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Strauss
Habanera and Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ....Bizet
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saëns
Egyptian Ballet..........Luigini
Gavotte—Tarantelle ....Jacchia
Hungarian Dance in G minor (No. 1), Brahms
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
Spanish Dance, "Bolero"....Mozkowski
Mazurka, "La Czarina"..........Ganne
Indian War Dance (Cheyenne)...Skilton

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 30.
[1333]

LAST RUSSIAN NIGHT OF SEASON AT POPS

The second and last Russian-Tschaikowsky night of the season will take place at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight. The following program has been compiled for the occasion by Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor:

Entrance of Antony into Egypt........Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty".......Tschaikowsky
Orientale (Arr. by Gustave Strube)........Cui
Marche Slave..........Tschaikowsky
Finale, "Scheherazade"......Rimsky-Korsakoff
(Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.)
Eili, Eili..........Arr. by Agide Jacchia
(Mr. Georges Mayer, solo trumpet.)
Russian Dance, "Trepak".......Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solonnelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Finale of the 4th Symphony, Allegro con fuoco ....Tschaikowsky
Russian Folk Songs—
(a) Kalinka.
(b) Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar......Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

HERALD-JULY

ANCE MUSIC AT POPS

program consisting entirely of dance music, which comprises a large and fascinating part of the Pops repertory, will feature the concert in Symphony Hall tonight.

Military Polonaise.......Chopin-Glazounoff
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"..........Strauss
Habanera and Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ....Bizet
cchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saens
yptian Ballet..........Luigini
Gavotte b. Tarantelle..........Jacchia
ngarian Dance in G minor No. 1)..........Brahms
llet Music from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
anish Dance, "Bolero"......Mozkowski
azurka, "La Czarina"..........Ganne
dian War Dance (Cheyenne)....Skilton

HERALD-JUNE

טשאיקאווסקי פראגראם אין סימפאני האלל

קומענדע זונטאג נאכמיטאג וועט אין סימפאני האלל געגעבען ווערען א טשאיקאווסקי קאנצערט פון סימפאני ארקעסטער. צוויי סאלאאיסטען וועלען זיך באטייליגען אין דעם קאנצערט. ריטשארד בורגין, דער גרויסער רוסישער וויאלין שפּיעלער, און זשעני בערדעטי, דער גרויסער סעליסט, וועלען זיין דיא סאלאאיסטען.

PROGRAMMA DI MUSICA VERDIANA AI POPS

Il programma Verdiano — uno dei più popolari della stagione dei Pops in Symphony Hall, di cui rimangono solamente tre settimane— sarà dato martedì sera prossimo sotto l'ispirata ed autorevole direzione del Maestro Agide Jacchia.

Il programma che sarà eseguito è il presente:

1. Prologue to "Pagliacci" — Leoncavallo.
2. Overture to "William Tell" — Rossini.
3. Minuet — Bolzoni.
4. Hymn to the sun from "Iris" — Mascagni.
5. Fantasia "Ballo in Maschera" —
6. Quartet from "Rigoletto" — Verdi.
7. Prelude to "Aida"
8. Fantasia, "Otello"
9. Rhapsody "Italia" — Casella .
10. Waltz, "Le Seran Rose" — Arditi.
11. Marcia Reale Italiana — Cabetti.

האָט פּראָהיבישאָן געווירקט אויף דער פּאָפּולאַריטעט פון דיא „פּאָפּס-קאָנצערטען.

די באריהמטע באסטאנער אינסטיטוציע, די „פּאפּס-קאנצערטען“ אין סימפאני האל, האט דורכגעלעבט זעהר פיעל ענדערונגען פון דער צייט ווען זי איז געגרינדעט געווארען אין 1885. ווען פּראהיבישאן איז געווארען א געזעץ, האבען מאנכע געדיינקט אז די „פּאפּס-קאנצערטען“ וועלען רעוואלוציאניזירט ווערען און אנדערע ווידער האבען געגלויבט אז די קאנצערטען וועלען אונטערגעהן. אויסגעלאזט האט זיך פּונקט פארקעהרט.

ווען די „ביל און פעיר“ איז אלס רעזולטאט פון פּראהיבישאן געענדערט געווארען אין פריהלינג פון 1919, האט דיזע ענדערונג ניט געווירקט אויף אזוי ווייט, אז עס זאל זיך ארויסזעהן א שאדען וואס קען פארדונקלען די היסטאריע פון דער ערפאלגרייכער עקזיסטענץ פון דיזע קאנצערטען.

די ביכער פון דער פערוואלטונג בעווייזען אז זייט די לעצטע צוויי יאהר האבען מעהר מענשען באזוכט די קאנצערטען און אז א פיל גרעסערע צאהל שפּייז און געטרענקע איז פארברויכט געווארען, ווי אין די פערגאנגענע יאהרען. בפרט נאך ווען מען דערמאנט זיך אז אין 1890 איז „שנאפּס“ געווען דער פּאפּולערסטער געטראנק ביי די „פּאפּס-קאנצערטען“, מוז מען קומען צום שלום אז פּראהיבישאן האט גאר ניט געווירקט אויף די קאנצערטען.

ווען די „פּאפּס-קאנצערטען“ זיינען געגרינדעט געווארען, צו פארנעהמען דעם פּלאץ פון ווינטער קאנצערטען מיט דער באסטאן סימפאני ארקעסטער אין אלטען מוזיק-האל אויף העמילטאן פּליים איז „ביער, ווין און לייכטע וויין“ אזוי פּאפּולער געווארען צוזאמען מיט דער מוזיק, אז די „פּראמענאיד-קאנצערטען“ ווי מען האט זיי דאן גערופען, זיינען געווארען די איינציגע אמוזירונג פאר מענשען וואס האבען געוואלט פארברייגען אן אנגענעהמען זומער-אווענד.

דער קעלער איז געווען פול מיט ביער-פעסלאך, און הונדערטער גלעזער זיינען געווען אויסגעשטעלט אין ליין. די ביער האט געמוזט געצאפּט ווערען דורך סטיעם, כדי צו קענען בעפריעדיגען דעם גרויסען פערלאנג. א גרויסע פייפ האט זיך געצויגען פון בייסמענט צום בארטיש און דער שאפּען האט זיך קיינמאל ניט פערמאכט. אריבער 240 גאלאן ביער פלעגט אויסגעצאפּט ווערען יעדע נאכט.

אין יענער צייט ווען עס פלעגט פארקומען א „הארווארד-נאכט“ פאר די הארווארד סטודענטען, האט זיך אבגעטען חושך. די סטודענטען האבען זיך געווארפען טשערס איבער די קעפּ און דער ווייטער האט געמוזט ריזיקירען מיט זיין לעבען צוצוקומען צו א באשטימטע טישעל. אין איינער פון אזעלכע שטורמישע אווענדען האט דער קאנדוקטאר טימאטהי אראמאווסקי ניט געקענט ארויסברענגען אזעלכע הויכע טענער מיט זיין ארקעסטער, וועלכע זאלען קענען בייקוכען דעם ליארם פון עולם. ער איז דאן געווארען אין כעס, האט אוועקגעווארפען זיין שטעקעל, און איז ארונטער פון פלאטפארם, רופענדיג דעם גאנצען ארקעסטער מיט זיך. עס האט געדויערט פולע דריי פירטעל שטונדען ביז וואנען עס איז געלינגען צו בארוהיגען דעם עולם און באוועגען דעם קאנדוקטאר אז ער זאל ארויס מיט זיין ארקעסטער און פארטזעצען זיין פראגראם.

נאך בעפאר פּראהיבישאן איז געווארען געזעצליך, אין 1890, האט דער פּאליס-קאמישאנער צוגענומען די לייסענס פון די „פּאפּס“ אויס געוויסע טעכנישע אורזאכען.

א גאנצען סיזאן האבען די „פּאפּס-קאנצערטען“ דערפון געליטען, אבער באלד זיינען טויזענדער מענשען געקומען און די צאהל פון באזוכער איז פארגרעסערט געווארען.

דאס איז א לעבעדיגער בעווייז, אז די „פּאפּס-קאנצערטען“ זיינען ניט פּאפּולער געווען צוליעב דעם גוטען ביער און וויין וועלכע זיינען אמאל דארט סערווירט געווארען נור אז דיזע קאנצערטען זיינען היינט, נאכדעם ווי פּראהיבישאן איז אריין אין קראפט, פיעל מעהר פּאפּולער געווארען ווי אין די פריהערדיגע יאהרען פאר די אינהאלטסרייכע מוזיקאלישע פּראגראמען וואס ווערען ביי דיזע קאנצערטען אויסגעפיהרט, — פּראגראמען מיט קאמפּאזיציעס פון די גרעסטע מוזיקאלישע קלאסיקער, געשפּיעלט פון אן ארקעסטער לויטער קינסטלער.

עס איז אן אמת'ער פארגעניגען צו פארברייגען א זומער-אווענד אין די „פּאפּס“!

Programma di musica italiana

Martedì sera 21 corrente, nella Symphony Hall sarà tenuto il p grande concerto musicale della ser svolta in questa stagione dall'Orchestra dei "Pops". Diretta ed animat dal maestro Agide Jacchia, l'eccellente Orchestra svolgerà magistralmente il seguente programma di musi italiana:

1 — Prologo dei "Pagliacci" — R. Leoncavallo;
2 — Overture del "Guglielmo Tell" — Rossini;
3 — Minuet — Bolzoni;
4 — Inno al Sole dell'"Iris" - Notte, Tramonto, Alba — Mascagni;
5 — Fantasia "Ballo in Maschera"
6 — Quartetto del "Rigoletto"
7 — Preludio di "Aida"
8 — Fantasia, "Otello" di Giuseppe Verdi.
9 — Rhapsodia "Italia" — Casella
10 — Walz, Se saran rose—Ar
11 — Marcia Reale Italiana — betti.

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of Anthony into Egypt. Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty".... Tschaikowsky
Orientale (arranged by Gustave Strube) ....Cui
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Finale "Scheherazade".Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Eili, Eili (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
(Solo trumpet—Mr. Georges Mager.)
Russian Dance, "Trepak".Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Finale of the 4th Symphony, Allegro con fuoco..........Tschaikowsky
Russian Folk Songs—
a. Kalinka.
b. Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar.......... Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY

גט אן אנגענעהמען זומער דער קעלער איז געווע
ביער־פעסלאך, און הונדערט
זיינען געווען אויסגעשטעלט
די ביער האט געמוזט געצא
הויך סטיעס, כדי צו קענען
נען דעם גרויסען פערלאנג.
טיש האט זיך געצויגען פון
צום באר־טיש און דער שאפען
קיינמאל נים פערמאכט. אין
גאלאן ביער פלעגט אויסגעצאפ
יעדע נאכט.
אין יענער צייט ווען עס
פארקומען א „הארווארד־נאכט“
הארווארד סטודענטען, האט זיך
טוען חושך. די סטודענטען האב
נעווארפען טשערס איבער די
דער וויטער האט געמוזט ריזיקיר
זיין לעבען צוצוקומען צו א באנ
טישעל. אין איינער פון אזעלכע
מישע אווענדען האט דער קאנדוק
טימאטהי אראמאווסקי נים גע
ארויסברענגען אזעלכע הויכע
מיט זיין ארקעסטער, וועלכע זאל
נען בייקוכען דעם ליארם פון
איז ראן געווארען אין כעס, האט
געווארפען זיין שטעקעל, און איז
טער פון פלאטפארם, רופענדיג דעם
צען ארקעסטער מיט זיך. עס האט
דויערט פולע דריי פירטעל שטונד
וואנען עס איז געלינגען צו באנ
דעם עולם און באוועגען דעם קאנד
טאר אז ער זאל ארויס מיט זיין ארק
טער און פארטזעצען זיין פראגראם.
נאך בעפאר פראהיבישאן איז
ותארען געזעצליך, אין 1890, האט ד
פאליס־קאמישאנער צוגענומען די
סענס פון די „פאפס“ אויס געווינ
טעכנישע אורזאכען.
א גאנצע סיזאן האבען די „פאפס
קאנצערטען“ דערפון געליטען. אבע
באלד זיינען טויזענדער מענשען גע
מען און די צאהל פון באזוכער איז פאר
גרעסערט געווארען.
דאס איז א לעבעדיגער בעווייז, אז ד
„פאפס־קאנצערטען“ זיינען נים פאפו
לער געווען צוליעב דעם גוטען ביער א
ווייל וועלכע זיינען אמאל דארט סער
ווירט געווארען נור אז דיזע קאנצערט
זיינען היינט, נאכדעם ווי פראהיבישא
איז אריין אין קראפט, פיעל מעהר פא
פולערער געווארען ווי אין די פריהער
דיגע יאהרען פאר די אינהאלטסרייכ
מוזיקאלישע פראגראמען וואס ווערע
ביי דיזע קאנצערטען אויסגעפירט.
פראגראמען מיט קאמפאזיציעס פון
גרעסטע מוזיקאלישע קלאסיקער, גע
שפיעלט פון אן ארקעסטער לויט
קינסטלער.
עס איז אן אמת'ער פארגעניגען צ פארברייינגען א זומער־אווענד אין ד
„פאפס“!

Programma di musica italiana

Martedì sera 21 corrente, nella Symphony Hall sarà tenuto il più grande concerto musicale della serie svolta in questa stagione dall'Orchestra dei "Pops". Diretta ed animata dal maestro Agide Jacchia, l'eccellente Orchestra svolgerà magistralmente il seguente programma di musica italiana:

1 — Prologo dei "Pagliacci" — R. Leoncavallo;
2 — Overture del "Guglielmo Tell" — Rossini;
3 — Minuet — Bolzoni;
4 — Inno al Sole dell'"Iris" - Notte Tramonto, Alba — Mascagni;
5 — Fantasia "Ballo in Maschera"
6 — Quartetto del "Rigoletto"
7 — Preludio di "Aida"
8 — Fantasia "Otello" di Giuseppe Verdi.
9 — Rhapsodia "Italia" — Case
10 — Walz, Se saran rose—Ardit
11 — Marcia Reale Italiana — C etti.

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of Anthony into Egypt. Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty"....Tschaikowsk
Orientale (arranged by Gustave Strube) ....Cu
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsk
Finale "Scheherazade". Rimsky-Korsako
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Elli, Elli (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
(Solo trumpet—Mr. Georges Mager.)
Russian Dance, "Trepak". Tschaikowsk
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsk
Finale of the 4th Symphony, Allegro con fuoco..........Tschaikowsk
Russian Folk Songs—
a. Kalinka.
b. Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar.......... Ippolitoff-Iva

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

At the Pops Tonight

Introduction to "Othello" (The Tempest) ....Verdi
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppé
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust"..............Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Elli, Elli.......Arranged by A. Jacchia
(Solo trumpet—Georges Mager)
"The Last Spring"...............Grieg
Carnival in Paris..............Svendsen
Southern Rhapsody.............Hosmer
Mexican Serenade, "La Paloma," Yradier
Marche Slav..............Tschaikowsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS-JULY 2.

POPS ENTER THEIR LAST WEEK

Programs of special interest will make the last six nights of the season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall unusually attractive. For the holiday, Monday, July 4th, the program originally announced has been changed in order that the thousands of disappointed Pops enthusiasts who could not gain admission to the regular Request Night last Tuesday may hear this most popular program of them all. On Wednesday night, July 6th, Agide Jacchia and the famous Pops symphony orchestra, will be heard in a program featuring the splendid music of Poland and of such composers as Chopin and Paderewski. Thursday night will bring a Wagner program, considered the highest in quality which are to be heard at the Pops. The closing night, Saturday, July 9th, is always the occasion of a farewell demonstration. The request program, which has been determined entirely by the vote of the Pop public, and will be heard on Monday evening, follows:

1. Hungarian March (Rakoczy) ....Berlioz
2. Overture to "William Tell"......Rossini
3. Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
4. Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" ...Puccini
   Star Spangled Banner.
5. From the Suite "Peer Gynt"......Grieg
   a-Morning Mood. b-In the Hall of the Mountain King.
6. Elli, Elli (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
7. Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) ....Rubinstein
8. Overture Solennelle "1812" Tschaikowski
9. Rhapsody, "Italia"..............Casella
10. Largo (Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz) ....Handel
   Organ, Harp and Strings.
11. Pomp and Circumstance ....Elgar
Encores: Volga Bargemen's Song,
Hindu Song From "Sadko" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff

AMER. JULY 2.

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Only six nights of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall remain. Tomorrow the opportunity will be afforded those who could not obtain tickets for the request night last Tuesday to hear this most popular of Pop programs repeated. For Wednesday night Agide Jacchia, the far-famed conductor of the Pops, has prepared a Polish program featuring the music of Chopin, Paderewski and others. For Thursday night a Wagner program will provide music of the highest quality that can be heard at these concerts. The closing night is always a gala occasion.

ADV. JULY. 3

LAST WEEK OF POPS

The six nights of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall which remain of the present season abound with programs of interest. Tomorrow (Monday, July 4) the opportunity will be afforded those who could not obtain tickets for the Request night last Tuesday to hear this most popular of Pops programs, entirely determined by the vote of the Pops public, for this program is to be repeated intact on this date. It was plainly revealed last Tuesday that every number and encore of the request program affords delight to the many in the highest degree. For Wednesday, July 6, Agide Jacchia, the far-famed conductor of the Pops, has prepared a Polish program of interest, featuring the music of Chopin, Paderewski and their compatriots. For Thursday, July 7, a Wagner program will provide music of the highest quality that can be heard at these concerts. The closing night (Saturday, July 9) is always a gala occasion. The programs of the closing week follows:

MONDAY, JULY 4
Request program (repeated)
Hungarian March (Rakoczy).......Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell"........Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"....Puccini
"The Star Spangled Banner"
From the suite, "Peer Gynt".........Grieg
a. Morning Mood
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King
Elli, Elli ...(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) Rubinstein
Overture solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"....................Casella
Largo ....Handel
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; organ, harp and strings)
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) Edgar Encores:
Volga Bargemen's Song
Hindu song from "Sadko"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff

TUESDAY, JULY 5
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..... Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"...Suppe
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"..Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"..............Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"..............Wagner
Organ solo, Caprice Heroique.......Bennet
(Albert W. Snow)
Canzonetta, "Little Italy"......Riesenfeld
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman"..... Offenbach
Indian Summer, "An American Idyl" Herbert
Cortege of the Sardar.....Ipolitoff-Ivanoff
WEDNESDAY, JULY 6
(Polish night)
Polonaise Militaire..................Chopin
Overture, "Phedre"...............Massenet
Waltz, "La Barcarole"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"..........................Verdi
Polish Dance.....................Scharwenka
Violin solo, "Mazurka"...........Zarzycki
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz)
Nocturne, opus 48, No. 1..........Chopin
Fantasia from the opera, "Manru".. Paderewski
"Polskie Kwiaty," selection of polish songs and dances
En Badinant ....d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Boyards..........Halvorsen
THURSDAY, JULY 7
(Wagner Night)
Coronation March..................Meyerbeer
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods at Walhalla, from "Das Rheingold"............Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Dreams ....Wagner
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz)
Procession to the Cathedral, from Act II, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 3...............Dvorak
Waltz, "The Skaters"..........Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" ....Wagner
FRIDAY, JULY 8
March, "El Capitan"...................Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina"..........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"........Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".............Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major.....Brahms
Balse Triste..............................Sibelius
Marche Slave..............Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".................Verdi
Melodie-Valse ....Schutt
"In the Hall of the Mountain King"..Grieg
SATURDAY, JULY 9
(Closing night)
Entrance of the Gladiators..........Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".........Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Cymbal Dance ....Chaminade
Largo from the "New World" Symphony ....Dvorak
Lion du Bal...............................Gillet
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..Tschaikowsky
Introduction to Act III., "Lahengrin." Wagner
Russian Folk Song, "Dubinushka," (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
American Military Fantasy......Rollinson

HERALD-JULY 4

HERALD-JULY 3.

Last Week of Pops

Programs of special interest will make the last six nights of the season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall unusually attractive. For the holiday, Monday, July 4, the program originally announced has been changed in order that the thousands of disappointed Pops enthusiasts who could not gain admission to the regular request night last Tuesday may hear this most popular program of them all. On Wednesday night, July 6, will be heard a program featuring the splendid music of Poland and of such composers as Chopin and Paderewski. Thursday night will bring a Wagner program. The closing night, Saturday, July 9, is always the occasion of a farewell demonstration.

TRAV-JULY. 2.

Last Week of the Pops at Symphony Hall

The "Request Night" program, which attracted an audience last Tuesday sufficient to have filled Symphony Hall to more than double its capacity, will be repeated tomorrow night, in order that those who could not get in may have another chance to listen to a program chosen strictly in accordance with a popular vote taken among the Pops audiences.

Wednesday a Polish program, and Thursday a Wagner program, are the other special features of this, the last week of the Pops season. Tomorrow's "request program" follows: Hungarian March, Berlioz; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Elli, Elli," arranged by Jacchia; Mammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein; Ouverture Solennette, "1812," Tschaikowsky rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; Largo, Handel; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar.

The encores will be as follows: Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged by Jacchia; Hindu Song from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj, and Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff.

GLOBE. JULY. 3

REPEAT POPS REQUEST PROGRAM TONIGHT

So huge was the attendance at the regular request night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall last Tuesday night, and so numerous were the patrons who could not obtain seats, that the management has decided to repeat at tonight's concert this 100 per cent. popular program, the numbers of which have been entirely determined by public vote. The program in full:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy)......Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell".......Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"....Puccini
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt".........Grieg
a. Morning Mood.
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Elli, Elli (arranged by Agide Jacchia).
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812". Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"..................Casella
Largo ....Handel
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz
Harp, organ and strings.
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) Elgar
Encores: Volga Bergemen's Song.
Hindu song from "Sadko" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria.........Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff

HERALD-JULY 4

At the Pops Tonight

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".... Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"..........Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"...........Wagner
Organ Solo,
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)
Canzonetta, "Little Italy"....Riesenfeld
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Indian Summer, An American Idyl. Herbert
Cortège of the Sardar....Ipolitoff-Ivanoff

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS, JULY. 5.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
POPS
LAST 5 NIGHTS
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
AGIDE JACCHIA Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (no tax)

TRAV-JULY. 6.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
POPS
Last 4 Nights
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
AGIDE JACCHIA Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
TONIGHT—POLISH PROGRAMME
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (no tax)

HERALD-JULY. 6.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
POPS
Last 4 Nights
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
Agide Jacchia Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
TONIGHT—POLISH PROGRAM
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (No tax)

GLOBE-JULY. 6.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
LAST 4 NIGHTS
POPS
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
Agide Jacchia Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
Tonight—POLISH PROGRAM
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (no tax)

POST-JULY. 6.

POLISH MUSIC AT POPS

An unusually interesting program, featuring the music of Chopin, Paderewski and other Polish composers, will be given at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Polonaise Militaire..........................Chopin
Overture, "Phedre"........................Massenet
Waltz, "La Barcarole"................Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"..................................Verdi
Polish Dance................................Scharwenka
Violin Solo, "Mazurka"...................Zarzycki
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz.)
Nocturne, Opus 48, No. 1....................Chopin
Fantasia from the Opera "Manru"..Paderewski
"Polskie Kwiaty," Selection of Polish Songs and Dances.
En Badinant...............................d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Boyards..............Halvorsen

HERALD-JULY

ADVER. JULY 6.

Hugo Riesenfeld, whose new work, "Little Italy," was played for the first time in Boston at the Pops last night.

The program at the Pops last night included the playing, for the first time in Boston, of a new composition by Hugo Rissenfeld, the celebrated motion picture musician, who composes scores for most of the big feature films, including the "Four Horsemen," now playing in Boston.

It is called "Little Italy," and is a humorous, descriptive bit describing characters and themes in the New York Italian quarter.

The piece is taken from a suite by Rissenfeld called, "Themes in New York," and the entire suite will be played at the Pops during the Fall season.

The composition was well

At the Pops Tonight

Polish Programme

Polonaise Militaire.............Chopin
Overture "Phèdre"..........Massenet
Waltz, "La Barcarole"......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"...................Verdi
Polish Dance...............Scharwenka
Violin Solo, "Mazurka"......Zarzycki
(Julius Theodorowicz)
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1........Chopin
Fantasia from the Opera "Manru," Paderewski
"Polskie Kwiaty," Selections of Polish Songs and Dances
En Badinant................d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY. 6.

POPS' WAGNER PROGRAM

The second and last Wagner program of the season will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers:

Coronation march..............Meyerbeer
Invitation to the dance......Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods to Walhalla from "Das Rheingold".......Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..........................Wagner
Dreams (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz) Wagner
Procession to the Cathedral from Act. II, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Slavonic dance No. 3...................Dvorak
Waltz, "The Skaters".........Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" ....Wagner

HERALD-JULY. 7.

WAGNER AT POPS TONIGHT

The second and last Wagner programme of the season, one of the best liked of the special Pops programmes, will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Coronation March ....Meyerbeer
Invitation to the Dance.......Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods to Walhalla from "Das Rheingold" ....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Dreams (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz). Wagner
Procession to the Cathedral from Act II., "Lohengrin".................................Wagner
Overuture to "Tannhauser"...........Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 3........................Dvorak
Waltz, "The Skaters".................Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner

POST-JULY. 7.

At the Pops Tonight

Wagner Programme

Coronation March ....Meyerbeer
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods to Walhalla from "Das Rheingold".......Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.—Dreams (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz).—Procession to Cathedral from Act II., "Lohengrin." — Overture to "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 8...........Dvořák
Waltz, "The Skaters"......Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walküre" ....Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY 7.

At the Pops Tonight

March, "El Capitan"..........Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"......Suppé
Waltz, "Estudiantina"......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".......Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major..Brahms
Valse Triste....................Sibelius
Marche Slave.........Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"..............Verdi
Melodie-Valse ....Schütt
"In the Hall of the Mountain King" ....Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JULY 8.

TWO MORE POPS

At the last Pop concert of the season but one, in Symphony Hall tonight, the Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following popular program:

March, "El Capitan".......................Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"...............Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina"..............Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"...........Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..................Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major.......Brahms
Valse Triste................................Sibelius
Marche Slave....................Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".......................Verdi
Melodia—Valse..............................Schutt
In in Hall of the Mountain King"...Grieg

HERALD-MAY 8.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the last Pop concert of the season but one, to take place in Symphony Hall tonight, the orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following popular programme:

March, "El Capitan" ....Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ....Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" ....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major.........Brahms
Valse Triste ....Sibelius
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
Melodie-Valse ....Schutt
"In the Hall of the Mountain King"....Grieg

POST-JULY 8.

POPS CLOSE TONIGHT

A program rich in the most popular of Pops music will further enliven the closing night of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, which is always an event of special interest and attraction. This final program follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators........Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".......Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".......................Verdi
Cymbal dance.................Chaminade
Largo from "The New World Symphony"........................ Dvorak
"Lion du Bal"..........................Gillet
Overture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
American Military Fantasy......Rollinson

HERALD-JULY 9.

[134]

מענשען וואס האבען געוואו גען אן אנגענעהמען זומער־
דער קעלער איז געווען
ביער־פעסלאך, און הונדערט
זיינען געווען אויסגעשטעלט
די ביער האט געמוזט געצא
הויך סטיעס, כדי צו קענען
גען דעם גרויסען פערלאנג.
פיף האט זיך געצויגען פון
צום באר־טיש און דער שאפען
קיינמאל נים פערמאכט. ארט
גלאזן ביער פלעגט אויסגעצאפ
יעדע נאכט.

אין יענער צייט ווען עס
פארקומען א „הארווארד־נאכט"
הארווארד סטודענטען, האט זיך
טען חושך. די סטודענטען האבען
געווארפען טשערס איבער די
דער ווייטער האט געמוזט ריזיקירען
זיין לעבען צוצוקומען צו א באשטי
טישעל. אין איינער פון אזעלכע
מישע אוועקנדען האט דער קאנדוקטער
טימאטהי אדאמאווסקי נים געקוקט
ארויסברענגען אזעלכע הויכע טע
מיט זיין ארקעסטער, וועלכע זאלען
גען בייקוכען דעם ליארם פון עולם.
איז דאן געווארען אין כעס, האט
געווארפען זיין שטעקעל, און איז א
טער פון פלאטפארם, רופענדיג דעם
צען ארקעסטער מיט זיך. עס האט
דויערט פולע דריי פירטעל שטונדען
וואנען עס איז געלינגען צו בארוהיגען
דעם עולם און באוועגען דעם קאנדוקטער
טאר אז ער זאל ארויס מיט זיין ארקע
טער און פארטזעצען זיין פראגראם.

נאך בעפאר פראהיבישאן איז
ווארען געזעצליך, אין 1890, האט די
פאליס־קאמישאנער צוגענומען די ל סענס פון די „פאפס" אויס געווי
טעכנישע אורזאכען.

א גאנצען סיזאן האבען די „פאפס קאנצערטען" דערפון געליטען, אבער
באלד זיינען טויזענדער מענשען געק
מען און די צאהל פון באזוכער איז פאר
גרעסערט געווארען.

דאס איז א לעבעדיגער בעווייז, אז די
„פאפס־קאנצערטען" זיינען נים פאפו
לער געווען צוליעב דעם גוטען ביער און
וויין וועלכע זיינען אמאל דארט סער
ווירט געווארען נור אז דיזע קאנצערטע
זיינען היינט, נאכדעם ווי פראהיבישא
איז אריין אין קראפט, פיעל מעהר פאפ
פולערער געווארען ווי אין די פריהער
דיגע יאהרען פאר די אינהאלטסריכ
מוזיקאלישע פראגראמען וואס ווערע
ביי דיזע קאנצערטען אויסגעפירט,
פראגראמען מיט קאמפאזיציעס פון ד
גרעסטע מוזיקאלישע קלאסיקער, גע
שפיעלט פון אן ארקעסטער לויטער
קינסטלער.

עס איז אן אמת'ער פארגעניגען צ פארברייגנען א זומער־אוונד אין די
„פאפס"!

Programma di musica italiana

Martedì sera 21 corrente, nella Symphony Hall sarà tenuto il più grande concerto musicale della serie svolta in questa stagione dall'Orchestra dei "Pops". Diretta ed animata dal maestro Agide Jacchia, l'eccellente Orchestra svolgerà magistralme te il seguente programma di musica italiana:

1 — Prologo dei "Pagliacci" — R. Leoncavallo;
2 — Overture del "Guglielmo Tell" — Rossini;
3 — Minuet — Bolzoni;
4 — Inno al Sole dell'"Iris" - Notte Tramonto, Alba — Mascagni;
5 — Fantasia "Ballo in Maschera"
6 — Quartetto del "Rigoletto"
7 — Preludio di "Aida"
8 — Fantasia "Otello" di Giuseppe Verdi.
9 — Rhapsodia "Italia" — Case
10 — Walz, Se saran rose—Ardi
11 — Marcia Reale Italiana -- G
petti.

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of Anthony into Egypt. Arensk
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" from the Suite, "The Sleeping Beauty".... Tschaikowsk
Orientale (arranged by Gustave Strube) ....Cu
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsk
Finale "Scheherazade". Rimsky-Korsako
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Eili, Eili (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
(Solo trumpet—Mr. Georges Mager.)
Russian Dance, "Trepak". Tschaikows
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikows
Finale of the 4th Symphony, Allegro con fuoco........Tschaikows
Russian Folk Songs—
a. Kaliaka.
b. Volga Bargemen's Song.
Procession of the Sardar.......... Ippolitoff-Iva

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

At the Pops Tonight

Introduction to "Othello" (The Tempest) ....Verdi
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppé
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust"..............Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin"........Wagner
Eili, Eili........Arranged by A. Jacchia
(Solo trumpet—Georges Mager)
"The Last Spring"..............Grieg
Carnival in Paris..............Svendsen
Southern Rhapsody.............Hosmer
Mexican Serenade, "La Paloma," Yradier
Marche Slav..............Tschaikowsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY. 2.

POPS ENTER THEIR LAST WEEK

Programs of special interest will make the last six nights of the season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall unusually attractive. For the holiday, Monday, July 4th, the program originally announced has been changed in order that the thousands of disappointed Pops enthusiasts who could not gain admission to the regular Request Night last Tuesday may hear this most popular program of them all. On Wednesday night, July 6th, Agide Jacchia and the famous Pops symphony orchestra, will be heard in a program featuring the splendid music of Poland and of such composers as Chopin and Paderewski. Thursday night will bring a Wagner program, considered the highest in quality which are to be heard at the Pops The closing night, Saturday, July 9th, is always the occasion of a farewell demonstration. The request program, which has been determined entirely by the vote of the Pop public, and will be heard on Monday evening, follows:

1. Hungarian March (Rakoozy) ....Berlion
2. Overture to "William Tell" .....Rossini
3. Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
4. Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" ...Puccini
   Star Spangled Banner.
5. From the Suite "Peer Gynt"......Crieg
   a-Morning Mood. b-In the Hall of the Mountain King.
6. Eili, Eili (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
7. Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) ....Rubinstein
8. Overture Solennelle "1812". Tschaikowski
9. Rhapsody, "Italia" ....Casella
10. Largo (Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz) ....Handel
    Organ, Harp and Strings.
11. Pomp and Circumstance ....Elgar

Encores: Volga Bargemen's Song,
Hindu Song From "Sadko" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff

AMER. JULY

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Only six nights of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall remain. Tomorrow the opportunity will be afforded those who could not obtain tickets for the request night last Tuesday to hear this most popular of Pop programs repeated. For Wednesday night Agide Jacchia, the far-famed conductor of the Pops, has prepared a Polish program, featuring the music of Chopin, Paderewski and others. For Thursday night a Wagner program will provide music of the highest quality that can be heard at these concerts. The closing night is always a gala occasion.

ADV. JULY 3

LAST WEEK OF POPS

The six nights of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall which remain of the present season abound with programs of interest. Tomorrow (Monday, July 4) the opportunity will be afforded those who could not obtain tickets for the Request night last Tuesday to hear this most popular of Pops programs, entirely determined by the vote of the Pops public, for this program is to be repeated intact on this date. It was plainly revealed last Tuesday that every number and encore of the request program affords delight to the many in the highest degree. For Wednesday, July 6, Agide Jacchia, the far-famed conductor of the Pops, has prepared a Polish program of interest, featuring the music of Chopin, Paderewski and their compatriots. For Thursday, July 7, a Wagner program will provide music of the highest quality that can be heard at these concerts. The closing night (Saturday, July 9) is always a gala occasion. The programs of the closing week follows:

MONDAY, JULY 4

Request program (repeated)
Hungarian March (Rakoczy)........Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell"........Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..........................Strauss
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"....Puccini
"The Star Spangled Banner"
From the suite, "Peer Gynt" ....Grieg
a. Morning Mood
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King
Eili, Eili ....(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) Rubinstein
Overture solennelle, "1812" , Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia" ....Casella
Largo ....Handel
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; organ, harp and strings)
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) Edgar
Encores:
Volga Bargemen's Song
Hindu song from "Sadko"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff

TUESDAY, JULY 5

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"...... Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"....Suppe
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"..Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"...............Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"..............Wagner
Organ solo, Caprice Heroique.....Bennet
(Albert W. Snow)
Canzonetta, "Little Italy".......Riesenfeld
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman".... Offenbach
Indian Summer, "An American Idyl" Herbert
Cortege of the Sardar.....Ipolitoff-Ivanoff

WEDNESDAY, JULY 6
(Polish night)

Polonaise Militaire.................Chopin
Overture, "Phedre"..............Massenet
Waltz, "La Barcarole".........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"......................Verdi
Polish Dance...................Scharwenka
Violin solo, "Mazurka"...........Zarzycki
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz)
Nocturne, opus 48, No. 1...........Chopin
Fantasia from the opera, "Manru".. Paderewski
"Polskie Kwiaty," selection of polish songs and dances
En Badinant ....d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Boyards........Halvorsen

THURSDAY, JULY 7
(Wagner Night)

Coronation March.................Meyerbeer
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"..Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods at Walhalla, from "Das Rheingold"...........Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Dreams ....Wagner
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowiez)
Procession to the Cathedral, from Act II, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser"........Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 5................Dvorak
Waltz, "The Skaters"............Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" ....Wagner

FRIDAY, JULY 8

March, "El Capitan"................Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina".........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"........Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major.....Brahms
Balse Triste..........................Sibelius
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"..................Verdi
Melodie-Valse ....Schutt
"In the Hall of the Mountain King"..Grieg

SATURDAY, JULY 9
(Closing night)

Entrance of the Gladiators.........Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".........Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Cymbal Dance ....Chaminade
Largo from the "New World" Smyphony ....Dvorak
Lion du Bal.............................Gillet
Overture Solennelle, "1812"..Tschaikowsky
Introduction to Act III., "Lahengrin." Wagner
Russian Folk Song, "Dubinushka," (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinso

HERALD-JULY 3.

Last Week of Pops

Programs of special interest will make the last six nights of the season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall unusually attractive. For the holiday, Monday, July 4, the program originally announced has been changed in order that the thousands of disappointed Pops enthusiasts who could not gain admission to the regular request night last Tuesday may hear this most popular program of them all. On Wednesday night, July 6, will be heard a program featuring the splendid music of Poland and of such composers as Chopin and Paderewski. Thursday night will bring a Wagner program. The closing night, Saturday, July 9, is always the occasion of a farewell demonstration.

TRAV-JULY. 2.

Last Week of the Pops at Symphony Hall

The "Request Night" program, which attracted an audience last Tuesday sufficient to have filled Symphony Hall to more than double its capacity, will be repeated tomorrow night, in order that those who could not get in may have another chance to listen to a program chosen strictly in accordance with a popular vote taken among the Pops audiences.

Wednesday a Polish program, and Thursday a Wagner program, are the other special features of this, the last week of the Pops season. Tomorrow's "request program" follows: Hungarian March, Berlioz; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Jacchia; Mammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein; Ouverture Solennette, "1812," Tschaikowsky rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; Largo, Handel; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar.

The encores will be as follows: Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged by Jacchia; Hindu Song from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj, and Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff.

GLOBE. JULY. 3.

REPEAT POPS REQUEST PROGRAM TONIGHT

So huge was the attendance at the regular request night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall last Tuesday night, and so numerous were the patrons who could not obtain seats, that the management has decided to repeat at tonight's concert this 100 per cent. popular program, the numbers of which have been entirely determined by public vote. The program in full:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy)......Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell".........Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"....Puccini
From the Suite, "Peer Gynt"..........Grieg
a. Morning Mood:
b. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Eili, Eili (arranged by Agide Jacchia).
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812". Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Italia"......................Casella
Largo ....Handel
Solo violin, J. Theodorowiez
Harp, organ and strings.
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) Elgar
Encores: Volga Bergemen's Song.
Hindu song from "Sadko" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ave Maria..............Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ....Rachmaninoff

HERALD-JULY 4.

At the Pops Tonight

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".... Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".Ivanovici
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".........Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi"...........Wagner
Organ Solo,
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)
Canzonetta, "Little Italy"....Riesenfeld
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Indian Summer, An American Idyl. Herbert
Cortège of the Sardar....Ipolioff-Ivanoff

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY. 5.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
POPS
LAST 5 NIGHTS
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
AGIDE JACCHIA Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (no tax)

TRAV-JULY. 5.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
POPS
Last 4 Nights
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
AGIDE JACCHIA Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
TONIGHT—POLISH PROGRAMME
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (no tax)

HERALD-JULY 6.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
POPS
Last 4 Nights
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
Agide Jacchia Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
TONIGHT—POLISH PROGRAM
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (No tax)

GLOBE-JULY. 6.

SYMPHONY HALL—TONIGHT
LAST 4 NIGHTS
POPS
Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players
Agide Jacchia Conductor
Popular Music
Refreshments
Tonight—POLISH PROGRAM
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1 (no tax)

POST-JULY 6.

POLISH MUSIC AT POPS

An unusually interesting program, featuring the music of Chopin, Paderewski and other Polish composers, will be given at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Polonaise Militaire...........................Chopin
Overture, "Phedre"...........................Massenet
Waltz, "La Barcarole"........................Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"..................................Verdi
Polish Dance......................................Scharwenka
Violin Solo, "Mazurka"........................Zarzycki
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz.)
Nocturne, Opus 48, No. 1....................Chopin
Fantasia from the Opera "Manru"..Paderewski
"Polskie Kwiaty," Selection of Polish Songs and Dances.
En Badinant......................................d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Boyards.....................Halvorsen

HERALD-JULY 6

ADVER. JULY 6.

Hugo Riesenfeld, whose new work, "Little Italy," was played for the first time in Boston at the Pops last night.

The program at the Pops last night included the playing, for the first time in Boston, of a new composition by Hugo Rissenfeld, the celebrated motion picture musician, who composes scores for most of the big feature films, including the "Four Horsemen," now playing in Boston.

It is called "Little Italy," and is a humorous, descriptive bit describing characters and themes in the New York Italian quarter.

The piece is taken from a suite by Rissenfeld called, "Themes in New York," and the entire suite will be played at the Pops during the Fall season.

The composition was well

At the Pops Tonight

Polish Programme

Polonaise Militaire..............Chopin
Overture "Phèdre"...........Massenet
Waltz, "La Barcarole"......Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida"....................Verdi
Polish Dance..............Scharwenka
Violin Solo, "Mazurka".......Zarzycki
(Julius Theodorowicz)
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.........Chopin
Fantasia from the Opera "Manru," Paderewski
"Polskie Kwiaty," Selections of Polish Songs and Dances
En Badinant..............d'Ambrosio
Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen

TRANS. JULY. 6.

POPS' WAGNER PROGRAM

The second and last Wagner program of the season will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers:

Coronation march................Meyerbeer
Invitation to the dance......Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods to Walhalla from "Das Rheingold".......Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"........................Wagner
Dreams (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz) Wagner
Procession to the Cathedral from Act. II, "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Slavonic dance No. 3.............Dvorak
Waltz, "The Skaters".........Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" ....Wagner

HERALD-JULY 7.

WAGNER AT POPS TONIGHT

The second and last Wagner programme of the season, one of the best liked of the special Pops programmes, will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Coronation March ....Meyerbeer
Invitation to the Dance.........Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods to Walhalla from "Das Rheingold".......................Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..Wagner
Dreams (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz). Wagner
Procession to the Cathedral from Act II., "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overuture to "Tannhauser"..................Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 3.........................Dvorak
Waltz, "The Skaters"......................Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagne

POST-JULY 7.

At the Pops Tonight

Wagner Programme

Coronation March ....Meyerbeer
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".Leoncavallo
Entrance of the Gods to Walhalla from "Das Rheingold".......Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.—Dreams (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz).—Procession to Cathedral from Act II., "Lohengrin." — Overture to "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 8..........Dvoràk
Waltz, "The Skaters"......Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walküre" ....Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY 7.

At the Pops Tonight

March, "El Capitan"..........Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppé
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".......Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major..Brahms
Valse Triste....................Sibelius
Marche Slave...........Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"...........Verdi
Melodie-Valse ....Schütt
"In the Hall of the Mountain King" ....Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JULY 8.

TWO MORE POPS

At the last Pop concert of the season but one, in Symphony Hall tonight, the Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following popular program:

March, "El Capitan"...............Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina'.'........Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".......Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major.....Brahms
Valse Triste........................Sibelius
Marche Slave..............Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"...................Verdi
Melodia—Valse......................Schutt
"In in Hall of the Mountain King"...Grieg

HERALD-MAY 8.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the last Pop concert of the season but one, to take place in Symphony Hall tonight, the orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following popular programme:

March, "El Capitan" ....Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ....Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" ....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Hungarian Dance in D major.........Brahms
Valse Triste ....Sibelius
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ....Verdi
Melodie-Valse ....Schutt
"In the Hall of the Mountain King"....Grieg

POST-JULY 8.

POPS CLOSE TONIGHT

A program rich in the most popular of Pops music will further enliven the closing night of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, which is always an event of special interest and attraction. This final program follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators.......Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".......Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"...................Verdi
Cymbal dance...............Chaminade
Largo from "The New World Symphony"........................ Dvorak
'Lion du Bal".......................Gillet
Overture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinson

HERALD-JULY 9.

[134]

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND